thus inſtantlie required of his brother in law, and nothing leſſe imagining than that which was pretended, gentlie granted to fulfill his requeſt. Which thing obteined, all the lords of the conſpiracie departed home to their houſes, as they noiſed it, to ſet armorers on worke about the trimming of their armour againſt the iuſts, and to prepare all other furniture and things readie, as to ſuch an high & ſolemne triumph apperteined. The earle of Huntington came to his houſe and raiſed men on euerie ſide, and prepared horſſe and harneſſe for his compaſſed purpoſe, and when he had all things readie, he departed towards Oxenford, and at his comming thither, he found all his mates and confederates there, well appointed for their purpoſe, except the earle of Rutland, by whoſe follie their practiſed conſpiracie was brought to light and diſcloſed to king Henrie. For this earle of Rutland departing before from Weſtminſter to ſée his father the duke of Yorke, as he ſat at dinner, had his counterpane of the indenture of the confederacie in his boſome.

The duke of Yorke taketh the indenture from his ſon.

The father eſpieng it, would néeds ſée what it was: and though the ſonne humblie denied to ſhew it, the father being more earneſt to ſée it, by force tooke it out of his boſome; and perceiuing the contents thereof, in a great rage cauſed his horſſes to be ſadled out of hand, and ſpitefullie reprouing his ſonne of treaſon, for whome he was become ſuertie and mainpernour for his good abearing in open parlement, he incontinentlie mounted on horſſebacke to ride towards Windſore to the king, to declare vnto him the malicious intent of his complices. The earle of Rutland ſéeing in what danger he ſtood, tooke his horſſe, and rode another waie to Windſore in poſt, ſo that he got thither before his father, and when he was alighted at the caſtell gate, he cauſed the gates to be ſhut, ſaieng that he muſt néeds deliuer the keies to the king. When he came before the kings preſence, he knéeled downe on his knées, beſéeching him of mercie and forgiueneſſe, and declaring the whole matter vnto him in order as euerie thing had paſſed, obteined pardon. Therewith came his father, and being let in, deliuered the indenture which he had taken from his ſonne, vnto the king, who thereby perceiuing his ſonnes words to be true, changed his purpoſe for his going to Oxenford, and diſpatched meſſengers forth to ſignifie vnto the earle of Northumberland his high conſtable, and to the earle of Weſtmerland his high marſhall, and to other his aſſured fréends, of all the doubtfull danger and perillous ieopardie.

The earle of Rutland vttereth ÿ whole conſpiracie to the king.

The conſpirators being at Oxenford, at length perceiued by the lacke of the earle of Rutland, that their enterpriſe was reuealed to the king, and therevpon determined now openlie with ſpeare and ſhield to bring that to paſſe which before they couertlie attempted, and ſo they adorned Maudelen, a man moſt reſembling king Richard, in roiall and princelie veſture, and named him to be king Richard, affirming that by fauour of his kéepers he was eſcaped out of priſon, and ſo they came forwards in order of warre, to the intent to deſtroie king Henrie. Whileſt the confederators with their new publiſhed idoll, accompanied with a ſtrong armie of men, tooke the direct waie towards Windſore, king Henrie admoniſhed thereof, with a few horſſemen in the night came to the Tower of London about twelue of the clocke, where in the morning he cauſed the maior of the citie to apparell in armour the beſt and moſt courageous perſons of the citie, which brought to him thrée thouſand archers, and thrée thouſand bill-men, beſides them that were appointed to kéepe and defend the citie.

Magdalen counterfeited to be king Richard.

The K. commeth to the tower of London.

The lords come to Windeſore.

The conſpirators comming to Windſore, entered the caſtell, and vnderſtanding that the king was gon from thence to London, determined with all ſpéed to make towards the citie: but changing that determination as they were on their waie, they turned to Colbroke, and there ſtaied. King Henrie iſſuing out of London with twentie thouſand men, came ſtreight to Hunſlo heath, and there pitched his campe to abide the comming of his enimies: but when they were aduertiſed of the kings puiſſance, amazed with feare, and forthinking their begun enterpriſe, as men miſtruſting their owne companie, departed from thence to Berkhamſtéed, and ſo to Circeſter, & there the lords tooke their lodging. The earle of Kent, and the earle of Saliſburie in one Inne, and the earle of Huntington and lord Spenſer in an other, and all the hoſt laie in the fields, wherevpon in the night ſeaſon, the bailiffe of the towne with fourеſcore archers ſet on the houſe, where the erle of Kent and the other laie, which houſe was manfullie aſſaulted and ſtronglie defended a great ſpace. The earle of Huntington being in an other Inne with the lord Spenſer, ſet fire on diuerſe houſes in the towne, thinking that the aſſailants would leaue the aſſault and reſcue their goods, which thing they nothing regarded. The hoſt lieng without, hearing noiſe, and ſéeing this fire in the towne, thought verelie that king Henrie had béene come thither with his puiſſance, and therevpon fled without meaſure, euerie man making ſhift to ſaue himſelfe, and ſo that which the lords deuiſed for their helpe, wrought their deſtruction: for if the armie that laie without the towne had not miſtaken the matter, when they ſaw the houſes on fire, they might eaſilie haue ſuccoured their chéefeteins in the towne, that were aſſailed but with a few of the towneſmen, in compariſon of the great multitude that laie abroad in the fields. But ſuch was the ordinance of the mightie Lord of hoſtes, who diſpoſeth althings at his pleaſure.

The king goeth foorth againſt them.

They retire.

They come to Circeſter.

The bailiffe of Circeſter ſetteth vpon them on their lodgings.

The earle of Huntington and his companie ſéeing the force of the towneſmen to increaſe, fled out on the backſide, intending to repaire to the armie which they found diſperſed and gone. Then the earle ſéeing no hope of comfort, fled into Eſſex. The other lords which were left fighting in the towne of Circeſter, were wounded to death and taken, and their heads ſtricken off and ſent to London. Thus writeth Hall of this conſpiracie, in following what author I know not. But Thomas Walſingham and diuerſe other ſéeme ſomewhat to diſſent from him in relation of this matter: for they write that the conſpiratours ment vpon the ſudden to haue ſet vpon the king in the caſtell of Windſore, vnder colour of a maſke or mummerie, and ſo to haue diſpatched him; and reſtoring king Richard vnto the kingdome, to haue recouered their former titles of honour, with the poſſeſſions which they had loſt by iudgement of the laſt parlement. But the king getting knowledge of their pretenſed treaſons, got him with all ſpéed vnto London.

Thom. Walſ.

A maſke.

The conſpirators, to wit, the earles of Kent and Saliſburie, ſir Raſe Lumlie, and others, ſuppoſing that the king had not vnderſtood their malicious purpoſe, the firſt ſundaie of the new yeare, which fell in the octaues of the Innocents, came in the twilight of the euening vnto Windſore with foure hundred armed men, where vnderſtanding that the king was withdrawne vpon warning had of their purpoſed intention, they forthwith returned backe, and came firſt vnto Sunnings, a manor place not farre from Reading, where the quéene wife to king Richard then laie. Here ſetting a good countenance of the matter, the earle of Kent declared in preſence of the quéenes ſeruants that the lord Henrie of Lancaſter was fled from his preſence with his children and fréends, and had ſhut vp himſelfe & them in the Tower of London, as one afraid to come abroad, for all the brags made heretofore of his manhood: and therefore (ſaith he) my intention is (my lords) to go to Richard that was, is, and ſhall be our king, who being alreadie eſcaped forth of priſon, lieth now at Pomfret, with an hundred thouſand men. And to cauſe his ſpéech the better to be beléeued, he tooke awaie the kings cogniſances from them that ware the ſame, as the collars from their necks, and the badges of creſſants from the ſléeues of the ſeruants of houſhold, and throwing them awaie, ſaid that ſuch cogniſances were no longer to be borne.

Thus hauing put the quéene in a vaine hope of that which was nothing ſo, they departed from thence vnto Wallingford, and after to Abington, intiſing the people by all meanes poſſible vnto rebellion, all the waie as they went, and ſending their agents abroad for the ſame purpoſe: at length they came to Circeſter in the darke of the night, and tooke vp their lodgings. The inhabitants of that towne ſuſpecting the matter, and iudging (as the truth was) theſe rumors which the lords ſpred abroad to be but dreams, they tooke thereupon counſell togither, got them to armor, and ſtopped all the entries and outgates of the Innes where theſe new gheſtes were lodged, inſomuch that when they about midnight ſecretlie attempted to haue come forth, and gone their waies, the townesmen with bow and arrowes were readie to ſtaie them, and keepe them in. The lords perceiuing the danger, got them to their armor and weapons, and did their beſt by force to breake through and repell the towneſmen. But after they had fought from midnight till thrée of the clocke in the afternoone of the next daie, and perceiued they could not preuaile, they yéelded themſelues to the towneſmen, beſéeching them to haue their liues ſaued, till they might come to the kings preſence.

The lords yéeld themſelues.

A prieſt ſet fire on the houſes of Circeſter.

This requeſt they had obteined, if a préeſt that was chapleine to one of them, had not in the meane time ſet fire vpon certeine houſes in the towne, to the end that whiles the towneſmen ſhould buſie themſelues to quench the fire, the lords might find meanes to eſcape. But it came nothing to paſſe as he imagined, for the towneſmen leauing all care to ſaue their houſes from the rage of the fire, were kindled more in furie towards the lords, and ſo to reuenge themſelues of them, they brought them forth of the abbeie where they had them in their hands, and in the twilight of the euening, ſtroke off their heads. ¶ The earle of Saliſburie (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) who in all his life time had béene a fauourer of the Lollards or Wickleuiſts, a deſpiſer of images, a contemner of canons, and a ſcorner of the ſacraments, ended his daies (as it was reported) without the * ſacrament of confeſſion. Theſe be the words of Thom. Walſ. which are ſet downe, to ſignifie that the earle of Saliſburie was a bidden gheſt to blockham feaſt with the reſt: and (as it ſhould ſéeme by his relation) the more maligned, bicauſe he was ſomwhat eſtranged frõ the corruption of the religion then receiued, and leaned to a ſect purſued with ſpitefulneſſe and reuenge.

The lords beheaded.

Chr. S. Alb.

John Holl and earle of Huntington (as Thomas Walſingham writeth) was not with the lords at the caſtell of Windſore, but ſtaied about London to behold the end of his buſineſſe: and hearing how the matter went, farre contrarie to that he wiſhed, he ſought to flie by ſea; but not able to get awaie, by reaſon the wind being contrarie would not permit him, he tooke his horſſe, and hauing a knight with him called ſir John Shellie, he road into Eſſex, attempting to haue fled from thence by ſea: but ſtill the wind was ſo againſt him, that he was continuallie driuen backe when he was about to make ſaile, and ſo comming againe to land, he was taken one euening at Pitwell in Eſſex, in a mill (that belonged to one of his truſtie fréends) as he ſat there at ſupper, togither with the ſaid ſir John Shellie. The commons of the countrie that tooke him, brought him firſt to Chelmeſford, and after to Plaſhie, where on the daie of S. Maure, that is the fiftéenth of Ianuarie, about ſun ſetting he was beheaded, in the verie place in which the duke of Gloceſter was arreſted by king Richard. He confeſſed with lamentable repentance (as writers doo record) that diuers & manie waies he had offended God and his prince, bicauſe that vnderſtanding the purpoſe of the other lords, he had not reuealed the ſame.

The earle of Huntington taken.

He is beheaded.

The lord * Hugh Spenſer, otherwiſe called earle of Gloceſter, as he would haue fled into Wales, was taken and carried to Briſtow, where (according to the earneſt deſires of the commons) he was beheaded. Maudelen fléeing into Scotland, was taken by the waie, and brought to the Tower. Manie other that were priuie to this conſpiracie, were taken, and put to death, ſome at Oxford, as ſir Thomas Blunt, ſir Benet Cilie knight, and Thomas Wintercell eſquier; but ſir Leonard Brokas, and ſir John Shellie knights, John Maudelen, and William Ferbie chapleins, were drawne, hanged, and beheaded at London. There were ninetéene in all executed in one place and other, and the heads of the chéefe conſpirators were ſet on polles ouer London bridge, to the terror of others. Shortlie after, the abbat of Weſtminſter, in whoſe houſe the conſpiracie was begun (as is ſaid) gooing betwéene his monaſterie & manſion, for thought fell into a ſudden palſie, and ſhortlie after, without ſpéech, ended his life. The biſhop of Carleill was impeached, and condemned of the ſame conſpiracie; but the king of his mercifull clemencie, pardoned him of that offenſe, although he died ſhortlie after, more through feare than force of ſickneſſe, as ſome haue written. Thus all the aſſociats of this vnhappie conſpiracie taſted the painefull penance of their pleſant paſtime.

The biſhop of Carleill dieth through feare, or rather through grefe of mind, to ſe the wicked proſper as he tooke it. Hall.

Thus haue yée heard what writers haue recorded of this matter, with ſome difference betwixt them that write, how the king ſhould haue béene made awaie at a iuſts; and other that teſtifie, how it ſhould haue béene at a maſke or mummerie: but whether they meant to haue diſpatched him at a mumming, or at a iuſts, their purpoſe being reuealed by the earle of Rutland, they were brought to confuſion (as before yée haue heard.) And immediatlie after, king Henrie, to rid himſelfe of anie ſuch like danger to be attempted againſt him thereafter, cauſed king Richard to die of a violent death, that no man ſhould afterward faine himſelfe to repreſent his perſon, though ſome haue ſaid, he was not priuie to that wicked offenſe. The common fame is, that he was euerie daie ſerued at the table with coſtlie meat, like a king, to the intent that no creature ſhould ſuſpect anie thing doone contrarie to the order taken in the parlement; and when the meat was ſet before him, he was forbidden once to touch it; yea, he was not permitted ſo much as to ſmell to it, and ſo he died of forced famine.

The ſundrie reports of K. Richar. death.

¶ But Thomas Walſingham is ſo farre from imputing his death to compulſorie famine, that he referreth it altogither to voluntarie pining of himſelfe. For when he heard that the complots and attempts of ſuch his fauourers, as ſought his reſtitution, and their owne aduancement, adnihilated; and the chéefe agents ſhamefullie executed; he tooke ſuch a conceit at theſe miſfortunes (for ſo Thomas Walſingham termeth them) and was ſo beaten out of hart, that wilfullie he ſtarued himſelfe, and ſo died in Pomfret

Abr. Fl. out of Thom. Walſ. pag. 404, 40 caſtell on S. Valentines daie: a happie daie to him, for it was the beginning of his eaſe, and the ending of his paine: ſo that death was to him daintie and ſweet, as the poet ſaith, and that verie well in breefe,

One writer, which ſeemeth to haue great knowledge of king Richards dooings, ſaith, that king Henrie, ſitting on a daie at his table, ſore ſighing, ſaid; Haue I no faithfull freend which will deliuer me of him, whoſe life will be my death, and whoſe death will be the preſeruation of my life? This ſaieng was much noted of them which were preſent, and eſpeciallie of one called ſir Piers of Exton. This knight incontinentlie departed from the court, with eight ſtrong perſons in his companie, and came to Pomfret, commanding the eſquier that was accuſtomed to ſew and take the aſſaie before king Richard, to doo ſo no more, ſaieng; Let him eat now, for he ſhall not long eat. King Richard ſat downe to dinner, and was ſerued without courteſie or aſſaie, wherevpon much maruelling at the ſudden change, he demanded of the eſquier whie he did not his dutie; Sir (ſaid he) I am otherwiſe commanded by ſir Piers of Exton, which is newlie come from K. Henrie. When king Richard heard that word, he tooke the keruing knife in his hand, and ſtrake the eſquier on the head, ſaieng The diuell take Henrie of Lancaſter and thee togither. And with that word, ſir Piers entred the chamber, well armed, with eight tall men likewiſe armed, euerie of them hauing a bill in his hand.

Thom Walſin.

Sir Piers de Exton a murtherer of king Richard.

King Richard perceiuing this, put the table from him, & ſteping to the formoſt man, wrung the bill out of his hands, & ſo valiantlie defended himſelfe, that he ſlue foure of thoſe that thus came to aſſaile him. Sir Piers being halfe diſmaied herewith, lept into the chaire where king Richard was woont to ſit, while the other foure perſons fought with him, and chaſed him about the chamber. And in concluſion, as king Richard trauerſed his ground, from one ſide of the chamber to an other, & comming by the chaire, where ſir Piers ſtood, he was felled with a ſtroke of a pollax which ſir Piers gaue him vpon the head, and therewith rid him out of life, without giuing him reſpit once to call to God for mercie of his paſſed offenſes. It is ſaid, that ſir Piers of Exton, after he had thus ſlaine him, wept right bitterlie, as one ſtriken with the pricke of a giltie conſcience, for murthering him, whome he had ſo long time obeied as king. After he was thus dead, his bodie was imbalmed, and ſeered, and couered with lead, all ſaue the face, to the intent that all men might ſee him, and perceiue that he was departed this life: for as the corps was conueied from Pomfret to London, in all the townes and places where thoſe that had the conueiance of it did ſtaie with it all night, they cauſed dirige to be ſoong in the euening, and maſſe of Requiem in the morning; and as well after the one ſeruice as the other, his face diſcouered, was ſhewed to all that coueted to behold it.

K. Richard murthered.

Thus was the corps firſt brought to the Tower, and after through the citie, to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule bare faced, where it laie three daies togither, that all men might behold it. There was a ſolemne obſequie doone for him, both at Paules, and after at Weſtminſter, at which time, both at dirige ouernight, and in the morning at the maſſe of Requiem, the king and the citizens of London were preſent. When the ſame was ended, the corps was commanded to be had vnto Langlie, there to be buried in the church of the friers preachers. The biſhop of Cheſter, the abbats of ſaint Albons and Waltham, celebrated the exequies for the buriall, none of the nobles nor anie of the commons (to accompt of) being preſent: neither was there anie to bid them to dinner after they had laid him in the ground, and finiſhed the funerall ſeruice. He was after by king Henrie the fift remoued to Weſtminſter, and there honorablie intoomed with queene Anne his wife, although the Scots vntruelie write, that he eſcaped out of priſon, and led a vertuous and a ſolitarie life in Scotland, and there died, & is buried (as they hold) in the blacke friers at Sterling. ¶ But Fabian and others doo as it were point out the place of his interrement, ſaieng that he lieth intoomed on the ſouth ſide of ſaint Edwards ſhrine, with an epitaph expreſſing partlie his proportion of bodie and partlie his properties of mind, as after followeth in a rimed hexaſtichon:

When the newes of king Richards depoſing was reported in France, king Charles and all his court wondering, deteſted and abhorred ſuch an iniurie doone to an annointed king, to a crowned prince, and to the head of a realme: but in eſpeciall, Walerane earle of ſaint Paule, which had married king Richards halfe ſiſter, mooued with great diſdaine towards king Henrie, ceaſſed not to ſtirre king Charles & his councell to make warres againſt the Engliſhmen, and he himſelfe ſent letters of defiance into England. The earles ſute was eaſilie agreed vnto, and an armie roiall appointed with all ſpeed, to inuade England. The armie was come downe into Picardie, redie to be tranſported into England: but when it was certeinelie knowen, that king Richard was dead, and that the enterpriſe of his deliuerance (which was cheeflie meant) was fruſtrate and void, the armie was diſſolued. But when the certeintie of K. Richards death was intimate to the Gaſcoignes, the moſt part of the wiſeſt men of the countrie were right penſiue: for they iudged verelie, that hereby the Engliſh nation ſhould be brought to diſhonour, and loſſe of their ancient fame and glorie, for committing ſo heinous an offenſe againſt their king and ſouereigne lord, the memorie whereof (as they thought) would neuer die: and cheeflie, the citizens of Burdeaux tooke the matter verie ſore at the ſtomach: for they bare exceeding fauour to king Richard, becauſe he was borne and brought vp in their citie, and therefore more than all the reſidue they ſhewed themſelues to abhorre ſo heinous a deed.

Forren princes not without cauſe abhorre to heare of the ſhamefull murther of king Richard.

How the Gaſcoignes tooke the death of K. Richard.

The Frenchmen hauing vnderſtanding hereof, thought with themſelues that now was the time for them to practiſe with the Gaſcoignes to reduce them from the Engliſh obeiſance, vnder their ſubiection. Herevpon came Lewes duke of Burbon vnto Agen, and wrote to diuerſe cities and townes, on the confines of Guien, exhorting them with large promiſes, and faire ſugred words, to reuolt from the Engliſhmen, and to become ſubiects to the crowne of France; but his trauell preuailed not: for the people vnderſtanding that the Engliſh yoke was but eaſie in compariſon to the French bondage, determined to abide rather in their old ſubiection, than for a diſpleaſure irrecouerable to aduenture themſelues on a new doubtfull perill; yet it was doubted, leaſt the cities of Burdeaux, Dax, and Baion, would haue reuolted, if the lords of the marches about thoſe places had leaned to them in that purpoſe, for they ſent their commiſſioners to Agen, to treate with the duke of Burbon. But forſomuch as the lords, Pomiers, Mucident, Duras, Landuras, Copane, Roſem, & Langurant, were minded to continue ſtill Engliſh, thoſe cities durſt not without them turne to the French obeiſance,

The earle of worceſter ſent into Gaſcoigne.

King Henrie being aduertiſed of the Frenchmens couert meanings, and alſo of the wauering minds of the Gaſcoignes, ſent Thomas Perſie earle of Worceſter with two hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers into Guien, to aid and aſſiſt ſir Robert Knols, his lieutenant there. The chiefeſt capteines that accompanied the earle in this iournie were theſe: firſt, his nephue ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir Thomas Colleuill, ſir William Liſle, Iohn de Graillie baſe ſonne to the capitall de Boeuf, ſir William Draiton, ſir Iohn Daubreticourt: alſo there went with him the biſhop of London, and maſter Richard Doall or Dolleie. The earle at his arriuall ſo wiſelie intreated the noble men, ſo grauelie perſuaded the magiſtrats of the cities and townes, and ſo gentlie and familiarlie vſed and treated the commons, that he not onelie appeaſed their furie and malice, but brought them to louing and vniforme obeiſance, receiuing of them othes of obedience, & loiall fealtie, which doone, he returned againe into England with great thanks.

Ambaſſadors from the French king.

Abr.Fl.out of Fabian, pag. 364.

The French king perceiuing he could not bring his purpoſe about, neither by inuading England, nor by practiſing with the Gaſcoignes, ſent a ſolemne ambaſſage into England, requiring to haue his daughter the ladie Iſabell, ſometime eſpouſed to king Richard, reſtored to him againe. King Henrie gentlie receiued thoſe that were ſent to him about this meſſage, and for anſwer, promiſed to ſend his commiſſioners vnto Calis, which ſhould further commune and conclude with them. ¶ This ſéemeth diſſonant from the report of Fabian deriued out of Gagwine. For he ſaith that Charles hearing of the ſuppreſſion of K. Richard, ſent 2 of his houſhold knights into England, requiring king Henrie the fourth, then newlie made king, to ſend home his daughter Iſabell, latelie married vnto king Richard, with ſuch dowrie as with hir was promiſed. In dooing of which meſſage king Henrie tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that he threw the ſaid two knights in priſon; where through one of them (named Blanchet) died in England, and the other called Henrie, after great ſickneſſe returned into France: wherefore if Fabian plaie not the fabler, thoſe that were ſent on the ſaid meſſage were not gentlie receiued of king Henrie; vnleſſe to be caſt in priſon and diſcourteouſlie dealt withall ſtand countable for beneuolence & gentle interteinment. But to remit this and the like variances among writers to ſuch as can reconcile them, let vs returne to the ſtorie.

Open warre proclamed by the king of Scots againſt England.

Thom.Walſ.

Robert Logon taken priſoner.

It was not inough that K. Henrie was thus troubled now in the firſt yere of his reigne, with ciuill ſedition, and the couert practiſes of Frenchmen; but that the Scots alſo tooke vpon them to make open warre againſt him: it chanced (as in the Scotiſh chronicles more at large appeareth) that George of Dunbar, earle of the marches of Scotland, being in diſpleaſure with Robert king of Scots, fled into England, to Henrie earle of Northumberland, wherevpon the Scotiſh king depriued him of all his dignities and poſſeſſions, and cauſed his goods to be confiſcate, and after wrote to the king of England, requiring him if he would haue the truce anie longer to continue, either to deliuer into his poſſeſſion the earle of March and other traitors to his perſon, or elſe to baniſh them out of his realmes and dominions. King Henrie diſcréetly anſwerd the herald of Scotland, that the words of a prince ought to be kept: and his writings and ſeale to be inuiolate; and conſidering that he had granted a ſafe conduct to the earle and his companie, he ſhould neither without cauſe reaſonable breake his promiſe, nor yet deface his honor. Which anſwer declared to the king of Scots, he incontinentlie proclaimed open warre againſt the king of England, with fire and ſword. Herevpon, one ſir Robert Logon, a Scotiſh knight, with certeine ſhips well appointed for the warre, meant to haue deſtroied the Engliſh fléet that was come on the coaſts of Scotland, about Aberden, to fiſh there: but (as it chanced) he met with certeine ſhips of Lin, that fought with him, and tooke him priſoner, with the reſidue of his companie, ſo that he quite failed of his purpoſe, and came to the loſſe himſelfe.

Anno Reg. 2.

At the ſame time, the Engliſhmen ſpoiled alſo certeine of the Iles of Orkenſie. This ſummer, great death chanced in this land, manie dieng of the peſtilence, wherewith ſundrie places were infected. King Henrie perceiuing that policie oftentimes preuenteth perill, and vnderſtanding the naughtie purpoſes of the Scots, gathered a great armie, and entred into Scotland, burning townes, villages, and caſtels, with a great part of the townes of Edenburgh and Léeth, and beſieged the caſtell of Edenburgh in the end of September, whereof was capteine Dauid duke of Rothſaie, and a prince of the realme, with Archembald earle of Dowglas, hauing with them manie hardie men of warre. Robert duke of Albanie, that was appointed gouernour of the realme, becauſe the king was ſicke and not méet to rule, ſent an herald vnto king Henrie, promiſing him battell within ſix daies at the furtheſt, if he would ſo long tarrie, which king Henrie promiſed to doo right gladlie, and gaue to the herald for bringing him ſo acceptable newes, a gowne of ſilke, and a cheine of gold. But king Henrie ſtaied ſix daies, and ſixtéene too, without hearing any word of the gouernors comming. Then the winter beginning to war cold, and foule weather ſtill increaſing, cauſed the king to breake vp his ſiege, and ſo returned without battell or ſkirmiſh offered.

Owen Glendouer what he was.

In the meane time that the king was thus in Scotland, the Scots made a rode into Northumberland, and burned diuerſe townes in Bamburrough ſhire. At the kings comming backe to Yorke, there were two ſtrangers, the one a Frenchman, and the other an Italian, requiring to accompliſh certeine feats of armes, againſt ſir Iohn Cornewall, and Ianico de Artois. Their requeſt was granted, and the ſtrangers were put to the woorſt, whereby ſir Iohn Cornewall obteined the kings fauour ſo farre foorth, that he married the kings ſiſter, the widow of Iohn Holland, earle of Huntington. Yet ſome ſaid, that the knight and the counteſſe were agréed aforehand, without the kings conſent. In the kings abſence, whileſt he was foorth of the realme in Scotland againſt his enimies, the Welſhmen tooke occaſion to rebell vnder the conduct of their capteine Owen Glendouer, dooing what miſchéefe they could deuiſe, vnto their Engliſh neighbours. This Owen Glendouer was ſonne to an eſquier of Wales, named Griffith Vichan: he dwelled in the pariſh of Conwaie, within the countie of Merioneth in Northwales, in a place called Glindourwie, which is as much to ſaie in Engliſh, as The vallie by the ſide of the water of Dée, by occaſion whereof he was ſurnamed Glindour Dew.

He was firſt ſet to ſtudie the lawes of the realme, and became an vtter barreſter, or an apprentiſe of the law (as they terme him) and ſerued king Richard at Flint caſtell, when he was taken by Henrie duke of Lancaſter, though other haue written that he ſerued this king Henrie the fourth, before he came to atteine the crowne, in roome of an eſquier, and after, by reaſon of variance that roſe betwixt him and the lord Reginald Greie of Ruthin, about the lands which he claimed to be his by right of inheritance: when he ſaw that he might not preuaile, finding no ſuch fauor in his ſute as he looked for, he firſt made warre againſt the ſaid lord Greie, waſting his lands and poſſeſſions with fire and ſword, cruellie killing his ſeruants and tenants. The king aduertiſed of ſuch rebellious exploits, enterpriſed by the ſaid Owen, and his vnrulie complices, determined to chaſtiſe them, as diſturbers of his peace, and ſo with an armie entered into Wales; but the Welſhmen with their capteine withdrew into the mounteines of Snowdon, ſo to eſcape the reuenge, which the king meant towards them. The king therefore did much hurt in the countries with fire and ſword, ſleing diuerſe that with weapon in hand came foorth to reſiſt him, and ſo with a great bootie of beaſts and cattell he returned.

The emperour of Conſtantinople comming into England to ſue for aid againſt the Turkes, was met by the king on Blackeheath, vpon the feaſt day of ſaint Thomas the apoſtle, and brought vnto London with great honor. The king bare all his charges, preſenting him with gifts at his departure, meet for ſuch an eſtate. After the feaſt of the Epiphanie, a parlement was holden, in which an act was made, againſt thoſe that held opinions in religion, contrarie to the receiued doctrine of the church of Rome; ordeining, that whereſoeuer any of them were found and proued to ſet foorth ſuch doctrine, they ſhould be apprehended, and deliuered to the biſhop their dioceſane; and if they ſtood ſtiffelie in their opinions, and would not be reformed, they ſhould be deliuered to the ſecular power, to be burnt to aſhes. The firſt that taſted the ſmart of this ſtatute, was one William Hawtrée or Sawtrée a prieſt, that being apprehended was burnt in Smithfield, in time of this parlement.

About the ſame time, king Henrie (according to promiſe made (as ye haue heard) vnto the French ambaſſadors, ſent ouer into the countrie of Guiſnes, Edward earle of Rutland, otherwiſe in king Richards daies intituled duke of Aumarle, ſon to Edmund duke of Yorke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, and his ſonne the lord Henrie Perſie, the lord Yuan Fitzwarren, the biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincolne: where the duke of Burbon, the lords Charles d'Albert, Charles de Hangeſt, John de Chaſtelmorant, the Patriarke of Jeruſalem, and the biſhops of Paris and Beauuois, were readie there to commune with them, and ſo they aſſembling togither at ſundrie times and places, the Frenchmen required to haue queene Iſabell to them reſtored, but the Engliſhmen ſéemed loth to depart with hir, requiring to haue hir married to Henrie prince of Wales, one in blood and age in all things to hir equall; but the Frenchmen would in no wiſe condeſcend thereto, without their kings conſent, who at that preſent was not in caſe to vtter his mind, being troubled with his woonted diſeaſe. The commiſſioners then began to treat of peace, and at length renewed the truce to endure for ſix and twentie yeares yet to come; wherevnto the foure yeares paſſed being added, made vp the number of thirtie yeares, according to the concluſion agreed vpon, in the life time of king Richard.

Some authors affirme, that there was a new league concluded. to continue, during the liues of both the princes. The Frenchmen diuerſe times required to haue ſome dower aſſigned foorth for queene Iſabell, but that was at all times vtterlie denied, for that the marriage betwixt hir and king Richard was neuer conſummate, by reaſon whereof ſhe was not dowable. Neuertheleſſe, ſhe was ſhortlie after ſent home, vnder the conduct of the earle of Worceſter, aſſociat with diuerſe other noble and honorable perſonages, both men and women, hauing with hir all the iewels, ornaments, and plate which ſhe brought into England, with a great ſurpluſage beſides giuen to hir by the king. She was deliuered betwixt Bullongne and Calis, to Valeran earle of ſaint Paule, the French kings lieutenant in Picardie, who being accompanied with the biſhop of Chartres, the lord de Hugueuile, the ladie of Monpenſier ſiſter to the erle of March, the ladie of Lucenburgh ſiſter to the ſaid earle of ſaint Paule, & diuerſe other ladies and gentlewomen, which receiued hir with great ioy and gladneſſe, and taking leaue of the Engliſh lords and ladies, they conueied hir to the dukes of Burgognie and Burbon, that attended for hir, not far off, vpon a hill, with a great number of people. They firſt conueied hir to Bullogne, & after to Abuile, from whence the duke of Orleance conueied hir to Paris, vnto the preſence of the king hir father, and the queene hir mother: ſhe was after giuen in marriage vnto Charles, ſonne to Lewes duke of Orleance.

About the ſame time, Owen Glendouer and his Welſhmen did much hurt to the kings ſubiects. One night as the king was going to bed, he was in danger to haue beene deſtroied; for ſome naughtie traitorous perſons had conueied into his bed a certeine iron made with ſmiths craft, like a caltrop, with three long prickes, ſharpe and ſmall, ſtanding vpright, in ſuch ſort, that when he had laid him downe, & that the weight of his bodie ſhould come vpon the bed, he ſhould haue beene thruſt in with thoſe pricks, and peraduenture ſlaine: but as God would, the king not thinking of any ſuch thing, chanced yet to feele and perceiue the inſtrument before he laid him downe, and ſo eſcaped the danger. ¶ Howbeit he was not ſo ſoone deliuered from feare; for he might well haue his life in ſuſpicion, & prouide for the preſeruation of the ſame; ſith perils of death crept into his ſecret chamber, and laie lurking in the bed of downe where his bodie was to be repoſed and to take reſt. Oh what a ſuſpected ſtate therefore is that of a king holding his regiment with the hatred of his people, the hartgrudgings of his courtiers, and the peremptorie practiſes of both togither? Could he confidentlie compoſe or ſetle himſelfe to ſleepe for feare of ſtrangling? Durſt he boldly eat and drinke without dread of poiſoning? Might he aduenture to ſhew himſelfe in great méetings or ſolemne aſſemblies without miſtruſt of miſcheefe againſt his perſon intended? What pleaſure or what felicitie could he take in his princelie pompe, which he knew by manifeſt and fearefull experience, to be enuied and maligned to the verie death? The ſtate of ſuch a king is noted by the poet in Dionyſius, as in a mirror, concerning whome it is ſaid, Hor. lib. ca. 3. Ode. 1.

This yeare, the eight day of Aprill deceaſſed the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike. In the moneth of March appeared a blaſing ſtarre, firſt betwéene the eaſt part of the firmament and the north, flaſhing foorth fire and flames round about it, and laſtlie, ſhooting foorth fierie beams towards the north, foreſhewing (as was thought) the great effuſion of blood that followed, about the parts of Wales and Northumberland. For much about the ſame time, Owen Glendouer (with his Welſhmen) fought with the lord Greie of Ruthen, comming foorth to defend his poſſeſſions, which the ſame Owen waſted and deſtroied: and as the fortune of that daies worke fell out, the lord Greie was taken priſoner, and manie of his men were ſlaine. This hap lifted the Welſhmen into high pride, and increaſed meruellouſlie their wicked and preſumptuous attempts.

The prior of Laund apprehended.

About Whitſuntide a conſpiracie was deuiſed by certeine perſons, that wiſhed the kings death, mainteining and bruting abroad, that king Richard was aliue, and therefore exhorted men to ſtand with him, for ſhortlie he would come to light, and reward ſuch as tooke his part with iuſt recompenſe. Herewith, there was a prieſt taken at Ware, or (as ſome books haue) at Warwike, who had a kalendar or roll, in which a great number of names were written, more than were in any wiſe guiltie of the fact, as afterwards appeared by the ſame prieſts confeſſion. For being examined, whether he knew ſuch perſons as he had ſo inrolled, & were there preſent before him, he ſaid he neuer knew them at all; and being demanded wherefore he had then ſo recorded their names, he anſwered, bicauſe he thought they would gladlie doo what miſchiefe they could againſt king Henrie, vpon any occaſion offered in reuenge of the iniuries doone to king Richard, by whom they had beene aduanced, and princelie preferred. When therfore there appeared no more credit in the man, he was condemned, drawen, hanged, and quartered, and diuerſe that had beene apprehended about that matter, were releaſed, and ſet at libertie. Shortlie after, the prior of Laund (who for his euill gouernment had béene depriued of his ſtate and dignitie) was likewiſe executed, not for attempting any thing of himſelfe, but onlie for that he confeſſed, that he knew euill counſell and concealed it. His name was Walter Baldocke, a canon ſometime in Dunſtable, and by king Richard promoted to the priorſhip of Laund.

Greie friers apprehended.

The diuell appeareth in likeneſſe of a greie frier.

Alſo the ſame time, certeine greie friers were apprehended for treaſon which they had deuiſed to bring to paſſe, and one of them, whoſe name was Richard Friſebie, being aſked what he would doo if king Richard had béene aliue, and preſent with them, anſwered ſtoutlie, that he would fight againſt any man in his quarrell, euen to death. Herevpon, he was condemned, drawen, and hanged in his friers wéed, to the great confuſion of his brethren; but they made earneſt inſtance to haue his bodie taken downe, and buried with diriges and exequies, and had their ſute granted. Sir Roger of Claringdon knight was alſo put to death about this conſpiracie, with two of his ſeruants, the one an eſquier, the other a yeoman. He was baſe ſonne (as was reported) vnto Edward, eldeſt ſonne to king Edward the third, ſurnamed the blacke prince. On Corpus Chriſti daie at euenſong time, the diuell (as was thought) appeared in a towne of Eſſex called Danburie, entring into the church in likeneſſe of a greie frier, behauing himſelfe verie outragiouſlie, plaieng his parts like a diuell indéed, ſo that the pariſhioners were put in a maruellous great fright.

Eight friers executed.

The earle of March taken priſoner in battell by Owen Glendouer.

At the ſame inſtant, there chanced ſuch a tempeſt of wind, thunder, and lightning, that the higheſt part of the roofe of that church was blowen downe, and the chancell was all to ſhaken, rent, and torne in péeces. Within a ſmall while after, eight of thoſe greie friers that had practiſed treaſon againſt the king, were brought to open iudgement, and conuicted were drawen and headed at London; and two other ſuffered at Leiceſter, all which perſons had publiſhed king Richard to be aliue. Owen Glendouer, according to his accuſtomed manner, robbing and ſpoiling within the Engliſh borders, cauſed all the forces of the ſhire of Hereford to aſſemble togither againſt them, vnder the conduct of Edmund Mortimer earle of March. But cõming to trie the matter by battell, whether by treaſon or otherwiſe, ſo it fortuned, that the Engliſh power was diſcomfited, the earle taken priſoner, and aboue a thouſand of his people ſlaine in the place. The ſhamefull villanie vſed by the Welſhwomen towards the dead carcaſſes, was ſuch, as honeſt eares would be aſhamed to heare, and continent toongs to ſpeake thereof. The dead bodies might not be buried, without great ſummes of monie giuen for libertie to conueie them awaie.

Scots ouerthrowen.

The king was not haſtie to purchaſe the deliuerance of the earle March, bicauſe his title to the crowne was well inough knowen, and therefore ſuffered him to remaine in miſerable priſon, wiſhing both the ſaid earle, and all other of his linage out of this life, with God and his ſaincts in heauen, ſo they had béene out of the waie, for then all had béene well inough as he thought. But to let theſe things paſſe, the king this yeare ſent his eldeſt daughter Blanch, accõpanied with the earle of Summerſet, the biſhop of Worceſter, the lord Clifford, and others, into Almanie, which brought hir to Colin, and there with great triumph ſhe was maried to William duke of Bauier, ſonne and heire to Lewes the emperour. About mid of Auguſt, the king to chaſtiſe the preſumptuous attempts of the Welſhmen, went with a great power of men into Wales, to purſue the capteine of the Welſh rebell Owen Glendouer, but in effect he loſt his labor; for Owen conueied himſelfe out of the waie, into his knowen lurking places, and (as was thought) through art magike, he cauſed ſuch foule weather of winds, tempeſt, raine, ſnow, and haile to be raiſed, for the annoiance of the kings armie, that the like had not béene heard of; in ſuch ſort, that the king was conſtreined to returne home, hauing cauſed his people yet to ſpoile and burne firſt a great part of the countrie. The ſame time, the lord Edmund of Langlie duke of Yorke departed this life, and was buried at Langlie with his brethren. The Scots vnder the leding of Patrike Hepborne, of the Hales the yoonger, entring into England, were ouerthrowen at Neſbit, in the marches, as in the Scotiſh chronicle ye may find more at large. This battell was fought the two and twentith of Iune, in this yeare of our Lord 1402.

Scots vanquiſhed at Homildon.

Priſoners taken.

The caſtell of Cocklawes beſieged by the lord Perſie.

Archembald earle Dowglas ſore diſpleaſed in his mind for this ouerthrow, procured a commiſſion to inuade England, and that to his coſt, as ye may likewiſe read in the Scotiſh hiſtories. For at a place called Homildon, they were ſo fiercelie aſſailed by the Engliſhmen, vnder the leading of the lord Perſie, ſurnamed Henrie Hotſpur, and George earle of March, that with violence of the Engliſh ſhot they were quite vanquiſhed and put to flight, on the Rood daie in harueſt, with a great ſlaughter made by the Engliſhmen. We know that the Scotiſh writers note this battell to haue chanced in the yeare 1403. But we following Tho. Walſingham in this place, and other Engliſh writers, for the accompt of times, haue thought good to place it in this yeare 1402, as in the ſame writers we find it. There were ſlaine of men of eſtimation, ſir Iohn Swinton, ſir Adam Gordon, ſir Iohn Leuiſton, ſir Alexander Ramſie of Dalehouſie, and thrée and twentie knights, beſides ten thouſand of the commons: and of priſoners among other were theſe, Mordacke earle of Fife, ſon to the gouernour Archembald earle Dowglas, which in the fight loſt one of his eies, Thomas erle of Murrey, Robert earle of Angus, and (as ſome writers haue) the earles of Atholl & Menteith, with fiue hundred other of meaner degrées. After this, the lord Perſie, hauing beſtowed the priſoners in ſuer kéeping, entered Tiuidale, waſting and deſtroieng the whole countrie, and then beſieged the caſtell of Cocklawes, whereof was capteine one ſir Iohn Grenlow, who compounded with the Engliſhmen, that if the caſtell were not ſuccoured within thrée moneths, then he would deliuer it into their hands.

The firſt two moneths paſſed, and no likelihood of reſcue appeared; but yer the third moneth was expired, red, the Engliſhmen being ſent for to go with the king into Wales, raiſed their ſiege and departed, leauing the noble men priſoners with the earle of Northumberland, and with his ſonne the lord Perſie, to keepe them to the kings vſe. In this meane while, ſuch as miſliked with the doctrine and ceremonies then vſed in the church, ceaſſed not to vtter their conſciences, though in ſecret, to thoſe in whome they had affiance. But as in the like caſes it commonlie happeneth, they were bewraied by ſome that were thought chieflie to fauour their cauſe, as by ſir Lewes Clifford knight, who hauing leaned to the doctrine a long time, did now (as Thomas Walſingham writeth) diſcloſe all that he knew vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, to ſhew himſelfe as it were to haue erred rather of ſimpleneſſe and ignorance, than of frowardneſſe or ſtubborne malice. The names of ſuch as taught the articles and concluſions mainteined by thoſe which then they called Lollards or heretikes, the ſaid ſir Lewes Clifford gaue in writing to the ſaid archbiſhop. Edmund Mortimer earle of March, priſoner with Owen Glendouer, whether for irkeſomneſſe of cruell captiuitie, or feare of death, or for what other cauſe, it is vncerteine, agreed to take part with Owen, againſt the king of England, and tooke to wife the daughter of the ſaid Owen.

Strange wonders happened (as men reported) at the natiuitie of this man, for the ſame night he was borne, all his fathers horſſes in the ſtable were found to ſtand in bloud vp to the bellies. The morow after the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, a parlement began at Weſtminſter, which continued the ſpace of ſeauen weekes, in the ſame was a tenth and a halfe granted by the cleargie, and a fifteenth by the communaltie. Moreouer, the commons in this parlement beſought the king to haue the perſon of George earle of March a Scotiſhman, recommended to his maieſtie, for that the ſame earle ſhewed himſelfe faithfull to the king & his realme. ¶ There was alſo a ſtatute made, that the friers beggers ſhould not receiue any into their order, vnder the age of fourteene yeares. In this fourth yeare of king Henries reigne, ambaſſadors were ſent ouer into Britaine, to bring from thence the duches of Britaine, the ladie Iane de Nauarre, the widow of Iohn de Montford, late duke of Britaine, ſurnamed the conqueror, with whom by procurators the king had contracted matrimonie. In the beginning of Februarie, thoſe that were ſent returned with hir in ſafetie, but not without taſting the bitter ſtormes of the wind and weather, that toſſed them ſore to and fro, before they could get to land. The king met hir at Wincheſter, where the ſeuenth of Februarie, the marriage was ſolennized betwixt them.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in dooing in England, Valeran earle of ſaint Paule, bearing ſtill a deadlie and malicious hatred toward king Henrie, hauing aſſembled ſixteene or ſeuenteene hundred men of warre, imbarked them at Harflew, and taking the ſea, landed in the Ile of Wight, in the which he burned two villages, and foure ſimple cotages, and for a triumph of ſo noble an act, made foure knights. But when he heard that the people of the Ile were aſſembled and approched to fight with him, he haſted to his ſhips, and returned home: wherewith the noble men of his companie were diſpleaſed, conſidering his prouiſion to be great and his gaine ſmall. In the ſame verie ſeaſon, Iohn earle of Cleremont ſonne to the duke of Bourbon, wan in Gaſcoigne out of the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion, the caſtels of ſaint Peter, ſaint Marie, and the New caſtell; and the lord de la Bret wan the caſtell of Carlaſſin, which was no ſmall loſſe to the Engliſh nation.

Henrie earle of Northumberland, with his brother Thomas earle of Worceſter, and his ſonne the lord Henrie Perſie, ſurnamed Hotſpur, which were to king Henrie in the beginning of his reigne, both faithfull freends, and earneſt aiders, began now to enuie his wealth and felicitie; and eſpeciallie they were greeued, bicauſe the king demanded of the earle and his ſonne ſuch Scotiſh priſoners as were taken at Homeldon and Neſbit: for of all the captiues which were taken in the conflicts foughten in thoſe two places, there was deliuered to the kings poſſeſſion onelie Mordake earle of Fife, the duke of Albanies ſonne, though the king did diuers and ſundrie times require deliuerance of the reſidue, and that with great threatnings: wherewith the Perſies being ſore offended, for that they claimed them as their owne proper priſoners, and their peculiar preies, by the counſell of the lord Thomas Perſie earle of Worceſter, whoſe ſtudie was euer (as ſome write) to procure malice, and ſet things in a broile, came to the king vnto Windſore (vpon a purpoſe to prooue him) and there required of him, that either by ranſome or otherwiſe, he would cauſe to be deliuered out of priſon Edmund Mortimer earle of March, their couſine germane, whome (as they reported) Owen Glendouer kept in filthie priſon, ſhakled with irons, onelie for that he tooke his part, and was to him faithfull and true.

The requeſt of the Perſies.

The king began not a little to muſe at this requeſt, and not without cauſe: for in deed it touched him ſomewhat neere, ſith this Edmund was ſonne to Roger earle of March, ſonne to the ladie Philip, daughter of Lionell duke of Clarence, the third ſonne of king Edward the third; which Edmund at king Richards going into Ireland, was proclamed heire apparant to the crowne and realme, whoſe aunt called Elianor, the lord Henrie Perſie had married; and therefore king Henrie could not well heare, that anie man ſhould be earneſt about the aduancement of that linage. The king when he had ſtudied on the matter, made anſwer, that the earle of March was not taken priſoner for his cauſe, nor in his ſeruice, but willinglie ſuffered himſelfe to be taken, bicauſe he would not withſtand the attempts of Owen Glendouer, and his complices, & therefore he would neither ranſome him, nor releeue him.

The Perſies with this anſwer and fraudulent excuſe were not a little fumed, inſomuch that Henrie Hotſpur ſaid openlie: Behold, the heire of the relme is robbed of his right, and yet the robber with his owne will not redeeme him. So in this furie the Perſies departed, minding nothing more than to depoſe king Henrie from the high type of his roialtie, and to place in his ſeat their couſine Edmund earle of March, whom they did not onlie deliuer out of captiuitie, but alſo (to the high diſpleaſure of king Henrie) entered in league with the foreſaid Owen Glendouer. Heerewith, they by their deputies in the houſe of the archdeacon of Bangor, diuided the realme amongſt them, cauſing a tripartite indenture to be made and ſealed with their ſeales, by the couenants whereof, all England from Seuerne and Trent, ſouth and eaſtward, was aſſigned to the earle of March: all Wales, & the lands beyond Seuerne weſtward, were appointed to Owen Glendouer: and all the remnant from Trent northward, to the lord Perſie.

this new confederacie, and nothing leſſe minding than that which after happened, gathered a great armie to go againe into Wales, whereof the earle of Northumberland and his ſonne were aduertiſed by the earle of Worceſter, and with all diligence raiſed all the power they could make, and ſent to the Scots which before were taken priſoners at Homeldon, for aid of men, promiſing to the earle of Dowglas the towne of Berwike, and a part of Northumberland, and to other Scotiſh lords, great lordſhips and ſeigniories, if they obteined the vpper hand. The Perſies to make their part ſeeme good, deuiſed certeine articles, by the aduiſe of Richard Scroope, archbiſhop of Yorke, brother to the lord Scroope, whome king Henrie had cauſed to be beheaded at Briſtow. Theſe articles being ſhewed to diuerſe noblemen, and other ſtates of the realme, moued them to fauour their purpoſe, in ſo much that manie of them did not onelie promiſe to the Perſies aid and ſuccour by words, but alſo by their writings and ſeales confirmed the ſame. Howbeit when the matter came to triall, the moſt part of the confederates abandoned them, and at the daie of the conflict left them alone. Thus after that the conſpirators had diſcouered themſelues, the lord Henrie Perſie deſirous to proceed in the enterpriſe, vpon truſt to be aſſiſted by Owen Glendouer, the earle of March, & other, aſſembled an armie of men of armes and archers forth of Cheſhire and Wales. Incontinentlie his vncle Thomas Perſie earle of Worceſter, that had the gouernement of the prince of Wales, who as then laie at London in ſecret manner, conueied himſelfe out of the princes houſe, and comming to Stafford (where he met his nephue) they increaſed their power by all waies and meanes they could deuiſe. The earle of Northumberland himſelfe was not with them, but being ſicke, had promiſed vpon his amendement to repaire vnto them (as ſome write) with all conuenient ſpeed.

The earle of Worceſter gouernour to the prince ſlippeth from him. Hall.

These noble men, to make their conſpiracie to ſeeme excuſable, beſides the articles aboue mentioned, ſent letters abroad, wherein was conteined, that their gathering of an armie tended to none other end, but onlie for the ſafegard of their owne perſons, and to put ſome better gouernment in the commonwealth. For whereas taxes and tallages were dailie leuied, vnder pretenſe to be imploied in defenſe of the realme, the ſame were vainlie waſted, and vnprofitablie conſumed: and where through the ſlanderous reports of their enimies, the king had taken a greeuous diſpleaſure with them, they durſt not appeare perſonallie in the kings preſence, vntill the prelats and barons of the realme had obteined of the king licence for them to come and purge themſelues before him, by lawfull triall of their peeres, whoſe iudgement (as they pretended) they would in no wiſe refuſe. Manie that ſaw and heard theſe letters, did commend their diligence, and highlie praiſed their aſſured fidelitie and truſtineſſe towards the commonwealth.

The pretenſe of yͤ Perſies, as they publiſhed it abroad.

But the king vnderſtanding their cloaked drift, deuiſed (by what meanes he might) to quiet and appeaſe the commons, and deface their contriued forgeries; and therefore he wrote an anſwer to their libels, that he maruelled much, ſith the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Henrie Perſie his ſonne, had receiued the moſt part of the ſummes of monie granted to him by the cleargie and communaltie, for defenſe of the marches, as he could euidentlie proue what ſhould moue them to complaine and raiſe ſuch manifeſt ſlanders. And whereas he vnderſtood, that the earles of Northumberland and Worceſter, and the lord Perſie had by their letters ſignified to their freends abroad, that by reaſon of the ſlanderous reports of their enimies, they durſt not appeare in his preſence, without the mediation of the prelats and nobles of the realme, ſo as they required pledges, whereby they might ſafelie come afore him, to declare and alledge what they had to ſaie in proofe of their innocencie, he proteſted by letters ſent foorth vnder his ſeale, that they might ſafelie come and go, without all danger, or anie manner of indamagement to be offered to their perſons.

The kings anſwer to the Perſies libell.

But this could not ſatiſfie thoſe men, but that reſolued to go forwards with their enterpriſe, they marched towards Shrewesburie, vpon hope to be aided (as men thought) by Owen Glendouer, and his Welſhmen, publiſhing abroad throughout the countries on each ſide, that king Richard was aliue, whome if they wiſhed to ſee, they willed them to repaire in armour vnto the caſtell of Cheſter, where (without all doubt) he was at that preſent, and redie to come forward. This tale being raiſed, though it were moſt vntrue, yet it bred variable motions in mens minds, cauſing them to wauer, ſo as they knew not to which part they ſhould ſticke; and verelie, diuers were well affected towards king Richard, ſpeciallie ſuch as had taſted of his princelie bountifulnes, of which there was no ſmall number. And to ſpeake a truth, no maruell it was, if manie enuied the proſperous ſtate of king Henrie, ſith it was euident inough to the world, that he had with wrong vſurped the crowne, and not onelie violentlie depoſed king Richard, but alſo cruellie procured his death, for the which vndoubtedlie, both he and his poſteritie taſted ſuch troubles, as put them ſtill in danger of their ſtates, till their direct ſucceeding line was quite rooted out by the contrarie faction, as in Henrie the ſixt and Edward the fourth it may appeare.

Proofe K. Richard is ſtill aliue with the that with K. Henries ouerthrow.

But now to returne where we left. King Henrie aduertiſed of the proceedings of the Perſies, foorthwith gathered about him ſuch power as he might make, and being earneſtlie called vpon by the Scot, the earle of March, to make haſt and giue battell to his enimies, before their power by delaieng of time ſhould ſtill too much increaſe, he paſſed forward with ſuch ſpeed, that he was in ſight of his enimies, lieng in campe neere to Shrewesburie, before they were in doubt of anie ſuch thing, for the Perſies thought that he would haue ſtaied at Burton vpon Trent, till his councell had come thither to him to giue their aduiſe what he were beſt to doo. But herein the enimie was deceiued of his expectation, ſith the king had great regard of expedition and making ſpeed for the ſafetie of his owne perſon, wherevnto the earle of March incited him, conſidering that in delaie is danger, & loſſe in lingering, as the poet in the like caſe ſaith:

The kings ſpeedie diligence.

Tolle moras, nocuit ſemper differre paratis,
Dum trepidant nullo firmatæ robore partes.

By reaſon of the kings ſudden cōming in this ſort, they ſtaied from aſſaulting the towne of Shrewesburie, which enterpriſe they were readie at that inſtant to haue taken in hand, and foorthwith the lord Perſie (as a capteine of high courage) began to exhort the capteines and ſouldiers to prepare themſelues to battell, ſith the matter was growen to that point, that by no meanes it could be auoided, ſo that (ſaid he) this daie ſhall either bring vs all to aduancement & honor, or elſe if it ſhall chance vs to be ouercome, ſhall deliuer vs from the kings ſpitefull malice and cruell diſdaine: for plaieng the men (as we ought to doo) better it is to die in battell for the commonwealths cauſe, than through cowardlike feare to prolong life, which after ſhall be taken from vs, by ſentence of the enimie.

The Perſies troubled with the kings ſudden comming.

The lord Perſie exhorteth his complices to ſticke to their tackle.

Herevpon

Hervpon, the whole armie being in number about fourteene thouſand choſen men, promiſed to ſtand with him ſo long as life laſted. There were with the Perſies as chiefteines of this armie, the earle of Dowglas a Scottiſh man, the baron of Kinderton, ſir Hugh Browne, and ſir Richard Vernon knights, with diuerſe other ſtout and right valiant capteins. Now when the two armies were incamped, the one againſt the other, the earle of Worceſter and the lord Perſie with their complices ſent the articles (whereof I ſpake before) by Thomas Caiton, and Thomas Saluain eſquiers to king Henrie, vnder their hands and ſeales, which articles in effect charged him with manifeſt periurie, in that (contrarie to his oth receiued vpon the euangeliſts at Doncaſter, when he firſt entred the realme after his exile) he had taken vpon him the crowne and roiall dignitie, impriſoned king Richard, cauſed him to reſigne his title, and finallie to be murthered. Diuerſe other matters they laid to his charge, as leuieng of taxes and tallages, contrarie to his promiſe, infringing of lawes & cuſtomes of the realme, and ſuffering the earle of March to remaine in priſon, without trauelling to haue him deliuered. All which things they as procurors & protectors of the common-wealth, tooke vpon them to proue againſt him, as they proteſted vnto the whole world.

The Perſies ſent their articles to the king.

King Henrie charged with periurie.

Procurors & protectors of the common-wealth.

King Henrie after he had read theſe articles, with the defiance which they annexed to the ſame, anſwered the eſquiers, that he was readie with dint of ſword and fierce battell to proue their quarrell falſe, and nothing elſe than a forged matter, not doubting, but that God would aid and aſſiſt him in his righteous cauſe, againſt the diſloiall and falſe forſworne traitors. The next daie in the morning earlie, being the euen of Marie Magdalene, they ſet their battels in order on both ſides, and now whileſt the warriors looked when the token of battell ſhould be giuen, the abbat of Shrewesburie, and one of the clearks of the priuie ſeale, were ſent from the king vnto the Perſies, to offer them pardon, if they would come to any reaſonable agréement. By their perſuaſions, the lord Henrie Perſie began to giue eare vnto the kings offers, & ſo ſent with them his vncle the earle of Worceſter, to declare vnto the king the cauſes of thoſe troubles, and to require ſome effectuall reformation in the ſame.

The kings anſwer to the meſſengers that brought the articles.

The king offereth to pardon his aduerſaries.

It was reported for a truth, that now when the king had condeſcended vnto all that was reaſonable at his hands to be required, and ſeemed to humble himſelfe more than was meet for his eſtate, the earle of Worceſter (vpon his returne to his nephue) made relation cleane contrarie to that the king had ſaid, in ſuch ſort that he ſet his nephues hart more in diſpleaſure towards the king, than euer it was before, driuing him by that meanes to fight whether he would or not: then ſuddenlie blew the trumpets, the kings part crieng S. George vpon them, the aduerſaries cried Eſperance Perſie, and ſo the two armies furiouſlie ioined. The archers on both ſides ſhot for the beſt game, laieng on ſuch load with arrowes, that manie died, and were driuen downe that neuer roſe againe.

The earle of Worceſters double dealing in wrong reporting the kings words.

The Scots (as ſome write) which had the fore ward on the Perſies ſide, intending to be reuenged of their old diſpleaſures doone to them by the Engliſh nation, ſet ſo fiercelie on the kings foreward, led by the earle of Stafford, that they made the ſame draw backe, and had almoſt broken their aduerſaries arraie. The Welſhmen alſo which before had laine lurking in the woods, mounteines, and mariſhes, hearing of this battell toward, came to the aid of the Perſies, and refreſhed the wearied people with new ſuccours. The king perceiuing that his men were thus put to diſtreſſe, what with the violent impreſſion of the Scots, and the tempeſtuous ſtormes of arrowes, that his aduerſaries diſcharged freely againſt him and his people, it was no need to will him to ſtirre: for ſuddenlie with his freſh battell, he approched and relieued his men; ſo that the battell began more fierce than before. Here the lord Henrie Perſie, and the earle Dowglas, a right ſtout and hardie capteine, not regarding the ſhot of the kings battell, nor the cloſe order of the ranks, preſſing forward togither bent their whole forces towards the kings perſon, comming vpon him with ſpeares and ſwords ſo fiercelie, that the earle of March the Scot, perceiuing their purpoſe, withdrew the king from that ſide of the field (as ſome write) for his great benefit and ſafegard (as it appeared) for they gaue ſuch a violent onſet vpon them that ſtood about the kings ſtandard, that ſlaieng his ſtandard-bearer ſir Walter Blunt, and ouerthrowing the ſtandard, they made ſlaughter of all thoſe that ſtood about it, as the earle of Stafford, that daie made by the king conſtable of the realme, and diuerſe other.

The prince that daie holpe his father like a luſtie yoong gentleman: for although he was hurt in the face with an arrow, ſo that diuerſe noble men that were about him, would haue conueied him forth of the field, yet he would not ſuffer them ſo to doo, leaſt his departure from amongſt his men might happilie haue ſtriken ſome feare into their harts: and ſo without regard of his hurt, he continued with his men, & neuer ceaſſed, either to fight where the battell was moſt hot, or to incourage his men where it ſeemed moſt need. This battell laſted thrée long houres, with indifferent fortune on both parts, till at length, the king crieng ſaint George victorie, brake the arraie of his enimies, and aduentured ſo farre, that (as ſome write) the earle Dowglas ſtrake him downe, & at that inſtant ſlue ſir Walter Blunt, and thrée other, apparelled in the kings ſute and clothing, ſaieng: I maruell to ſée ſo many kings thus ſuddenlie ariſe one in the necke of an other. The king in deed was raiſed, & did that daie manie a noble feat of armes, for as it is written, he ſlue that daie with his owne hands ſix and thirtie perſons of his enimies. The other on his part incouraged by his doings, fought valiantlie, and ſlue the lord Perſie, called ſir Henrie Hotſpurre. To conclude, the kings enimies were vanquiſhed, and put to flight, in which flight, the earle of Dowglas, for haſt, falling from the crag of an hie mounteine, brake one of his cullions, and was taken, and for his valiantneſſe, of the king frankelie and freelie deliuered.

There was alſo taken the earle of Worceſter, the procuror and ſetter forth of all this miſcheefe, ſir Richard Vernon, and the baron of Kinderton, with diuerſe other. There were ſlaine vpon the kings part, beſide the earle of Stafford, to the number of ten knights, ſir Hugh Shorlie, ſir Iohn Cliſton, ſir Iohn Cokaine, ſir Nicholas Gauſell, ſir Walter Blunt, ſir Iohn Caluerleie, ſir Iohn Maſſie of Podington, ſir Hugh Mortimer, and ſir Robert Gauſell, all the which receiued the ſame morning the order of knighthood: ſir Thomas Wendeſleie was wounded to death, and ſo paſſed out of this life ſhortlie after. There died in all vpon the kings ſide ſixteene hundred, and foure thouſand were greeuouſlie wounded. On the contrarie ſide were ſlaine, beſides the lord Perſie, the moſt part of the knights and eſquiers of the countie of Cheſter, to the number of two hundred, beſides yeomen and footmen, in all there died of thoſe that fought on the Perſies ſide, about fiue thouſand. This battell was fought on Marie Magdalene euen, being ſaturdaie. Vpon the mondaie folowing, the earle of Worceſter, the baron of Kinderton, and ſir Richard Vernon knights, were condemned and behea-

The earle of Northumberland was now marching forward with great power, which he had got thither, either to aid his ſonne and brother (as was thought) or at the leaſt towards the king, to procure a peace: but the earle of Weſtmerland, and ſir Robert Waterton knight, had got an armie on foot, and meant to meet him. The earle of Northumberland, taking neither of them to be his freend, turned ſuddenlie backe, and withdrew himſelfe into Warkeworth caſtell. The king hauing ſet a ſtaie in things about Shrewesburie, went ſtraight to Yorke, from whence he wrote to the earle of Northumberland, willing him to diſmiſſe his companies that he had with him, and to come vnto him in peaceable wiſe. The earle vpon receipt of the kings letters came vnto him the morow after ſaint Laurence daie, hauing but a few of his ſeruants to attend him, and ſo excuſed himſelfe, that the king (bicauſe the earle had Berwike in his poſſeſſion, and further, had his caſtels of Alnewike, Warkeworth, and other, fortified with Scots) diſſembled the matter, gaue him faire words, and ſuffered him (as ſaith Hall) to depart home, although by other it ſhould ſeeme, that he was committed for a time to ſafe cuſtodie.

The king returning forth of Yorkeſhire, determined to go into Northwales, to chaſtiſe the preſumptuous doings of the vnrulie Welſhmen, who (after his comming from Shrewesburie, and the marches there) had doone much harme to the Engliſh ſubiects. But now where the king wanted monie to furniſh that enterpriſe, and to wage his ſouldiers, there were ſome that counſelled him to be bold with the biſhops, and ſupplie his want with their ſurpluſage. But as it fortuned, the archbiſhop of Canturburie was there preſent, who in the name of all the reſt boldlie made anſwer, that none of his prouince ſhould be ſpoiled by anie of thoſe naughtie diſpoſed perſons; but that firſt with hard ſtripes they ſhould vnderſtand the price of their raſh enterpriſe. But the king neuertheleſſe ſo vſed the matter with the biſhops for their good wils, that the archbiſhop at length to pleaſure him, calling the cleargie togither, got a grant of a tenth, towards the kings neceſſarie charges.

The Britaines vnder the conduct of the lord of Caſtils, ſpoiled and burnt the towne of Plimmouth, and returned without receiuing anie damage, but immediatlie thervpon, the weſterne men manning forth a fleet, vnder the gouernement of one William Wilford eſquier, made ſaile ouer to the coaſts of Britaine, where they tooke aboue fortie ſhips laden with oile, ſope, and Rochell wine, to the quantitie of a thouſand tunne, or much thereabouts. In returning homewards, they burnt fortie other veſſels, and landing at Pennarch, they burnt townes and villages ſix leagues within the countrie, togither with the towne of ſaint Matthew, and all the buildings there, three leagues round about the ſame towne. About the feaſt of All ſaints, a parlement began at Couentrie, and continued there till ſaint Andrewes tide: but at length, bicauſe vittels waxed deere, and lodging was ſtreict, it was adiorned from thence vnto London, there to begin againe in the octaues of the Epiphanie. The ſame time, a pardon was granted and proclamed, for all ſuch as had taken part with the Perſies againſt the king, and likewiſe for other offendors, thoſe excepted that had conſented to betraie Calis, whom the king ſent thither to ſuffer for their offenſes. A little before Chriſtmas the Frenchmen meant to haue robbed and ſpoiled the Ile of Wight, but when a thouſand of them were ſet on land, and had got togither a great bootie of cattell, ſuddenlie there came vpon them ſuch number of people that they were conſtreined to withdraw to their ſhips, leauing their preie behind them, and no ſmall number of their men to paie for their ſhot, ſo that they wan little by that iournie, returning home with ſhame and diſhonor.

This yeare in the parlement holden at London (beginning the morow after the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie, and continuing twelue weekes) the earle of Northumberland was reſtored vnto his former dignities, lands and goods, the Ile of Man onlie excepted, which by reaſon of the forfeiture made by the earle of Saliſburie, the king had firſt giuen vnto him, and now depriued him thereof, where all his other lands, poſſeſſions, and liuings were wholie to him and his heires reſtored. By authoritie of the ſame parlement a ſubſidie was alſo granted to the king, of euerie knights fee twentie ſhillings, whether the ſame were holden of him by menaltie, or otherwiſe. Moreouer, euerie man and woman that might diſpend in lands the value of twentie ſhillings & ſo vpward, aboue the repriſes, whether the ſame lands belonged to the laie fee, or to the church, paied for euerie pound twelue pence: and thoſe that were valued to be worth in goods twentie pounds and vpwards, paid alſo after the rate of lands, that is, twelue pence for euerie pound. ¶ This ſeemeth to be that ſubſidie which Thomas Walſingham calleth a ſore ſurcharging ſubſidie, or an vnaccuſtomed tax: the forme and maner wherof (ſaith he) I had here interlaced, but that the verie granters and authors thereof had rather that the poſteritie ſhould be vtterlie ignorant thereof, and neuer heare of it; ſithens it was granted vpon this condition, that hereafter it ſhould not be drawne into example; neither might the euidences thereof be kept in the kings treaſurie, nor in the excheker; but the records thereof preſentlie (after the iuſt accounts giuen vp) burned; neither ſhould writs or commiſſions be ſent abroad againſt the collectors or inquirers hereof for their better inqueſt.

Abr. Fl. out of Tho. Walſin. Hypod. pag. 164.

The Frenchmen about the ſame time came before the Ile of Wight with a great nauie, and ſent certeine of their men to the ſhore, to demand in name of king Richard, and of his wife queene Iſabell, a tribute or ſpeciall ſubſidie in monie, of the inhabitants of that Ile; who anſwered, that king Richard was dead, and queene Iſabell ſometime his wife had beene ſent home to hir parents and countrie, without condition of anie dowrie or tribute: wherefore, they anſwered reaſonablie, that none they would giue: but if the Frenchmen had deſire to fight, they willed them to come on land, and there ſhould be none to reſiſt them; and after they were on land, they promiſed to giue them reſpit for ſix houres ſpace to refreſh themſelues, and that time being once expired, they ſhould not faile to haue battell. When the Frenchmen heard of this ſtout anſwer made by the Ilandmen, they had no luſt to approch neere to the land, but returned without further attempt.

The Frenchmens demand of the Ile of wight.

The anſwer of the Ilandmen.

About this ſeaſon, the duke of Orleance, brother to the French king, a man of no leſſe pride than hautineſſe of courage, wrote letters to king Henrie, aduertiſing him, that for the loue he bare to the noble feats of chiualrie, he could imagine nothing either more honorable or cõmendable to them both, than to meet in the field each part with an hundred knights and eſquiers, all being gentlemen, both of name and armes, armed at all points, and furniſhed with ſpeares, axes, ſwords, and daggers, and there to fight and combat to the yeelding; and euerie perſon, to whome God ſhould ſend victorie, to haue his priſoner, & him to ranſome at his pleaſure, offering himſelfe with his companie to come to his citie of Anguleſme, ſo that the king would come to the lands of Burdeaux, and there defend this challenge.

The duke of Orleance his challenge.

The anſwer of king Henrie.

The king of England grauelie anſwered herevnto, that he maruelled why the duke vnder colour of doing déeds of armes for a vaine-glorie, would now ſéeke to breake the peace betwixt the realmes of England and France, he being ſworne to mainteine the ſame peace, ſith he might further vnderſtand, that no king annointed, of verie dutie, was bound to anſwer anie challenge, but to his péere of equall ſtate and dignitie; and further declared, that when opportunitie ſerued, he would paſſe the ſea, and come into his countrie of Gaſcoigne, with ſuch companie as he thought conuenient, and then might the duke ſet forward with his band, for the accompliſhing of his couragious deſire, promiſing him in the word of a prince, not thence to depart, till the duke either by fulfilling his owne deſire in manner aforeſaid, or by ſingular combat betwéene them two onelie, for auoiding of more effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, ſhould thinke himſelfe fullie ſatiſfied. To this and much more conteined in the kings anſwer, the duke replied, and the king againe reioined, not without tawnts and checks vnfitting for their eſtates.

The duke of Orleance beſiegeth Vergi in Guien.

The duke of Orleance offended highlie (as he might ſéeme) furniſhed againſt the king of England with an armie of ſix thouſand men, entered into Guien, and beſieged the towne of Vergi, whereof was capteine ſir Robert Antlfield, a right hardie and valiant knight, hauing with him onelie thrée hundred Engliſhmen, which defended the fortreſſe ſo manfullie, that the duke (after he had laine thrée moneths) and loſt manie of his men, without honour or ſpoile returned into France.

The lord du Chaſtell ſlaine.

After this, the admerall of Britaine highlie incouraged, for that the laſt yéere he had taken certeine Engliſh ſhips laden with wines, acompanied with the lord du Chaſtell, a valiant baron of Britaine, and twelue hundred men of armes, ſailed forth with thirtie ſhips from S. Malos, and came before the towne of Dartmouth, and would haue landed; but by the puiſſance of the towneſmen and aid of the countrie, they were repelled, in the which conflict, the lord du Chaſtell, and two of his brethren, with foure hundred other were ſlaine, and aboue two hundred taken priſoners and put to their ranſoms, amongſt whom the lord of Baqueuille the marſhall of Britaine was one.

Owen Glendouer waſted the Engliſh marches.

All this ſummer, Owen Glendouer and his adherents, robbed, burned, and deſtroied the countries adioining néere to the places where he hanted, and one while by ſleight & guilefull policie, an other while by open force, he tooke and ſlue manie Engliſhmen, brake downe certeine caſtels which he wan, and ſome he fortified and kept for his owne defenſe. John Treuor biſhop of Aſſaph, conſidering with himſelfe how things proſpered vnder the hands of this Owen, fled to him, and tooke his part againſt the king.

Crueltie of the Britains & Flemings.

About the ſame time, the Britaines and the Flemings tooke certeine ſhips of ours laden with merchandize, and ſlue all the marriners or elſe hanged them.

The countes of Oxford.

K. Richard once againe aliue.

Alſo, the old counteſſe of Oxford, mother to Robert Veere late duke of Ireland, that died at Louaine, cauſed certeine of hir ſeruants, and other ſuch as ſhe durſt truſt, to publiſh and brute abroad, thorough all the parts of Eſſex, that king Richard was aliue, and that he would ſhortlie come to light, and claime his former eſtate, honor, and dignitie. She procured a great number of harts to be made of ſiluer and gold, ſuch as king Richard was wont to giue vnto his knights, eſquiers, & fréends, to weare as cognizances, to the end that in beſtowing them in king Richards name, ſhe might the ſooner allure men to further hir lewd practiſes: and where the fame went abroad, that king Richard was in Scotland with a great power of Frenchmen and Scots, readie to come to recouer his realme, manie gaue the more light credit vnto this brute thus ſet forth by the ſaid counteſſe.

Serlo one of K. Richards chamber.

The perſwaſions alſo of one Serlo, that in times paſt was one of king Richards chamber, greatlie increaſed this errour; for the ſame Serlo, hearing in France (whither he was fled) that his maiſter king Richard was in Scotland aliue, conueied himſelfe thither, to vnderſtand the truth of that matter, and finding there one indéed that greatlie reſembled him in all lineaments of bodie, but yet was not the man himſelfe (as he well perceiued) vpon malice that he bare to king Henrie, aduertiſed by letters ſent vnto diuerſe of king Richards fréends, that he was aliue indéed, and ſhortlie would come to ſhew himſelfe openlie to the world, when he had once made his waie readie to recouer his kingdome, to the confuſion of his enimies, and comfort of his fréends. Theſe forged inuentions cauſed manie to beléeue the brute raiſed by the counteſſe of Oxford, for the which they came in trouble, were apprehended and committed to priſon.

The counteſſe of Oxford committed to priſon.

Hir ſecretarie executed.

The counteſſe hir ſelfe was ſhut vp in cloſe priſon, and all hir goods were confiſcat, and hir ſecretarie drawen and hanged, that had ſpred abroad this fained report, in going vp and downe the countrie, blowing into mens eares that king Richard was aliue, & affirming that he had ſpoken with him in ſuch a place and in ſuch a place, apparelled in this raiment and that raiment, with ſuch like circumſtances.

The earle of Northumberland cõmeth to the king.

Sir william Clifford bringeth Serlo to the king.

About the feaſt of ſaint John Baptiſt, at the kings commandement, the earle of Northumberland came to Pomfret, and brought with him his nephues, and his nephues ſonnes, whereby he cleared himſelfe of a great deale of ſuſpicion, manie doubting before his comming that he had giuen euill counſell to the yoong men, whereby to moue them to rebellion, and to withſtand the king. Sir William Clifford alſo came with the earle, and brought the foreſaid Serlo with him, whom he had apprehended vpon his comming to him at Berwike, in hope to haue found ſuccour at his hands: in conſideration whereof the king pardoned the ſaid ſir William Clifford of his diſobedience ſhewed, in kéeping the caſtell of Berwike againſt him, in which dooing he had committed manifeſt treaſon.

Serlo examined for the duke of Gloceſters death.

This Serlo being knowen to be the man that had béene the chiefe murtherer of the duke of Gloceſter, when he was made awaie at Calis, was diligentlie examined, who were helpers with him in the execution thereof, and after what ſort they made him awaie: Serlo knowing there was no waie with him but death, would not vtter any other, but confeſſed for his owne part, he was worthie for that wicked déed to die ten thouſand deaths, and ſhewed ſuch outward appearance of repentance, that manie ſore lamented his caſe, and promiſed to hire prieſts to ſing maſſes, (as the maner was) for his ſoule, of their owne coſts and charges. He was condemned to die at Pomfret, and was drawen from thence through euerie good towne, through which thoſe that had the conueiance of him paſſed with him till they came to London, where he was executed, confeſſing euerie thing to be true concerning his wicked pretenſe, as before is recited: and further, that when he perceiued how their counterfeit practiſe would come to light and he openlie reuealed, he meant to haue returned into France, but wanting monie, he thought to haue béene relieued with ſome portion at the hand of the ſaid ſir William Clifford, and this cauſed him to come vnto Berwike, to ſhew him his neceſſitie, who to make his owne peace, did apprehend him, and preſent him to the king, as before ye haue heard.

He is drawen through euery good towne.

He is executed at Lõdon.

Anno Reg. 6.

King Henrie wanting monie in the feaſt of ſaint Faith the virgine, aſſembled at Couentrie his high court of parlement, in the which, the lord Stephan Scrope of Maſham, and the lord Henrie Fitz Hugh obteined firſt to haue places of barons. Moreouer, it is to be noted, that this was called The laie mans parlement, bicauſe the ſhiriffes were appointed to haue a ſpeciall regard, that none ſhould be choſen knights for the counties, nor burgeſſes for the cities and townes, that had any ſkill in the lawes of the land. This was done, and when they came togither to talke of the weightie affaires of the realme, ſpeciallie how the king might be relieued with monie, to beare ſuch charges as he was knowen to be at, as well in defending the realme from the Scots and Welſhmen at home, as from the Britains, Flemings, and Frenchmen abroad, it was thought moſt expedient, that the ſpiritualtie ſhould be depriued of their temporall poſſeſſions, to the reliefe of the kings neceſſitie. Herevpon roſe great altercation betwixt the cleargie and the laitie; the knights affirming, that they had oftentimes ſerued the king, not onelie with their goods, but alſo with their perſons in great dangers and ieopardies, whileſt the ſpiritualtie ſat at home, and holp the king nothing at all. Thomas Arundell archbiſhop of Canturburie ſtoutlie anſwered herevnto, that the cleargie had alwaie giuen to the king as much as the laitie had done, conſidering they had oftener giuen their tenths to him than the laitie their fifteens: alſo, that more of their tenants went forth into the kings warres, than the tenants of them of the laie fee: beſide this, they praied day and night for the kings good ſucceſſe againſt his enimies.

The laie mans parlement.

Strife betwixt the laitie and ſpiritualtie.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie anſwereth for his brethren.

When the ſpeaker named ſir John Cheinie, in replieng by plaine ſpeach, ſeemed little to eſteeme ſuch praiers of the church, the archbiſhop was ſet in a great chafe, and with ſharpe words declaring what he thought muſt needs follow, both of the king and kingdome, when praiers and ſuffrages of churchmen came to be ſo little ſet by, he grew to ſuch impatiencie, that he flatlie told the ſpeaker, that although he ſeemed little to eſteeme of the religion of the cleargie, he would not haue him to thinke, that he ſhould take awaie the poſſeſſions of the church, without finding ſuch as would ſeeke to withſtand him, for if (ſaid he) the archbiſhop of Canturburie maie liue, thou ſhalt haue hot taking awaie any manner of thing that is his. After this, when the archbiſhop perceiued that the king winked at theſe matters, he roſe from his place and comming before the king, kneeled downe, and beſought him to conſider, how through the fauour and grace of the almightie God, he had atteined to the kingdome, and therefore he ought to remember his firſt purpoſe and intent, which was, to ſaue vnto euerie man his right, ſo far as in him laie.

Sir John Cheinie ſpeaker of the parlement.

The archb. chafeth.

He ſpake like a lord.

He willed him likewiſe to haue in conſideration the oth which he willinglie had receiued, that is, that he ſhould aduance the honor of the church, and the miniſters thereof cheriſh and mainteine. Alſo, to haue in mind the danger and diſhonour that redounded to ſuch as brake their othes: ſo that he beſought him to permit and ſuffer the church to inioy the priuileges and liberties, which in time of his predeceſſors it had inioied, requeſting him to ſtand in awe of that king, by whom all kings did reigne; and to feare the cenſures and condemnation that thoſe incurred, which tooke and bereft from the church any good or right belonging to it, who moſt certeinelie (ſaid he) are accurſed. When the archbiſhop had vſed this, or the like ſpeach, the king commanded him to go to his ſeat againe, aſſuring him, that his intent and purpoſe was to leaue the church in as good ſtate, or better, than he found it.

The kings anſwer to the archbiſhop.

The archbiſhop herewith turning to the knights and burgeſſes of the parlement, ſaid vnto them; You, and ſuch other as you be, haue giuen counſell vnto the king and his predeceſſors, to confiſcate and take into their hands the goods and poſſeſſions of the celles, which the Frenchmen and Normans poſſeſſed here in England, and affirmed that by the ſame he and they ſhould heape vp great riches, and indeed thoſe goods and poſſeſſions (as is to be proued) were worth manie thouſands of gold: and yet it is moſt true, that the king at this day is not halfe one marke of ſiluer the richer thereby, for you haue begged and gotten them out of his hands, and haue appropriated the ſame vnto your ſelues, ſo that we may coniecture verie well, that you requeſt to haue our temporalties, not to aduance the kings profit, but to ſatiſfie your owne greedie couetouſneſſe, for vndoubtedlie if the king (as God forbid he ſhould) did accompliſh your wicked purpoſes and minds, he ſhould not be one farthing the richer the yeare next after: and trulie, ſooner will I ſuffer this head of mine to be cut off from my ſhoulders, than that the church ſhould loſe the leaſt right that apperteineth to it.

The knights ſaid little, but yet they proceeded in their ſute to haue their purpoſe forward, which the archbiſhop perceiuing (as an other Argus, hauing his eie on each ſide, to marke what was done) laboured ſo to diſappoint their doings, that he wan the fauour of certeine of the temporall lords to aſſiſt him, who conſtantlie auouched by their conſents, that the church ſhould neuer be ſpoiled of the temporalties, and herein they acquited the archbiſhop and prelats, one pleaſure for an other, which they had done for them before, when the commons in this parlement required, that all ſuch lands and reuenues as ſometime belonged to the crowne, and had beene giuen awaie, either by the king, or by his predeceſſors king Edward, and king Richard, ſhould be againe reſtored to the kings vſe; vnto which requeſt, the archbiſhop and other the prelats would in no wiſe conſent: thus by the ſtout diligence of the archbiſhop Arundell that petition of the commons, touching the ſpirituall temporalties, came to none effect. [Yea the knights themſelues, who verie inſtantlie had ſtood in this error, acknowledging their maliciouſnes & guiltineſſe herein, beſought the archbiſhop of Canturburie to pardon them; and gaue thanks that by his couragiouſneſſe the church in this ſo troubleſome a time reuiued, calling to mind the ſaieng of an ethnike, by way of application, to the ſaid archbiſhops hie praiſe;

Two fifteenes were granted by the commons, with condition, that the ſame ſhould be paid vnto the hands of the lord Furniuall, who ſhould ſee that monie imploied for maintenance of the kings warres. Moreouer, at the importunate ſute of the commons, the letters patents that had beene made to diuerſe perſons of annuities to them granted by king Edward and king Richard, were called in, and made void, not without ſome note of diſhonor to the king. The cleargie granted to the king a tenth and a halfe, notwithſtanding that the halfe of one tenth latelie granted was yet behind, and appointed to be paid vpon ſaint Martins daie now next comming. About this ſeaſon, great loſſe happened in Kent, by breaking in of waters, that ouerflowed the ſea banks, as well in the archbiſhop of Canturburies grounds, as other mens, whereby much cattell was drowned. Neither did England alone bewaile hir loſſes by ſuch breakings in of the ſea, but alſo Zeland, Flanders, & Holland taſted of the like damage.

Two fifteens granted.

Letters patents reuoked.

A tenth and halfe granted by ỹ cleargie.

two colleges, one at Wincheſter for grammarians, and the other at Oxenford called the new college, purchaſing lands and reuenues for the maintenance of ſtudents there, to the great commoditie of the commonwealth: for from thence, as out of a good nurſſerie, haue come forth diuerſe men in all ages excellentlie learned in all ſciences. ¶ And heere I haue not thought it impertinent to ſpeake ſomewhat of this worthie prelat (conſidering that by him ſo great a benefit hath returned to the commonwealth) according to ſuch notes as I haue ſeene collected by that painfull traueller in ſearch of antiquities Iohn Leland, who ſaith, that as ſome haue ſuppoſed, the ſaid Wickham, otherwiſe called Perot, was baſe ſonne to one Perot, the towne-clerke of Wickham in Hampſhire, of which place he tooke his ſurname, and that one maiſter Wodall a gentleman, dwelling in the ſaid towne, brought him vp at ſchoole, where he learned his grammar, and to write verie faire, in ſo much that the conſtable of Wincheſter caſtell, a great ruler in thoſe daies in Hampſhire, got him of maiſter Wodall, and reteined him to be his ſecretarie, with whome he continued, till king Edward the third, comming to Wincheſter, conceiued ſome good liking of the yoong man, and tooke him to his ſeruice, and withall vnderſtanding that he was minded to be a churchman, he firſt made him parſon and deane of ſaint Martins in London, then archdeacon of Buckingham.

But for ſo much as his ſeruice was right acceptable to the king, as he that with great dexteritie could handle ſuch affaires of the ſtate, or other matters of charge as were committed to his hands, the king ſtill kept him about his perſon, as one of his cheefe chapleins of houſhold, and imploied him in ſundrie offices, as occaſions ſerued: and firſt he made him ſurueior of his works and buildings, namelie at Windſore, in reparing of that caſtell, and alſo at Quinburrough, where, by the kings appointment, a ſtrong fortreſſe was raiſed, for defenſe of the realme on that ſide. After this, he was aduanced to the keeping of the priuie ſeale, made ouerſeer of the wards and forreſts, alſo treaſuror of the kings reuenues in France, and at length was made biſhop of Wincheſter. Yet the Blacke prince did not greatlie fauour him, wherevpon Wickham procured to keepe him occupied in warres beyond the ſeas. But at length Iohn duke of Lancaſter, and Alice Perers king Edwards concubine, conceiuing ſome great diſpleaſure againſt him, found meane to procure the king to baniſh him the realme, and then he remained in Normandie and Picardie for the ſpace of ſeauen yeares, or thereabout, and might not be reſtored ſo long as king Edward liued. But after his deceaſſe, about the ſecond yeare of king Richard the ſeconds reigne, he was reſtored home, and purchaſed a generall pardon for all matters paſt that might be ſurmized againſt him, or laid to his charge.

He was alſo at one time treaſuror of England (as Leland gathereth.)

Afterwards he bare himſelfe ſo vprightlie in that dangerous time, when ſuch miſliking and priuie enuie reigned betwixt the king and his nobles, that both parts ſeemed to like of him, inſomuch that when the king made him lord chancellor, there was not anie that greatlie repined thereat; and verelie in that the king made choiſe of him before others to occupie that place, it argueth there was not ſo euill a diſpoſition in the king, nor lacke of diſcretion in order of gouernment, as writers ſeeme to charge him with. But where other could not ſo well beare iniuries at others hands as happilie Wickham could, the fire of diſſention cheeflie kindled thereof. For if the duke of Ireland, and the earle of Suffolke, with thoſe of that faction could haue refrained to ſhew their diſpleaſures, when the duke of Gloceſter and other his complices pinched at them (for that they ſaw the king haue them in more eſtimation than they wiſhed) matters might haue beene qualified peraduenture with leſſe adoo, and without danger to haue inſued to either part. But howſoeuer it went with them, it may doubtleſſe be eaſilie coniectured, that Wickham was a man of ſingular wiſedome, and politike forecaſt, that could from meane degree in ſuch wiſe clime aloft, and afterwards paſſe through the chances and changes of variable fortune, keeping himſelfe euer ſo in ſtate, that he grew at length to be able to furniſh the chargeable expenſes of two ſuch notable foundations which he left behind him, to make his name immortall. But leauing the conſideration hereof to others, I will returne to the purpoſe from whence I haue thus far ſtepped.

The earle of Marches ſonnes.
Thom. Walſin.

In this ſixt yeare, the fridaie after ſaint Valentines daie, the earle of March his ſonnes earlie in the morning were taken forth of Windſore caſtell, and conueied awaie, it was not knowne whither at the firſt, but ſuch ſearch and inquirie was made for them that ſhortlie after they were heard of, and brought backe againe. The ſmith that counterfeited the keies, by the which they that conueied them thence got into the chamber where they were lodged, had firſt his hands cut off, and after his head ſtriken from his ſhoulders. The ladie Spenſer, ſiſter to the duke of Yorke and widow of the lord Thomas Spenſer, executed at Briſtow (as before yee haue heard) being apprehended and committed to cloſe priſon, accuſed hir brother the duke of Yorke, as cheefe authour in ſtealing awaie the ſaid earle of March his ſonnes. And further, that the ſaid duke ment to haue broken into the manor of Eltham the laſt Chriſtmaſſe, by ſcaling the wals in the night ſeaſon, the king being there the ſame time, to the intent to haue murthered him. For to prooue hir accuſation true, ſhe offered that if there were anie knight, or eſquier, that would take vpon him to fight in hir quarrell, if he were ouercome, ſhe would be content to be burnt for it.

The ladie Spenſer cõmitted to ward.

She accuſeth hir brother the duke of Yorke.

One of hir eſquiers named William Maidſtone, hearing what anſwer his ladie and miſtreſſe propounded, caſt downe his hood, and proffered in hir cauſe the combat. The duke likewiſe caſt downe his hood, readie by battell to cleare his innocencie. But yet the kings ſonne lord Thomas of Lancaſter arreſted him, and put him vnder ſafe keeping in the Tower, till it were further knowne what order ſhould be taken with him, and in the meane time were all his goods confiſcate. The ſame time was Thomas Mowbraie earle marſhall accuſed, as priuie to the purpoſe of the duke of Yorke, touching the withdrawing of the earle of March his children, who confeſſed indeed that he knew of the dukes purpoſe: but yet in no wiſe gaue his conſent therevnto, and therefore beſought the king to be good and gratious lord vnto him for concealing the matter, and ſo he obteined pardon of that offenſe.

williã Maidſtone eſquier offred to fight in his ladies quarrell.

The earle marſhall accuſed.

The king had aſſembled at the ſame time the moſt part of the nobilitie at London, to conſult with them for diuerſe weightie matters, concerning the ſtate of the common-wealth, and about ſome aid of monie which he required: but the lords ſhewed themſelues not willing to ſatiſfie his requeſt. He therfore cauſed the ſpirituall lords as well as the temporall, to meet at S. Albons in the Lent ſeaſon, about the ſame matter; but yet obteined not his purpoſe, by reaſon the barons were ſore againſt him, and ſo at length on Palme ſundaie they went their waie, each man to his home, hauing gratified the king in nothing concerning his demand. In the meane time, to wit the fifteenth of March at a place in Wales called Vſke, in a conflict fought betwixt the Welſhmen and certeine of the princes companie, the ſonne of Owen Glendouer was taken, and fiftéene hundred Welſhmen taken and ſlaine. Alſo in Maie about the feaſt daie of S. Dunſtane, was the chancellor of the ſaid Owen taken priſoner, and a great number of other taken and ſlaine. The priſoners were brought vp to London, where the chancellor was committed to ſafe kéeping in the Tower.

Iuſt. lib. 1. Herod. lib. 1. Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7.

¶This was a ſhrewd diſcomfiture to the Welſh by the Engliſh, on whome ſiniſter lot lowred, at ſuch time as more than a thouſand of them were ſlaine in a hot ſkirmiſh; and ſuch ſhamefull villanie executed vpon the carcaſſes of the dead men by the Welſhwomen; as the like (I doo beléeue) hath neuer or ſildome béene practiſed. For though it was a cruell déed of Tomyris quéene of the Maſſagets in Scythia, againſt whome when Cyrus the great king of Perſia came, and had ſlaine hir ſonne, ſhe by hir policie trained him into ſuch ſtreicts, that ſhe ſlue him and all his hoſt; and cauſing a great veſſell to be filled with the bloud of Cyrus and other Perſians, did caſt his head thereinto, ſaieng; Bloud thou haſt thirſted and now drinke thereof thy fill: againe, though it was a cruell déed of Fuluia the wife of Marcus Antonius (at whoſe commandement Popilius cut off the head and hands of that golden mouthed orator Tullie, which afterwards were nailed vp ouer the place of common plées at Rome) to hold in hir hands the toong of that father of eloquence cut out of his head after the ſame was parted from his ſhoulders, and to pricke it all ouer with pins and néedels: yet neither the crueltie of Tomyris nor yet of Fuluia is comparable to this of the Welſhwomen; which is worthie to be recorded to the ſhame of a ſex pretending the title of weake veſſels, and yet raging with ſuch force of fierceneſſe and barbariſme. For the dead bodies of the Engliſhmen, being aboue a thouſand lieng vpon the ground imbrued in their owne bloud, was a ſight (a man would thinke) gréeuous to looke vpon, and ſo farre from exciting and ſtirring vp affections of crueltie; that it ſhould rather haue mooued the beholders to commiſeration and mercie: yet did the women of Wales cut off their priuities, and put one part thereof into the mouthes of euerie dead man, in ſuch ſort that the cullions hoong downe to their chins; and not ſo contented, they did cut off their noſes and thruſt them into their tailes as they laie on the ground mangled and defaced. This was a verie ignominious déed, and a worſſe not committed among the barbarous: which though it make the reader to read it, and the hearer to heare it, aſhamed: yet bicauſe it was a thing doone in open ſight, and left teſtified in hiſtorie; I ſée little reaſon whie it ſhould not be imparted in our mother toong to the knowledge of our owne countrimen, as well as vnto ſtrangers in a language vnknowne. And thus much by waie of notifieng the inhumanitie and deteſtable demeanour of thoſe Welſhwomen, after the conflict betwéene the Engliſh and the Welſh, whereof deſultorie mention is made before pag. 520, where Edmund Mortimer earle of March was taken priſoner.

The caſtell of Marke beſieged about the middeſt of Maie as Iac. Meir. ſaith.

Sir Philip Hall.

Valeran earle of S. Paule, by the aſſent of the French king, aſſembled fiue hundred men of armes, fiue hundred Genowaies with croſſebowes, and a thouſand Flemings on foot, with the which he laid ſiege to the caſtell of Marke, thrée leagues from Calis, vpon the fiftéenth daie of Iulie. Capteine of the caſtell as then for the king of England was one ſir Philip Hall, hauing with him foure ſcore archers, and foure and twentie other ſoldiers, which defended the place ſo manfullie, that the earle retired into the towne, and there lodged, fortifieng it for feare of reſcue that might come from Calis. The next daie he gaue an other aſſault to the caſtell, and tooke the vtter court, wherin was found a great number of horſſes, kine, and other cattell. The next daie there iſſued foorth of Calis two hundred men of armes, two hundred archers, and thrée hundred footmen, with ten or twelue wagons laden with vittels and artillerie, conducted by ſir Richard Aſton knight, lieutenant of the Engliſh pale for the earle of Summerſet, capteine generall of thoſe marches.

The earle of S. Paule put to flight. Ia. Meir.

The Frenchmen aduertiſed that the Engliſhmen were comming to remooue the ſiege, iſſued not foorth of their lodgings but kept them within their cloſure. Neuertheleſſe, the Engliſhmen ſhot ſo ſharpelie and cloſelie togither, that the Flemings and footmen began to flie: the men of armes fearing the ſlaughter of their horſſes, ran awaie with a light gallop. The Genowaies which had ſpent the moſt part of their ſhot at the aſſaults made to the caſtell, ſhewed ſmall reſiſtance, and ſo all the number of the French part were ſlaine and put to flight. The earle of S. Paule and diuerſe other eſcaped awaie, and by S. Omers got to Therouenne, or (as others ſaie) to ſaint Omers. But there were taken to the number of thrée or foure ſcore, and amongſt other the lord de Dampier ſeneſhall of Ponthien, monſieur de Weriners, monſieur de Vineles, monſieur de Noielles, monſieur Iohn de Hangeſts capteine of Bullongne, the lord de Rambures, monſieur Lionell Darreis capteine of Graueling, monſieur Peter Raſſer capteine of Arde, alſo Combernard capteine of Tirouan, Boid Chanon capteine of Montoire, Iohn Chanon capteine of Liſle, Stenebecke capteine of Ralingham, the baſtard of Burneuill capteine of Burburgh. There were ſlaine about 60, and among them as chéefe ſir Robert Berenguevill, the lord of Quercus, Morell de Sancuſes, the lord Courbet de Rempeupret, and others.

Arde aſſaulted by Engliſhmen.

The Engliſhmen had the ſpoile of the earls campe, and being returned to Calis, within fiue daies after there iſſued foorth about fiue hundred men, meaning to haue woone the towne of Arde with a ſudden aſſault, which they gaue to it in the night time. But ſir Manfrid de Bois, and the lord Rigine, did ſo valiantlie defend it, that the Engliſhmen with loſſe of fortie of their men were conſtreined to returne vnto Calis, after they had burnt the dead bodies in an old houſe, for that the enimies ſhould not perceiue what loſſe the Engliſhmen had ſuſteined. After this, the French king, to auoid perils, laid in gariſon at Bullongne, and in other places, the marques of Pount, ſonne to the duke of Bar, the earle of Dampnie, and ſir Iohn Harpadan a knight of great renowme and eſtimation. The duke of Burgognie likewiſe ſent a a number of ſoldiers vnto Graueling, vnder the leading of one Iohn Vandenwall, and to other fortreſſes alongſt the coaſt he ſent new ſupplies, for doubt of the Engliſhmens inuaſions.

The marques du Pount.

An armie ſent to Calis and to the ſea.

Chr. Fland. Ia. Meir.

The Engliſhmen beſieged the caſtell of Sluis.

The king of England in déed hearing of the preparation made for warre by the Frenchmen, leuied foure thouſand men which he ſent vnto Calis, and to the ſea, of the which 3000 were vnder the conduct of the kings ſonne. The lord Thomas of Lancaſter, and the earle of Kent, the two and twentith daie of Maie (as ſome write) came vpon the coaſt of Flanders, and entring the hauen of Sluis, burnt foure great ſhips which they found there lieng at anchor. On the fift daie after their comming into that hauen they went on land, thinking to haue fought with the duke of Burgognie. But as other write, after they had beſieged the caſtell that ſtood in the mouth of the hauen, and looſing thrée ſcore of their men, amongſt which they name one to beare the title of earle of Penbroke (whom they buried for the time in the church of Mude) fiue daies after their comming thither they determined to depart from thence, perceiuing the caſtell would not eaſilie be wonne, but firſt they ſpoiled the countrie about them, and burnt Heis fléet, otherwiſe called Condekirke, and diuerſe other places thereabout.

This doone, they tooke vp the bodie of him whom the Flemiſh writers call the earle of Penbroke, and got them againe to the ſea, for that they were aduertiſed how the duke of Burgognie meant to beſiege Calis. Wherevpon raiſing their ſiege thus from Sluis caſtell, they returned vnto the defenſe of the towne of Calis, ſo much deſired of the French nation. As they returned homewards, they met with thrée caricks of Genoa, of the which one hauing the wind with hir, meant to haue ouerthrowne the ſhip wherein the lord Thomas of Lancaſter was aboord: but by the good foreſight of the maſter of the ſhip that ruled the ſterne, ſuddenlie turning the ſame, the violent ſwaie of that huge veſſell comming ſo vpon them, was auoided; but yet the caricke ſtroke off the noſe of the Engliſh ſhip, and bruſed hir on the ſide. Then began the fight verie cruell, till the earle of Kent came to the reſcue: and ſo finallie after a great conflict and bloudie battell betwixt the caricks and Engliſh ſhips, the victorie remained with the Engliſhmen, who taking the caricks, turned their ſailes towards Normandie, where they arriued and burnt the townes of Hoggue, Mountburge, Berſlie, ſaint Petronils and other, to the number of thirtie ſix, paſſing forth into the countrie without reſiſtance, the ſpace of thirtie miles, ſpoiling all that came in their waie. This doone, they returned, and brought the caricks into the chamber at Rie, where one of them by misfortune of fire periſhed, to the loſſe & no gaine of either of the parties.

A great fight by ſea. Thrée caricks are taken. Townes in Normandie burnt.

John duke of Burgognie hauing obteined licence to beſiege Calis, prepared an armie of ſix thouſand men of armes, fiftéene hundred croſbowes, & twelue thouſand footmen, the which being aſſembled, and all neceſſarie prouiſion readie at ſaint Omers, he was by the French king countermanded, and not ſuffered to procéed anie further in that weightie enterpriſe. And this was thought to be partlie the cauſe of the malice that he conceiued againſt the duke of Orleance, ſuppoſing that through him (enuieng his glorie) he was thus diſappointed of his purpoſe. Whileſt ſuch doings were in hand betwixt the Engliſh and French, as the beſieging of Marke caſtell by the earle of ſaint Paule, and the ſending forth of the Engliſh fléet, vnder the gouernance of the lord Thomas of Lancaſter, and the earle of Kent, the king was minded to haue gone into Wales againſt the Welſh rebels, that vnder their chéefteine Owen Glendouer, ceaſſed not to doo much miſchéefe ſtill againſt the Engliſh ſubiects.

The duke of Burgognie prepareth to beſiege Calis.

The chéefe root of the malice betwixt the dukes of Burgognie & Orleance.

But at the ſame time, to his further diſquieting, there was a conſpiracie put in practiſe againſt him at home by the earle of Northumberland, who had conſpired with Richard Scroope archbiſhop of Yorke Thomas Mowbraie earle marſhall ſonne to Thomas duke of Norfolke, who for the quarrell betwixt him and king Henrie had béene baniſhed (as ye haue heard) the lords Haſtings, Fauconbridge, Berdolfe, and diuerſe others. It was appointed that they ſhould méet altogither with their whole power, vpon Yorkeſwold, at a daie aſſigned, and that the earle of Northumberland ſhould be chéefteine, promiſing to bring with him a great number of Scots. The archbiſhop accompanied with the earle marſhall, deuiſed certeine articles of ſuch matters, as it was ſuppoſed that not onelie the commonaltie of the Realme, but alſo the nobilitie found themſelues gréeued with: which articles they ſhewed firſt vnto ſuch of their adherents as were néere about them, & after ſent them abroad to their fréends further off, aſſuring them that for redreſſe of ſuch oppreſſions, they would ſhed the laſt drop of bloud in their bodies, if néed were.

A new conſpiracie againſt king Henrie by the earle of Northumberland & others.

The archbiſhop not meaning to ſtaie after he ſaw himſelfe accompanied with a great number of men, that came flocking to Yorke to take his part in this quarrell, forthwith diſcouered his enterpriſe, cauſing the articles aforſaid to be ſet vp in the publike ſtréets of the citie of Yorke, and vpon the gates of the monaſteries, that ech man might vnderſtand the cauſe that mooued him to riſe in armes againſt the king, the reforming whereof did not yet apperteine vnto him. Herevpon knights, eſquiers, gentlemen, yeomen, and other of the commons, as well of the citie, townes and countries about, being allured either for deſire of change, or elſe for deſire to ſée a reformation in ſuch things as were mentioned in the articles, aſſembled togither in great numbers; and the archbiſhop comming forth amongſt them clad in armor, incouraged, exhorted, and (by all meanes he could) pricked them forth to take the enterpriſe in hand, and manfullie to continue in their begun purpoſe, promiſing forgiueneſſe of ſinnes to all them, whoſe hap it was to die in the quarrell: and thus not onelie all the citizens of Yorke, but all other in the countries about, that were able to beare weapon, came to the archbiſhop, and the earle marſhall. In déed the reſpect that men had to the archbiſhop, cauſed them to like the better of the cauſe, ſince the grauitie of his age, his integritie of life, and incomparable learning, with the reuerend aſpect of his amiable perſonage, mooued all men to haue him in no ſmall eſtimation.

The archbiſhop in armor.

The eſtimation which men had of the archbiſhop of Yorke.

The king aduertiſed of theſe matters, meaning to preuent them, left his iournie into Wales, and marched with all ſpéed towards the north parts. Alſo Rafe Neuill earle of Weſtmerland, that was not farre off, togither with the lord John of Lancaſter the kings ſonne, being informed of this rebellious attempt, aſſembled togither ſuch power as they might make, and togither with thoſe which were appointed to attend on the ſaid lord John to defend the borders againſt the Scots, as the lord Henrie Fitzhugh, the lord Rafe Euers, the lord Robert Umfreuill, & others, made forward againſt the rebels, and comming into a plaine within the forreſt of Galtree, cauſed their ſtandards to be pitched downe in like ſort as the archbiſhop had pitched his, ouer againſt them, being farre ſtronger in number of people than the other, for (as ſome write) there were of the rebels at the leaſt twentie thouſand men.

The earle of Weſtmerland and the lord John of Lancaſter the kings ſonne prepare themſelues to reſiſt the kings enimies.

The forreſt of Galtrée.

When the earle of Weſtmerland perceiued the force of the aduerſaries, and that they laie ſtill and attempted not to come forward vpon him, he ſubtilie deuiſed how to quaile their purpoſe, and forthwith diſpatched meſſengers vnto the archbiſhop to vnderſtand the cauſe as it were of that great aſſemblie, and for what cauſe (contrarie to the kings peace) they came ſo in armour. The archbiſhop anſwered, that he tooke nothing in hand againſt the kings peace, but that whatſoeuer he did, tended rather to aduance the peace and quiet of the common-wealth, than otherwiſe; and where he and his companie were in armes, it was for feare of the king, to whom he could haue no frée acceſſe, by reaſon of ſuch a multitude of flatterers as were about him; and therefore he mainteined that his purpoſe to be good & profitable, as well for the king himſelfe, as for the realme, if men were willing to vnderſtand a truth: & herewith he ſhewed forth a ſcroll, in which the articles were written whereof before ye haue heard.

The ſubtill policie of the earle of Weſtmerland.

The archbiſhops proteſtation why he had on him armes.

The meſſengers returning to the earle of Weſtmerland, ſhewed him what they had heard & brought from the archbiſhop. When he had read the articles, he ſhewed in word and countenance outwardly that he liked of the archbiſhops holie and vertuous intent and purpoſe, promiſing that he and his would proſecute the ſame in aſſiſting the archbiſhop, who reioiſing hereat, gaue credit to the earle, and perſuaded the earle marſhall (againſt his will as it were) to go with him to a place appointed for them to commune togither. Here when they were met with like number on either part, the articles were read ouer, and without anie more adoo, the earle of Weſtmerland and thoſe that were with him agreed to doo their beſt, to ſee that a reformation might be had, according to the ſame.

The earle of weſtmerlãds politike dealing.

The earle of Weſtmerland vſing more policie than the reſt: Well (ſaid he) then our trauell is come to the wiſhed end: and where our people haue beene long in armour, let them depart home to their woonted trades and occupations: in the meane time let vs drinke togither in ſigne of agreement, that the people on both ſides maie ſee it, and know that it is true, that we be light at a point. They had no ſooner ſhaken hands togither, but that a knight was ſent ſtreight waies from the archbiſhop, to bring word to the people that there was peace concluded, commanding ech man to laie aſide his armes, and to reſort home to their houſes. The people beholding ſuch tokens of peace, as ſhaking of hands, and drinking togither of the lords in louing manner, they being alreadie wearied with the vnaccuſtomed trauell of warre, brake vp their field and returned homewards: but in the meane time, whileſt the people of the archbiſhops ſide withdrew awaie, the number of the contrarie part increaſed, according to order giuen by the earle of Weſtmerland; and yet the archbiſhop perceiued not that he was deceiued, vntill the earle of Weſtmerland arreſted both him and the earle marſhall, with diuerſe other. Thus ſaith Walſingham.

The archbiſhop of yorke and the earle marſhall arreſted.
Eiton,

But others write ſomwhat otherwiſe of this matter, affirming that the earle of Weſtmerland in deed, and the lord Rafe Euers, procured the archbiſhop & the earle marſhall, to come to a communication with them, vpon a ground iuſt in the midwaie betwixt both the armies, where the earle of Weſtmerland in talke declared to them how perilous an enterpriſe they had taken in hand, ſo to raiſe the people, and to moue warre againſt the king, aduiſing them therefore to ſubmit themſelues without further delaie vnto the kings mercie, and his ſonne the lord Iohn, who was preſent there in the field with banners ſpred, redie to trie the matter by dint of ſword, if they refuſed this counſell: and therefore he willed them to remember themſelues well; & if they would not yeeld and craue the kings pardon, he bad them doo their beſt to defend themſelues.

Hereupon as well the archbiſhop as the earle marſhall ſubmitted themſelues vnto the king, and to his ſonne the lord Iohn that was there preſent, and returned not to their armie. Whereupon their troops ſcaled and fled their waies: but being purſued, manie were taken, manie ſlaine, and manie ſpoiled of that that they had about them, & ſo permitted to go their waies. Howſoeuer the matter was handled, true it is that the archbiſhop, and the earle marſhall were brought to Pomfret to the king, who in this meane while was aduanced thither with his power, and from thence he went to Yorke, whither the priſoners were alſo brought, and there beheaded the morrow after Whitſundaie in a place without the citie, that is to vnderſtand, the archbiſhop himſelfe, the earle marſhall, ſir Iohn Lampleie, and ſir Robert Plumpton. ¶ Unto all which perſons though indemnitie were promiſed, yet was the ſame to none of them at anie hand performed. By the iſſue hereof, I meane the death of the foreſaid, but ſpeciallie of the archbiſhop, the propheſie of a ſickelie canon of Bridlington in Yorkeſhire fell out to be true, who darklie inough foretold this matter, & the infortunate euent thereof in theſe words hereafter following, ſaieng:

The archbiſhop of yorke, the earle marſhall, & others put to death.

* Archiepiſcop

The archbiſhop reputed a martyr.

The archbiſhop ſuffered death verie conſtantlie, inſomuch as the common people tooke it, he died a martyr, affirming that certeine miracles were wrought as well in the field where he was executed, as alſo in the place where he was buried: and immediatlie vpon ſuch bruits, both men and women began to worſhip his dead carcaſſe, whom they loued ſo much when he was aliue, till they were forbidden by the kings freends, and for feare gaue ouer to viſit the place of his ſepulture. The earle marſhals bodie by the kings leaue was buried in the cathedrall church, manie lamenting his deſtinie; but his head was ſet on a pole aloft on the wals for a certeine ſpace, till by the kings permiſſion [after the ſame had ſuffered manie a hot ſunnie daie, and manie a wet ſhower of raine] it was taken downe and buried togither with the bodie.

The lords executed.

The earle of Northumberland.

After the king, accordinglie as ſeemed to him good, had ranſomed and puniſhed by greeuous fines the citizens of Yorke (which had borne armour on their archbiſhops ſide againſt him) he departed frõ Yorke with an armie of thirtie and ſeuen thouſand fighting men, furniſhed with all prouiſion neceſſarie, marching northwards againſt the earle of Northumberland. At his comming to Durham, the lord Haſtings, the lord Fauconbridge, ſir Iohn Colleuill of the Dale, and ſir Iohn Griffith, being conuicted of the conſpiracie, were there beheaded. The earle of Northumberland, hearing that his counſell was bewraied, and his confederats brought to confuſion, through too much haſt of the archbiſhop of Yorke, with three hundred horſſe got him to Berwike. The king comming forward quickelie, wan the caſtell of Warkewoorth. Whereupon the earle of Northumberland, not thinking himſelfe in ſuertie at Berwike, fled with the lord Berdolfe into Scotland, where they were receiued of Dauid lord Fleming.

Berwike caſtell yeelded to the king.

The ſonne of the lord Greiſtoke and others put to death.
Eiton.

The king comming to Berwike, commanded them that kept the caſtell againſt him to render it into his hands, and when they flatlie denied ſo to doo, he cauſed a peece of artillerie to be planted againſt one of the towers, and at the firſt ſhot ouerthrowing part thereof, they within were put in ſuch feare, that they ſimplie yeelded themſelues without any maner of condition, wholie to remaine at the kings pleaſure. Hereupon the chiefeſt of them, to wit, ſir William Greiſtoke, ſonne to Rafe baron of Greiſtoke, ſir Henrie Beinton, and Iohn Blenkinſop, with foure or fiue other were put to death, and diuerſe other were kept in priſon. Some write that the earle of Northumberland at his entring into Scotland, deliuered the towne of Berwike vnto the Scots, who hearing of king Henries approch, and deſpairing to defend the towne againſt him, ſet fire on it and departed. There was not one houſe that was left vnburnt, except the friers and the church.

The caſtell of Alnewike yeelded to the king.

The K. paſſeth into wales.

He loſeth his cariages.
He returneth.

After that the king had diſpoſed things in ſuch conuenient order as ſtood with his pleaſure at Berwike, he came backe, and had the caſtell of Alnewike deliuered vnto him, with all other the caſtels that belonged to the erle of Northumberland in the north parts, as Prodhow, Langlie, Cockermouth, Alnham, and Newſteed. Thus hauing quieted the north parts, he tooke his iournie directlie into Wales, where he found fortune nothing fauourable vnto him, for all his attempts had euill ſucceſſe, in ſomuch that loſing fiftie of his cariages through abundance of raine and waters, he returned; and comming to Worceſter, he ſent for the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other biſhops, declaring to them the miſfortune that had chanced to him, in conſideration whereof he requeſted them to helpe him with ſome portion of monie, towards the maintenance of his warres, for the taming of the preſumptuous and vnquiet Welſhmen.

Hall. The marſhall Mõtmerãcie ſent to aid Owen Glendouer.

In the meane time, the French king had appointed one of the marſhals of France called Montmerancie, and the maſter of his croſbowes, with twelue thouſand men to ſaile into Wales to aid Owen Glendouer. They tooke ſhipping at Breſt, and hauing the wind proſperous, landed at Milford hauen, with an hundred and fourtie ſhips, as Thomas Walſingham ſaith; though Enguerant de Monſtrellet maketh mention but of an hundred and twentie. The moſt part of their horſſes were loſt by the waie for lacke of freſh water. The lord Berkleie, and Henrie Paie, eſpieng their aduantage, burnt fifteene of thoſe French ſhips, as they laie at road there in the hauen of Milford: and ſhortlie after the ſame lord Berkleie, and ſir Thomas Swinborne, with the ſaid Henrie Paie, tooke other fourteene ſhips, as they came that waie with prouiſion of vittels and munition foorth of France to the aid of the other.

Carmarden wone by the French.

In the meane while the marſhall Montmerancie, with his armie, beſieged the towne of Carmarden, and wan it by compoſition, granting to the men of warre that kept it againſt him, licence to depart whither they would, & to take with them all their moueable goods: the caſtell of Penbroke they aſſaulted not, eſteeming it to be ſo well manned, that they ſhuld but loſe their labour in attempting it. Notwithſtanding they beſieged the towne of Hereford weſt, which neuertheleſſe was ſo well defended by the earle of Arundell and his power, that they loſt more than they wan, and ſo they departed towards the towne of Denbigh, where they found Owen Glendouer abiding for their comming, with ten thouſand of his Welſhmen. Here were the Frenchmen ioifullie receiued of the Welſh rebels, and ſo when all things were prepared, they paſſed by Glamorganſhire towards Worceſter, and there burnt the ſuburbes: but hearing of the kings approch, they ſuddenlie returned towards Wales.

Hereford weſt manfullie defended.

Enguerant de Monſtrellet ſaith they burnt the townes but could not win the caſtell.

The ſuburbs of worceſter burnt.

The king with a great puiſſance followed, and found them imbattelled on a high mounteine, where there was a great vallie betwixt both the armies, ſo that either armie might plainelie perceiue the other, and either hoſt looked to be aſſailed of his aduerſarie, & therefore ſought to take the aduantage of ground. Thus they continued for the ſpace of eight daies from morning till night, readie to abide, but not to giue battell. There were manie ſkirmiſhes, and diuerſe proper feats of armes wrought in that meane while, in the which the French loſt manie of their nobles and gentlemen, as the lord Patrouſlars de Tries, brother to the marſhall of France, the lord Matelonne or Martelonne, the lord de la Valle, and the baſtard of Bourbon, with other, to the number (as ſome haue written) of fiue hundred. But Enguerant de Monſtrellet affirmeth, that vpon their returne into France, there wanted not aboue three ſcore perſons of all their companies.

French lords ſlaine.

After they had laine thus one againſt an other the ſpace of eight daies (as before is ſaid) vittels began to faile, ſo that they were inforced to diſlodge. The French and Welſhmen withdrew into Wales, and though the Engliſhmen followed, yet impeached with the deſart grounds and barren countrie, thorough which they muſt paſſe, as our felles and craggie mounteins, from hill to dale, from mariſh to wood, from naught to worſſe (as Hall ſaith) without vittels or ſuccour, the king was of force conſtrained to retire with his armie, and returne againe to Worceſter, in which returne the enimies tooke certeine cariages of his laden with vittels. The Frenchmen after the armies were thus withdrawne, returned into Britaine, making ſmall brags of their painefull iournie.

The Frenchmen returne home.

Anno Reg. 7.

This yeare at London, the earle of Arundell maried the baſtard daughter of the king of Portingale, the king of England and the queene with their preſence honoring the ſolemnitie of that feaſt, which was kept with all ſumptuous roialtie, the morrow after ſaint Katharins daie. ¶ And on the daie of the Conception of our ladie, the ladie Philip king Henries daughter was proclamed queene of Denmarke, Norwaie, and Sweden, in preſence of ſuch ambaſſadors, as the laſt ſummer came hither from the king of thoſe countries, to demand hir in marriage for him, and had ſo trauelled in the matter, that finallie they obteined it. ¶ On the daie of the tranſlation of ſaint Martine, the towne of Roiſton was on fire. This yeare the firſt of March a parlement began, which continued almoſt all this yeare: for after that in the lower houſe they had denied a long time to grant to any ſubſidie: yet at length, a little before Chriſtmaſſe, in the eight yeare of his reigne they granted a fifteenth to the loſſe and great damage of the communaltie, for through lingering of time, the expenſes of knights and burgeſſes grew almoſt in value to the ſumme that was demanded.

A parlement.

A fifteenth grãted by the temporaltie.

Moreouer, by the clergie a new kind of ſubſidie was granted, to the king, to be leuied of ſtipendarie prieſts and friers mendicants, and other ſuch religious men as ſong for the dead, celebrating (as they termed it) anniuerſaries: euerie of them gaue halfe a marke, in reliefe of other of the cleargie that had ſtill borne the burthen for them before. Wherevpon now they murmured and grudged ſore, for that they were thus charged at that preſent. The ſame time the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Bardolfe, warned by the lord Dauid Fleming, that there was a conſpiracie practiſed to deliuer them into the king of Englands hands, fled into Wales to Owen Glendouer. This coſt the lord Fleming his life: for after it was knowne that he had diſcloſed to the earle of Northumberland what was meant againſt him, and that the earle therevpon was ſhifted awaie, certeine of the Scots ſlue the ſaid lord Fleming.

A new kind of ſubſidie granted by the cleargie.

The lord Fleming loſt his life for giuing knowledge to the earle of Northumberland of that which was meant againſt him.

Wherevpon no ſmall grudge roſe betwixt thoſe that ſo ſlue him, and the ſaid lord Flemings friends. For this and other matters, ſuch diſſention ſprong vp amongſt the Scotiſh nobilitie, that one durſt not truſt another, ſo that they were glad to ſue for a truce betwixt England and them, which was granted to indure for one yeare, as in ſome books we find recorded. This truce being obteined, Robert king of Scotland (vpon conſiderations, as in the Scotiſh hiſtorie ye may read more at large) ſent his eldeſt ſon Iames intituled prince of Scotland (a child not paſt nine yeares of age) to be conueied into France, vnder the conduct of the earle of Orkenie, and a biſhop, in hope that he might there both remaine in ſafetie, and alſo learne the French toong.

Diſſention amõg the Scotiſh nobilitie.

Eleuen yeares ſaith Harding.

The prince of Scotland ſtaid here in England.

But it fortuned, that as they ſailed neare to the Engliſh coaſt about Flambrough head in Holderneſſe, their ſhip was taken and ſtaied by certeine mariners of Claie (a towne in Norffolke) that were abroad the ſame time; and ſo he and all his companie being apprehended the thirtith of March, was conueied to Windſore, where though he had letters from his father, which he preſented to the king, conteining a requeſt in his ſonnes behalfe for fauour to be ſhewed towards him, if by chance he landed within any of his dominions: yet was he deteined, and as well he himſelfe as the earle of Orkenie was committed to ſafe kéeping in the Tower of London, but the biſhop got away and eſcaped (as ſome write) by what means I know not. By the Scotiſh writers we find that this chanced in the yeare 1404, that is, two yeares before the time noted in diuerſe Engliſh writers, as Thomas Walſingham and other. But Harding ſaith it was in the ninth yeare of king Henries reigne, to wit, in the yeare 1408.

But whenſoeuer it chanced, it is to be thought, that there was no truce at that preſent betwéene the two realmes, but that the warre was rather open, ſith diuerſe Engliſh rebels ſtill remained in Scotland, and were there ſuccored to the high diſpleaſure of king Henrke. ¶ By authoritie of the parlement that all this time continued, the Britons that ſerued the quéene, with two of hir daughters were baniſhed the realme. Robert Halome chancellor of Oxford, as then being in the popes court at Rome, was created archbiſhop of Yorke. ¶ Moreouer the ſame time, the pope gaue vnto Thomas Langlie the biſhoprike of Durham, which by the death of Walter Skirlow was then void. In the ſummer of this yeare, the ladie Philip the kings yonger daughter was ſent ouer to hir affianced huſband, Erike king of Denmarke, Norwaie, and Sweden, being conueied thither with great pompe, and there married to the ſaid king, where ſhe taſted (according to the common ſpéech vſed in praieng for the ſucceſſe of ſuch as match togither in mariage) both ioy and ſome ſorrow among. There attended hir thither Henrie Bowet biſhop of Bath, and the lord Richard brother to the duke of Yorke.

There was a iuſts held at London, betwixt the earle of Kent, and the erle of Marre a Scotiſhman; alſo ſir John Cornewall, and the lord Beaumont, againſt other two Scotiſh knights, whereof the honor remained with the Engliſhmen. In the parlement which yet continued, the duke of Yorke was reſtored to his former libertie, eſtate and dignitie, where manie ſuppoſed that he had béene dead long before that time in priſon. Edmund Holland earle of Kent was in ſuch fauour with king Henrie, that he not onelie aduanced him to high offices and great honors, but alſo to his great coſts and charges obteined for him the ladie Lucie, eldeſt daughter, and one of the heirs of the lord Barnabo of Millane, which Barnabo paied to him 100000 ducates, in the church of S. Marie Oueries in Southwarke, by the hands of Don Alfonſo de Cainuola, vpon the day of the ſolemnization of the marriage, which was the foure and twentith of Ianuarie.

¶ In this yeare Roger of Walden departed this life; who hauing béene toſſed vp and downe with ſundrie changes of fortune, tried in a ſhort time how inconſtant, vncerteine, variable, wandering, vnſtable, and flitting ſhe is; which when ſhe is thought firmelie to ſtand, ſhe ſlipperinglie falleth; and with a diſſembling looke counterfaiteth falſe ioies. For by the meanes of hir changeableneſſe, the ſaid Roger of a poore fellow, grew vp to be high lord treaſuror of the realme, and ſhortlie after archbiſhop of Canturburie; but by what right, the world knoweth; conſidering that the lord Thomas Arundell was then liuing. Anon after he was depoſed from his dignitie, and lead the life of an ordinarie priuat man a long time; within a while after againe he was promoted and made biſhop of London, which ſée he had not poſſeſſed a full yeare, but was depriued, and Nicholas Hobwith ſucceeded in his roome. So that hereby men are taught not to be proud of their preferment, nor to reckon of them as of perpetuities, ſithens they may be as ſoone diſpoſſeſſed as poſſeſſed of them; and for that all eſtates & degrées depend vpon Gods power and prouidence, whereof the poet diuinelie ſaith,

In this yeare the ſeuenth of Maie was Thomas Langlie conſecrated biſhop of Durham after the deceaſe of Walter Skirlow. In which place he continued one and thirtie yeares. He among other his beneficiall déeds beautified the church of Durham for euer with a chanterie of two chapleines. Beſides which for the increaſe of learning (wherwith himſelfe was greatlie furniſhed) he built two ſchooles, the one for grammar to inſtruct youth, whereby in following time they might be made more able to benefit themſelues and ſerue their countrie: and the other of muſicke, wherein children might be made apt to ſerue God and the church, both which ſchooles he erected in a parcell of ground cõmonlie called The plaie gréene. To which buildings (for he was one that delighted much therein, and like vnto the philoſopher Anaxagoras ſuppoſed that there was not any more earthlie felicitie, than to erect ſumptuous palaces, wherby after their death the memorie of the founders might haue continuance) he added manie ſumptuous parts of the palace of Durham. In the towne whereof he did alſo from the ground (of moſt ſtatelie ſtone) erect a new gaole with the gate-houſe to the ſame, in that place where of old it remained, and then by iniurie of time fallen downe and conſumed. This man inioied the ſée of Durham almoſt the whole time of thrée kings, that is; about ſix yeares and ſix moneths in the time of Henrie the fourth, nine yeares and fiue moneths in the time of Henrie the fift, and fiftéene yeares in the time of Henrie the ſixt; during the gouernment of all which princes, he was all his life time highlie eſtéemed and reuerenced for his ſingular wiſedome, and for the great authoritie he bare in publike, betwéene whome and the maior of Newcaſtell aroſe great contention, about a bridge called Tinebridge in the towne of Gateſhed or Goteſhed, in Latine called Caput capræ. But in the yeare of our redemption 1416, and of Henrie the fift, the fourth, and of his biſhoprike the eleuenth, this biſhop had the recouerie thereof, as appeareth by the letter of atturnie of the ſaid biſhop, made to diuerſe to take poſſeſſion of the ſame.

The duke of Orleance beſiegeth towns in Gaſcoigne.

The duke of Orleance hauing leuied a mightie armie, had beſieged the townes of Burge and Blaie in Gaſcoigne, meaning with force to win the ſame; but ſo it fortuned, that for the ſpace of eight weekes togither, there paſſed not one daie without tempeſt of raine, ſnow, and haile, mixed with winds and lightnings, which killed aſwell men as cattell, by reaſon whereof he loſt (as was reported) ſix thouſand men, ſo that he was conſtreined to breake vp his camps from before both thoſe townes, and to get him awaie with diſhonor, for all his brags and boaſts made at his firſt comming thither. The ſame time, Henrie Paie and certeine other perſons of the fiue ports, with fifteene ſhips, tooke an hundred and twentie priſes, which laie at anchor in and about the coaſt of Britaine, laden with iron, ſalt, oile, & Rochell wines.

Henrie Paie a valiant ſeaman.

K. Richard ſtill aliue as was feigned.

In this ſeaſon alſo billes were ſet vp in diuerſe places of London, and on the doore of Paules church, in which was conteined, that king Richard being aliue and in health, would come ſhortlie with great magnificence & power to recouer againe his kingdome; but the contriuer of this deuiſe was quicklie found out, apprehended, and puniſhed according to his demerits. ¶ The citie of London this yeare in the ſummer was ſo infected with peſtilent mortalitie, that the king durſt not repaire thither, nor come neere to it. Wherevpon he being at the caſtell of Leeds in Kent, and departing from thence, tooke ſhip at Quinburgh in the Ile, of Shepie, to ſaile ouer vnto Lee in Eſſex, and ſo to go to Plaſchie, there to paſſe the time till the mortalitie was ceaſſed.

The king in danger to be taken by French pirats.

Sir Thomas Rampſton taken.

The king eſcaped through ſwiftneſſe of his ſhip.

The lord Camois put in blame.

As he was vpon the ſea, certeine French pirats which laie lurking at the Thames mouth to watch for ſome preie, got knowledge by ſome meanes (as was ſuppoſed) of the kings paſſage, and therevpon as he was in the middeſt of his courſe, they entred among his fleet, and tooke foure veſſels next to the kings ſhip, and in one of the ſame veſſels ſir Thomas Rampſton the kings vicechamberlaine, with all his chamber ſtuffe and apparell. They followed the king ſo neere, that if his ſhip had not beene ſwift, he had landed ſooner in France than in Eſſex: but ſuch was his good hap, that he eſcaped and arriued at his appointed port. The lord Camois, that was commanded with certeine ſhips of warre to waft the king ouer (whether the wind turned ſo that he could not keepe his direct courſe, or that his ſhip was but a ſlug) ran ſo far in the kings diſpleaſure, that he was attached & indited, for that (as was ſurmized againſt him) he had practiſed with the Frenchmen, that the king might by them haue beene taken in his paſſage.

Yee haue heard that the pope by vertue of his prouiſion had giuen the archbiſhoprike of Yorke vnto maiſter Robert Halom; but the king was ſo offended therewith, that the ſaid Robert might in no wiſe inioy that benefice, and ſo at length, to ſatiſfie the kings pleaſure, maiſter Henrie Bowet was tranſlated from Bath vnto Yorke, and maiſter Robert Halom was made biſhop of Saliſburie then void by remoouing of Henrie Chichellie to S. Dauids. The lord Henrie prince of Wales this yeare in the ſummer ſeaſon beſieged the caſtell of Abiruſcwith, and conſtreined them within to compound with him vnder certeine conditions for truce; but the prince was no ſooner from thence departed, but that Owen Glendouer by ſubtill craft entered the caſtell, put out the keepers, and charging them with treaſon for concluding an agreement without his conſent, placed other in that fortreſſe to defend it to his vſe.

About the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, that ancient warriour and worthie knight ſir Robert Knols departed this life: he was (as before yee haue heard) borne of meane parentage, but growen into ſuch eſtimation for his valiant proweſſe, as he was thought meet to haue the leading of whole armies, and the rule and gouernment of large prouinces. For not long before his deceaſſe, he being gouernour of Aquitaine, incumbred with age, reſigned his office vnto ſir Thomas Belfort, a right valiant capteine, and therewith returned into England, where he died at a manour place of his in Norffolke, & from thence brought to London in a litter, with great pompe and much torch light, was buried in the church of White friers in Fleetſtreet by the ladie Conſtance his wife, where was doone for him a ſolemne obſequie, with a great feaſt, and liberall dole to the poore.

He alſo founded a college of ſecular prieſts at Pomfret, and did manie other things in his life right commendable. Sir Thomas Rampſton conſtable of the tower was drowned, in comming from the court as he would haue ſhut the bridge, the ſtreame being ſo big, that it ouerturned his barge. This yeare the

The earle of Northumberland, and the lord Bardolfe, after they had béene in Wales, in France and Flanders, to purchaſe aid againſt king Henrie, were returned backe into Scotland, and had remained there now for the ſpace of a whole yeare: and as their euill fortune would, whileſt the king held a councell of the nobilitie at London, the ſaid earle of Northumberland and lord Bardolfe, in a diſmall houre, with a great power of Scots returned into England, recouering diuerſe of the earls caſtels and ſeigniories, for the people in great numbers reſorted vnto them. Héerevpon incouraged with hope of good ſucceſſe, they entred into Yorkeſhire, & there began to deſtroie the countrie. The cardinall of Burges cõmeth into England in diſfauor of pope Greg kings which were accounted the chéefe in chriſtendome, to put vnto their helping hands, that the ſame pope Gregorie might be induced to obſerue and performe that oth, which he had receiued, ſo as by the roiall authoritie of thoſe two kings, concord might be had in the church. The French king (as this cardinall alleged) following the aduiſe of the learned men of the vniuerſities of Paris, Bologna, Orleans, Tholouſe, and Montpellier, to auoid the danger of fauouring ſchiſme, determined to obeie neither the one nor the other that contended for the papaſie, vntill peace and concord might be reſtored in Chriſtes church. Theſe and the like matters, to vtter what deſire he had to haue an vnitie in the church, he declared frankelie in his letters directed to the pope, ſo as it might appeare to the world, how ſoberlie and modeſtlie he ſought to induce the pope to procure peace & concord in the church. Moſt holie father, if the ſeat apoſtolicall would vouchſafe by prouidence to conſider, how great dangers haue inuaded the whole world vnder the pretext of ſchiſme, and ſpeciallie the ſlaughter of chriſtian people, which is of aboue two hundred thouſand (as it is auouched) by the outrage of warres and battell ſprong vp in ſundrie parts of the world; & now latelie to the number of thirtie thouſand (by meanes of the diſſention about the biſhoprike of Leods betwéene two, one contending vnder the authoritie of true pope, and the other vnder the title of antipape) ſlaine in a foughten field, whereof we make report with gréefe; trulie the ſaid ſeat would be penſiue in ſpirit, & with due ſorow troubled in mind; yea at the motion of a good conſcience, it would rather giue ouer the honour of that apoſtolicall ſeat, than ſuffer ſuch deteſtable déeds further to be committed, vnder the cloke of diſſimulation, taking example of the true and naturall mother, which pleading before king Salomon, choſe rather to part with hir owne child, than to ſée him cut in ſunder. And although by that new creation of nine cardinals, againſt your oth (that we maie vſe the words of others) made by you, whereof a vehement cauſe of woondering is riſen, it maie in ſome ſort be ſuppoſed (as it is likelie) that your intent reſpecteth not anie end of ſchiſme; yet farre be it alwaies from the world, that your circumſpect ſeat ſhould be charged by anie perſon with ſo great inconſtancie of mind, whereby the laſt errour might be counted woorſſe than the firſt, &c.

We being deſirous to ſhew how great zeale we had, & haue, that peace might be granted & giuen to the church by the conſent of the ſtates of our realme, haue ſent ouer our letters to our lord the pope, according to the tenure of a copie incloſed within theſe preſents effectuallie to be executed. Wherefore we doo earneſtlie beſéech the reuerend college of you; that if happilie the ſaid Gregorie be preſent at the generall councell holden at Piſa, about the yéelding vp of the papaſie, according to the promiſe and oth by him manie a time made, to fulfill your and our deſires, as we wiſh and beare our ſelues in hand he will doo; that you will ſo order things concerning his eſtate, that thereby God maie chéeflie be pleaſed, and as well Gregorie himſelfe, as we, who deſeruedlie doo tender his honour and commoditie with all our harts, maie be beholden to giue you and euerie of you manifold thanks.

An other thing the commons ſued to haue granted vnto them, but could not obteine: which was, that clearks conuicted ſhould not from thence forth be deliuered to the biſhops priſon. Moreouer they demanded to haue the ſtatute either reuoked, or qualified, which had béene eſtabliſhed by authoritie of parlement, in the ſecond yeare of this kings reigne, againſt ſuch as were reputed to be heretiks, or Lollards. By force whereof it was prouided, that whereſoeuer ſuch maner of perſons ſhould be found and knowne to preach or teach their erronious doctrine, they ſhould be attached with the kings writ, and brought to the next goale: but the king ſéemed ſo highlie to fauour the cleargie, that the commons were anſwered plainelie, they ſhould not come by their purpoſe, but rather that the ſaid ſtatute ſhould be made more rigorous and ſharpe for the puniſhment of ſuch perſons.

John Badbie burnt. Tho. Walſi.

The prince being preſent at the execution offereth him pardon.

Notable conſtancie of Badbie.

During this parlement one John Badbie a tailor, or (as ſome write) a ſmith, being conuict of hereſie, was brought into Smithfield, and there in a tun or pipe burnt to death, in pitifull manner. The kings eldeſt ſonne the lord Henrie prince of Wales being preſent, offered him his pardon, firſt before the fire was kindled, if he would haue recanted his opinions; and after when the fire was kindled, hearing him make a roring noiſe verie pitifullie, the prince cauſed the fire to be plucked backe, and exhorting him being with pitifull paine almoſt dead, to remember himſelfe, and renounce his opinions, promiſing him not onelie life, but alſo thrée pence a daie ſo long as he liued to be paid out of the kings coffers: but he hauing recouered his ſpirits againe, refuſed the princes offer, chooſing eftſoones to taſt the fire, and ſo to die, than to forſake his opinions. Wherevpon the prince commanded, that he ſhould be put into the tun againe, from thenceforth not to haue anie fauour or pardon at all, and ſo it was doone, and the fire put to him againe, and he conſumed to aſhes.

The kings demand in the parlement.

A long parlement. A fifteenth granted.

Earle of Surrie deceaſſeth.

Preparation made to win Calis. Thom. Walſ.

The king demanded in this parlement, that it might be granted to him, to haue euerie yeare in which he held no parlement a tenth of the cleargie, and a fiftéenth of the laitie; but the eſtates would not agrée therevnto, by reaſon whereof, the parlement continued till almoſt the middle of Maie. At length they granted to giue him a fiftéenth, not without great murmuring and grudging of the commonaltie. About this ſeaſon died the lord Thomas Beauford earle of Surrie. The eleuenth of Aprill or therabouts, the towne of ſaint Omers was burnt by caſuall fire togither with the abbeie, in which towne was ſuch ſtrange and maruellous prouiſion of engines, and all manner of furniture and preparation for the winning of Calis, as the like had neuer béene ſéene nor heard of. Some write, that they of Calis ſtanding in doubt of ſuch purueiance, & great preparation deuiſed to annoie them, procured a yoong man to kindle a fire, whereby all that dreadfull prouiſion was conſumed to aſhes, and ſo they within Calis deliuered of a great deale of care and feare which they had thereof.

The engines of the duke of Burgognie againſt Calis that ſhot out barrels of poiſon.

¶ But Tho. Walſingham maketh a full & complet declaration, both concerning the dukes deuiſe, & alſo of the Caleſians deliuerance from the danger of the ſame; which becauſe it perfecteth the report of this preſent matter, I haue thought good to ſet downe word for word as I find it in his Hypodigme. About the ninth of Aprill (ſaith he) the towne of ſaint Audomare was burned with the abbeie, wherein was hidden and laid vp the execrable prouiſion of the duke of Burgognie, who had vowed either to deſtroie the towne of Calis, or elſe to ſubdue it to the will and pleaſure of the French. There a great manie engines to this daie no where ſéene, there an excéeding ſort of veſſels conteining poiſon in them were kept in ſtore, which he had aforehand prouided to caſt out to the deſtruction of the ſaid towne. For he had gathered togither ſerpents, ſcorpions, todes, and other kinds of venemous things, which he had cloſed and ſhut vp in little barrels, that when the fleſh or ſubſtance of thoſe noiſome creatures was rotten, and diſſolued into filthie matter, he might laie ſiege to Calis, and caſt the ſaid barrels let out of engines into the towne; which with the violence of the throw being daſht in péeces, might choke them that were within, poiſon the harneſſed men touched therewith, & with their ſcattered venem infect all the ſtréets, lanes, & paſſages of the towne. In the meane time, a certeine yoong man allured with couetouſneſſe of gold, or lead with affection and loue towards the kings towne, aſked of the gouernours what reward he ſhould deſerue, that would diſcharge and ſet frée the towne from ſo great a feare, and would burne all the prouiſion which they ſuſpected. Herevpon they leuied a ſumme of that yellow metall (namelie gold) wherewith the yoongman contented, went his waie, and with fire readie made for the purpoſe, did not onelie burne the ſaid venemous matter and infected ſtuffe, but alſo togither with the monaſterie almoſt the whole towne.]

Sir Robert Vmfreuill viceadmerall. Harding.

His exploit in Scotland.

Moreouer this yeare ſir Robert Vmfreuill viceadmerall of England, annoied the countries on the ſea coaſts of Scotland: for comming into the Forth with ten ſhips of warre, and lieng there fourtéene daies togither, he landed euerie daie on the one ſide of the riuer or the other, taking preies, ſpoiles & priſoners; notwithſtanding the duke of Albanie, and the earle Dowglas were readie there, with a great power to reſiſt him: he burnt the galliot of Scotland (being a ſhip of great account) with manie other veſſels lieng the ſame time at the Blackeneſh ouer againſt Lieth. At his returne from thence, he brought with him fourteene good ſhips, and manie other great priſes of cloathes, both woollen, and linnen, pitch, tarre, woad, flower, meale, wheat and rie, which being ſold abroad, the markets were well holpen thereby, ſo that his ſurname of Robert Mendmarket ſeemed verie well to agree with his qualities, which name he got by this occaſion.

His ſurname Robert Mendmarket.

About foure yeares before this, he burnt the towne of Peples on the market daie, cauſing his men to meat the cloathes which they got there with their bowes, & ſo to ſell them awaie, whereupon the Scots named him Robert Mendmarket. Shortlie after his returne from the ſea now in this eleuenth yeare of king Henries reigne, he made a road into Scotland by land, hauing with him his nephue yong Gilbert Vmfreuill earle of Angus (commonlie called earle of Kime) being then but fourteene yeares of age, and this was the firſt time that the ſaid earle ſpread his banner. They burnt at that time Iedworth, and the moſt part of Tiuidale. This yeare there died of the bloudie flix in the citie of Burdeaux fourteene thouſand perſons, and ſo ſore raged that diſeaſe in Gaſcoigne and Guien, that there wanted people to dreſſe their vines, and preſſe their grapes.

By what occaſion he came by that ſurname.

The earle of Angus Vmfreuill cōmonlie called erle of Kime.

John Prendergeſt knight, & William Long ſcowred the ſeas, ſo as no pirat durſt appeare, but that merchants & paſſengers might paſſe to & fro in ſafetie. But yet through diſdaine of ſome that enuied their good ſucceſſe, the ſame Prendergeſt and Long were accuſed of robberies which they ſhould practiſe, in ſpoiling ſuch ſhips as they met with, of diuerſe things againſt the owners wils. Prendergeſt was driuen to take ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter, and could not be ſuffered to lodge in anie mans houſe for feare of the kings diſpleaſure, commanding that none ſhould receiue him, and ſo was conſtreined to ſet vp a tent within the porch of ſaint Peters church there, and to haue his ſeruants to watch nightlie about him for doubt to be murthered of his aduerſaries: but his aſſociat William Long laie ſtill at the ſea, till the lord admerall hauing prepared certeine veſſels went to the ſea himſelfe in perſon to fetch him: but yet he could not catch him vntill he had promiſed him pardon, and vndertaken vpon his fidelitie that he ſhould haue no harme: but notwithſtanding all promiſes, vpon his comming in he was ſhut vp faſt in the Tower, and ſo for a time remained in durance. The archbiſhop of Canturburie minding in this ſeaſon to viſit the vniuerſitie of Oxenford, could not be ſuffered, in conſideration of priuileges which they pretended to haue.

John Prendergeſt and William Long.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie not ſuffred to viſit the vniuerſitie of Oxenford

The realme of France in this meane while was diſquieted, with the two factions of Burgognie and Orleance, in moſt miſerable wiſe, as in the French hiſtories it maie further appeare. Neither could the king, being a lunatike perſon, and feeble of braine, take any full order for reforming of ſuch miſcheefs, ſo that the whole ſtate of the kingdome was maruellouſlie brought in decaie: neither tooke thoſe troubles end by the death of the duke of Orleance (murthered at length through the practiſe of the duke of Burgognie) but rather more perilouſlie increaſed. For the yong duke of Orleance Charles, ſonne to duke Lewes thus murthered, alied himſelfe with the dukes of Berrie and Burbon, and with the earles of Alanſon & Arminacke, whereby he was ſo ſtronglie banded againſt the duke of Burgognie, whom he defied as his mortall fo and enimie, that the duke of Burgognie fearing the ſequele of the matter, thought good (becauſe there was a motion of mariage betwixt the prince of Wales & his daughter) to require aid of king Henrie, who foreſeeing that this ciuill diſcord in France (as it after hapned) might turne his realme to honor and profit, ſent to the duke of Burgognie, Thomas earle of Arundell, Gilbert Vmfreuill earle of Angus (commonlie called the earle of Kime) ſir Robert Vmfreuill, vncle to the ſame Gilbert, ſir John Oldcaſtell lord Cobham, ſir John Greie, and William Porter, with twelue hundred archers.

France diſquieted with two factions.

The duke of Orleance murthered.

The earles of Arundell and Angus with others ſent to aid the duke of Burgognie.

They tooke ſhipping at Douer, & landed at Sluis, from whence with ſpeedie iournies in the latter end of this twelfth yeare of king Henries reigne they came to Arras, where they found the duke of Burgognie, of whom they were ioifullie receiued, & from thence he appointed them to go vnto Peron, where he aſſembled a power alſo of his owne ſubiects, and remoouing from thence, he marched through the countrie, by Roie, Bretueill, Beauois, and Giſors, till he came with his armie vnto Pontois, where he remained about the ſpace of three weekes. From Pontois the two and twentith of October, the duke of Burgognie marched towards Paris, and paſſing the riuer of Saine at Pont Meulene, he ſtaid not till he came to Paris, into the which he entred the 23 of October, late in the euening. The duke of Orleance laie at the ſame time at ſaint Denis, with the more part of his armie, & the reſidue kept the towne of S. Clou, where a bridge laie ouer the riuer of Saine. On the 9 of Nouember, with hard & ſharpe fight the Engliſhmen gat the towne of ſaint Clou, with the bridge, ſlue & drowned nine hundred ſouldiors that were ſet there to defend that paſſage, beſides 400 that were taken priſoners. They tooke alſo aboue 12 hundred horſſes, which they found in the towne, with great riches, whereof the men of warre made their profit.

Anno Reg. 13.

Saint Clou taken by the helpe of the Engliſhmen.

Among other priſoners, ſir Manſerd de Bos a valiant capteine was taken, and ſhortlie after put to death, as diuerſe other were, which the Burgognians bought of the Engliſhmen that had taken them priſoners. The tower that ſtood at the end of the bridge could not be wone. At an other bickering alſo, it chanced that the Engliſhmen, vnder the leading of the earle of Angus or Kime, had the vpper hand, and tooke manie priſoners, whom the duke of Burgognie would that they ſhould haue beene likewiſe put to death as traitors to their countrie, but the ſaid earle of Angus anſwered for himſelfe, and the reſidue of the Engliſhmen, that they would rather die all in the place, than ſuffer their priſoners to be vſed otherwiſe than as men of war ought to be, that is, to haue their liues ſaued, and to be ranſomed according as the law of armes required, and by that meanes they were preſerued. The duke of Burgognie hauing the world at will (for the duke of Orleance immediatlie after the loſſe of ſaint Clou, departing from ſaint Denis, got him into the high countries) ſent home the Engliſhmen with hartie thanks, and great rewards.

Sir Manſerd de Bos put to death.

Harding.

This yeare, the king created his brother Thomas Beauford earle of Dorſet; and his ſonne the lord Thomas of Lancaſter, that was lord ſteward of England, and earle of Aubemarle, he created duke of Clarence. John duke of Burgognie, hauing now the gouernance both of the French king and his relme, ſo perſecuted the duke of Orleance and his complices, that finallie they for their laſt refuge required aid of king Henrie, ſending ouer vnto him certeine perſons as their lawfull procurators (of the which one was called Albert Aubemont, a man of great wit, learning, & audacitie) to offer in name of the confederates vnto the ſaid king Henrie and to his ſonnes, certeine conditions, which were made and concluded the yeare of our Lord 1412, the eight of Maie. The names of the chiefe confederats were theſe, John duke of Berrie and earle of Poicton, Charles duke of Orleance, and Valois erle of Blois, and Beaumont lord of Coucie and Ach, John duke of Bourbon, and Auuergne earle of Clearmont foreſt, and Liſle lord of Beaulieu, and Caſteau Chinon, John duke of Alanſon, Barnard earle of Arminacke, and others. The effect of the articles which theſe confederats were agreed, vpon touching their offer to the king of England, were as followeth.

The articles of couenants which they offered to the king of England.

1 First, they offered their bodies, finances, and lands, to ſerue the king of England, his heires, and ſucceſſors, in all iuſt cauſes and actions, ſauing alwaies their allegiance, knowing that he would not further inquire of them.

2 Secondlie, they offered their ſonnes and daughters, neeces and nephues, and all other their kinſfolks to be beſtowed in marriages according to the pleaſure of the king of England.

3 Thirdlie, they offered their caſtels, townes, treaſures, & all their other goods, to ſerue the foreſaid king.

4 Fourthlie, they offered their freends, alies, and well-willers to ſerue him, being the moſt part of all the nobles of France, churchmen, clearkes, and honeſt citizens, as it ſhould well appeare.

5 Fiftlie, they offered to put him in poſſeſſion of the duchie of Guien, which they were readie to proteſt to belong vnto the king of England, in like and ſemblable wiſe, in libertie and franchiſes, as any other king of England his predeceſſor had held and inioied the ſame.

6 Sixtlie, that they would be readie to recogniſe the lands which they poſſeſſed within that duchie, to hold the ſame of the king of England, as of the verie true duke of Guien, promiſing all ſeruices and homages after the beſt maner that might be.

7 Seuenthlie, they promiſed to deliuer vnto the king, as much as laie in them, all townes and caſtels apperteining to the roialtie and ſeigniorie of the king of England, which are in number twentie townes and caſtels: and as to the regard of other townes & fortreſſes which were not in their hands, they would to the vttermoſt of their powers, helpe the king of England and his heires to win them out of his aduerſaries hands.

8 Eightlie, that the duke of Berrie, as vaſſall to the king of England, and likewiſe the duke of Orleance his ſubiect and vaſſall, ſhould hold of him by homage and fealtie, the lands and ſeigniories hereafter following, that is to ſaie; the duke of Berrie to hold onelie the countie of Ponthieu during his life, and the duke of Orleance to hold the countie of Anguleſme during his life, and the countie of Perigourt for euer, and the earle of Arminacke to hold foure caſtels vpon certeine ſuerties and conditions, as by indenture ſhould be appointed. For the which offers, couenants and agreements, they requeſted of the king of England to condeſcend vnto theſe conditions inſuing.

The conditions which they reque- ſted of the king of England.

1 First, that the king of England, as duke of Guien ſhould defend and ſuccor them as he ought to doo, againſt all men, as their verie lord and ſoueraigne, and ſpeciallie vntill they had executed iuſtice fullie vpon the duke of Burgognie, for the crime which he committed vpon the perſon of the duke of Orleance.

2 Secondlie, that he ſhould aſſiſt them againſt the ſaid duke of Burgognie and his fautors, to recouer againe their goods, which by occaſion of the ſaid duke and his freends they had loſt and beene depriued of.

3 Thirdlie, that he ſhould likewiſe aid them in all iuſt quarels, for recouering of damages doone to their freends, vaſſals and ſubiects.

4 Fourthlie, to helpe and aſſiſt them for the concluding and eſtabliſhing of a firme peace betwixt both the realmes, ſo far as was poſſible. ¶ And further they beſought the king of England to ſend vnto them eight thouſand men, to aid them againſt the duke of Burgognie and his complices, which dailie procured the French king to make war vpon them, ſeeking by all waies & meanes how to deſtroie them.

The king of England louinglie interteined the meſſengers, and vpon conſideration had of their offers, as well for that he deteſted the ſhamefull murther of the duke of Orleance (which remained vnpuniſhed by ſupport of ſuch as mainteined the duke of Burgognie, who (as it appeared) would keepe promiſe no longer than ſerued his owne turne) as alſo for that the ſame offers ſeemed to make greatlie both for his honor and profit, thought that by the office of a king he was bound in dutie to ſuccour them that cried for iuſtice, and could not haue it; and namelie ſith in right they were his ſubiects and vaſſals, he ought to defend them in maintenance of his ſuperioritie and ſeigniorie. Herevpon as duke of Guien, he tooke vpon him to ſuccor and defend them againſt all men, as their verie lord and ſoueraigne, and ſo ſending awaie the meſſengers, promiſed to ſend them aid verie ſhortlie.

The king of England taketh vpon him to defend the Orleantiall faction.

This feat was not ſo ſecretlie wrought, but that it was knowne ſtreightwaies in France. Wherefore the French kings councell ſent the earle of ſaint Paule downe into Picardie, with fifteene hundred horſſemen, and a great number of footmen, who approching to Guiſnes, attempted to aſſault the caſtell, but was repelled and beaten backe, ſo that he retired to the towne of ſaint Quintines, as one that neuer wan gaine at the Engliſhmens hands, but euer departed from them with loſſe and diſhonor. In this meane ſeaſon the French king being led by the duke of Burgognie, purſued them that tooke part with the duke of Orleance, commonlie called Arminacks, and after the winning of diuerſe townes he beſieged the citie of Burges in Berrie, comming before it vpon ſaturdaie the eleuenth of Iune, with a right huge armie. Within this citie were the dukes of Berrie and Bourbon, the earle of Auxerre, the lord Dalbret, the archbiſhops of Sens and Burges, the biſhops of Paris and Chartres, hauing with them fifteene hundred armed men, and foure hundred archers and arcubaliſters.

The earle of ſaint Paule aſſaulteth the caſtell of Guiſnes.

His fortune againſt Engliſhmen.

There were with the king at this ſiege, his ſonne the duke of Aquitane, otherwiſe called the Dolphin, the dukes of Burgognie and Bar, and a great number of other earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen; ſo that the citie was beſieged euen till within the Faurburges of that ſide towards Dun le Roie. The ſiege continued, till at length through mediation of Philibert de Lignac, lord great maiſter of the Rhodes, and the marſhall of Sauoie, that were both in the kings campe, trauelling betwixt the parties, there were appointed commiſſioners on both ſides to treat for peace, to wit the maſter of the croſbowes, and the seneſhall of Heinalt, and certeine other for the king; and the archbiſhop of Burges, with the lord of Gaucourt & others for the Orlientiall ſide. Theſe comming togither on a fridaie, the fifteenth of Iulie in the Dolphins tent, vſed the matter with ſuch diſcretion, that they concluded a peace, & ſo on the wedneſdaie next following, the campe brake vp, & the king returned.

A peace concluded betwixt the two factions of Burgognie & Orleance.

Whileſt theſe things were a dooing in France, The prince of wales accuſed to his father.

John Stow.

lord Henrie prince of Wales, eldeſt ſonne to king Henrie, got knowledge that certeine of his fathers ſeruants were buſie to giue informations againſt him, whereby diſcord might ariſe betwixt him and his father: for they put into the kings head, not onelie what euill rule (according to the courſe of youth) the prince kept to the offenſe of manie: but alſo what great reſort of people came to his houſe, ſo that the court was nothing furniſhed with ſuch a traine as dailie followed the prince. Theſe tales brought no ſmall ſuſpicion into the kings head, leaſt his ſonne would preſume to vſurpe the crowne, he being yet aliue, through which ſuſpicious gelouſie, it was perceiued that he fauoured not his ſonne, as in times paſt he had doone.

The ſuſpicious gelouſie of the king toward his ſon.

The prince goeth to the court with a great traine.

His ſtrange apparell.

The Prince ſore offended with ſuch perſons, as by ſlanderous reports, ſought not onelie to ſpot his good name abrode in the realme, but to ſowe diſcord alſo betwixt him and his father, wrote his letters into euerie part of the realme, to reproue all ſuch ſlanderous deuiſes of thoſe that ſought his diſcredit. And to cleare himſelfe the better, that the world might vnderſtand what wrong he had to be ſlandered in ſuch wiſe: about the feaſt of Peter and Paule, to wit, the nine and twentith daie of June, he came to the court with ſuch a number of noble men and other his freends that wiſhed him well, as the like traine had beene ſildome ſeene repairing to the court at any one time in thoſe daies. He was apparelled in a gowne of blew ſatten, full of ſmall oilet holes, at euerie hole the needle hanging by a ſilke thred with which it was ſewed. About his arme he ware an hounds collar ſet full of SS of gold, and the tirets likewiſe being of the ſame metall.

The court was then at Weſtminſter, where he being entred into the hall, not one of his companie durſt once aduance himſelfe further than the fire in the ſame hall, notwithſtanding they were earneſtlie requeſted by the lords to come higher: but they regarding what they had in commandement of the prince, would not preſume to doo in any thing contrarie thereunto. He himſelfe onelie accompanied with thoſe of the kings houſe, was ſtreight admitted to the preſence of the king his father, who being at that time greeuouſlie diſeaſed, yet cauſed himſelfe in his chaire to be borne into his priuie chamber, where in the preſence of three or foure perſons, in whome he had moſt confidence, he commanded the prince to ſhew what he had to ſaie concerning the cauſe of his comming.

The prince cometh to the kings preſẽce.

His words to his father.

The prince kneeling downe before his father ſaid: Moſt redoubted and ſouereigne lord and father, I am at this time come to your preſence as your liege man, and as your naturall ſonne, in all things to be at your commandement. And where I vnderſtand you haue in ſuſpicion my demeanour againſt your grace, you know verie well, that if I knew any man within this realme, of whome you ſhould ſtand in feare, my duetie were to puniſh that perſon, thereby to remooue that greefe from your heart. Then how much more ought I to ſuffer death, to eaſe your grace of that greefe which you haue of me, being your naturall ſonne and liege man: and to that end I haue this daie made my ſelfe readie by confeſſion and receiuing of the ſacrament. And therefore I beſeech you moſt redoubted lord and deare father, for the honour of God, to eaſe your heart of all ſuch ſuſpicion as you haue of me, and to diſpatch me heere before your knees, with this ſame dagger [and withall he deliuered vnto the king his dagger, in all humble reuerence; adding further, that his life was not ſo deare to him, that he wiſhed to liue one daie with his diſpleaſure] and therefore in thus ridding me out of life, and your ſelfe from all ſuſpicion, here in preſence of theſe lords, and before God at the daie of the generall iudgement, I faithfullie proteſt clearlie to forgiue you.

The kings words to the prince his ſon

Eiton.

The princes requeſt to haue his accuſors to anſwer their wrõgful ſlanders.

The king mooued herewith, caſt from him the dagger, and imbracing the prince kiſſed him, and with ſhedding teares confeſſed, that in deed he had him partlie in ſuſpicion, though now (as he perceiued) not with iuſt cauſe, and therefore from thenceforth no miſreport ſhould cauſe him to haue him in miſtruſt, and this he promiſed of his honour. So by his great wiſedome was the wrongfull ſuſpicion which his father had conceiued againſt him remooued, and he reſtored to his fauour. And further, where he could not but greeuouſlie complaine of them that had ſlandered him ſo greatlie, to the defacing not onelie of his honor, but alſo putting him in danger of his life, he humblie beſought the king that they might anſwer their vniuſt accuſation; and in caſe they were found to haue forged ſuch matters vpon a malicious purpoſe, that then they might ſuffer ſome puniſhment for their faults, though not to the full of that they had deſerued. The king ſeeming to grant his reſonable deſire, yet told him that he muſt tarrie a parlement, that ſuch offendors might be puniſhed by iudgement of their peeres: and ſo for that time he was diſmiſſed, with great loue and ſignes of fatherlie affection.

Abr. Fl. out of Angl. prælijs.

¶Thus were the father and the ſonne reconciled, betwixt whom the ſaid pickthanks had ſowne diuiſion, inſomuch that the ſonne vpon a vehement conceit of vnkindneſſe ſprong in the father, was in the waie to be worne out of fauour. Which was the more likelie to come to paſſe, by their informations that priuilie charged him with riot and other vnciuill demeanor vnſeemelie for a prince. Indeed he was youthfullie giuen, growne to audacitie, and had choſen him companions agreeable to his age; with whome he ſpent the time in ſuch recreations, exerciſes, and delights as he fanſied. But yet (it ſhould ſeeme by the report of ſome writers) that his behauiour was not offenſiue or at leaſt tending to the damage of anie bodie; ſith he had a care to auoid dooing of wrong, and to tedder his affections within the tract of vertue, whereby he opened vnto himſelfe a redie paſſage of good liking among the prudent ſort, and was beloued of ſuch as could diſcerne his diſpoſition, which was in no degree ſo exceſſiue, as that he deſerued in ſuch vehement maner to be ſuſpected. In whoſe diſpraiſe I find little, but to his praiſe verie much, parcell whereof I will deliuer by the waie as a metyard whereby the reſidue may be meaſured. About the ſame time, John Prendergeſt knight, being reſtored to the kings fauour, with thirtie ſhips ſcowred the ſeas, tooke good priſes of wine and vitels, which releeued the commons greatlie. Amongſt other enterpriſes, he landed vpon the ſudden at Craal on the faire day, tooke the towne, and robbed the faire, ſo as they that were come thither to ſell their wares, had quicke vtterance and ſlow paiment. King Henrie vnderſtanding that the French king by ſetting on of the duke of Burgognie in purſuing the contrarie faction, had beſieged the citie of Burges (as before yee haue heard) determined with all ſpeed to aid the duke of Orleance, & ſo about the feaſt of the Aſſumption

They landed in the Baie de la Hogue ſaint Waſt, in the countrie of Conſtantine. The Engliſhmen ſwarmed like bées round about the countrie, robbing and ſpoiling the ſame.

The earle of Alanſon and Richmond ſent to yͤ duke of Clarence.

The duke of Clarence marcheth toward Guien.

Shortlie after their departure from the place where they landed, there came to them ſix hundred armed men of Gaſcoignes that were inrolled at Burdeaux. When newes thereof came to the French court, being then at Auxerre, incontinentlie the earles of Alanſon and Richmond were diſpatched to go vnto the Engliſh campe, bicauſe they had euer béene partakers with the duke of Orleance, to giue them thanks for their paines, and to aduertiſe them of the peace that had béene latelie concluded betwixt the parties, and therefore to take order with them, that they might be ſatiſfied, ſo as they ſhould not ſpoile & waſte the countrie, as they had begun. But whereas the Engliſhmen were gréedie to haue, and the duke of Orleance was not rich to paie, they marched on towards Guien in good order, and what by sacking of townes, and ranſoming of rich priſoners, they got great treaſure, and manie good preies and booties.

Thrée floods without ebbing betwéen.

Being paſſed the riuer of Loire they ſpoiled the towne of Beaulieu, and with fire and ſword waſted the countries of Touraine and Maine. The lord de Rambures appointed to reſiſt ſuch violence, was eaſilie vanquiſhed. Moreouer, to the aid of the duke of Orleance, the king of England ſent ouer to Calis the earls of Kent and Warwike, with two thouſand fighting men, which ſpoiled and waſted the countrie of Bullennois, burnt the towne of Samer de Bois, and tooke with aſſault the fortreſſe of Ruſſalt, and diuerſe other. This yeare, the king abaſed the coines of his gold and ſiluer, cauſing the ſame to be currant in this realme, at ſuch value as the other was valued before, where indéed the noble was worſſe by foure pence than the former, and ſo likewiſe of the ſiluer, the coines whereof he appointed to be currant after the ſame rate. ¶In this yeare, and vpon the twelfth day of October, were thrée floods in the Thames, the one following vpon the other, & no ebbing betwéene: which thing no man then liuing could remember the like to be ſéene.

¶In this kings time, and in the eighth yeare of his reigne (as Richard Grafton hath recorded) a worthie citizen of London named Richard Whitington, mercer and alderman, was elected maior of the ſaid citie, and bare that office thrée times. This man ſo beſtowed his goods and ſubſtance, that he hath well deſerued to be regiſtred in chronicles. Firſt he erected one houſe or church in London to be a houſe of praier, and named the ſame after his owne name, Whitington colledge, remaining at this daie. In the ſaid church, beſides certeine préeſts and clearks, he placed a number of poore aged men and women, builded for them houſes and lodgings, and allowed them wood, coles, cloth, and wéekelie monie to their great reléefe and comfort. This man alſo at his owne coſt builded the gate of London called Newgate in the yéere of our Lord 1422, which before was a moſt ouglie and lothſome priſon. He alſo builded more than the halfe of S. Bartholomews hoſpitall in weſt Smithfield. He builded likewiſe the beautifull librarie in the graie friers in London now called Chriſts hoſpitall, ſtanding in the north part of the cloiſter thereof, where in the wall his armes be grauen in ſtone. He alſo builded for the eaſe of the maior of London, his brethren, and the worſhipfull citizens, on the ſolemne daies of their aſſemblie, a chapell adioining to the Guildhall; to the intent that before they entered into anie of their worldlie affaires, they ſhould begin with praier and inuocation to God for his aſſiſtance: at the end ioining to the ſouth part of the ſaid chapell, he builded for the citie a librarie of ſtone, for the cuſtodie of their records and other bookes. He alſo builded a great part of the eaſt end of Guildhall; and did manie other good déeds worthie of imitation. By a writing of this mans owne hand, which he willed to be fixed as a ſchedule to his laſt will and teſtament, it appeareth what a pitifull and relenting heart he had at other mens miſeries, and did not onelie wiſh but alſo did what he could procure for their reléefe. In ſo much that he charged and commanded his executors, as they would anſwer before God at the daie of the reſurrection of all fleſh, that if they found anie debtor of his, whome if in conſcience they thought not to be well worth thrée times as much as they owght him, and alſo out of other mens debt, and well able to paie, that then they ſhould neuer demand it; for he clearelie forgaue it: and that they ſhould put no man in ſute for anie debt due to him. A worthie memoriall of a notable minded gentleman.

Anno Reg.14.

The duke of Orleance cometh to yͤ Engliſh armie.

The lord of Helie marſhall of France.

Sir John Blunt.

Yée haue heard how the duke of Clarence and his armie did much hurt in the realme of France, in places as he paſſed: wherevpon at length, the duke of Orleance being earneſtlie called vpon to diſpatch the Engliſhmen out of France, according to an article compriſed in the concluſion of the peace, he came to the duke of Clarence, rendering to him and his armie a thouſand gramerſies, and diſburſed to them as much monie as he or his fréends might eaſilie ſpare; and for the reſt being two hundred and nine thouſand frankes remaining vnpaid, he deliuered in gage his ſecond brother, John duke of Angoleſme, which was grandfather to king Francis the firſt, that reigned in our daies, ſir Marcell de Burges, and ſir John de Samoures, ſir Archembald Villiers, and diuerſe other, which earle continued long in England, as after ſhall appeare. When this agréement was thus made betwixt the dukes of Orleance and Clarence, the Engliſh armie with rich preies, booties and priſoners came to Burdeaux, making warre on the frontiers of France, to their great gaine. In this meane while, the lord of Helie, one of the marſhals of France, with an armie of foure thouſand men, beſieged a certeine fortreſſe in Guien, which an Engliſh knight, one ſir John Blunt kept, who with thrée hundred men that came to his aid, diſcomfited, chaſed, and ouerthrew the French power, tooke priſoners twelue men of name, and other gentlemen to the number of ſix ſcore, and amongſt other, the ſaid marſhall, who was ſent ouer into England, and put in the caſtell of Wiſſebet, from whence he eſcaped, and got ouer into France, where ſeruing the duke of Orleance at the battell of Agincort, he was ſlaine among other.

The K. meant to haue made a iournie againſt the Infidels.

The king is vexed with ſickneſſe.

In this fourtéenth and laſt yeare of king Henries reigne, a councell was holden in the white friers in London, at the which, among other things, order was taken for ſhips and gallies to be builded and made readie, and all other things neceſſarie to be prouided for a voiage which he meant to make into the holie land, there to recouer the citie of Jeruſalem from the Infidels. For it gréeued him to conſider the great malice of chriſtian princes, that were bent vpon a miſchéeuous purpoſe to deſtroie one another, to the perill of their owne ſoules, rather than to make war againſt the enimies of the chriſtian faith, as in conſcience (it ſéemed to him) they were bound. He held his Chriſtmas this yeare at Eltham, being ſore vexed with ſickneſſe, ſo that it was thought ſometime, that he had beene dead: notwithſtanding it pleaſed God that he ſomwhat recouered his ſtrength againe, and ſo paſſed that Chriſtmaſſe with as much ioy as he might.

A parlement.

The K. ſick of an apoplexie.
Hall.

Hall.

The morrow after Candlemas daie began a parlement, which he had called at London, but he departed this life before the ſame parlement was ended: for now that his prouiſions were readie, and that he was furniſhed with ſufficient treaſure, ſoldiers, capteins, vittels, munitions, tall ſhips, ſtrong gallies, and all things neceſſarie for ſuch a roiall iournie as he pretended to take into the holie land, he was eftſoones taken with a ſore ſickneſſe, which was not a leproſie, ſtriken by the hand of God (ſaith maiſter Hall) as fooliſh friers imagined; but a verie apoplexie, of the which he languiſhed till his appointed houre, and had none other greefe nor maladie; ſo that what man ordeineth, God altereth at his good will and pleaſure, not giuing place more to the prince, than to the pooreſt creature liuing, when he ſeeth his time to diſpoſe of him this waie or that, as to his omnipotent power and diuine prouidence ſeemeth expedient. During this his laſt ſickneſſe, he cauſed his crowne (as ſome write) to be ſet on a pillow at his beds head, and ſuddenlie his pangs ſo ſore troubled him, that he laie as though all his vitall ſpirits had beene from him departed. Such as were about him, thinking verelie that he had beene departed, couered his face with a linnen cloth.

The prince taketh awaie the crowne before his father was dead

He is blamed of the king.
His anſwer.

A guiltie conſcience in extremitie of ſickneſſe pincheth ſore.

The death of Henrie the fourth.

The prince his ſonne being hereof aduertiſed, entered into the chamber, tooke awaie the crowne, and departed. The father being ſuddenlie reuiued out of that trance, quicklie perceiued the lacke of his crowne; and hauing knowledge that the prince his ſonne had taken it awaie, cauſed him to come before his preſence, requiring of him what he meant ſo to miſuſe himſelfe. The prince with a good audacitie anſwered; Sir, to mine and all mens iudgements you ſeemed dead in this world, wherefore I as your next heire apparant tooke that as mine owne, and not as yours. Well faire ſonne (ſaid the king with a great ſigh) what right I had to it, God knoweth. Well (ſaid the prince) if you die king, I will haue the garland, and truſt to keepe it with the ſword againſt all mine enimies, as you haue doone. Then ſaid the king, I commit all to God, and remember you to doo well. With that he turned himſelfe in his bed, and ſhortlie after departed to God in a chamber of the abbats of Weſtminſter called Ieruſalem, the twentith daie of March, in the yeare 1413, and in the yeare of his age 46, when he had reigned thirteene yeares, fiue moneths and od daies, in great perplexitie and little pleaſure [or fourteene yeares, as ſome haue noted, who name not the diſeaſe whereof he died, but refer it to ſickneſſe abſolutelie, whereby his time of departure did approach and fetch him out of the world: as Ch.Okl. ſaith, whoſe words may ſerue as a funerall epigramme in memoriall of the ſaid king Henrie:

Abr.Fl. out of Angl. præl. ſub Hen.4.

Fabian.

We find, that he was taken with his laſt ſickeneſſe, while he was making his praiers at ſaint Edwards ſhrine, there as it were to take his leaue, and ſo to proceed forth on his iournie: he was ſo ſuddenlie and greeuouſlie taken, that ſuch as were about him, feared leaſt he would haue died preſentlie, wherfore to releeue him (if it were poſſible) they bare him into a chamber that was next at hand, belonging to the abbat of Weſtminſter, where they laid him on a pallet before the fire, and vſed all remedies to reuiue him. At length, he recouered his ſpeech, and vnderſtanding and perceiuing himſelfe in a ſtrange place which he knew not, he willed to know if the chamber had anie particular name, wherevnto anſwer was made, that it was called Ieruſalem. Then ſaid the king; Lauds be giuen to the father of heauen, for now I know that I ſhall die heere in this chamber, according to the propheſie of me declared, that I ſhould depart this life in Ieruſalem.

Whether this was true that ſo he ſpake, as one that gaue too much credit to fooliſh propheſies & vaine tales, or whether it was fained, as in ſuch caſes it commonlie happeneth, we leaue it to the aduiſed reader to iudge. His bodie with all funerall pompe was conueied vnto Canturburie, and there ſolemnlie buried, leauing behind him by the ladie Marie daughter to the lord Humfrie Bohun earle of Hereford and Northhampton, Henrie prince of Wales, Thomas duke of Clarence, Iohn duke of Bedford, Humfrie duke of Gloceſter, Blanch ducheſſe of Bauier, and Philip queene of Denmarke: by his laſt wife Iane, he had no children. This king was of a meane ſtature, well proportioned, and formallie compact, quicke and liuelie, and of a ſtout courage. In his latter daies he ſhewed himſelfe ſo gentle, that he gat more loue amongſt the nobles and people of this realme, than he had purchaſed malice and euill will in the beginning.

He is buried at Canturburie.
His iſſue.

His ſtature.

But yet to ſpeake a truth, by his proceedings, after he had atteined to the crowne, what with ſuch taxes, tallages, ſubſidies, and exactions as he was conſtreined to charge the people with; and what by puniſhing ſuch as mooued with diſdeine to ſee him vſurpe the crowne (contrarie to the oth taken at his entring into this land, vpon his returne from exile) did at ſundrie times rebell againſt him, he wan himſelfe more hatred, than in all his life time (if it had beene longer by manie yeares than it was) had beene poſſible for him to haue weeded out & remoued. And yet doubtleſſe, worthie were his ſubiects to taſt of that bitter cup, ſithens they were ſo readie to ioine and clappe hands with him, for the depoſing of their rightfull and naturall prince king Richard, whoſe cheefe fault reſted onlie in that, that he was too bountifull to his freends, and too mercifull to his foes; ſpeciallie if he had not beene drawne by others, to ſeeke reuenge of thoſe that abuſed his good and courteous nature. ¶ But now to returne to the matter preſent. The duke of Clarence immediatlie vpon knowlege had of his father king Henrie the fourth his death, returned out of Guien into England, with the earle of Angoleſme, and other priſoners.

Now will we rehearſe what writers of our Engliſh nation liued in the daies of this king. That renowmed poet Geffrie Chaucer is worthilie named as principall, a man ſo exquiſitlie learned in all ſciences, that his match was not lightlie found any where in thoſe daies; and for reducing our Engliſh toong to a perfect conformitie, he hath excelled therein all other; he departed this life about the yeare of our Lord 1402, as Bale gathereth: but by other it appeareth, that he deceaſſed the fiue and twentith of October in the yeare 1400, and lieth buried at Weſtminſter, in the ſouth part of the great church there, as by a monument erected by Nicholas Brigham it doth appeare. Iohn Gower deſcended of that worthie familie of the Gowers of Stitenham in Yorkeſhire (as Leland noteth) ſtudied not onelie the common lawes of this realme, but alſo other kinds of literature, and great knowledge in the ſame, namelie in poeticall inuentions, applieng his indeuor with Chaucer, to garniſh the Engliſh toong, in bringing it from a rude vnperfectneſſe, vnto a more apt elegancie: for whereas before thoſe daies, the learned vſed to write onelie in Latine or French, and not in Engliſh, our toong remained verie barren, rude, and vnperfect; but now by the diligent induſtrie of Chaucer and Gower, it was within a while greatlie amended, ſo as it grew not onelie verie rich and plentifull in words, but alſo ſo proper and apt to expreſſe that which the mind conceiued, as anie other vſuall language. Gower departed this life ſhortlie after the deceaſſe of his deere and louing freend Chaucer'; to wit, in the yeare 1402, being then come to great age, and blind for a certeine time before his death. He was buried in the church of ſaint Marie Oueries in Southwarke.

Moreouer, Hugh Legat borne in Hertfordſhire, and a monke of ſaint Albons, wrote ſcholies vpon Architrenius of Iohn Hanuill, and alſo vpon Boetius De conſolatione; Roger Alington, chancellor of the vniuerſitie of Oxford, a great ſophiſter, & an enimie to the doctrine of Wickliffe; Iohn Botrell, a logician; Nicholas Gorham, borne in a village of the ſame name in Hertfordſhire, a Dominike frier, firſt proceeded maſter of art in Oxenford, and after going to Paris, became the French kings confeſſor, and therefore hath beene of ſome taken to be a Frenchman; Iohn Lilleſhull, ſo called of a monaſterie in the weſt parties of this realme whereof he was gouernour; Walter Diſſe, ſo called of a towne in Norfolke where he was borne, firſt a Carmelite frier profeſſed in Norwich, and after going to Cambridge, he there proceeded doctor, he was alſo confeſſor to the duke of Lancaſter, and to his wife the ducheſſe Conſtance, & a great ſetter foorth of pope Vrbans cauſe againſt the other popes that were by him and thoſe of his faction named the antipapes; Thomas Maldon, ſo called of the towne of that name in Eſſex where he was borne: Iohn Edo, deſcended out of Wales by linage, and borne in Herefordſhire, a Franciſcane frier.

Adde to the forenamed, Nicholas Fakingham, borne in Norfolke, a greie frier, proceeded doctor in Oxenford, a great diuine, and an excellent philoſopher, prouinciall of his order here in England; Laurence Holbecke, a monke of Ramſie, well ſeene in the Hebrue toong, and wrote thereof a dictionarie; Iohn Colton, archbiſhop of Ardmach; Iohn Marrie, ſo called of a village in Yorkeſhire where he was borne, a Carmelite of Doncaſter; Richard Cheſer borne in Norfolke, a diuine, and an Auguſtine frier in Norwich; Iohn Lathburie, a Franciſcane frier of Reading; Nicholas Poutz; Richard Scroope brother to William Scroope, lord treaſuror of England, ſtudied in Cambridge, and proceeded there doctor of both the lawes, became an aduocat in the court of Rome, and afterwards was aduanced to the gouernement of the ſee of Couentrie and Lichfield, and at length was remoued from thence, and made archbiſhop of Yorke, he wrote an inuectiue againſt king Henrie, and at length loſt his head, as before ye haue heard; Iohn Wrotham, a Carmelite frier of London, and after made warden of an houſe of his order in Calis.

Furthermore, Iohn Colbie, a Carmelite frier of Norwich; William Thorpe a northerne man borne, and ſtudent in Oxenford, an excellent diuine, and an earneſt follower of that famous clearke Iohn Wickliffe, a notable preacher of the word, and expreſſing his doctrine no leſſe in trade of life, than in ſpeech, he was at length apprehended by commandement of the archbiſhop of Canturburie Thomas Arundell, and committed to priſon in Saltwood caſtell, where at length he died; Stephan Patrington, borne in Yorkeſhire, a frier Carmelite, prouinciall of his order through England, of which brood, there were at that ſeaſon 1500 within this land, he was biſhop of ſaint Dauids, and confeſſor to king Henrie the fift, about the fift yeare of whoſe reigne, he deceaſſed; Robert Maſcall, a Carmelite frier of Ludlow, confeſſor alſo to the ſaid K. who made him biſhop of Hereford; Reginald Langham, a frier minor of Norwich: Actonus Dominicanus; Thomas Palmer, warden of the Blacke friers within the citie of London; Boſton of Burie, a monke of the abbeie of Burie in Suffolke, wrote a catalog of all the writers of the church, and other treatiſes.

Acts and monuments of Iohn Fox.

Moreouer, Thomas Peuerell, a frier Carmelite, borne in Suffolke, he was aduanced to the ſee of Oſſorie in Ireland by Richard the ſecond, and after by pope Boniface the ninth remoued to Landaffe in Wales, and from thence called by Henrie the fourth, with conſent of pope Gregorie the twelfe, to gouerne the ſee of Worceſter, and ſo continued biſhop of that citie, vntill he ended his life in the yeare of our Lord 1418, which was about the ſixt yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the fift; Iohn Purueie, an excellent diuine, proceeded maſter of art in Oxenford, he was apprehended for ſuch doctrine as he taught, contrarie to the ordinances of the church of Rome, and was at length compelled by Thomas Arundell, archbiſhop of Canturburie, to recant at Paules croſſe ſeuen ſpeciall articles, he wrote diuerſe treatiſes, & was the ſecond time committed to priſon in king Henrie the fift his daies, by Henrie Chichleie, that ſucceeded Arundell in gouernement of the church of Canturburie; William Holme, a greie frier (and a good phyſician for curing diſeaſes of the bodie, whatſoeuer his phyſicke was for the ſoule) he liued vntill Henrie the fift his daies, and deceaſſed about the fourth yeare of his reigne; Nicholas Baiard, a blacke frier, a doctor of diuinitie profeſſed at Oxenford; Thomas Rudburne, archdeacon of Sudburie, and biſhop of ſaint Dauids in Wales, ſucceeding after Stephan Patrington, he wrote a chronicle, and certeine epiſtles (as Iohn Bale noteth.)

Sée maiſter Fox, in his booke of Acts and monuments.

Finallie and to conclude, Nicholas Riſton, who being ſore greeued in mind, as diuerſe other in thoſe daies, to conſider what inconuenience redounded to the church, by reaſon of the ſtrife and bralling among the prelats for the acknowleging of a lawfull pope, two or three ſtill contending for that dignitie, wrote a booke, intituled De tollendo ſchiſmate; Iohn Walter, an excellent mathematician, being firſt brought vp of a ſcholer, in the colledge of Wincheſter, and after ſtudied at Oxenford; Thomas of Newmarket, taking that ſurname of the towne in Cambridgeſhire where he was borne, he for his worthineſſe (as was thought) was made biſhop of Careleill, well ſeene both in other ſciences, and alſo in diuinitie; William Auger a Franciſcane frier, of an houſe of that order in Bridgewater; Peter Ruſſell a graie frier, and of his order the prouinciall heere in England; Iohn Langton, a Carmelite; Robert Wantham a monke of Cernelie in Dorſetſhire, wrote a booke in verſe, of the originall and ſignification of words; William Norton, a Franciſcane frier of Couentrie; Hugh Sueth, a blacke frier, and a great preacher; Richard Folſham a monke of Norwich; Robert Wimbeldon, a ſingular diuine, and an excellent preacher, as appeareth by the ſermon which he made vpon this text, Redde rationem villicationis tuæ.

Henrie the fift, prince of Wales, ſonne and heire to Henrie the fourth.

Anno Reg. 1.

Henrie prince of Wales, ſon and heire to K. Henrie the fourth, borne in Wales at Monmouth on the riuer of Wie, after his father was departed tooke vpon him the regiment of this realme of England, the twentith of March, the morrow after proclamed king, by the name of Henrie the fift, in the yeare of the world 5375, after the birth of our ſauiour, by our account 1413, the third of the emperor Sigiſmund: the thrée and thirtith of Charles the ſixt French king, and in the ſeuenth yeare of gouernance in Scotland vnder Robert brother to him that (before entrance into his kingdome 1390) had Iohn to name, which by deuiſe and order of the ſtates was changed into Robert the third, who at Rotſaie (a towne in the Iland of Got, 1406) deceaſſed by occaſion thus. As vpon hope in this gouernor to himſelfe conceiued how to come to the crowne, he at the caſtell of Falkland, latelie had famiſht his coſine Dauid the kings elder ſonne and heire (a diſſolute yoong prince) yet to his fathers excéeding ſorrow, at whoſe deceaſſe the father verie carefull, and caſting for the ſafegard of Iames his yoonger ſon and heire, from Baſſe the rocke in a well appointed ſhip, vnder charge of Henrie Saintcléere earle of Orkeneie, into France to his old fréend king Charles for good education and ſafetie this yoong prince he ſent: who in the courſe, whether for tempeſt or tendernes of ſtomach, tooke land in Yorkeſhire at Flamborow, that after by wiſedome and good conſideration of the king and his councell was thought verie neceſſarie here to be reteined. But by the ſudden newes of this ſtate, the father (at ſupper as he ſat) ſo ſtroken at hart that well nie ſtreight had he fallen downe dead, yet borne into his chamber, where for greefe and pine within thrée daies next he deceaſſed. The yoong king Iames his ſonne after an eightéene yeares ſtaie, in which time he had béene well trained in princehood, at laſt with right honorable marriage at ſaint Marie Oueries vnto Ione daughter to the earle of Summerſet, coſine vnto Henrie the ſixt then king, and with manie other high gratuities here beſide was ſent and ſet in his rule and kingdome at home.

Homage doone to K. Henrie before his coronation.

The day of king Henries coronation a verie tempeſtuous day.

Such great hope, and good expectation was had of this mans fortunate ſucceſſe to follow, that within thrée daies after his fathers deceaſſe, diuerſe noble men and honorable perſonages did to him homage, and ſware to him due obedience, which had not béene ſéene done to any of his predeceſſors kings of this realme, till they had béene poſſeſſed of the crowne. He was crowned the ninth of Aprill being Paſſion ſundaie, which was a ſore, ruggie, and tempeſtuous day, with wind, ſnow and ſléet, that men greatlie maruelled thereat, making diuerſe interpretations what the ſame might ſignifie. But this king euen at firſt appointing with himſelfe, to ſhew that in his perſon princelie honors ſhould change publike manners, he determined to put on him the ſhape of a new man. For whereas aforetime he had made himſelfe a companion vnto miſrulie mates of diſſolute order and life, he now baniſhed them all from his preſence (but not vnrewarded, or elſe vnpreferred) inhibiting them vpon a great paine, not once to approch, lodge, or ſoiourne within ten miles of his court or preſence: and in their places he choſe men of grauitie, wit, and high policie, by whoſe wiſe counſell he might at all times rule to his honour and dignitie; calling to mind how once to hie offenſe of the king his father, he had with his fiſt ſtriken the chéefe iuſtice for ſending one of his minions (vpon deſert) to priſon, when the iuſtice ſtoutlie commanded himſelfe alſo ſtreict to ward, & he (then prince) obeied. The king after expelled him out of his priuie councell, baniſht him the court, and made the duke of Clarence (his yoonger brother) preſident of councell in his ſtéed. This reformation in the new king Chriſt. Okl. hath reported, fullie conſenting with this. For ſaith he,

A notable example of a worthie prince.

But now that the king was once placed in the roiall ſeat of the realme, he vertuouſlie conſidering in his mind, that all goodneſſe commeth of God, determined to begin with ſome thing acceptable to his diuine maieſtie, and therefore commanded the cleargie ſincerelie and trulie to preach the word of God, and to liue accordinglie, that they might be the lanternes of light to the temporaltie, as their profeſſion required. The laie men he willed to ſerue God, and obeie their prince, prohibiting them aboue all things breach of matrimonie, cuſtome in ſwearing; and namelie, wilfull periurie. Beſide this, he elected the beſt learned men in the lawes of the realme, to the offices of iuſtice; and men of good liuing, he preferred to high degrées and authoritie. Immediatlie after Eaſter he called a parlement, in which diuerſe good ſtatutes, and wholeſome ordinances, for the preſeruation and aduancement of the common-wealth were deuiſed and eſtabliſhed. On Trinitie ſundaie were the ſolemne exequies doone at Canturburie for his father, the king himſelfe being preſent thereat.

The funerals of king Henrie the fourth kept at Canturburie.

S. Georges day made a double feaſt.

About the ſame time, at the ſpeciall inſtance of the king, in a conuocation of the cleargie holden at Paules in London, it was ordeined, that ſaint George his daie ſhould be celebrate and kept as a double feaſt. The archbiſhop of Canturburie, meant to haue honored ſaint Dunſtanes daie with like reuerence, but it tooke not effect. When the king had ſetled things much to his purpoſe, he cauſed the bodie of king Richard to be remoued with all funerall dignitie conuenient for his eſtate, from Langlie to Weſtminſter, where he was honorablie interred with quéene Anne his firſt wife, in a ſolemne toome erected and ſet vp at the charges of this king. ¶ Polychronicon ſaith, that after the bodie of the dead king was taken vp out of the earth, this new king (happilie tendering the magnificence of a prince, and abhorring obſcure buriall) cauſed the ſame to be conueied to Weſtminſter in a roiall ſeat (or chaire of eſtate) couered all ouer with blacke veluet, & adorned with banners of diuers armes round about. All the horſſes likewiſe (ſaith this author) were apparelled with blacke, and bare ſundrie ſutes of armes. Manie other ſolemnities were had at his interrement, according to the qualitie of the age wherein he liued and died.

Abr. Fl. out of Polychron.

Alſo in this firſt yéere of this kings reigne, ſir John Oldcaſtell, which by his wife was called lord Cobham, a valiant capteine and a hardie gentleman, was accuſed to the archbiſhop of Canturburie of certeine points of hereſie, who knowing him to be highlie in the kings fauour, declared to his highneſſe the whole accuſation. The king firſt hauing compaſſion of the noble man, required the prelats, that if he were a ſtraied ſhéepe, rather by gentlenes than by rigor to reduce him to the fold. And after this, he himſelfe ſent for him, and right earneſtlie exhorted him, and louinglie admoniſhed him to reconcile himſelfe to God and to his lawes. The lord Cobham not onelie thanked him for his moſt fauourable clemencie, but alſo declared firſt to him by mouth, and afterwards by writing, the foundation of his faith, and the ground of his beliefe, affirming his grace to be his ſupreme head and competent iudge, and none other perſon, offering an hundred knights and eſquiers to come to his purgation, or elſe to fight in open liſts in defenſe of his iuſt cauſe.

The king vnderſtanding and perſuaded by his councell, that by order of the lawes of his realme, ſuch accuſations touching matters of faith ought to be tried by his ſpirituall prelats, ſent him to the Tower of London, there to abide the determination of the clergie, according to the ſtatutes in that caſe prouided, after which time a ſolemne ſeſſion was appointed in the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule, vpon the thrée and twentith day of September, and an other the fiue and twentith daie of the ſame moneth, in the hall of the Blacke friers at London, in which places the ſaid lord was examined, apoſed, and fullie heard, and in concluſion by the archbiſhop of Canturburie denounced an heretike, & remitted againe to the Tower of London, from which place, either by helpe of fréends, or fauour of kéepers, he priuilie eſcaped and came into Wales, where he remained for a ſeaſon.

After this, the king kéeping his Chriſtmaſſe at his manor of Eltham, was aduertiſed, that ſir Roger Acton knight, a man of great wit and poſſeſſions, John Browne eſquier, John Beuerlie prieſt, and a great number of other were aſſembled in armour againſt the king, his brethren, the clergie and realme. These newes came to the king, on the twelfth daie in Chriſtmaſſe, whervpon vnderſtanding that they were in a place called Ficket field beſide London, on the backe ſide of ſaint Giles, he ſtreight got him to his palace at Weſtminſter, in as ſecret wiſe as he might, and there calling to him certeine bands of armed men, he repaired into ſaint Giles fields, néere to the ſaid place (where he vnderſtood they ſhould fullie méet about midnight) and ſo handled the matter, that he tooke ſome, and ſlue ſome, euen as ſtood with his pleaſure. The capteins of them afore mentioned, being apprehended, were brought to the kings preſence, and to him declared the cauſes of their commotion & riſing, accuſing a great number of their complices.

The rebels ſurpriſed.

Thom. Walſin.

The king vſed one policie, which much ſerued to the diſcomfiting of the aduerſaries (as Thom. Walſingham ſaith) which was this: he gaue order, that all the gates of London ſhould be ſtreictlie kept and garded, ſo as none ſhould come in or out, but ſuch as were knowen to go to the king. Hereby came it to paſſe, that the chiefeſt ſuccour appointed to come to the capteins of the rebels, was by that meanes cut off, where otherwiſe ſuerlie (had it not béene thus preuented and ſtaied) there had iſſued forth of London to haue ioined with them, to the number (as it was thought) of fiftie thouſand perſons, one and other, ſeruants, prentiſes, and citizens, confederate with them that were thus aſſembled in Ficket field. Diuerſe alſo that came from ſundrie parts of the realme, haſting towards the place, to be there at their appointed time, chanced to light among the kings men, who being taken and demanded whither they went with ſuch ſpéed, anſwered, they came to méet with their capteine the lord Cobham.

By this exceſſiue number it may appeare, that Walſingham reporteth this matter according to the common fame, and not as one that ſearched out an exquiſite truth.

But whether he came thither at all, or made ſhift for himſelfe to get awaie, it doth not appeare; for he could not be heard of at that time (as Thomas Walſingham confeſſeth) although the king by proclamation promiſed a thouſand marks to him that could bring him forth, with great liberties to the cities or townes that would diſcouer where he was. By this it maie appeare, how greatlie he was beloued, that there could not one be found, that for ſo great a reward would bring him to light. Among other that were taken was one William Murlie, who dwelt in Dunſtable, a man of great wealth, and by his occupation a brewer, an earneſt mainteiner of the lord Cobhams opinions, and (as the brute ran) in hope to be highlie aduanced by him if their purpoſed deuiſe had taken place, apparant by this; that he had two horſſes trapped with guilt harneſſe led after him, and in his boſome a paire of gilt ſpurs (as it was déemed) prepared for himſelfe to weare, looking to be made knight by the lord Cobhams hands at that preſent time. But when he ſaw how their purpoſe quailed, he withdrew into the citie with great feare to hide himſelfe; howbeit he was perceiued, taken, and finallie executed among others.

William Murlie.

To conclude, ſo manie perſons herevpon were apprehended, that all the priſons in and about London were full, the chiefe of them were condemned by the cleargie of hereſie, and atteinted of high treaſon in the Guildhall of London, and adiudged for that offenſe to be drawen and hanged, and for hereſie to be conſumed with fire, gallowes and all, which iudgement wis executed the ſame moneth, on the ſaid ſir Roger Acton, and eight and twentie others. ¶ Some ſaie, that the occaſion of their death was onelie for the conueieng of the lord Cobham out of priſon. Others write, that it was both for treaſon and hereſie, and ſo it appeareth by the record. Certeine affirme, that it was for feined cauſes ſurmized by the ſpiritualtie, more vpon diſpleaſure than truth, and that they were aſſembled to heare their preacher (the foreſaid Beuerlie) in that place there, out of the waie from reſort of people, ſith they might not come togither openlie about any ſuch matter, without danger to be apprehended; as the manner is, and hath béene euer of the perſecuted flocke, when they are prohibited publikelie the exerciſe of their religion. But howſoeuer the matter went with theſe men, apprehended they were, and diuerſe of them executed (as before ye haue heard) whether for rebellion or hereſie, or for both (as the forme of the indictment importeth) I néed not to ſpend manie words, ſith others haue ſo largelie treated thereof; and therefore I refer thoſe that wiſh to be more fullie ſatiſfied herein vnto their reports.

Sir Roger Acton & his complices condemned of treaſon and hereſie.

A diſdainefull ambaſſage.

Whileſt in the Lent ſeaſon the king laie at Killingworth, there came to him from Charles Dolphin of France certeine ambaſſadors, that brought with them a barrell of Paris balles, which from their maiſter they preſented to him for a token that was taken in verie ill part, as ſent in ſcorne, to ſignifie, that it was more méet for the king to paſſe the time with ſuch childiſh exerciſe, than to attempt any worthie exploit. Wherfore the K. wrote to him, that yer ought long, he would toſſe him ſome London balles that perchance ſhould ſhake the walles of the beſt court in France. ¶This yeare, Thom. Arundell archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, a ſtout prelat, and an earneſt mainteiner of the Romiſh religion: Henrie Chichelie biſhop of ſaint Dauid ſucceeded the ſame Arundell in the ſée of Canturburie, and the kings confeſſor Stephan Patrington a Carmelite frier was made biſhop of S. Dauid. Henrie Perſie then but a child, ſonne to the lord Henrie Perſie ſurnamed Hotſpur, after his fathers deceaſſe, that was ſlaine at Shrewesburie field, was conueied into Scotland, and there left by his grandfather, where euer ſince he had remained: the king therefore pitied his caſe, and ſo procured for him, that he came home, and was reſtored to all his lands and earledome of Northumberland, which lands before had béene giuen to the lord Iohn, the kings brother.

Le Roſier la ſecond partie.

A caſe verie ſtrange, and for manie cauſes alwaies right worthie of remembrance, in this yeare 1414, the ſecond of this kings reigne did befall, which conteining in it ſo manie matters for knowledge of Gods great power and iuſtice, of wilfull breaking his diuine lawes, of the eaſie ſlip into ruine where his mercie doth not ſtaie vs, the buſie bogging of the diuell alwaies, our weakeneſſe in combat with him, into what outrage and confuſion he haleth where he is not withſtood, with what tyrannie he tormenteth where he vanquiſheth, what the will and power of a ſouereigne ouer a ſubiect may force in caſes of iniquitie, where by vertue and grace he be not reſtrained: the zeale of a parent, the pangs of a child, but chéeflie the verie plague of Gods wrath and indignation vpon wilfull and obſtinate offendors, all which at thoſe daies though touched in Naples, yet at all times and euerie where ſo well ſeruing for example and warning, it hath béene thought verie conuenient the ſame in our ſtories alſo héere to be noted, which was thus. At this time newes were brought into France, how king Lancelot (the aduerſarie to Lewes king of Sicill) was departed, and in manner thus. It hapned that he fell in loue with a yong damoſell his owne phyſicians daughter (a puzell verie beautifull) and he in hope to inioy hir the eaſilier, cauſed hir father for his conſent to be talked withall in the matter, which he vtterlie refuſed to grant, and ſhewed forth manie reaſons for him; but at laſt all cauſes & excuſes reiected, ſith (though conſtreined) he muſt néeds aſſent, feined himſelfe willing and content. And forceing talke with his daughter vpon his mind in the matter, chéeflie how méet it were ſhe vſed his counſell how beſt with the king to kéepe hir ſtill in grace, he gaue hir a little box of ointment, and inſtruction withall, that when the king ſhould come to haue his will, ſhe ſhould afore with that balme annoint all hir wombe; the damoſell on good obſeruation did after (at oportunitie) as hir father taught hir. Héerevpon ſo pittifullie came it to paſſe, that the verie ſame night the king laie with hir, his bellie and hirs were by and by ſet as it were all on a ſindging fier, with torments of ſuch vnquenchable ſcorching and burning euen into the verie entrailes, that he of his kingdome, his life, his loue; and ſhe of hir princelie promotion, thus ſoone both togither made a ſorrowfull end. After the plaie of this lamentable tragedie, the phyſician fled for his ſafetie, and ſtraight vpon the newes king Lewes gathered a great aſſemblie, wherewith to paſſe towards Naples, and ſent before a good companie vnder the lord Longnie marſhall of France.

Anno Reg. 2. 1414

In the ſecond yeare of his reigne, king Henrie called his high court of parlement, the laſt daie of Aprill in the towne of Leiceſter, in which parlement manie profitable lawes were concluded, and manie petitions moued, were for that time deferred. Amongſt which, one was, that a bill exhibited in the parlement holden at Weſtminſter in the eleuenth yeare of king Henrie the fourth (which by reaſon the king was then troubled with ciuill diſcord, came to none effect) might now with good deliberation be pondered, and brought to ſome good concluſion. The effect of which ſupplication was, that the temporall lands deuoutlie giuen, and diſordinatlie ſpent by religious, and other ſpirituall perſons, ſhould be ſeized into the kings hands, ſith the ſame might ſuffice to mainteine, to the honor of the king, and defenſe of the realme, fiftéene earles, fiftéene hundred knights, ſix thouſand and two hundred eſquiers, and a hundred almeſſe-houſes, for reliefe onelie of the poore, impotent, and néedie perſons, and the king to haue cléerelie to his coffers twentie thouſand pounds, with manie other prouiſions and values of religious houſes, which I paſſe ouer.

A bill exhibited to the parlemēt againſt the clergie.

This bill was much noted, and more feared among the religious ſort, whom ſuerlie it touched verie néere, and therefore to find remedie againſt it, they determined to aſſaie all waies to put by and ouerthrow this bill: wherein they thought beſt to trie if they might moue the kings mood with ſome ſharpe inuention, that he ſhould not regard the importunate petitions of the commons. Wherevpon, on a daie in the parlement, Henrie Chichelie archbiſhop of Canturburie made a pithie oration, wherein he declared, how not onelie the duchies of Normandie and Aquitaine, with the counties of Anion and Maine, and the countrie of Gaſcoigne, were by vndoubted title apperteining to the king, as to the lawfull and onelie heire of the ſame; but alſo the whole realme of France, as heire to his great grandfather king Edward the third.

The archbiſhop of Canturburies oration in the parlement houſe.

The Salike law.

Herein did he much inueie againſt the ſurmiſed and falſe fained law Salike, which the Frenchmen alledge euer againſt the kings of England in barre of their iuſt title to the crowne of France. The verie words of that ſuppoſed law are theſe, In terram Salicam mulieres ne ſuccedant, that is to ſaie, Into the Salike land let not women ſuccéed. Which the French gloſſers expound to be the realme of France, and that this law was made by king Pharamond; whereas yet their owne authors affirme, that the land Salike is in Germanie, betwéene the riuers of Elbe and Sala; and that when Charles the great had ouercome the Saxons, he placed there certeine Frenchmen, which hauing in diſdeine the diſhoneſt maners of the Germane women, made a law, that the females ſhould not ſuccéed to any inheritance within that land, which at this daie is called Meiſen, ſo that if this be true, this law was not made for the realme of France, nor the Frenchmen poſſeſſed the land Salike, till foure hundred and one and twentie yeares after the death of Pharamond, the ſuppoſed maker of this Salike law, for this Pharamond deceaſſed in the yeare 426, and Charles the great ſubdued the Saxons, and placed the Frenchmen in thoſe parts beyond the riuer of Sala, in the yeare 805.

Meiſna.

Moreouer, it appeareth by their owne writers, that king Pepine, which depoſed Childerike, claimed the crowne of France, as heire generall, for that he was deſcended of Blithild daughter to king Clothair the firſt: Hugh Capet alſo, who vſurped the crowne vpon Charles duke of Loraine, the ſole heire male of the line and ſtocke of Charles the great, to make his title ſeeme true, and appeare good, though in deed it was ſtarke naught, conueied himſelfe as heire to the ladie Lingard, daughter to king Charlemaine, ſonne to Lewes the emperour, that was ſon to Charles the great. King Lewes alſo the tenth otherwiſe called ſaint Lewes, being verie heire to the ſaid vſurper Hugh Capet, could neuer be ſatiſfied in his conſcience how he might iuſtlie keepe and poſſeſſe the crowne of France, till he was perſuaded and fullie inſtructed, that queene Iſabell his grandmother was lineallie deſcended of the ladie Ermengard daughter and heire to the aboue named Charles duke of Loraine, by the which marriage, the bloud and line of Charles the great was againe vnited and reſtored to the crowne & ſcepter of France, ſo that more cleere than the ſunne it openlie appeareth, that the title of king Pepin, the claime of Hugh Capet, the poſſeſſion of Lewes, yea and the French kings to this daie, are deriued and conueied from the heire female, though they would vnder the colour of ſuch a fained law, barre the kings and princes of this realme of England of their right and lawfull inheritance.

The archbiſhop further alledged out of the booke of Numbers this ſaieng: When a man dieth without a ſonne, let the inheritance deſcend to his daughter. At length, hauing ſaid ſufficientlie for the proofe of the kings iuſt and lawfull title to the crowne of France, he exhorted him to aduance foorth his banner to fight for his right, to conquer his inheritance, to ſpare neither bloud, ſword, nor fire, ſith his warre was iuſt, his cauſe good, and his claime true. And to the intent his louing chapleins and obedient ſubiects of the ſpiritualtie might ſhew themſelues willing and deſirous to aid his maieſtie, for the recouerie of his ancient right and true inheritance, the archbiſhop declared that in their ſpirituall conuocation, they had granted to his highneſſe ſuch a ſumme of monie, as neuer by no ſpirituall perſons was to any prince before thoſe daies giuen or aduanced.

The earle of weſtmerland perſuadeth ẏ king to the conqueſt of Scotland.

When the archbiſhop had ended his prepared tale, Rafe Neuill earle of Weſtmerland, and as then lord Warden of the marches againſt Scotland, vnderſtanding that the king vpon a couragious deſire to recouer his right in France, would ſuerlie take the wars in hand, thought good to moue the king to begin firſt with Scotland, and thervpon declared how eaſie a matter it ſhould be to make a conqueſt there, and how greatlie the ſame ſhould further his wiſhed purpoſe for the ſubduing of the Frenchmen, concluding the ſumme of his tale with this old ſaieng: that Who ſo will France win, muſt with Scotland firſt begin. Manie matters he touched, as well to ſhew how neceſſarie the conqueſt of Scotland ſhould be, as alſo to proue how iuſt a cauſe the king had to attempt it, truſting to perſuade the king and all other to be of his opinion.

The duke of Exceſter his wiſe and pithie anſwer to the earle of weſtmerlãds ſaieng.

A true ſaieng.

But after he had made an end, the duke of Exceſter, vncle to the king, a man well learned and wiſe, (who had beene ſent into Italie by his father, intending that he ſhould haue been a preeſt) replied againſt the erle of Weſtmerlands oration, affirming rather that he which would Scotland win, he with France muſt firſt begin. For if the king might once compaſſe the conqueſt of France, Scotland could not long reſiſt; ſo that conquere France, and Scotland would ſoone obeie. For where ſhould the Scots lerne policie and ſkill to defend themſelues, if they had not their bringing vp and training in France? If the French penſions mainteined not the Scotiſh nobilitie, in what caſe ſhould they be? Then take awaie France, and the Scots will ſoone be tamed; France being to Scotland the ſame that the ſap is to the tree, which being taken awaie, the tree muſt needs die and wither.

To be briefe, the duke of Exceſter vſed ſuch earneſt and pithie perſuaſions, to induce the king and the whole aſſemblie of the parlement to credit his words, that immediatlie after he had made an end, all the companie began to crie; Warre, warre; France, France. Hereby the bill for diſſoluing of religious houſes was cleerelie ſet aſide, and nothing thought on but onelie the recouering of France, according as the archbiſhop had mooued. And vpon this point, after a few acts beſides for the wealth of the realme eſtabliſhed, the parlement was proroged vnto Weſtminſter. ¶ Some write, that in this parlement it was enacted, that Lollards and heretikes with their mainteiners and fauourers ſhould be Ipſo facto adiudged guiltie of high treaſon: but in the ſtatute made in the ſame parlement againſt Lollards, we find no ſuch words: albeit by force of that ſtatute it was ordeined, that perſons ſo conuicted & executed, ſhould loſe their lands holden in fee ſimple, and all other their goods and cattels, as in caſes of felonie.

Ambaſſadors from ẏ Frẽch king and from the duke of Burgognie.

During this parlement, there came to the king ambaſſadors, as well from the French king that was then in the hands of the Orlientiall faction, as alſo from the duke of Burgognie, for aid againſt that faction; promiſing more (as was ſaid) than laie well in his power to performe. The king ſhortlie after ſent ambaſſadors to them both, as the biſhop of Durham, and Norwich, with others. Moreouer at this parlement, Iohn the kings brother was created duke of Bedford, and his brother Humfrie duke of Glocester. Alſo, Thomas Beaufort, marqueſſe Dorſet, was created duke of Exceſter. Immediatlie after, the king ſent ouer into France his vncle the duke of Exceſter, the lord Greie admerall of England, the archbiſhop of Dubline, and the biſhop of Norwich, ambaſſadors vnto the French king, with fiue hundred horſſe, which were lodged in the temple houſe in Paris, keeping ſuch triumphant cheere in their lodging, and ſuch a ſolemne eſtate in their riding through the citie, that the Pariſiens and all the Frenchmen had no ſmall meruell at their honorable port.

Ambaſſadors ſent to Fran.

The French king receiued them verie honorablie, and banketted them right ſumptuouſlie, ſhewing to them iuſts and Martiall paſtimes, by the ſpace of three daies togither, in the which iuſts the king himſelfe, to ſhew his courage and actiuitie to the Engliſhmen, manfullie brake ſpeares and luſtilie tournied. When the triumph was ended, the Engliſh ambaſſadors, hauing a time appointed them to declare their meſſage, admitted to the French kings preſence, required of him to deliuer vnto the king of England the realme and crowne of France, with the entier duchies of Aquiteine, Normandie and Aniou, with the countries of Poictiou and Maine. Manie other requeſts they made: and this offered withall, that if the French king would without warre and effuſion of chriſtian bloud, render to the king their maiſter his verie right & lawfull inheritance, that he would be content to take in mariage the ladie Katharine, daughter to the French king, and to indow hir with all the duchies and countries before rehearſed: and if he would not ſo doo, then the king of England did expreſſe and ſignifie to him, that with the aid of God, and helpe of his people, he would recouer his right and inheritance wrongfullie withholden from him, with mortall warre, and dint of ſword. ¶ This in effect doth our Engliſh poet compriſe in his report of the occaſion, which Henrie the fit tooke to arrere battell againſt the French king: putting into the mouthes of the ſaid king of Englands ambaſſadors an imagined ſpeech, the concluſion whereof he maketh to be either reſtitution of that which the French had taken and deteined from the Engliſh, or elſe fier and ſword. His words are theſe, ———raptum nobis aut redde Britannis,

Aut ferrum expectes, vltrices inſuper ignes.

The Frenchmen being not a little abaſhed at theſe demands, thought not to make anie abſolute anſwer in ſo weightie a cauſe, till they had further breathed; and therefore praied the Engliſh ambaſſadors to ſaie to the king their maiſter, that they now hauing no opportunitie to conclude in ſo high a matter, would ſhortlie ſend ambaſſadors into England, which ſhould certifie & declare to the king their whole mind, purpoſe, and intent. The Engliſh ambaſſadors returned with this anſwer, making relation of euerie thing that was ſaid or doone. King Henrie after the returne of his ambaſſadors, determined fullie to make warre in France, conceiuing a good and perfect hope to haue fortunate ſucceſſe, ſith victorie for the moſt part followeth where right leadeth, being aduanced forward by iuſtice, and ſet forth by equitie.

Thom. Walſ. It is not like that in this councell writers meane yͤ parlement that was adiorned from Leiceſter to weſtminſter, where it began in the octaues of ſaint Martin, in this ſecond yeare 1415.

And bicauſe manie Frenchmen were promoted to eccleſiaſticall dignities, as ſome to benefices, and ſome to abbeies and priories within the realme, and ſent dailie innumerable ſummes of monie into France, for the releeſe of their naturall countrimen and kinſfolke, he therefore in fauour of the publike wealth of his realme and ſubiects, in a councell called at London, about Michaelmas, cauſed to be ordeined, that no ſtranger hereafter ſhould be promoted to anie ſpirituall dignitie or degree within this realme, without his eſpeciall licence, and roiall conſent; and all they that ſhould be admitted, ſhould find ſufficient ſuerties, not to diſcloſe the ſecrets of this realme to anie forren perſon, nor to miniſter aid or ſuccour to anie of them with monie, or by anie other meanes. This was confirmed in a conuocation called at the ſame time by the new archbiſhop of Canturburie.

The councell of Conſtance.

Moreouer, ſuch as were to go vnto the generall councell holden at Conſtance, were named and appointed to make them readie: for the king hauing knowledge from the emperor Sigiſmund, of the aſſembling of that councell, thought it not conuenient to ſit ſtill as an hearer, and no partaker in ſo high a cauſe, which touched the whole ſtate of the chriſtian common-wealth, as then troubled by reaſon of the ſchiſme that yet continued. Wherefore he ſent thither Richard earle of Warwike, the biſhops of Saliſburie, Bath, and Hereford, the abbat of Weſtminſter, and the prior of Worceſter, with diuerſe other doctors and learned men of the ſpiritualtie; beſides knights and eſquiers. They were in number eight hundred horſſes, ſo well appointed and furniſhed, as well the men as horſſes, that all nations merueiled to ſee ſuch an honorable companie come from a countrie ſo far diſtant.

The earle of warwike and others ſent to the generall councell.

Engueram.

Great preparation for the French wars

Diuerſe other things were concluded at that preſent: for the king had cauſed not onelie the lords of the ſpiritualtie, but alſo of the temporaltie to aſſemble here at London the ſame time, to treat ſpeciallie of his iournie that he purpoſed to make ſhortlie into France: and herevpon meanes was made for the gathering of monie, which was granted with ſo good a will both of the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie, that there was leuied the ſumme of three hundred thouſand markes Engliſh: and herewith order was giuen to gather a great hoaſt of men, thorough all his dominions. And for the more increaſing of his nauie, he ſent into Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland, to conduct and hire ſhips for the tranſporting and conueieng ouer of his men and munitions of war, and finallie prouided for armour, victuals, monie, artillerie, cariage, boates to paſſe ouer riuers couered with leather, tents, and all other things requiſite for ſo high an enterpriſe.

The Frenchmen hauing knowledge hereof, the Dolphin, who had the gouernance of the realme, bicauſe his father was fallen into his old diſeaſe of frenſie, ſent for the dukes of Berrie and Alanſon, and all the other lords of the councell of France: by whoſe aduiſe it was determined, that they ſhould not onelie prepare a ſufficient armie to reſiſt the king of England, when ſo euer he arriued to inuade France, but alſo to ſtuffe and furniſh the townes on the frontiers and ſea coaſts with conuenient garriſons of men: and further to ſend to the king of England a ſolemne ambaſſage, to make to him ſome offers according to the demands before rehearſed. The charge of this ambaſſage was committed to the earle of Vandoſme, to maiſter William Bouratier archbiſhop of Burges, and to maiſter Peter Fremell biſhop of Liſeux, to the lords of Yvry and Braquemont, and to maiſter Gaultier Cole the kings ſecretarie, and diuerſe others.

Anno Reg. 3.
Ambaſſadors out of France

Theſe ambaſſadors accompanied with 350 horſſes, paſſed the ſea at Calis, and landed at Douer, before whoſe arriuall the king was departed from Windſore to Wincheſter, intending to haue gone to Hampton, there to haue ſurueied his nauie: but hearing of the ambaſſadors approching, he tarried ſtill at Wincheſter, where the ſaid French lords ſhewed themſelues verie honorablie before the king and his nobilitie. At time prefixed, before the kings preſence, ſitting in his throne imperiall, the archbiſhop of Burges made an eloquent and a long oration, diſſuading warre, and praiſing peace; offering to the king of England a great ſumme of monie, with diuerſe countries, being in verie deed but baſe and poore, as a dowrie with the ladie Catharine in mariage, ſo that he would diſſolue his armie, and diſmiſſe his ſoldiers, which he had gathered and put in a readineſſe.

When his oration was ended, the king cauſed the ambaſſadors to be highlie feaſted, and ſet them at his owne table. And after a daie aſſigned in the foreſaid hall, the archbiſhop of Canturburie to their oration made a notable anſwer, the effect whereof was, that if the French king would not giue with his daughter in mariage the duches of Aquiteine, Aniou, and all other ſeigniories and dominions ſometimes apperteining to the noble progenitors of the king of England, he would in no wiſe retire his armie, nor breake his iournie; but would with all diligence enter into France, and deſtroie the people, waſte the countrie, and ſubuert the townes with blood, ſword, and fire, and neuer ceaſſe till he had recouered his ancient right and lawfull patrimonie. The king auowed the archbiſhops ſaieng, and in the word of a prince promiſed to performe it to the vttermoſt.

A proud preſumptuous prelat.

The archbiſhop of Burges much greeued, that his ambaſſage was no more regarded, after certeine brags bluſtered out with impatience, as more preſuming vpon his prelaſie, than reſpecting his dutie of conſiderance to whom he ſpake and what became him to ſaie, he praied ſafe conduct to depart. Which the king gentlie granted, and added withall to this effect: I little eſteeme your French brags, & leſſe ſet by your power and ſtrength; I know perfectlie my right to my region, which you vſurpe; & except you denie the apparant truth, ſo doo your ſelues alſo: if you neither doo nor will know it, yet God and the world knoweth it. An ouerthrow to the Scots by ſir Robert Umfreuill.

After the French ambaſſadors were departed, the king like a prouident prince, thought good to take order for the reſiſting of the Scots, if (according to their maner) they ſhould attempt anie thing againſt his ſubiects in his abſence. For that point appointed he the earle of Weſtmerland, the lord Scroope, the baron of Greiſtocke, ſir Robert Umfreuill, & diuerſe other valiant capteins to kéepe the frontiers & marches of Scotland, which ſir Robert Umfreuill on the daie of Marie Madgdalen fought with the Scots at the towne of Gedering, hauing in his companie onelie thrée hundred archers, and ſeuen ſcore ſpears, where he (after long conflict) ſlue of his enimies ſixtie and odde, tooke thrée hundred and ſixtie priſoners, diſcomfited and put to flight one thouſand and more, whome he followed in chaſe aboue twelue miles, but their hands full of preies and priſoners, retired homeward (not vnhurt) to the caſtell of Rockeſborough, of the which he was capteine.

The quéene mother gouernour of the realme.

When the king had all prouiſions readie, and ordered all things for the defenſe of his realme, he leauing behind him for gouernour of the realme, the quéene his mother in law, departed to Southampton, to take ſhip into France. And firſt princelie appointing to aduertiſe the French king of his comming, therefore diſpatched Antelope his purſeuant at armes with letters to him for reſtitution of that which he wrongfully withheld, contrarie to the lawes of God and man: the king further declaring how ſorie he was that he ſhould be thus compelled for repeating of his right and iuſt title of inheritance, to make warre to the deſtruction of chriſtian people, but ſithens he had offered peace which could not be receiued, now for fault of iuſtice, he was forced to take armes. Neuertheleſſe exhorted the French king in the bowels of Ieſu Chriſt, to render him that which was his owne, whereby effuſion of Chriſtian bloud might be auoided. Theſe letters chéeflie to this effect and purpoſe, were written and dated from Hampton the fift of Auguſt. When the ſame were preſented to the French king, and by his councell well peruſed, anſwer was made, that he would take aduiſe, and prouide therein as time and place ſhould be conuenient, ſo the meſſenger licenced to depart at his pleaſure.

The earle of Cambridge & other lords apprehended for treaſon. Thom. Wal.

When king Henrie had fullie furniſhed his nauie with men, munition, & other prouiſions, perceiuing that his capteines miſliked nothing ſo much as delate, determined his ſouldiors to go a ſhip-bord and awaie. But ſée the hap, the night before the daie appointed for their departure, he was crediblie informed, that Richard earle of Cambridge brother to Edward duke of Yorke, and Henrie lord Scroope of Maſham lord treaſuror, with Thomas Graie a knight of Northumberland, being confederat togither, had conſpired his death: wherefore he cauſed them to be apprehended. The ſaid lord Scroope was in ſuch fauour with the king, that he admitted him ſometime to be his bedfellow, in whoſe fidelitie the king repoſed ſuch truſt, that when anie priuat or publike councell was in hand, this lord had much in the determination of it. For he repreſented ſo great grauitie in his countenance, ſuch modeſtie in behauiour, and ſo vertuous zeale to all godlineſſe in his talke, that whatſoeuer he ſaid was thought for the moſt part neceſſarie to be doone and followed. Alſo the ſaid ſir Thomas Graie (as ſome write) was of the kings priuie councell.

King Henries words to the traitours.

Theſe priſoners vpon their examination, confeſſed, that for a great ſumme of monie which they had receiued of the French king, they intended verelie either to haue deliuered the king aliue into the hands of his enimies, or elſe to haue murthered him before he ſhould arriue in the duchie of Normandie. When king Henrie had heard all things opened, which he deſired to know, he cauſed all his nobilitie to come before his preſence, before whome he cauſed to be brought the offendors alſo, and to them ſaid. Hauing thus conſpired the death and deſtruction of me, which am the head of the realme and gouernour of the people, it maie be (no doubt) but that you likewiſe haue ſworne the confuſion of all that are here with me, ” and alſo the deſolation of your owne countrie. To what horror (O lord) for any true Engliſh hart to con- ” ſider, that ſuch an execrable iniquitie ſhould euer ſo ” bewrap you, as for pleaſing of a forren enimie to ” imbrue your hands in your bloud, and to ruine your owne natiue ſoile. Reuenge herein touching my per- ” ſon, though I ſéeke not; yet for the ſafegard of you ” my déere fréends, & for due preſeruation of all ſorts, I ” am by office to cauſe example to be ſhewed. Get ye hence therefore ye poore miſerable wretches to the re- ” ceiuing of your iuſt reward, wherein Gods maieſtie ” giue you grace of his mercie and repentance of ” your heinous offenſes. And ſo immediatlie they were had to execution.

The earle of Cambridge and the other traitours executed.

This doone, the king calling his lords againe afore him, ſaid in words few and with good grace. Of his enterpriſes he recounted the honor and glorie, whereof they with him were to be partakers, the great confidence he had in their noble minds, which could not but remember them of the famous feats that their anceſtors aforetime in France had atchiued, whereof the due report for euer recorded remained yet in regiſter. The great mercie of God that had ſo gratiouſlie reuealed vnto him the treaſon at hand, whereby the true harts of thoſe afore him made ſo eminent & apparant in his eie, as they might be right ſure he would neuer forget it. The doubt of danger to be nothing in reſpect of the certeintie of honor that they ſhould acquire, wherein himſelfe (as they ſaw) in perſon would be lord and leader through Gods grace. To whoſe maieſtie as chéeflie was knowne the equitie of his demand: euen ſo to his mercie did he onelie recommend the ſucceſſe of his trauels. When the king had ſaid, all the noble men knéeled downe, & promiſed faithfullie to ſerue him, dulie to obeie him, and rather to die than to ſuffer him to fall into the hands of his enimies.

This doone, the king thought that ſuerlie all treaſon and conſpiracie had béene vtterlie extinct: not ſuſpecting the fire which was newlie kindled, and ceaſſed not to increaſe, till at length it burſt out into ſuch a flame, that catching the beames of his houſe and familie, his line and ſtocke was cleane conſumed to aſhes. ¶ Diuerſe write that Richard earle of Cambridge did not conſpire with the lord Scroope & Thomas Graie for the murthering of king Henrie to pleaſe the French king withall, but onelie to the intent to exalt to the crowne his brother in law Edmund earle of March as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence: after the death of which earle of March, for diuerſe ſecret impediments, not able to haue iſſue, the earle of Cambridge was ſure that the crowne ſhould come to him by his wife, and to his children, of hir begotten. And therefore (as was thought) he rather confeſſed himſelfe for need of monie to be corrupted by the French king, than he would declare his inward mind, and open his verie intent and ſecret purpoſe, which if it were eſpied, he ſaw plainlie that the earle of March ſhould haue taſted of the ſame cuppe that he had drunken, and what ſhould haue come to his owne children he much doubted. Therefore deſtitute of comfort & in deſpaire of life to ſaue his children, he feined that tale, deſiring rather to ſaue his ſucceſſion than himſelfe, which he did in déed: for his ſonne Richard duke of Yorke not priuilie but openlie claimed the crowne, and Edward his ſonne both claimed it, & gained it, as after it ſhall appeare. Which thing if king Henrie had at this time either doubted, or foreſéene, had neuer béene like to haue come to paſſe, as Hall ſaith.

The effect of the earle of Cambridges indictement.

But whatſoeuer hath béene reported of the confeſſion of the earle of Cambridge, certeine it is, that indicted he was by the name of Richard earle of Cambridge of Conneſburgh in the countie of Yorke knight, and with him Thomas Graie of Heton in the countie of Northumberland knight; for that they the twentith daie of Iulie, in the third yeare of king Henrie the fifts reigne, at Southampton, and in diuerſe other places within this realme, had conſpired togither with a power of men to them aſſociat, without the kings licence, to haue led awaie the lord Edmund earle of March into Wales, and then to haue procured him to take vpon him the ſupreme gouernment of the realme, in caſe that king Richard the ſecond were dead: and herwith had purpoſed to ſet forth a proclamation there in Wales, in name of the ſaid earle of March, as heire of the crowne againſt king Henrie, by the name of Henrie of Lancaſter the vſurper, to the end that by ſuch meanes they might draw the more number of the kings liege people vnto the ſaid earle; and further to haue conueied a banner of the armes of England, and a certeine crowne of Spaine ſet vpon a pallet, and laid in gage to the ſaid earle of Cambridge, by the king, togither with the ſaid earle of March into the parties of Wales aforeſaid.

A iewell.

Further, that the ſaid earle of Cambridge, and ſir Thomas Graie had appointed certeine of the kings liege people to repaire into Scotland, and to bring from thence one Thomas Trumpington; alſo an other reſembling in ſhape, fauour, and countenance king Richard, and Henrie Perſie, togither with a great multitude of people to fight with the king, and him to deſtroie in open field. Beſide this, that they had meant to win certeine caſtels in Wales, and to kéepe them againſt the king: and manie other treaſons they had contriued, as by the indictement was ſpecified, to the intent they might deſtroie the king and his brethren, the dukes of Bedford and Glouceſter, and other the great lords & péers of the realme. And Henrie Scrope of Maſham, of Flaxflet, in the countie of Yorke was likewiſe indicted, as conſenting to the premiſſes. So that it appeareth their purpoſe was well inough then perceiued, although happilie not much bruted abroad, for conſiderations thought neceſſarie to haue it rather huſht and kept ſecret.

About the ſelfe ſame time the lord Cobham with his fréends, whether as one of counſell in the conſpiracie with the earle of Cambridge or not, was determined to haue made ſome attempt againſt the lord of Aburgauennie, who being aduertiſed thereof, got for his defenſe from Worceſter, Perſore, Teukeſburie, and other places thereabout, to the number of fiue thouſand archers, and other armed men, which came to him vnto his caſtell of Hanleie: whereof when the lord Cobham was aduertiſed, he withdrew againe to ſuch ſecret places about Maluerne, as he had prouided for his ſuertie, to reſort vnto; but a prieſt that belonged vnto him, was taken, and diuerſe other, who diſcloſed to the lord Aburgauennie, one of the places where the ſaid lord Cobham with his men vſed to kéepe themſelues cloſe. Vnto that place the lord Aburgauennie went, where he found in déed monie and armor piled vp betwixt two wals, handſomelie conueied and framed for the purpoſe; but the lord Cobham with his folkes were withdrawne into ſome other place, after they once heard, that the earle of Cambridge and the lord Scrope were executed.

But now to proceed with king Henries doings. After this, when the wind came about proſperous to his purpoſe, he cauſed the mariners to weie vp anchors, and hoiſe vp ſailes, and to ſet forward with a thouſand ſhips, on the vigill of our ladie daie the Aſſumption, and tooke land at Caux, commonlie called Kidcaux, where the riuer of Saine runneth into the ſea, without reſiſtance. At his firſt comming on land, he cauſed proclamation to be made, that no perſon ſhould be ſo hardie on paine of death, either to take anie thing out of anie church that belonged to the ſame, or to hurt or doo anie violence either to prieſts, women, or anie ſuch as ſhould be found without weapon or armor, and not readie to make reſiſtance: alſo that no man ſhould renew anie quarell or ſtrife, whereby anie fraie might ariſe to the diſquieting of the armie.

Princelie and wiſelie.

The next daie after his landing, he marched toward the towne of Harflue, ſtanding on the riuer of Saine betwéene two hils; he beſieged it on euerie ſide, raiſing bulwarks and a baſtell, in which the two earles of Kent & Huntington were placed, with Cornwall, Graie, Steward, and Porter. On that ſide towards the ſea, the king lodged with his field, and the duke of Clarence on the further ſide towards Rone. There were within the towne the lords de Touteuill and Gaucourt, with diuerſe other that valiantlie defended the ſiege, dooing what damage they could to their aduerſaries; and damming vp the riuer that hath his courſe through the towne, the water roſe ſo high betwixt the kings campe, and the duke of Clarence campe (diuided by the ſame riuer) that the Engliſhmen were conſtreined to withdraw their artillerie from one ſide, where they had planted the ſame.

Harding.

The French king being aduertiſed, that king Henrie was arriued on that coaſt, ſent in all haſt the lord de la Breth conſtable of France, the ſeneſhall of France, the lord Bouciqualt marſhall of France, the ſeneſhall of Henault, the lord Lignie with other, which fortified townes with men, victuals, and artillerie on all thoſe frontiers towards the ſea. And hearing that Harflue was beſieged, they came to the caſtell of Caudebecke, being not farre from Harflue, to the intent they might ſuccor their fréends which were beſieged, by ſome policie or meanes: but the Engliſhmen, notwithſtanding all the damage that the Frenchmen could worke againſt them, forraied the countrie, ſpoiled the villages, bringing manie a rich preie to the campe before Harflue. And dailie was the towne aſſaulted: for the duke of Glouceſter, to whome the order of the ſiege was committed, made thrée mines vnder the ground, and approching to the wals with his engins and ordinance, would not ſuffer them within to take anie reſt.

The king beſieged Harflue.

Titus Liuius.

For although they with their countermining ſomwhat diſappointed the Engliſhmen, & came to fight with them hand to hand within the mines, ſo that they went no further forward with that worke; yet they were ſo incloſed on ech ſide, as well by water as land, that ſuccour they ſaw could none come to them: for the king lieng with his battell on the hill ſide on the one partie, and the duke of Clarence beyond the riuer that paſſeth by the towne, and runneth into Saine on the other partie, beſide other lords and capteins that were lodged with their retinues for their moſt aduantage: none could be ſuffered to go in, or come forth, without their licence; inſomuch that ſuch pouder as was ſent to haue béene conueied into the towne by water, was taken by the Engliſh ſhips that watched the riuer.

Harding.
Thom. Walſi.

The ſeuenteenth of September they within Harflue praie parlee.

The capteins within the towne, perceiuing that they were not able long to reſiſt the continuall aſſaults of the Engliſhmen, knowing that their wals were vndermined, and like to be ouerthrowne (as one of their bulwarks was alredie, where the earles of Huntington and Kent had ſet vp their banners) ſent an officer at armes forth about midnight after the feaſt daie of ſaint Lambert, which fell that yeare vpon the tueſdaie, to beſéech the king of England to appoint ſome certeine perſons as commiſſioners from him, with whome they within might treat about ſome agréement. The duke of Clarence, to whome this meſſenger firſt declared his errand, aduertiſed the king of their requeſt, who granting thereto, appointed the duke of Excester, with the lord Fitz Hugh, and ſir Thomas Erpingham, to vnderſtand their minds, who at the firſt requeſted a truce vntill ſundaie next following the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, in which meane time if no ſuccour came to remoue the ſiege, they would vndertake to deliuer the towne into the kings hands, their liues and goods ſaued.

A fiue daies reſpit.

The king aduertiſed hereof, ſent them word, that except they would ſurrender the towne to him the morow next inſuing, without anie condition, they ſhould ſpend no more time in talke about the matter. But yet at length through the earneſt ſute of the French lords, the king was contented to grant them truce vntill nine of the clocke the next ſundaie, being the two and twentith of September; with condition, that if in the meane time no reſcue came, they ſhould yéeld the towne at that houre, with their bodies and goods to ſtand at the kings pleaſure. And for aſſurance thereof, they deliuered into the kings hands thirtie of their beſt capteins and merchants within that towne as pledges. But other write, that it was couenanted, that they ſhould deliuer but onelie twelue pledges, and that if the ſiege were not raiſed by the French kings power within ſix daies next following, then ſhould they deliuer the towne into the king of England hands, and thirtie of the chéefeſt perſonages within the ſame, to ſtand for life or death at his will and pleaſure: and as for the reſidue of the men of warre and towneſmen, they ſhould depart whether they would, without carieng forth either armour, weapon, or goods.

The king neuertheleſſe was after content to grant a reſpit vpon certeine conditions, that the capteins within might haue time to ſend to the French king for ſuccour (as before ye haue heard) leaſt he intending greater exploits, might loſe time in ſuch ſmall matters. When this compoſition was agréed vpon, the lord Bacqueuill was ſent vnto the French king, to declare in what point the towne ſtood. To whome the Dolphin anſwered, that the kings power was not yet aſſembled, in ſuch number as was conuenient to raiſe ſo great a ſiege. This anſwer being brought vnto the capteins within the towne, they rendered it vp to the king of England, after that the third daie was expired, which was on the daie of ſaint Maurice being the ſeuen and thirtith daie after the ſiege was firſt laid. The ſouldiors were ranſomed, and the towne ſacked, to the great gaine of the Engliſhmen. ¶ Some writing of this yéelding vp of Harflue, do in like ſort make mention of the diſtreſſe wherto the people, then expelled out of their habitations, were driuen: inſomuch as parents with their children, yong maids and old folke went out of the towne gates with heauie harts (God wot) as put to their preſent ſhifts to ſéeke them a new abode. Beſides that, king Henrie cauſed proclamation to be made within his owne dominions of England, that whoſoeuer (either handicraftesman, merchantman, gentleman, or plowman) would inhabit in Harflue, ſhould haue his dwelling giuen him gratis, and his heire after him alſo inioy the like grace and fauour: inſomuch that great multitudes flocked to the ſea coaſts, waiting wind and wether for their tranſportage into Harflue, where being arriued, woonderfull it is to tell, within how ſhort a time the towne was peopled. This doth Anglorum prælia report, ſaieng (not without good ground, I beléeue) as followeth:

Harflue yéelded and ſacked.

Abr. Fl. out of Angl. præl. ſub Hen. 5. and Polychron.

——— tum flentes tenera cum prole parentes
Virgineuſque chorus veteres liquere penates:
Tum populus cunctus de portis Gallicus exit
Mæſtus, inarmatus, vacuus, miſer, æger, inópsq;
Vtque nouas ſedes quærat migrare coactus:
Oppidulo belli potiuntur iure Britanni, &c.

All this doone, the king ordeined capteine to the towne his vncle the duke of Excester, who eſtabliſhed his lieutenant there, one ſir John Faſtolfe, with fiftéene hundred men, or (as ſome haue) two thouſand and thirtie ſix knights, whereof the baron of Carew, and ſir Hugh Lutterell, were two councellors. And bicauſe manie of his nobles whileſt this ſiege laie before Harflue, fell ſicke of the flix and other diſeaſes, diuerſe alſo dead, amongſt whom the earle of Stafford, the biſhop of Norwich, the lords Molins and Burnell were foure (beſide others) the king licenced his brother the duke of Clarence, John earle marſhall, and John earle of Arundell, being infected with that diſeaſe, to returne into England.

Great death in the hoſt by the flix.

King Henrie, after the winning of Harflue, determined to haue procéeded further in the winning of other townes and fortreſſes: but bicauſe the dead time of the winter approched, it was determined by aduiſe of his councell, that he ſhould in all conuenient ſpéed ſet forward, and march through the countrie towards Calis by land, leaſt his returne as then homewards ſhould of ſlanderous tongs be named a running awaie: and yet that iournie was adiudged perillous, by reaſon that the number of his people was much miniſhed by the flix and other feuers, which ſore vexed and brought to death aboue fiftéene hundred perſons of the armie: and this was the cauſe that his returne was the ſooner appointed and concluded.

The kings mercifull dealing with the French priſoners.

But before his departing thence, he entred into the towne of Harflue, & went to the church of ſaint Martines, and there offered. All the men of warre which had not paid their ranſoms, he ſware them on the holie euangeliſts, to yéeld themſelues priſoners at Calis by the feaſt of ſaint Martine in Nouember next. There were two ſtrong towers ſtanding on the hauen ſide at Harflue, which looking for aid, did not yéeld, till ten daies after the towne was rendered. When the king had repared the walles, bulwarks and rampiers about the towne, and furniſhed it with vittels and artillerie, he remooued from Harflue toward Ponthoiſe, intending to paſſe the riuer of Some with his armie, before the bridges were either withdrawen or broken. Such vittels and other neceſſaries as were to be caried with the armie, he appointed to be laid on horſſes, leauing the carts and wagons behind for leſſe incombre.

The French king hearing that the towne of Harflue was gotten, and that the king of England was marching forward into the bowels of the realme of France, ſent out proclamations, and aſſembled people on euerie ſide, committing the whole charge of his armie to his ſonne the Dolphine and duke of Aquitaine, who incontinentlie cauſed the bridges to be broken, and the paſſages to be kept. Alſo they cauſed all the corne and vittels to be conueied awaie, or deſtroied in all places, where it was coniectured that the Engliſhmen would paſſe. The king of England nothing diſmaied herewith, kept his iournie in ſpite of his enimies, conſtreining them within diuerſe townes and holds to furniſh him with vittels: but yet as he paſſed by the towne of Ew, the garriſon of the towne iſſued forth, and gaue the Engliſhmen a ſkirmiſh, who beat them into the towne with loſſe, namelie of a right valiant man of armes, named Lancelot Piers. There were manie Engliſhmen hurt with quarels ſhot off from the loops and wals, as they purſued the enimies vnto the gates.

Corne & vittels deſtroied where the Engliſhmen ſhould paſſe.

A ſkirmiſh with the garriſon of Ew.

Enguerant.

At length the king approched the riuer of Some, & finding all the bridges broken, he came to the paſſage of Blanchetake, where his great grandfather king Edward the third a little before had ſtriken the battell of Creſſie: but the paſſage was now ſo impeached with ſtakes in the botome of the ford, that he could not paſſe, his enimies beſides there awaie ſo ſwarming on all ſides. He therefore marched forwards to Arames, marching with his armie, and paſſing with his carriage in ſo martiall a maner, that he appeared ſo terrible to his enimies, as they durſt not offer him battell. And yet the lord Dalbreth conſtable of France, the marſhall Boncequault, the earle of Vendoſme great maſter of France, the duke of Alanſon, and the earle of Richmont, with all the puiſſance of the Dolphin laie at Abuile, but euer kept the paſſages, and coaſted aloofe, like a hauke though eager yet not hardie on hir preie. The king of England kept on his iournie till he came to the bridge of ſaint Marence, where he found aboue thirtie thouſand Frenchmen, and there pitched his field, looking ſuerlie to be fought withall.

Blanchetake.

Wherefore to incourage his capteins the more, he dubbed certeine of his hardie and valiant gentlemen knights, as Iohn lord Ferrers of Grobie, Reginald of Greiſtocke, Piers Tempeſt, Chriſtopher Moriſbie, Thomas Pikering, William Huddleſton, Iohn Hoſbalton, Henrie Mortimer, Philip Hall, and William his brother, Iaques de Ormond, and diuerſe other: but the French making no ſemblance to fight, he departed in good order of battell by the towne of Amiens, to another towne neere to a caſtell called Bowes, and there laie two daies looking for their bidding of battell euerie houre. From thence he came neere to Corbie, where he was ſtaied that night, for that the common people and pezants mightilie there aſſembled, hauing gotten them ſome bead and hartening by meanes of their number that was great, and by truſt of a ſtrength (then ioined vnto them) made of men at armes (manie too tall and well appointed for fight) all of the garriſon of Corbie: a ſtrong towne well walled and warded. Hereupon at a ſtreict (which they had preoccupied) they ſtoutlie from our armie not onelie kept the paſſage, but alſo vpon vs gaue a proud onſet: wherein ſir Hugh Stafford knight lord Bourghchier, cheefteine of a wing to the king vnder his ſtandard of Guien, and as then neereſt to the enimie, though far inferior in number, yet with readie and valiant incounter receiued them. The force and ſlaughter grew great both on the one ſide and the other, by the French in eſpeciall at firſt right fiercelie purſued, in ſo much as with an hardie charge vpon our men, they had both beat downe the ſtandard, and alſo from vs quite woone it awaie, to their hie incouragement, and our incredible deſpite and diſmaie. Whereat one Iohn Bromley of Bromley in Staffordſhire eſquier, a neere kinſman vnto the lord Bourghchier, was euen ſtreight ſo pearſed at hart, as he could not conteine him, but by and by ran eagerlie vpon the French; and with his ſouldiers (in whom wrath and teene had alreadie inflamed furie and deſire of reuenge) did ſo fiercelie ſet vpon them, that they were not onlie beaten backe, but alſo forced to abandon the place. At this puſh the capteine cutting through the thickeſt, ſtrake downe the champion that bare the ſtandard, and ſo gloriouſlie recouered it againe, and after during the fight (where as manie of the French loſt their liues) couragiouſlie ouer his ſouldiers auanced it himſelfe. The reſt that fled awaie our people purſued in chaſing & ſlaughter vnto Corbie verie gates. So in victorie, honor, and great ioy, with our ſmall loſſe (in compariſon) thanks vnto Gods maieſtie, the cheefteine brought his hoſt into his campe and order againe. The ſingular prowes of this worthie capteine the noble man highlie regarding, in an ample teſtimonie thereof and vpon his owne honorable conſideration, by a faire ancient deed yet extant at theſe daies did giue him reward of fortie pounds annuitie for his life. The monument ſo plainelie declaring the truth of the matter, with the maner and dignitie of the feat, as it was doone, hath beene thought verie meet for the ſtorie in hand here now to place it as followeth.

For that by the armes in the ſeale it may the better be knowne of what ſtem this noble man ſprong (a matter which this ſtorie ſeemes iuſtlie to require) vnderſtand yee thus were the ſame. In his ſhield, a cheuorne charged with a mullet; his creſt, a ſwans head couped betweene two wings diſplaied all out of a crowne ſupported by two greihounds; about the ſheeld ingrauen, Signa Hugonis de Stafford militis. Hereby is gathered that he was a third brother of the duke of Buckinghams houſe.] This feat thus well doone, the king the ſame daie found a ſhallow, betweene Corbie and Peron, which neuer was eſpied before, at which he with his armie and carriages the night inſuing, paſſed the water of Some without let or danger, and therewith determined to make haſte towards Calis, and not to ſeeke for battell, except he were thereto conſtreined, bicauſe that his armie by ſickneſſe was ſore diminiſhed, in ſo much that he had but onelie two thouſand horſſemen and thirteene thouſand archers, bilmen, and of all ſorts of other footmen.

The kings armie but of 15000.

The Engliſh armie ſore afflicted.

The Engliſhmen were brought into ſome diſtreſſe in this iornie, by reaſon of their vittels in maner ſpent, and no hope to get more: for the enimies had deſtroied all the corne before they came. Reſt could they none take, for their enimies with alarmes did euer ſo infeſt them: dailie it rained, and nightlie it freeſed: of fuell there was great ſcarſitie, of fluxes plentie: monie inough, but wares for their releefe to beſtow it on, had they none. Yet in this great neceſſitie, the poore people of the countrie were not ſpoiled, nor anie thing taken of them without paiment, nor anie outrage or offenſe doone by the Engliſhmen, except one, which was, that a ſouldiour tooke a pix out of a church, for which he was apprehended, & the king not once remooued till the box was reſtored, and the offendor ſtrangled. The people of the countries thereabout, hearing of ſuch zeale in him, to the maintenance of iuſtice, miniſtred to his armie victuals, and other neceſſaries, although by open proclamation ſo to doo they were prohibited.

The French king being at Rone, and hearing that king Henrie was paſſed the riuer of Some, was much diſpleaſed therewith, and aſſembling his councell to the number of fiue and thirtie, aſked their aduiſe what was to be doone. There was amongſt theſe fiue and thirtie, his ſonne the Dolphin, calling himſelfe king of Sicill; the dukes of Berrie and Britaine, the earle of Pontieu the kings yoongeſt ſonne, and other high eſtates. At length thirtie of them agreed, that the Engliſhmen ſhould not depart vnfought withall, and fiue were of a contrarie opinion, but the greater number ruled the matter: and ſo Montioy king at armes was ſent to the king of England to defie him as the enimie of France, and to tell him that he ſhould ſhortlie haue battell. King Henrie aduiſedlie anſwered: Mine intent is to doo as it pleaſeth God, I will not ſeeke your maiſter at this time; but if he or his ſeeke me, I will meet with them God willing. If anie of your nation attempt once to ſtop me in my iournie now towards Calis, at their ieopardie be it; and yet wiſh I not anie of you ſo vnaduiſed, as to be the occaſion that I die your tawnie ground with your red bloud.

K. Henries anſwer to the defiance.

When he had thus anſwered the herald, he gaue him a princelie reward, and licence to depart. Vpon whoſe returne, with this anſwer, it was incontinentlie on the French ſide proclamed, that all men of warre ſhould reſort to the conſtable to fight with the king of England. Whereupon, all men apt for armor and deſirous of honour, drew them toward the field. The Dolphin ſore deſired to haue beene at the battell, but he was prohibited by his father: likewiſe Philip earle of Charolois would gladlie haue beene there, if his father the duke of Burgognie would haue ſuffered him: manie of his men ſtale awaie, and went to the Frenchmen. The king of England hearing that the Frenchmen approched, and that there was an other riuer for him to paſſe with his armie by a bridge, and doubting leaſt if the ſame bridge ſhould be broken, it would be greatlie to his hinderance, appointed certeine capteins with their bands, to go thither with all ſpeed before him, and to take poſſeſſion thereof, and ſo to keepe it, till his comming thither.

Thoſe that were ſent, finding the Frenchmen buſie to breake downe their bridge, aſſailed them ſo vigorouſlie, that they diſcomfited them, and tooke and ſlue them; and ſo the bridge was preſerued till the king came, and paſſed the riuer by the ſame with his whole armie. This was on the two and twentith day of October. The duke of Yorke that led the vauntgard (after the armie was paſſed the riuer) mounted vp to the heigth of an hill with his people, and ſent out ſcowts to diſcouer the countrie, the which vpon their returne aduertiſed him, that a great armie of Frenchmen was at hand, approching towards them. The duke declared to the king what he had heard, and the king therevpon, without all feare or trouble of mind, cauſed the battell which he led himſelfe to ſtaie, and incontinentlie rode foorth to view his aduerſaries, and that doone, returned to his people, and with cheerefull countenance cauſed them to be put in order of battell, aſſigning to euerie capteine ſuch roome and place, as he thought conuenient, and ſo kept them ſtill in that order till night was come, and then determined to ſeeke a place to incampe & lodge his armie in for that night.

King Henrie rideth foorth to take view of the French armie.

There was not one amongſt them that knew any certeine place whither to go, in that vnknowne countrie: but by chance they happened vpon a beaten waie, white in ſight; by the which they were brought vnto a little village, where they were refreſhed with meat and drinke ſomewhat more plenteouſlie than they had beene diuerſe daies before. Order was taken by commandement from the king after the armie was firſt ſet in battell arraie, that no noiſe or clamor ſhould be made in the hoſt; ſo that in marching foorth to this village, euerie man kept himſelfe quiet: but at their comming into the village, fiers were made to giue light on euerie ſide, as there likewiſe were in the French hoſt, which was incamped not paſt two hundred and fiftie paſes diſtant from the Engliſh. The cheefe leaders of the French hoſt were theſe: the conſtable of France, the marſhall, the admerall, the lord Rambures maiſter of the croſbowes, and other of the French nobilitie, which came and pitched downe their ſtandards and banners in the countie of ſaint Paule, within the territorie of Agincourt, hauing in their armie (as ſome write) to the number of threeſcore thouſand horſſemen, beſides footmen, wagoners and other.

The number of the French mẽ threeſcore thouſand. Engueran.

They were lodged euen in the waie by the which the Engliſhmen muſt needs paſſe towards Calis, and all that night after their comming thither, made great cheare and were verie merie, pleaſant, and full of game. The Engliſhmen alſo for their parts were of good comfort, and nothing abaſhed of the matter, and yet they were both hungrie, wearie, ſore trauelled, and vexed with manie cold diſeaſes. Howbeit reconciling themſelues with God by hoſſell and ſhrift, requiring aſſiſtance at his hands that is the onelie giuer of victorie, they determined rather to die, than to yeeld, or flee. The daie following was the fiue and twentith of October in the yeare 1415, being then fridaie, and the feaſt of Criſpine and Criſpinian, a day faire and fortunate to the Engliſh, but moſt ſorrowfull and vnluckie to the French.

The battell of Agincourt, the 25 of October 1415.

In

The order of the French armie.

In the morning, the French capteins made thrée battels, in the vaward were eight thouſand healmes of knights and eſquiers, foure thouſand archers, and fiftéene hundred croſbowes which were guided by the lord de la Breth, conſtable of France, hauing with him the dukes of Orleance and Burbon, the earles of Ewe and Richmond, the marſhall Bouciquault, and the maiſter of the croſbowes, the lord Dampier admerall of France, and other capteins. The earle of Vandoſme with ſixtéene hundred men of armes were ordered for a wing to that battell. And the other wing was guided by ſir Guichard Dolphine, ſir Clugnet of Brabant, and ſir Lewes Bourdon, with eight hundred men of armes, of elect choſen perſons. And to breake the ſhot of the Engliſhmen, were appointed ſir Guilliam de Saueuſes, with Hector and Philip his brethren, Ferrie de Maillie, and Alen de Gaſpanes, with other eight hundred of armes.

As manie in the battell.

The French eſtéemed ſix to one Engliſh.

In the middle ward, were aſſigned as manie perſons, or more, as were in the formoſt battell, and the charge thereof was committed to the dukes of Bar and Alanſon, the earles of Neuers, Vaudemont, Blamont, Salinges, Grant Prée, & of Ruſſie. And in the rereward were all the other men of armes guided by the earles of Marle, Dampmartine, Fauconberg, and the lord of Lourreie capteine of Arde, who had with him the men of the frontiers of Bolonois. Thus the Frenchmen being ordered vnder their ſtandards and banners, made a great ſhew: for ſuerlie they were eſtéemed in number ſix times as manie or more, than was the whole companie of the Engliſhmen, with wagoners, pages and all. They reſted themſelues, waiting for the bloudie blaſt of the terrible trumpet, till the houre betwéene nine and ten of the clocke of the ſame daie, during which ſeaſon, the conſtable made vnto the capteins and other men of warre a pithie oration, exhorting and incouraging them to doo valiantlie, with manie comfortable words and ſenſible reaſons. King Henrie alſo like a leader, and not as one led; like a ſouereigne, and not an inferior, perceiuing a plot of ground verie ſtrong & méet for his purpoſe, which on the backe halfe was fenſed with the village, wherein he had lodged the night before, and on both ſides defended with hedges and buſhes, thought good there to imbattell his hoſt, and ſo ordered his men in the ſame place, as he ſaw occaſion, and as ſtood for his moſt aduantage.

The order of the Engliſh armie and archers.

The vaward all of archers.

Firſt, he ſent priuilie two hundred archers into a lowe medow, which was néere to the vauntgard of his enimies; but ſeparated with a great ditch, commanding them there to kéepe themſelues cloſe till they had a token to them giuen, to let driue at their aduerſaries: beſide this, he appointed a vaward, of the which he made capteine Edward duke of Yorke, who of an haultie courage had deſired that office, and with him were the lords Beaumont, Willoughbie, and Fanhope, and this battell was all of archers. The middle ward was gouerned by the king himſelfe, with his brother the duke of Gloceſter, and the earles of Marſhall, Oxenford, and Suffolke, in the which were all the ſtrong bilmen. The duke of Exceſter vncle to the king led the rereward, which was mixed both with bilmen and archers. The horſſemen like wings went on euerie ſide of the battell.

Archers the greateſt force of the Engliſh armie.

Hall.

Thus the king hauing ordered his battels, feared not the puiſſance of his enimies, but yet to prouide that they ſhould not with the multitude of horſſemen breake the order of his archers, in whome the force of his armie conſiſted [¶ For in thoſe daies the yeomen had their lims at libertie, ſith their hoſen were then faſtened with one point, and their iackes long and eaſie to ſhoot in; ſo that they might draw bowes of great ſtrength, and ſhoot arrowes of a yard long; beſide the head] he cauſed ſtakes bound with iron ſharpe at both ends, of the length of fiue or ſix foot to be pitched before the archers, and of ech ſide the footmen like an hedge, to the intent that if the barded horſſes ran raſhlie vpon them, they might ſhortlie be gored and deſtroied. Certeine perſons alſo were appointed to remooue the ſtakes, as by the moouing of the archers occaſion and time ſhould require, ſo that the footmen were hedged about with ſtakes, and the horſſemen ſtood like a bulwarke betwéene them and their enimies, without the ſtakes. This deuiſe of fortifieng an armie, was at this time firſt inuented: but ſince that time they haue deuiſed caltraps, harrowes, and other new engins againſt the force of horſſemen; ſo that if the enimies run haſtilie vpon the ſame, either are their horſſes wounded with the ſtakes, or their féet hurt with the other engins, ſo as thereby the beaſts are gored, or elſe made vnable to mainteine their courſe.

K. Henries oration to his men.

King Henrie, by reaſon of his ſmall number of people to fill vp his battels, placed his vauntgard ſo on the right hand of the maine battell, which himſelfe led, that the diſtance betwixt them might ſcarſe be perceiued, and ſo in like caſe was the rereward ioined on the left hand, that the one might the more readilie ſuccour an other in time of néed. When he had thus ordered his battels, he left a ſmall companie to kéepe his campe and cariage, which remained ſtill in the village, and then calling his capteins and ſoldiers about him, he made to them a right graue oration, mouing them to plaie the men, whereby to obteine a glorious victorie, as there was hope certeine they ſhould, the rather if they would but remember the iuſt cauſe for which they fought, and whome they ſhould incounter, ſuch faint-harted people as their anceſtors had ſo often ouercome. To conclude, manie words of courage he vttered, to ſtirre them to doo manfullie, aſſuring them that England ſhould neuer be charged with his ranſome, nor anie Frenchman triumph ouer him as a captiue; for either by famous death or glorious victorie would he (by Gods grace) win honour and fame.

A noble courage of a valiant prince.

It is ſaid, that as he heard one of the hoſt vtter his wiſh to another thus: I would to God there were with vs now ſo manie good ſoldiers as are at this houre within England! the king anſwered: I would not wiſh a man more here than I haue, we are indéed in compariſon to the enimies but a few, but if God of his clemencie doo fauour vs, and our iuſt cauſe (as I truſt he will) we ſhall ſpéed well inough. But let no man aſcribe victorie to our owne ſtrength and might, but onelie to Gods aſſiſtance, to whome I haue no doubt we ſhall worthilie haue cauſe to giue thanks therefore. And if ſo be that for our offenſes ſakes we ſhall be deliuered into the hands of our enimies, the leſſe number we be, the leſſe damage ſhall the realme of England ſuſteine: but if we ſhould fight in truſt of multitude of men, and ſo get the victorie (our minds being prone to pride) we ſhould thervpon peraduenture aſcribe the victorie not ſo much to the gift of God, as to our owne puiſſance, and thereby prouoke his high indignation and diſpleaſure againſt vs: and if the enimie get the vpper hand, then ſhould our realme and countrie ſuffer more damage and ſtand in further danger. But be you of good comfort, and ſhew your ſelues valiant, God and our iuſt quarrell ſhall defend vs, and deliuer theſe our proud aduerſaries with all the multitude of them which you ſée (or at the leaſt the moſt of them) into our hands. Whileſt the king was yet thus in ſpéech, either armie ſo maligned the other, being as then in open ſight, that euerie man cried; Forward, forward. The dukes of Clarence, Gloceſter, and Yorke, were of the ſame opinion, yet the king ſtaied a while, leaſt anie ieopardie were not foreſeene, or anie hazard not preuented. The Frenchmen in the meane while, as though they had beene ſure of victorie, made great triumph, for the capteins had determined before, how to diuide the ſpoile, and the ſoldiers the night before had plaid the Engliſhmen at dice. The noble men had deuiſed a chariot, wherein they might triumphantlie conueie the king captiue to the citie of Paris, crieng to their ſoldiers; Haſte you to the ſpoile, glorie and honor; little weening (God wot) how ſoone their brags ſhould be blowne awaie.

Hall.

Here we may not forget how the French thus in their iolitie, ſent an herald to king Henrie, to inquire what ranſome he would offer. Wherevnto he anſwered, that within two or three houres he hoped it would ſo happen, that the Frenchmen ſhould be glad to common rather with the Engliſhmen for their ranſoms, than the Engliſh to take thought for their deliuerance, promiſing for his owne part, that his dead carcaſſe ſhould rather be a prize to the Frenchmen, than that his liuing bodie ſhould paie anie ranſome. When the meſſenger was come backe to the French hoſt, the men of warre put on their helmets, and cauſed their trumpets to blow to the battell. They thought themſelues ſo ſure of victorie, that diuerſe of the noble men made ſuch haſt towards the battell, that they left manie of their ſeruants and men of warre behind them, and ſome of them would not once ſtaie for their ſtandards: as amongſt other the duke of Brabant, when his ſtandard was not come, cauſed a baner to be taken from a trumpet and faſtened to a ſpeare, the which he commanded to be borne before him in ſteed of his ſtandard.

But when both theſe armies comming within danger either of other, ſet in full order of battell on both ſides, they ſtood ſtill at the firſt, beholding either others demeanor, being not diſtant in ſunder paſt three bow ſhoots. And when they had on both parts thus ſtaied a good while without dooing anie thing, (except that certeine of the French horſemen aduancing forwards, betwixt both the hoſts, were by the Engliſh archers conſtreined to returne backe) aduiſe was taken amongſt the Engliſhmen, what was beſt for them to doo. Therevpon all things conſidered, it was determined, that ſith the Frenchmen would not come forward, the king with his armie imbattelled (as yee haue hard) ſhould march towards them, and ſo leauing their truſſe and baggage in the village where they lodged the night before, onelie with their weapons, armour, and ſtakes prepared for the purpoſe, as yee haue heard.

Theſe made ſomewhat forward, before whome there went an old knight ſir Thomas Erpingham (a man of great experience in the warre) with a warder in his hand; and when he caſt vp his warder, all the armie ſhouted, but that was a ſigne to the archers in the medow, which therwith ſhot wholie altogither at the vauward of the Frenchmen, who when they perceiued the archers in the medow, and ſaw they could not come at them for a ditch that was betwixt them, with all haſt ſet vpon the fore ward of king Henrie, but yer they could ioine, the archers in the forefront, and the archers on that ſide which ſtood in the medow, ſo wounded the footmen, galled the horſſes, and combred the men of armes, that the footmen durſt not go forward, the horſſemen ran togither vpō plumps without order, ſome ouerthrew ſuch as were next them, and the horſſes ouerthrew their maſters, and ſo at the firſt ioining, the Frenchmen were foulie diſcomforted, and the Engliſhmen highlie incouraged.

The Engliſh gaue the onſet.

The two armies ioine battell.

When the French vauward was thus brought to confuſion, the Engliſh archers caſt awaie their bowes, & tooke into their hands, axes, malls, ſwords, bils, and other hand-weapons, and with the ſame ſlue the Frenchmen, vntill they came to the middle ward. Then approched the king, and ſo incouraged his people, that ſhortlie the ſecond battell of the Frenchmen was ouerthrowne, and diſperſed, not without great ſlaughter of men: howbeit, diuerſe were releeued by their varlets, and conueied out of the field. The Engliſhmen were ſo buſied in fighting, and taking of the priſoners at hand, that they followed not in chaſe of their enimies, nor would once breake out of their araie of battell. Yet ſundrie of the Frenchmen ſtronglie withſtood the fierceneſſe of the Engliſh, when they came to handie ſtrokes, ſo that the fight ſometime was doubtfull and perillous. Yet as part of the French horſſemen ſet their courſe to haue entred vpon the kings battell, with the ſtakes ouerthrowne, they were either taken or ſlaine. Thus this battell continued three long houres.

The vauward of the French diſcomfited.

Their battell beaten.

The king that daie ſhewed himſelfe a valiant knight, albeit almoſt felled by the duke of Alanſon; yet with plaine ſtrength he ſlue two of the dukes companie, and felled the duke himſelfe; whome when he would haue yelded, the kings gard (contrarie to his mind) ſlue out of hand. In concluſion, the king minding to make an end of that daies iornie, cauſed his horſſemen to fetch a compaſſe about, and to ioine with him againſt the rereward of the Frenchmen, in the which was the greateſt number of people. When the Frenchmen perceiued his intent, they were ſuddenlie amazed and ran awaie like ſheepe, without order or arraie. Which when the king perceiued, he incouraged his men, and followed ſo quickelie vpon the enimies, that they ran hither and thither, caſting awaie their armour: manie on their knees deſired to haue their liues ſaued.

A valiant king.

The French rereward diſcomfited.

In the meane ſeaſon, while the battell thus continued, and that the Engliſhmen had taken a great number of priſoners, certeine Frenchmen on horſſebacke, whereof were capteins Robinet of Borneuill, Rifflart of Clamas, Iſambert of Agincourt, and other men of armes, to the number of ſix hundred horſſemen, which were the firſt that fled, hearing that the Engliſh tents & pauilions were a good waie diſtant from the armie, without anie ſufficient gard to defend the ſame, either vpon a couetous meaning to gaine by the ſpoile, or vpon a deſire to be reuenged, entred vpon the kings campe, and there ſpoiled the hails, robbed the tents, brake vp cheſts, and caried awaie caſkets, and ſlue ſuch ſeruants as they found to make anie reſiſtance. For which treaſon and haſkardie in thus leauing their campe at the verie point of fight, for winning of ſpoile where none to defend it, verie manie were after committed to priſon, and had loſt their liues, if the Dolphin had longer liued.

The kings campe robbed.

But when the outcrie of the lackies and boies, which ran awaie for feare of the Frenchmen thus ſpoiling the campe, came to the kings eares, he doubting leaſt his enimies ſhould gather togither againe, and begin a new field; and miſtruſting further that the priſoners would be an aid to his enimies, or the verie enimies to their takers in deed if they were ſuffered to liue, contrarie to his accuſtomed gentlenes, commanded by ſound of trumpet, that euerie man (vpon paine of death) ſhould incontinentlie ſlaie his priſoner. When this dolorous decree, and pitifull proclamation was pronounced, pitie it was to ſee how ſome Frenchmen were ſuddenlie ſticked with daggers, ſome were brained with pollaxes, ſome ſlaine with malls, other had their throats cut, and ſome their bellies panched, ſo that in effect, hauing reſpect to the great number, few priſoners were ſaued.

All the priſoners ſlaine.

When this lamentable ſlaughter was ended, the Engliſhmen diſpoſed themſelues in order of battell, readie to abide a new field, and alſo to inuade, and newlie ſet on their enimies, with great force they aſſailed the earles of Marle and Fauconbridge, and the lords of Louraie, and of Thine, with ſix hundred men of armes, who had all that daie kept togither, but now ſlaine and beaten downe out of hand. ¶ Some write, that the king perceiuing his enimies in one part to aſſemble togither, as though they meant to giue a new battell for preſeruation of the priſoners, ſent to them an herald, commanding them either to depart out of his ſight, or elſe to come forward at once, and giue battell: promiſing herewith, that if they did offer to fight againe, not onelie thoſe priſoners which his people alreadie had taken; but alſo ſo manie of them as in this new conflict, which they thus attempted ſhould fall into his hands, ſhould die the death without redemption.

A right wiſe and valiant challenge of the king.

The Frenchmen fearing the ſentence of ſo terrible a decrée, without further delaie parted out of the field. And ſo about foure of the clocke in the after noone; the king when he ſaw no apperance of enimies, cauſed the retreit to be blowen; and gathering his armie togither, gaue thanks to almightie God for ſo happie a victorie, cauſing his prelats and chapleins to ſing this pſalme: In exitu Iſrael de Aegypto, and commanded euerie man to knéele downe on the ground at this verſe: Non nobis Domine, non nobis, ſed nomini tuo da gloriam. Which doone, he cauſed Te Deum, with certeine anthems to be ſoong, giuing laud and praiſe to God, without boaſting of his owne force or anie humane power. That night he and his people tooke reſt, and refreſhed themſelues with ſuch victuals as they found in the French campe, but lodged in the ſame village where he laie the night before.

Thanks giuen to God for the victorie.

A worthie example of a godlie prince.

Titus Liuius.

In the morning, Montioie king at armes and foure other French heralds came to the K. to know the number of priſoners, and to deſire buriall for the dead. Before he made them anſwer (to vnderſtand what they would ſaie) he demanded of them whie they made to him that requeſt, conſidering that he knew not whether the victorie was his or theirs? When Montioie by true and iuſt confeſſion had cléered that doubt to the high praiſe of the king, he deſired of Montioie to vnderſtand the name of the caſtell néere adioining: when they had told him that it was called Agincourt, he ſaid, Then ſhall this conflict be called the battell of Agincourt. He feaſted the French officers of armes that daie, and granted them their requeſt, which buſilie ſought through the field for ſuch as were ſlaine. But the Engliſhmen ſuffered them not to go alone, for they ſearched with them, & found manie hurt, but not in ieopardie of their liues, whom they tooke priſoners, and brought them to their tents. When the king of England had well refreſhed himſelfe, and his ſouldiers, that had taken the ſpoile of ſuch as were ſlaine, he with his priſoners in good order returned to his towne of Calis.

The battell of Agincourt.

When tidings of this great victorie, was blowne into England, ſolemne proceſſions and other praiſings to almightie God with boune-fires and ioifull triumphes, were ordeined in euerie towne, citie, and burrow, and the maior & citizens of London went the morow after the daie of ſaint Simon and Iude from the church of ſaint Paule to the church of ſaint Peter at Weſtminſter in deuout maner, rendring to God hartie thanks for ſuch fortunate lucke ſent to the king and his armie. The ſame ſundaie that the king remooued from the campe at Agincourt towards Calis, diuerſe Frenchmen came to the field to view againe the dead bodies; and the pezants of the countrie ſpoiled the carcaſſes of all ſuch apparell and other things as the Engliſhmen had left: who tooke nothing but gold and ſiluer, iewels, rich apparell and coſtlie armour. But the plowmen and pezants left nothing behind, neither ſhirt nor clout: ſo that the bodies laie ſtarke naked vntill wedneſdaie. On the which daie diuerſe of the noble men were conueied into their countries, and the remnant were by Philip earle Charolois (ſore lamenting the chance, and mooued with pitie) at his coſts & charges buried in a ſquare plot of ground of fiftéene hundred yards; in the which he cauſed to be made thrée pits, wherein were buried by account fiue thouſand and eight hundred perſons, beſide them that were caried awaie by their fréends and ſeruants, and others, which being wounded died in hoſpitals and other places.

The ſame day that the new maior went to weſtminſter to receiue his oth, the aduertiſement of this noble victorie came to the citie in the morning betimes yer men were vp from their beds.
Regiſter of maiors.

Thrée graues that held fiue thouſand and eight hundred corpſes.

After this their dolorous iournie & pitifull ſlaughter, diuerſe clearks of Paris made manie a lamentable verſe, complaining that the king reigned by will, and that councellors were parciall, affirming that the noble men fled againſt nature, and that the commons were deſtroied by their prodigalitie, declaring alſo that the cleargie were dumbe, and durſt not ſaie the truth, and that the humble commons dulie obeied, & yet euer ſuffered puniſhment, for which cauſe by diuine perſecution the leſſe number vanquiſhed the greater: wherefore they concluded, that all things went out of order, and yet was there no man that ſtudied to bring the vnrulie to frame. It was no maruell though this battell was lamentable to the French nation, for in it were taken and ſlaine the flower of all the nobilitie of France.

There were taken priſoners, Charles duke of Orleance nephue to the French king, Iohn duke of Burbon, the lord Bouciqualt one of the marſhals of France (he after died in England) with a number of other lords, knights, and eſquiers, at the leaſt fiftéene hundred, beſides the common people. There were ſlaine in all of the French part to the number of ten thouſand men, whereof were princes and noble men bearing baners one hundred twentie and ſix; to theſe, of knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen, ſo manie as made vp the number of eight thouſand and foure hundred (of the which fiue hundred were dubbed knights the night before the battell) ſo as of the meaner ſort, not paſt ſixtéene hundred. Amongſt thoſe of the nobilitie that were ſlaine, theſe were the chéefeſt, Charles lord de la Breth high conſtable of France, Iaques of Chatilon lord of Dampier admerall of France, the lord Rambures maſter of the croſſebowes, ſir Guiſchard Dolphin great maſter of France, Iohn duke of Alanſon, Anthonie duke of Brabant brother to the duke of Burgognie, Edward duke of Bar, the earle of Neuers an other brother to the duke of Burgognie, with the erles of Marle, Vaudemont, Beaumont, Grandprée, Rouſſie, Fauconberge, Fois and Leſtrake, beſide a great number of lords and barons of name.

Noble men priſoners.

Of Engliſhmen, there died at this battell, Edward duke Yorke, the earle of Suffolke, ſir Richard Kikelie, and Dauie Gamme eſquier, and of all other not aboue fiue and twentie perſons, as ſome doo report; but other writers of greater credit affirme, that there were ſlaine aboue fiue or ſix hundred perſons. Titus Liuius ſaith, that there were ſlaine of Engliſhmen, beſide the duke of Yorke, and the earle of Suffolke, an hundred perſons at the firſt incounter. The duke of Glocester the kings brother was ſore wounded about the hips, and borne downe to the ground, ſo that he fell backwards, with his féet towards his enimies, whom the king beſtrid, and like a brother valiantlie reſcued from his enimies, & ſo ſauing his life, cauſed him to be conueied out of the fight, into a place of more ſafetie. ¶ The whole order of this conflict which coſt manie a mans life, and procured great bloudſhed before it was ended, is liuelie deſcribed in Anglorum prælijs; where alſo, beſides the manner of di-

After that the king of England had refreſhed himſelfe, and his people at Calis, and that ſuch priſoners as he had left at Harflue (as ye haue heard) were come to Calis vnto him, the ſixt daie of Nouember, he with all his priſoners tooke ſhipping, and the ſame daie landed at Douer, hauing with him the dead bodies of the duke of Yorke, and the earle of Suffolke, and cauſed the duke to be buried at his colledge of Fodringhey, and the earle at new Elme. In this paſſage, the ſeas were ſo rough and troublous, that two ſhips belonging to ſir John. Cornewall, lord Fanhope, were driuen into Zeland; howbeit, nothing was loſt, nor any perſon periſht. ¶The maior of London, and the aldermen, apparelled in orient grained ſcarlet, and foure hundred commoners clad in beautifull murrie, well mounted, and trimlie horſſed, with rich collars, & great chaines, met the king on Blackheath, reioiſing at his returne: and the clergie of London, with rich croſſes, ſumptuous copes, and maſſie cenſers, receiued him at ſaint Thomas of Waterings with ſolemne proceſſion.

Titus Liuius.

The great modeſtie of the king.

The king like a graue and ſober perſonage, and as one remembring from whom all victories are ſent, ſeemed little to regard ſuch vaine pompe and ſhewes as were in triumphant ſort deuiſed for his welcomming home from ſo proſperous a iournie, in ſo much that he would not ſuffer his helmet to be caried with him, whereby might haue appeared to the people the blowes and dints that were to be ſeene in the ſame; neither would he ſuffer any ditties to be made and ſong by minſtrels of his glorious victorie, for that he would wholie haue the praiſe and thanks altogither giuen to God. The news of this bloudie battell being reported to the French king as then ſoiourning at Rone, filled the court full of ſorrow. But to remedie ſuch danger as was like to inſue, it was decreed by councell, to ordeine new officers in places of them that were ſlaine: and firſt, he elected his chiefe officer for the wars, called the conſtable, the earle of Arminacke, a wiſe and politike capteine, and an ancient enimie to the Engliſhmen, Sir John de Corſie was made maiſter of the croſſebowes. Shortlie after, either for melancholie that he had for the loſſe at Agincourt, or by ſome ſudden diſeaſe Lewes Dolphin of Viennois, heire apparant to the French king, departed this life without iſſue, which happened well for Robinet of Bourneuill, and his fellowes, as ye haue heard before, for his death was their life, & his life would haue béene their death.

The death of the Dolphin of France.
Part of thoſe that ſpoiled the Engliſh campe.

After the French king had created new officers, in hope to relieue the ſtate of his realme and countrie, ſore ſhaken by the late great ouerthrow, it chanced, that Thomas duke of Exceſter capteine of Harflue, accompanied with thrée thouſand Engliſhmen, made a great rode into Normandie, almoſt to the citie of Rone, in which iournie he got great abundance both of riches and priſoners: but in his returne, the earle of Arminacke newlie made conſtable of France, intending in his firſt enterpriſe to win the ſpurs, hauing with him aboue fiue thouſand horſſemen, incountred with the duke. The fight was handled on both parts verie hotlie, but bicauſe the Engliſhmen were not able to reſiſt the force of the Frenchmen, the duke was conſtreined to retire with loſſe at the leaſt of thrée hundred of his footmen.

A ſore conflict.

Howbeit being withdrawen into an orchard, which was ſtronglie fenſed and hedged about with thornes, the Frenchmen were not able to enter vpon the Engliſhmen; but yet they tooke from them all their horſſes and ſpoile, & aſſaulted them till it was night, and then retired backe to the towne, not far diſtant from the place where they fought, called Vallemont: this was vpon the 14 day of March. In the morning vpon the breake of the daie, the Engliſhmen iſſued foorth of the orchard, where they had kept themſelues all the night, & drew towards Harflue, whereof the Frenchmen being aduertiſed, followed them, & ouertooke them vpon the ſands néere to Chiefe de Caux, & there ſet on them: but in the end, the Frenchmen were diſcomfited, and a great number of them ſlaine by the Engliſhmen, which afterwards returned without more adoo vnto Harflue. The French writers blame the conſtable for this loſſe, bicauſe he kept on the high ground with a number of men of war, and would not come downe to aid his fellowes.

Anno Reg. 4.
The emperour Sigiſmund commeth into England.

In this fourth yeare of king Henries reigne, the emperour Sigiſmund, cooſine germane to king Henrie, came into England, to the intent that he might make an attonement betweene king Henrie and the French king: with whom he had béene before, bringing with him the archbiſhop of Remes, as ambaſſadour for the French king. At Calis he was honorablie receiued by the earle of Warwike lord deputie there, and diuerſe other lords ſent thither of purpoſe to attend him. Moreouer, the king ſent thither thirtie great ſhips to bring him and his traine ouer. At Douer the duke of Gloceſter, and diuerſe other lords were readie to receiue him, who at his approching to land, entered the water with their ſwords in their hands drawen; and by the mouth of the ſaid duke declared to him, that if he intended to enter the land as the kings freend, and as a mediator to intreat for peace, he ſhould be ſuffered to arriue: but if he would enter as an emperour into a land claimed to be vnder his empire, then were they readie to reſiſt him. This was thought neceſſarie to be doone for ſauing of the kings prerogatiue, who hath full preheminence within his owne realme, as an abſolute emperour.

Titus Liuius.

The ſtrange manner of receiuing the emperour at Douer.

When the emperour herevpon anſwered that he was come as the kings freend, and as a mediator for peace, and not with any imperiall authoritie, he was of the duke and other his aſſociats receiued with all ſuch honor as might be deuiſed. The king with all his nobilitie receiued him on Blackheath, the ſeuenth day of Maie, and brought him through London to Weſtminſter with great triumph. Shortlie after there came alſo into England Albert duke of Holland, who was likewiſe freendlie interteined. Both theſe princes, the emperour and the duke of Holland were conueied to Windſore to ſaint Georges feaſt, and elected companions of the noble order of the garter, and had the collar and habit of the ſame to them deliuered, and ſat in their ſtals all the ſolemnitie of the feaſt. Shortlie after that the feaſt was finiſhed, the duke of Holland returned into his countrie; but the emperour tarried ſtill, and aſſaied all maner of meanes to perſuade the king to a peace with the Frenchmen.

Albert duke of Holland cõmeth into England.

But their euill hap, as they that were appointed by Gods prouidence to ſuffer more damage at the Engliſhmens hands, would not permit his perſuaſions to take place: for whereas peace was euen almoſt entring in at the gates, the king was ſuddenlie ſtirred to diſpleaſure vpon a new occaſion, for he being aduertiſed of the loſſe of his men at the late conflict in the territorie of Rone (as ye haue heard) refuſed to heare this word peace once named. The emperour like a wiſe prince paſſed ouer that time till another ſeaſon, that ſome fauourable aſpect of the planets ſhould ſéeme to further his purpoſe. And when he thought the ſame was come, he broched againe the veſſell of concord and amitie, which he put in ſo faire a cup, and preſented it with ſuch effectuous words, that ſuerlie the king had taſted it, if word had not béen brought about the ſame time, that Harflue was beſieged of the French both by water and land, as it was in déed: for the conſtable of France incouraged by his laſt conflict (though the ſame was not much to his praiſe) aſſembled an armie, and vpon a ſudden laid ſiege to the towne. At the ſame inſtant John vicount of Narbon the vice-admerall of France, brought the whole nauie to the riuage and ſhore adioining to the towne, in purpoſe to haue entered by the waterſide; but the duke of Excester defeated his intent, and defended the towne verie manfullie.

The emperor an earneſt mediator for peace.

Harflue beſieged by the French.

King Henrie aduertiſed hereof, meant at the firſt to haue gone with his nauie in perſon to the ſuccors of his men; but the emperor diſſuaded him from that purpoſe, aduiſing him rather to ſend ſome one of his capteins. The king following his louing and reaſonable aduertiſement, appointed his brother the duke of Bedford accompanied with the earles of March, Marſhall, Oxford, Huntington, Warwike, Arundell, Saliſburie, Deuonſhire, and diuerſe barons, with two hundred ſaile to paſſe into Normandie, for reſcue of the towne of Harflue; which vſing great diligence ſhipped at Rie, and after ſome hinderance by contrarie winds, at length came to the mouth of the riuer of Seine on the daie of the Aſſumption of our ladie. When the vicount of Narbon perceiued the Engliſh nauie to approch, he couragiouſlie ſet forward, and gat the poſſeſſion of the mouth of the hauen. The duke of Bedford ſéeing his enimies thus fiercelie to come forward, ſet before certeine ſtrong ſhips, which at the firſt incounter vanquiſhed and tooke two French ſhips, the capteins whereof were too raſh and forward.

Titus Liuius.

A great ouerthrow by ſea giuen to the French by the duke of Bedford.

The duke followed with all his puiſſance, and ſet on his enimies. The fight was long, but not ſo long as perillous, nor ſo perillous as terrible (for battels on the ſea are deſperate) till at length the victorie fell to the Engliſhmen, ſo that almoſt all the whole nauie of France, in the which were manie ſhips, hulkes, carikes, and other ſmall veſſels, to the number of fiue was ſunke & taken. Amongſt other veſſels that were taken thrée great carikes of Genoa, a citie in Italie, were ſent into England. In the ſame conflict were ſlaine of the Frenchmen no ſmall number, as appeared by the dead bodies, which were ſéene euerie daie ſwimming about the Engliſh ſhips. After this, the duke of Bedford ſailed vp to Harflue, & refreſhed the towne both with vittels and monie; notwithſtanding certeine other French gallies did what they could to haue letted that enterpriſe. When the erle of Armignacke heard that the puiſſant name of France was vanquiſhed, he raiſed his ſiege & returned to Paris.

The French nauie of fiue hundred veſſels vanquiſhed.

Titus Liuius.

Harflue reſcued by the Engliſhmen.

After this diſcomfiture and loſſe, the puiſſance of the Frenchmen began to decaie, for now the princes and nobles of the realme fell into diuiſion and diſcord among themſelues, ſtudieng how to reuenge their old priuat iniuries, & refuſed to take paine for ſuccour of the publike weale and ſafegard of their countrie: wherevpon their power began to wax ſlender, their ſtate brought into imminent danger of perpetuall bondage; which thing no doubt had fallen vpon them if king Henrie had longer liued. For as vpon one inconuenience ſuffered, manie do follow, ſo was it in France at that time: for the king was not of ſound memorie, the warre that was toward both doubtfull and perillous: the princes vntruſtie and at diſcord: with a hundred things more (which might bring a realme to ruine) out of frame and order in France in thoſe daies. After that the duke of Bedford was returned backe againe into England with great triumph and glorie, he was not ſo much thanked of the king his brother, as praiſed of the emperour Sigiſmund, being to him a ſtranger, which ſaid openlie, that happie are thoſe ſubiects which haue ſuch a king, but more happie is the king that hath ſuch ſubiects.

Ciuill diſcord amongſt the nobles of France.

Charles the French king not of ſound memorie.

When the emperor perceiued that it was in vaine to mooue further for peace, he left off that treatie, and entered himſelfe into a league with king Henrie, the contents of which league conſiſted chéefie in theſe articles, that both the ſaid emperour and king, their heires, and ſucceſſors, ſhould be fréends ech to other, as alies and confederats againſt all manner of perſons, of what eſtate or degrée ſo euer they were (the church of Rome, and the pope for that time being onlie excepted) and that neither they, nor their heires, nor ſucceſſors ſhould be preſent in councell or other place, where either of them, or his heires or ſucceſſors might ſuſteine damage, in lands, goods, honors, ſtates, or perſons: and that if anie of them ſhould vnderſtand of loſſe or hinderance to be like to fall or happen to the others, they ſhould impeach the ſame, or if that laie not in their powers, they ſhould aduertiſe the others thereof with all conuenient ſpéed: and that either of them, and their heires and ſucceſſors ſhould aduance the others honor and commoditie without fraud or deceipt. Moreouer, that neither of them, nor their heires and ſucceſſors ſhould permit their ſubiects to leauie warres againſt the others; and that it ſhould be lawfull and frée for ech of their ſubiects, to paſſe into the others countrie, and there to remaine and make merchandize, either by ſea or land, paieng the cuſtomes, gabels, and duties due and accuſtomed, according to the lawes and ordinances of the places and countries where they chanced to traffike.

Titus Liuius.

The emperor entereth into league with king Henrie.

The cōtents of the league.

Furthermore, that neither of the ſaid princes, nor their heires nor ſucceſſors ſhould receiue any rebell, baniſhed man, or traitor of the others wittinglie; but ſhould cauſe euerie ſuch perſon to auoid out of their countries, realmes, dominions, and iuriſdictions. Againe, that neither of the ſaid princes, their heires, nor ſucceſſors ſhould begin any wars againſt any other perſon, other than ſuch as they had warres with at that preſent, without conſent of the other his confederate, except in defenſe of themſelues, their countries and ſubiects, in caſe of inuaſion made vpon them. Alſo, that it ſhould be lawfull for the king of England, to proſecute his warres againſt the Frenchmen for recouerie of his right, as ſhould ſéeme to him expedient; and likewiſe to the emperor, for recouerie of any part of his right in Fance, ſo that neither of them did preiudice the others right in that behalfe. Laſtlie, that either of them ſhould aſſiſt other, in recouerie & conqueſt of their rights, lands, and dominions, occupied, with-holden, and kept from them, by him that called himſelfe king of France, and other the princes and barons of France. This aliance, with other conditions, agréements, and articles, was concluded & eſtabliſhed on the ninetéenth daie of October, in the yeare of our Lord 2416. This doone, the emperor returned homewards, to paſſe into Germanie; and the king partlie to ſhew him honor, and partlie bicauſe of his owne affaires, aſſociated him to his towne of Calis.

Titus Liuius.

During the time of their abode there, the duke of Burgognie offered to come to Calis, to ſpeake with the emperor and the king, bicauſe he had knowledge of the league that was concluded betwixt them: the king ſent his brother the duke of Gloceſter, and the earle of March to the water of Graueling, to be hoſtages for the duke of Burgognie: and alſo the earle of Warwike, with a noble companie to conduct him to his preſence. At Graueling foord the dukes met, and after ſalutations doone, the duke of Burgognie was conueied to Calis, where of the emperor and the king he was highlie welcomed and feaſted. Here is to be noted, that in Iune laſt, the king of England had ſent the earle of Warwike, and other, vnto the duke of Burgognie, as then remaining at Liſle, where by the diligent trauell of thoſe Engliſh ambaſſadors, a truce was concluded betwixt the king of England and the duke of Burgognie, touching onlie the counties of Flanders and Arthois, to indure from the feaſt of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt in that preſent yeare 1416, vnto the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, in the yeare next inſuing. Which truce at the dukes being now at Calis (when no further agreement could be concluded) was prolonged vnto the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, that ſhould be in the yeare 1419. The duke of Gloceſter was receiued at Graueling, by the earle Charolois, and by him honorablie conueied to ſaint Omers, and there lodged that night.

A truce betweene the K. and the duke of Burgognie.

The next day, the earle Charolois came with diuerſe noble men, to viſit the duke of Gloceſter in his lodging, and when he entered into the chamber, the dukes backe was towards him, talking with ſome one of his ſeruants, and did not ſee nor welcome the earle at his firſt entrie; but after he ſaid to him ſhortlie without any great reuerence, or comming towards him; You be welcome faire couſine, and ſo paſſed forth his tale with his ſeruants. The earle Charolois for all his youth, was not well content therewith, but yet ſuffered for that time. When the duke of Burgognie had doone all his buſineſſe at Calis, after the ninth daie he returned to Graueling, where the duke of Gloceſter and he met againe, and louinglie departed, the one to Calis, and the other to ſaint Omers; for the which voiage the duke of Burgognie was ſuſpected to be enimie to the crowne of France. After the dukes departing from Calis, the emperor was highlie feaſted and rewarded, and at his pleaſure ſailed into Holland, & ſo rode towards Beame. The king likewiſe tooke ſhip, and returned into England on ſaint Lukes euen.

Titus Liuius. W.P.

About the ſame time, the king ſent new ambaſſadors vnto the generall councell, which ſtill continued at Conſtance, whither the emperour Sigiſmund alſo returned, cheefelie for chaſing awaie of that peſtilent ſmoke of ſchiſme then blaſted vp betweene Iohn the three and twentith, Gregorie the twelfth, and Benet the thirteenth (as they intituled themſelues) the three peruerſe prelats, that all at once with ſuch eager malice ſtroue togither for the ſacred ſee of papaſie Gods vicarage (that was) who to be higheſt here in earth. The infectious ſmother of this venemous vapor by the ſpirit of theſe holie men thus raiſed vp thorough faction and parts taking, had beene readie to choke all chriſtendome, had not by the wiſedome and authoritie of the princes there, the ſame the ſooner beene vented awaie. Here by the conſent alſo of all nations it was ordeined in this councell, that this realme ſhould haue the name of the Engliſh nation, and be called and reputed for one of the fiue principall nations of the councell, which to grant before that time, through enuie, other nations had vtterlie refuſed.

The kings oration.

The nineteenth of October, the parlement that had beene broken vp, by reaſon of the emperours comming, began againe at Weſtminſter, and there the king made to them a ſhort and pithie oration, declaring the iniuries latelie doone and committed by the French nation, ſhewing alſo the iuſt and lawfull occaſion of his warres: ſignifieng furthermore the great diſcord and ciuill diſſention which reigned amongſt the nobilitie of France, rehearſing manie things, for the which it were neceſſarie to follow the warres now in hand againſt them, and that without delaie. He therefore deſired them to prouide for monie and treaſure, that nothing ſhould be wanting when need required: his requeſt heerein was granted, for euerie man was willing and glad to further that voiage, ſo that the cleargie granted two diſmes, and the laitie a whole fifteenth. In this parlement alſo Iohn duke of Bedford was made gouernour or regent of the realme, to hold and enioie the office ſo long as the king was occupied in the French wars. Moreouer, in this parlement, the king gaue to the duke of Exceſter a thouſand pounds by yeare, to be paid out of his owne cofers; beſides fortie pounds yearelie, which he was to receiue of the towne of Exceſter, of the kings reuenues there, and had the ſame grant confirmed by authoritie of the parlement, inſomuch that ſome write, that in this parlement he was made duke of Exceſter, and not before.

The king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Killingworth, and the morrow after Chriſtmaſſe daie were certeine writings caſt abroad, in great mens houſes, and almoſt in euerie inne within the townes of S. Albons, Northampton, and Reading, conteining ſharpe reproofes againſt all eſtates of the church, and it could not be knowne from whence thoſe writings came, nor who was the author of them. The king verie earneſtlie procured all things to be made readie for the warre, meaning to paſſe the next ſummer ouer into France, to recouer his right by force, which by no other meane he ſaw how to obteine. ¶ In this meane while had the Frenchmen hired a great number of Genowaies and Italians, with certeine carickes and gallies well appointed, the which being ioined with the French fleet, laie at the mouth of the riuer of Seine, and vp within the ſame riuer, both to ſtop all ſuccour by ſea that ſhould come to them within Harflue, and alſo to waſt abroad, and doo what damage they could vnto the Engliſh, as occaſion ſerued.

The king therefore yer he paſſed ouer himſelfe, ſent the erle of Huntington to ſearch and ſcowre the ſeas. This luſtie earle, called Iohn Holland (ſonne to the earle of Huntington, otherwiſe called duke of Exceſter, beheaded at Circeſter, in the time of king Henrie the fourth, and couſine to the king) with a great nauie of ſhips ſearched the ſea, from the one coaſt to the other, and in concluſion incountred with nine of thoſe great carickes of Genes (the which the lord Iaques the baſtard of Burbon had reteined to ſerue the French king) and ſet on them ſharplie. The conflict was great, and the fight long (continuing the more part of a ſummers daie) but in concluſion, the Frenchmen and Italians were ouercome and fled. Three of the greateſt caricks with their patrons, and monſieur Iaques de Burbon their admerall were taken, with as much monie as ſhould haue paid the ſoldiers of the whole fleet for halfe a yeare, and three other caricks were bowged.

A great exploit by ſea doone by the earle of Huntington.

Tit. Liuius.

The earle returning backe with this good lucke, found the king at Hampton, who receiued him with thankes, as he had well deſerued. Shortlie after, vpon the three and twentith of Iulie, the king tooke his ſhip at Porteſmouth, accompanied with the dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter; the earls of Huntington, Marſhall, Warwike, Deuonſhire, Saliſburie, Suffolke, and Summerſet; the lords Roſſe, Willoughbie, Fitz Hugh, Clinton, Scroope, Matreuers, Burchier, Ferreis of Grobie, and Ferreis of Chartleie, Fanhope, Graie of Codnore, ſir Gilbert Vmfreuile, ſir Gilbert Talbot, and diuerſe other; and ſo hauing wind and weather to his deſire, the firſt daie of Auguſt he landed in Normandie, néere to a caſtell called Touque, where he conſulted with his capteins, what waie was beſt for him to take concerning his high enterpriſe.

The number of the armie 16400. of his owne puruciance.

Tit.Liuius.

His armie conteined the number of ſixtéene thouſand and foure hundred ſoldiers and men of warre of his owne puruciance, beſide others. The duke of Clarence had in his retinue a hundred lances, and thrée hundred archers: and beſide him, there were thrée earles, which had two hundred and fortie lances, and ſeauentéene hundred and twentie archers. The duke of Gloceſter foure hundred and ſeauentie lances, and fouretéene hundred and ten archers. The earles of March, Marſhall, Warwike, and Saliſburie, each of them one hundred lances, and thrée hundred archers a péece. The earle of Huntington fortie lances, and ſix ſcore archers. The earle of Suffolke thirtie lances, and foureſcore and ten archers. Beſide theſe, there were thirtéene lords, as Aburgauennie, Matreuers, Fitz Hugh, Clifford, Graie, Willoughbie, Talbot, Courtnie, Burchier, Roos, Louell, Ferrers of Chartleie, and Harington, the which had in their retinue the number of fiue hundred and ſix lances, and fiftéene hundred and foureſcore archers. Alſo, there were in this armie thréeſcore and ſeauentéene knights, which had vnder them nine hundred and fortie fiue lances, and two thouſand eight hundred and fiftie two archers; ſo that in all, there were fiue and twentie thouſand, fiue hundred, and eight and twentie fighting men: of which number euerie fourth man was a lance. Beſide the ſoldiers and men of warre, there were a thouſand maſons, carpenters, and other labourers.

The Normans flee to the walled townes.

The Normans hearing of the kings arriuall, were ſuddenlie ſtriken with ſuch feare, that they fled out of their houſes, leauing the townes and villages, and with their wiues and children, bag and baggage, got them into the walled townes, preparing there to defend themſelues, & with all ſpéed ſent to the French king, requiring him to prouide for the defenſe and preſeruation of his louing ſubiects. Héere vpon, the men of war were appointed to reſort into the ſtrong townes, to lie within the ſame in garriſons, to reſiſt the power of the Engliſhmen, ſo that all the walled townes and caſtels in Normandie were furniſhed with men, munition, and vittels. The king of England, when he had reſolued with his counſell for his procéeding in his enterpriſes, laid ſiege vnto the caſtell of Touque. The duke of Gloceſter that led the foreward, had the charge of that ſiege, the which by force of aſſaults, and other warlike meanes, brought to that point, that they within yéelded the place into his hands, the ninth daie of Auguſt. The earle of Saliſburie, who led the battell, tooke the caſtell of Ambervilliers, the which was giuen to him by the king, and ſo this earle was the firſt that had anie territorie giuen him of the king in this new conqueſt. The king made at the winning of Touque eight and twentie knights, and left ſir Robert Kirkelie capteine there.

Touque caſtell beſieged by yͤ Engliſhman & taken.

Amberuilliers caſtell taken.

After this, on deliberate aduiſe taken how to procéed; the K. ſet forward toward the towne of Caen in moſt warlike order, waſting the countrie on euerie ſide as he paſſed. Which towne ſtandeth in a plaine fertile countrie, no ſtronger walled, than déepe ditched, and as then well vittelled and repleniſhed with people: for the citizens fearing the kings comming, had there prouided all things neceſſarie and defenſible. But his maieſtie doubting leaſt the Frenchmen, vpon their vnderſtanding of his approch to the towne, would haue burned the ſuburbs and buildings without the walles, ſent the duke of Clarence with a thouſand men before him, to preuent that miſchéefe. The duke comming thither, found the ſuburbs alreadie ſet on fire, but vſed ſuch diligence to quench the ſame, that the moſt part was ſaued. He alſo wan the abbeie church of ſaint Stephan, which the Frenchmen were in hand to haue ouerthrowne, by vndermining the pillers; but the duke obteining the place, filled vp the mines, and ſo preſerued the church. He alſo wan a cell of nunnes, verie ſtronglie fenſed, after the manner of warre.

Caen beſieged

Then came the king before the towne, who cauſed forthwith to be caſt a déepe trench, with an high mount, to kéepe them within from iſſuing forth, and that doone, began fiercelie to aſſault the towne: but they within ſtood manfullie to their defenſe, ſo that there was ſore and cruell fight betwixt them, and their enimies. But when king Henrie perceiued that he loſt more than he wan by his dailie aſſaults, he left off anie more to aſſault it, and determined to ouerthrow the wals, with vndermining. Wherefore with all diligence, the pioners caſt trenches, made mines, & brought timber; ſo that within a few daies, the wals ſtood onelie vpon poſts, readie to fall, when fire ſhould be put to them. The king meaning now to giue a generall aſſault, cauſed all the capteins to aſſemble before him in councell, vnto whome he declared his purpoſe, commanding them not before the next daie to vtter it; till by ſound of trumpet they ſhould haue warning to ſet forward towards the wals, leaſt his determination being diſcloſed to the enimies, might cauſe them to prouide the better for their owne defenſe. He alſo preſcribed vnto them, what order he would haue them to kéepe, in giuing the aſſault, and that was this; that euerie capteine deuiding his band into thrée ſeuerall portions, they might be readie one to ſuccéed in an others place, as thoſe which fought ſhould happilie be driuen backe and repelled.

Tit.Liuius.

The order of the aſſault.

In the morning next following, being the fourth of September, ſomewhat before the breake of the daie, he cauſed his people to approch the wals, and to ſhew countenance, as though they would giue a generall aſſault; and whileſt they were buſied in aſſailing and defending on both ſides, the Engliſhmen pearſed and brake thorough the wals by diuerſe holes and ouertures made by the pioners, vnder the foundation: yet the king vpon diuerſe reſpects, offered them within pardon of life, if they would yéeld themſelues and the towne to his mercie; but they refuſing that to doo, the aſſault was newlie begun, and after ſore fight continued for the ſpace of an houre, the Engliſhmen preuailed, and ſlue ſo manie as they found with weapon in hand, readie to reſiſt them.

Titus Liuius.

The duke of Clarence was the firſt that entred with his people, and hauing got the one part of the towne, aſſailed them that kept the bridge, & by force beating them backe, paſſed the ſame, and ſo came to the wals on the other ſide of the towne, where the fight was ſharpe and fierce betwixt the aſſailants and defendants; but the duke with his people ſetting on the Frenchmen behind, as they ſtood at defenſe on the wals, eaſilie vanquiſhed them, ſo that the Engliſhmen entred at their pleaſure. Thus when the king was poſſeſſed of the towne, he incontinentlie commanded all armours & weapons of the vanquiſhed, to be brought into one place, which was immediatlie doone.

Caen taken by the Engliſhmen.

Then the miſerable people came before the kings preſence, and knéeling on their knées, held vp their hands, and cried; Mercie, mercie: to whome the king gaue certeine comfortable words, & bad them ſtand vp. All the night following, he cauſed his armie to kéepe themſelues in order of battell within the towne, and on the next morning called all the magiſtrats & gouernors of the towne to the ſenat houſe, Diuiſion of ſpoile.

where ſome for their wilfull ſtubborneſſe were adiudged to die, other were ſore fined and ranſomed. Then he calling togither his ſouldiers and men of warre, not onelie gaue them great praiſes and high commendations for their manlie doings, but alſo diſtributed to euerie man, according to his deſert, the ſpoile and gaine gotten in the towne, cheeflie bicauſe at the aſſault they had ſhewed good proofe of their manhood and valiant courages.

The capteine of the caſtell held out.

After that the towne was thus woone, the lord Montainie, capteine of the caſtell, would not yeeld, but made ſemblance, as though he meant to defend the place, to the vtterance: but after that he was ſharplie called vpon by king Henrie, either to yeeld it, or elſe that he ſhould be aſſured to haue all mercie and fauour ſequeſtred from him, he tooke better aduiſe, and therevpon being in deſpaire of releefe, made this compoſition, that if he were not reſcued of the French power by a certeine daie, he ſhould render the fortreſſe into the kings hands, with condition, that he and his ſouldiers ſhould be ſuffered to depart with all their goods, the habiliments of warre onelie excepted. Herevpon twelue hoſtages were deliuered to the king, and when the daie came, being the twentith of September, they within rendred the caſtell into the kings hands; and thus, both the towne and caſtell of Caen became Engliſh.

Whileſt the king was thus occupied about his warres in Normandie, the Scots in great number, entring England, waſted the countrie with fire and ſword whereſoeuer they came. The Engliſh lords that were left in truſt with the keeping of thoſe parties of the realme, raiſed the whole power of the countries, ſo that there came togither the number of an hundred thouſand men vpon Baw moore, where the generall aſſemblie was made, and as it chanced, the duke of Exceſter, vncle to the king, who had latelie before muſtered a certeine number of men to conueie them ouer to the king as a new ſupplie to his armie there, was the ſame time in the north parts on pilgrimage at Bridlington; and hearing of this inuaſion made by the Scots, tooke vpon him to be generall of the armie prepared againſt them, and to giue them battell. Alſo, the archbiſhop of Yorke, although he was not able to ſit on horſebacke by reaſon of his great age, cauſed himſelfe to be caried foorth in a charet in that iournie, the better to incourage other. But the Scots hearing that the Engliſhmen approched toward them with ſuch a puiſſance, withdrew backe into their countrie, and durſt not abide the bickering; either becauſe they miſtruſted an infortunat euent on their ſide, by reaſon of the Engliſh proweſſe; or elſe for that they had learned by others ouerthrowes to auoid the like, wherein ſtandeth a profitable point of wiſedome, as the poet verie ſententiouſlie ſaith,

Sir John Oldcaſtell.
The ſeruants of the abbat of S. Albons go about to catch the lord Cobham.

The ſame time, the lord Cobham, ſir John Oldcaſtell, whileſt he ſhifted from place to place to eſcape the hands of them, who he knew would be glad to laie hold on him, had conueied himſelfe in ſecret wiſe into an huſbandmans houſe, not farre from S. Albons, within the precinct of a lordſhip belonging to the abbat of that towne. The abbats ſeruants getting knowledge hereof, came thither by night, but they miſſed their purpoſe, for he was gone; but they caught diuerſe of his men, whome they caried ſtreict to priſon. The lord Cobham herewith was ſore diſmaied, for that ſome of them that were taken were ſuch as he truſted moſt, being of counſell in all his deuiſes. In the ſame place, were found books written in Engliſh, and ſome of thoſe books in times paſt had beene trimlie gilt, limned, and beautified with images, the heads whereof had beene ſcraped off, and in the Letanie they had blotted foorth the name of our ladie, and of other ſaints, till they came to the verſe Parce nobis Domine. Diuerſe writings were found there alſo, in derogation of ſuch honour as then was thought due to our ladie. The abbat of ſaint Albons ſent the booke ſo diſigured with ſcrapings & blottings out, with other ſuch writings as there were found, vnto the king; who ſent the booke againe to the archbiſhop, to ſhew the ſame in his ſermons at Paules croſſe in London, to the end that the citizens and other people of the realme might vnderſtand the purpoſes of thoſe that then were called Lollards, to bring them further in diſcredit with the people.

In this meane time that the king of England was occupied about Caen, the Frenchmen had neither anie ſufficient power to reſiſt him, nor were able to aſſemble an hoſt togither in their neceſſitie, by reaſon of the diſſention among themſelues: for their king was ſo ſimple, that he was ſpoiled both of treaſure and kingdome, ſo that euerie man ſpent and waſted he cared not what. Charles the Dolphin being of the age of ſixteene or ſeauenteene yeares, bewailed the ruine and decaie of his countrie, he onlie ſtudied the releefe of the common-wealth, and deuiſed how to reſiſt his enimies; but hauing neither men nor monie, was greatlie troubled and diſquieted in mind. In concluſion, by the aduiſe and counſell of the earle of Arminacke the conſtable of France, he found a meane to get all the treaſure & riches which his mother queene Iſabell had gotten and hoorded in diuerſe ſecret places: and for the common defenſe and profit of his countrie he wiſelie beſtowed it in waging ſouldiers, and preparing of things neceſſarie for the warre.

Commendation of the Dolphin of France.

The queene forgetting the great perill that the realme then ſtood in, remembring onelie the diſpleaſure to hir by this act doone, vpon a womaniſh malice, ſet hir huſband John duke of Burgognie in the higheſt authoritie about the king, giuing him the regiment and direction of the king and his realme, with all preheminence & ſoueraigntie. The duke of Burgognie hauing the ſword in his hand, in reuenge of old iniuries, began to make warre on the Dolphin, determining, that when he had tamed this yong vnbrideled gentleman, then would he go about to withſtand, and beat backe the common enimies of the realme. The like reaſon moued the Dolphin, for he minded firſt to repreſſe the authours of ciuill diſcord, before he would ſet vpon forreine enimies, and therefore prepared to ſubdue and deſtroie the duke of Burgognie, as the cheefe head of that miſcheefe, whereby the realme was vnquieted, decaied, and in manner brought to vtter ruine. Thus was France afflicted, and in euerie part troubled with warre and diuiſion, and no man to prouide remedie, nor once put foorth his finger for helpe or ſuccour.

The yong Dolphin fleeced his old moother of his treaſure, wher miſcheefe roſe vpon it.

The duke of Burgognie cheefe doer in France.

King Henrie in the meane time following victorie and his good ſucceſſe, ſent the duke of Clarence to the ſea coaſt, where (with great difficultie) he got the towne of Baieux, whereof the lord Matreuers was appointed capteine. The duke of Gloceſter alſo finding ſmall reſiſtance, tooke the citie of Liſeaux, of which citie ſir John Birkleie was ordeined capteine. King Henrie himſelfe taried ſtill at Caen, fortifieng the towne and caſtell, and put out fifteene hundred women and impotent perſons, repleniſhing the towne with Engliſh people. Where while the king ſoiourned, he kept a ſolemne feaſt, and made manie knights; beſide that, he ſhewed there an example of great pitie and clemencie: for in ſearching the caſtell, he found innumerable ſubſtance of plate and monie belonging to the citizens, whereof he would not ſuffer one penie to be touched, but reſtored the ſame to the owners, deliuering to euerie man that which was his owne.

Caen peopled with Engliſh inhabitants.
A worthie & rare example of equitie in king Henrie.

When the fame of his mercifull dealing herein, of his bountie to captiues, and of his fauourable vſing of thoſe that ſubmitted themſelues to his grace, was ſpred abroad, all the capteins of the townes adioining, came willinglie to his preſence, offering to him themſelues, their townes, and their goods, wherupon he made proclamation, that all men, which had, or would become his ſubiects, and ſweare to him allegiance, ſhould inioy their goods, and liberties, in as large or more ample maner, than they did before: which gentle interteining of the ſtubborne Normans, was the verie cauſe, why they were not onlie content, but alſo glad to remoue and turne from the French part, and become ſubiects to the crowne of England.

The Normans willinglie ſworne Engliſh.

When the king had ſet Caen in good order, he left there for capteins, the one of the towne, the other of the caſtell, ſir Gilbert Umfreuill earle of Kime or Angus, & ſir Gilbert Talbot, and made bailiffe there ſir John Popham, and ſo departed from Caen the firſt of October, and comming to the caſtell of Courſie, within thrée daies had it rendred to him. From whence, the fourth of October, he came vnto Argenton; they within that towne and caſtell offered, that if no reſcue came by a daie limited, they would deliuer both the towns and caſtell into the kings hands, ſo that ſuch as would abide and become the kings faithfull ſubiects ſhould be receiued, the other to depart with their goods and liues ſaued whither they would: the king accepted their offer. When the daie limited came, and no ſuccours appeared, they yéelded according to the couenants, and the king performed all that on his behalfe was promiſed. The lord Graie of Codnor was appointed capteine there. After this, reſorted dailie to the king, of the Normans, people of all ſorts and degrées, to ſweare to him fealtie and homage. The citie of Sées which was well inhabited, and wherein were two abbeies of great ſtrength, one of them yéelded to the king, and ſo likewiſe did diuerſe other townes in thoſe parties, without ſtroke ſtriken.

Argenton yéelded.

The voluntarie ſubiection of the French.

Sées yéelded.

The towne of Alanſon abode a ſiege for the ſpace of eight daies, they within defending it right valiantlie at the firſt; but in the end, conſidering with themſelues, what ſmall hope there was for anie ſuccours to come to remoue the ſiege, they grew to a compoſition, that if within a certeine daie they were not reléeued, they ſhould yéeld both the towne and caſtell into the kings hands, which was done: for no ſuccours could be heard of. The king appointed capteine of this towne, the duke of Gloceſter, and his lieutenant ſir Ralfe Lentall. The duke of Britaine vnder ſafe conduct came to the king, as he was thus buſie in the conqueſt of Normandie, and after ſundrie points treated of betwixt them, a truce was taken, to indure from the ſeuenth daie of Nouember, vnto the laſt of September, in the yeare next following, betwixt them, their ſouldiers, men of warre, and ſubiects. The like truce was granted vnto the quéene of Jeruſalem and Sicill, & to hir ſonne Lewes, for the duchie of Aniou, and the countie of Maine, the duke of Britaine being their deputie for concluding of the ſame truce.

Alanſon beſieged and yéelded vp.

Titus Liuius.

A truce taken betwéene king Henrie and the duke of Britaine.

About the ſame time alſo, at the ſute of Charles the Dolphin, a treatie was in hand at Tonque, for a finall peace, but it came to none effect. From Alanſon the king ſet forward towards the towne and caſtell of Faleis, meaning to beſiege the ſame, where the Frenchmen appointed to the kéeping of it, had fortified the towne by all meanes poſſible, and prepared themſelues to defend it to the vttermoſt. The earle of Saliſburie was firſt ſent thither before with certeine bands of ſouldiers to incloſe the enimies within the towne, & to view the ſtrength therof. After him came the king with his whole armie, about the firſt of December, and then was the towne beſieged on ech ſide. The king lodged before the gate that leadeth to Caen, the duke of Clarence before the caſtell that ſtandeth on a rocke, and the duke of Gloceſter laie on the kings right hand, and other lords & noble men were aſſigned to their places as was thought expedient. And to be ſure from taking damage by anie ſudden inuaſion of the enimies, there were great trenches and rampiers caſt and made about their ſeuerall campes, for defenſe of the ſame.

Faleis beſieged.

The Frenchmen notwithſtanding this ſiege, valiantlie defended their wals, and ſometimes made iſſues forth, but ſmall to their gaine: and ſtill the Engliſhmen with their guns and great ordinance made batterie to the wals and bulworks. The winter ſeaſon was verie cold, with ſharpe froſts, & hard weather; but the Engliſhmen made ſuch ſhift for prouiſion of all things neceſſarie to ſerue their turns, that they were ſufficientlie prouided, both againſt hunger and cold: ſo that in the end, the Frenchmen perceiuing they could not long indure againſt them, offered to talke, and agréed to giue ouer the towne, if no reſcue came by a certeine daie appointed. About the ſame ſeaſon was ſir John Oldcaſtell, lord Cobham taken, in the countrie of Powes land, in the borders of Wales, within a lordſhip belonging to the lord Powes, not without danger and hurts of ſome that were at the taking of him: for they could not take him, till he was wounded himſelfe.

Thom. Walſ.

Sir John Oldcaſtell taken.

At the ſame time, the ſtates of the realme were aſſembled at London, for the leuieng of monie, to furniſh the kings great charges, which he was at about the maintenance of his wars in France: it was therefore determined, that the ſaid ſir John Oldcaſtell ſhould be brought, and put to his triall, yer the aſſemblie brake vp. The lord Powes therefore was ſent to fetch him, who brought him to London in a litter, wounded as he was: herewith, being firſt laid faſt in the Tower, ſhortlie after he was brought before the duke of Bedford, regent of the realme, and the other eſtates, where in the end he was condemned; and finallie was drawen from the Tower vnto ſaint Giles field, and there hanged in a chaine by the middle, and after conſumed with fire, the gallowes and all.

Faleis rendered vp to king Henrie.

When the daie was come, on the which it was couenanted that the towne of Faleis ſhould be deliuered, to wit, the ſecond of Januarie, becauſe no ſuccours appeared, the towne was yéelded to the king: but the caſtell held out ſtill, into the which the capteine and gouernour both of the towne and caſtell had withdrawne themſelues, with all the ſouldiers; and being ſtreictlie beſieged, the capteine defended himſelfe and the place right ſtoutlie, although he was ſore laid to, vntill at length, perceiuing his people wearied with continuall aſſaults, and ſuch approches as were made to and within the verie wals, he was driuen to compound with the king, that if he were not ſuccoured by the firſt of Februarie, then ſhould he yéeld himſelfe priſoner, and deliuer the caſtell; ſo that the ſouldiers ſhould haue licence to depart, with their liues onelie ſaued. When the daie came, the couenants were performed, and the caſtell rendered to the kings hands, for no aid came to the reſcue of them within. The capteine named Oliuer de Mannie was kept as priſoner, till the caſtell was repared at his coſts and charges, becauſe the ſame, through his obſtinat wilfulneſſe, was ſore beaten and defaced, with vnderminings and batterie. Capteine there, by the king, was appointed ſir Henrie Fitz Hugh.

After this, king Henrie returned to Caen, and by reaſon of a proclamation which he had cauſed to be made for the people of Normandie, that had with-drawne themſelues forth of the balliwicks of Caen and Faleis, he granted awaie to his owne people the lands of thoſe that came not in vpon that proclamation, and in ſpeciall, he gaue to the duke of Clarence, during his life, the vicounties of Auge, Orbec, and Ponteau de Mer, with all the lands of thoſe that were withdrawne forth of the ſame vicounties. This gift was made the ſixteenth of Februarie, in this fift yeare of this kings reigne. women full of miſcheefe.

¶ In this yeare 1418, and in the firſt yeare of the reigne of this victorious king, Henrie the fift, on Eaſter daie in the after noone (a time which required deuotion) at a ſermon in ſaint Dunſtans in the eaſt of London, a great fraie happened in the ſaid church, where through manie people were ſore wounded, and one Thomas Petwarden fiſhmonger that dwelt at Sprots keie was ſlaine outright; as they (vpon a good intent) did what they could (to their owne perill as vnfortunatlie it befell) to appeaſe the turmoile, and to procure the keeping of the kings peace. Hereupon the church was ſuſpended, and the beginners of the broile, namelie the lord Strange and ſir John Truſſell knight (betweene whome ſuch coles of vnkindneſſe were kindled (at the inſtigation of their wiues, gentlewomen of euill diſpoſition and at curſſed hatred one with another) that their huſbands ment at their meeting in the ſaid church to haue ſlaine one another) were committed to the counter in the Pultrie. Two wiſe gentlemen (I wiſſe) and well aduiſed (no doubt) who without regard of day, place, people, preacher, or perill that might inſue; were ſo forward to become the inſtruments of their miſchieuous wiues malice; the fulfilling wherof they would haue forborne, if with diſcretion they had pondered the verdict of the poet concerning the ſaid ſex:

The principall offendors puniſhment.

Not teares of hir cōplaint (I truſt) for ſorrow of hir ſinne.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie, when he had intelligence giuen of this outragious prophanation of the church, cauſed the offendors to be excommunicat, as well at Paules, as in all other pariſh churches of London. Shortlie after, to wit on the one and twentith of Aprill, the ſaid archbiſhop ſat at ſaint Magnus, vpon inquiſition for the authors of the ſaid diſorder, and found the fault to conſiſt ſpeciallie in the lord Strange and his wife. So that vpon the firſt daie of Maie next following in Paules church, before the ſaid archbiſhop, the maior of London, and others, the ſaid offendors ſubmitted themſelues to doo penance, and ſware to doo it in ſuch ſort as to them it was inioined; namelie, as followeth. That immediatlie all their ſeruants ſhould (in their ſhirts) go before the parſon of ſaint Dunſtans, from Paules to the ſaid ſaint Dunſtans church; and the lord Strange bareheaded, with his ladie barefooted; Reignold Kenwood archdeacon of London following them. Alſo it was appointed them, that at the conſecrating or hallowing of the ſaid church (which they had prophaned) the ladie ſhould fill all the veſſels with * water, and offer likewiſe to the altar an ornament of ten pounds; and the lord hir huſband a pix of ſiluer of fiue pounds. Which doone by waie of a ſatiſfactorie expiation, it is likelie they were abſolued: but the lord Strange had firſt made the wife of the ſaid Petwarden ſlaine in the fraie, large amends: as Fabian ſaith, though in what ſort he maketh no mention.]

A violent tempeſt of wind.

Whileſt the king of England wan thus in Normandie, his nauie loſt nothing on the ſea, but ſo ſcowred the ſtreames, that neither Frenchmen nor Britons durſt once appeare; howbeit, on a daie there aroſe ſuch a ſtorme and hideous tempeſt, that if the earles of March and Huntington had not taken the hauen of Southhampton, the whole nauie had periſhed; & yet the ſafegard was ſtrange, for in the ſame hauen, two balingers, and two great carickes, laden with merchandize were drowned, and the broken maſt of another caricke was blowen ouer the wall of the towne. When the furie of this outragious wind and weather was aſſwaged, and the ſea waxed calme, the earles of March and Huntington paſſed ouer with all their companie, and landing in Normandie, they marched through the countrie, deſtroieng the French villages, and taking preies on each hand, till they came to the king where he then was.

Anno Reg. 6.

Townes in Normandie yeelded to K. Henrie.

In the ſixt yeare of king Henries reigne, he ſent the earle of Warwike, and the lord Talbot, to beſiege the ſtrong caſtell of Dampfront. The duke of Clarence was alſo ſent to beſiege and ſubdue other townes, vnto whome, at one time and other, we find, that theſe townes vnderwritten were yeelded, wherein he put capteins as followeth. In Courton John Aubin, in Barney William Houghton, in Chambis James Neuill, in Bechelouin the earle Marſhall, in Harecourt Richard Woodvill eſquier, in Fangernon John S. Albon, in Creuener ſir John Kirbie to whom it was giuen, in Anuilliers Robert Hornebie, in Bagles ſir John Arthur, in Freſnie le vicont ſir Robert Brent.

The duke of Gloceſter the ſame time, accompanied with the earle of March, the lord Greie of Codner, and other, was ſent to ſubdue the townes in the Ile of Conſtantine, vnto whome theſe townes hereafter mentioned were yeelded, where he appointed capteins as followeth. At Carentine the lord Botreux, at Saint Lo Reginald Weſt, at Valoignes Thomas Burgh, at Pont Done Dauie Howell, at the Haie de Pais ſir John Aſton, at ſaint Sauieur le vicont ſir John Robſert, at Pontorſon ſir Robert Gargraue, at Hamberie the earle of Suffolke lord of that place by gift, at Briquevill the ſaid earle alſo by gift, at Auranches ſir Philip Hall bailiffe of Alanſon, at Vire the lord Matreuers, at S. James de Beumeron the ſame lord.

Chierburgh beſieged by the Engliſh.

After that the duke had ſubdued to the kings dominion, the moſt part of all the townes in that Ile of Conſtantine, Chierburgh excepted, he returned to the king, and forthwith was ſent thither againe to beſiege that ſtrong fortreſſe, which was fenſed with men, munition, vittels, and ſtrong walles, towers, and turrets, in moſt defenſible wiſe, by reaſon whereof it was holden againſt him the ſpace of fiue moneths, although he vſed all waies and meanes poſſible to annoie them within, ſo that manie fierce aſſaults, ſkirmiſhes, iſſues, and other exploits of warre were atchiued, betwixt the Frenchmen within, and the Engliſhmen without: yet at length, the Frenchmen were ſo conſtreind by power of baterie, mines, and other forceable waies of approchings, that they were glad to compound to deliuer the place, if no reſcue came to raiſe the ſiege, either from the Dolphin, that then was retired into Aquitaine, or from the duke of Burgognie that then laie at Paris, within the terme of three ſcore and two daies (for ſo long reſpit the duke granted) but they truſting further vpon his lenitie and gentleneſſe hoped to get a far longer terme.

Now were the Dolphin and the duke of Burgognie growen to a certeine agreement, by mediation of cardinals ſent from the pope, ſo that the Engliſhmen ſuerlie thought, that they would leauie a power, and come downe to reſcue Chierburgh. The duke of Gloceſter therefore cauſed his camps to be ſtronglie intrenched, and manie defenſible blockehouſes of timber to be raiſed, like to ſmall turrets, that the ſame might be a ſafegard to his people, and to conclude, leſt nothing vnforeſéene nor vndoone, that was auailable for the defenſe of his armie. The king doubting leaſt ſome power ſhould be ſent downe, to the danger of his brother, and thoſe that were with him at this ſiege, cauſed two thouſand men to be imbarked in thirtie ſhips of the weſt countrie, by order ſent vnto certeine lords there.

Chierburgh yéelded to the Engliſhmen.

The Frenchmen within the towne, perceiuing thoſe ſuccors to approch néere to the towne, thought verelie that there had béene a power of Frenchmen comming to their aid: but when they ſaw them receiued as fréends into the Engliſh campe, their comfort was ſoone quailed: and ſo when the daie appointed came, being the ninetéenth of October, or rather about the later end of Nouember (as the hiſtorie of the dukes of Normandie hath) they rendred vp both the towne and caſtell, according to the couenants. The lord Greie of Codnore was made the kings lieutenant there, and after his deceaſſe, ſir Water Hungerford. About the ſame time, or rather before, as Titus Liuius writeth, to wit, the two and twentith of Iune, the ſtrong caſtell of Dampfront was yéelded into the hands of the earle of Warwike, to the kings vſe. But the hiſtorie writen of the dukes of Normandie affirmeth, that it was ſurrendred the two and twentith of September, after the ſiege had cōtinued about it from Aprill laſt. The king by honorable report of other, and of his owne ſpeciall knowledge, ſo rightlie aſcerteined of the great valure that (for feats at armes and policie in warre) was alwaies found in the perſon of that Iohn Bromley eſquier (ſpoken of a little here before) for which his maieſtie ſo ſundrie waies roiallie rewarded him againe; ſome ſpecialtie yet of the gentlemans merits togither with the ſouereignes bountie to him among other, ſéemes here (at mention of this Dampfront, whereof ſhortlie after he was capteine) verie well to deſerue a place: and to that purpoſe as the king in Iulie went ouer againe, and this Iohn Bromley in Iune the ſame yeare, with conduct of charge was ſent afore, imploieng himſelfe ſtill in venturous actiuitie with great annoie to the enimie: his highneſſe for good liking of the ſame, and for hartening and example to other (in Aprill next following) gaue fourtie pounds land to him and his heires males by letters patents in words as followeth, and remaining yet of record in the Tower of London.

The caſtell of Dampfront yéelded.

Yet héereat the noble prince not ſtaieng his bountie, but rather regarding euer how iuſtlie new merits doo deſerue new dignities, and peraduenture the more mooued ſomewhat to reare vp the degrée of this eſquire, toward the ſtate of his ſtocke, who a long time before had béene indued with knighthood, and alſo bicauſe that vnto the duke of Buckingham he was of bloud, which his behauiour alwaies had from ſtaine ſo farre preſerued, as rather brought to it ſome increaſe of glorie, did (in the moſt worthie wiſe which to that order belongeth) dub him knight of warfare in field, made him alſo capteine generall of this ſtrong caſtell of Dampfront, ſeneſhall and great conſtable of Boſſeuile le Roſſe, with other offices and titles of worſhip, as partlie may appeare by a déed, in which this knight taking patterne at his princes benignitie had giuen an annuitie of twentie pounds to his kinſman Walter Audeley.

Sir Iohn Bromley made capteine of Dampfrōt.

Et vt fidele teſtimonium præſentibus habeatur, ſigillum meum appoſui: hijs teſtibus, Roberto de Bruyn milite, Iohanne de Holland, Gulihelmo de Brereton, Richardo le Greuill, Iohanne de Egerton, Richardo le Beſton, Thoma le Creu, & alijs. Datum apud Dampfront prædicto, 12 die menſis Auguſti, anno regni regis Henrici quinti poſt conqueſtum ſexto.*

The old armes of the houſe of Bromley being quarterlie gules and or per feſſe indented, had in the ſeale to this déed, an inſcutchen charged with a griffin ſurgiant; his creaſt, out of a crowne, a demilion ſupporting a ſtandard charged with a lion paſſant gardant: about the ſhield was ingrauen, ſigillum Iohannis de Bromley militis. That inſcutchen and creaſt (as like is) giuen him in laudable remembrance for his valiant recouerie of the ſtandard at the ſharpe and bloodie ſkirmiſh by Corbie.] The earle of Warwike, and the lord Talbot, after the winning of this fortreſſe, made ſpéed to come vnto the ſiege of Rone, where they were imploied, as after ſhall appeare. And in like manner, the duke of Glouceſter, hauing once got the poſſeſſion of Chierburgh, haſted towards the ſame ſiege: for the better furniſhing of which enterpriſe, he had firſt cauſed an armie of fiftéene thouſand men to be brought ouer to him, vnder the leading of his vncle the duke of Excester, who imbarking with the ſame, about the feaſt of the holie Trinitie, was appointed by the king to beſiege the citie of Eureux, as the earle of Angus, otherwiſe called earle of Kime, was ſent to win the caſtell of Millie Leueſche. Theſe townes being deliuered to the kings vſe, the duke ordeined capteine of Eureux ſir Gilbert Halſall knight.

The king now determining with all ſpéed to beſiege Rone, prepared all things neceſſarie for his purpoſe. Into this citie the Normans had conuried out of euerie part their monie, iewels, and houſhold ſtuffe, as into the moſt ſure and ſtrongeſt place of the whole duchie. For ſince his arriuall, they had not onlie walled that citie, and fortified it with rampiers and ſtrong bulworks, but alſo furniſhed it with valiant capteins, and hardie ſoldiers, to the number of foure thouſand, beſide ſuch of the citizens as were appointed for the warre, according to their eſtates, of the which there were at the leaſt fiftéene thouſand readie to ſerue in defenſe of the citie, as ſoldiers, and men of warre in all places where they ſhould be aſſigned. King Henrie, to haue the countrie frée, before he would beſiege this citie, thought good firſt to win ſuch townes as laie in his waie, and therefore departing from Caen (where he had kept the feaſt of ſaint George) the ninth daie of Iune, he marched ſtreight vnto the towne of Louiers, and laid his ſiege about the ſame.

Titus Liuius. Louiers beſieged.

They within the towne, being well furniſhed of all things neceſſarie for the defending of a ſiege, manfullie reſiſted the Engliſhmens inforcements, which ſpared not to deuiſe all waies and means how to approch the walles, and to batter the ſame with their great artillerie, till at length they brought the Frenchmen to that extremitie, that they were contented to yéeld the towne on theſe conditions; that if by the thrée and twentith of Iune there came no ſuccour from the French king to raiſe the ſiege, the towne ſhould be deliuered into the kings hands, the ſoldiers of the garriſon ſhould ſerue vnder the king for a time, and the townesmen ſhould remaine in their dwellings as they did before, as ſubiects to the king: but the gunners that had diſcharged anie péece againſt the Engliſhmen ſhould ſuffer death. When the daie came, and no aid appeared, the couenants were performed accordinglie. From thence went the king with all ſpéed vnto Pont de Larch, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Seine, eight miles aboue Rone towards Paris: he came thither about the ſeauen and twentith of Iune.

Louiers yéelded vp.

When the Frenchmen which kept the paſſage there heard of the kings approach, they gathered togither a great number of men of warre, minding to defend the paſſage againſt him, appointing an other band of men (if they failed) to kéepe the further ſide of the bridge; and to watch, that neither by boate nor veſſell he ſhould come ouer the riuer by anie maner of meanes. At his comming néere to the towne, he perceiued that it was not poſſible to paſſe by the bridge without great loſſe of his people, and therfore he retired almoſt a mile backeward, where, in a pleaſant and commodious place by the riuer ſide he pitched his campe, and in the night ſeaſon, what with boates and barges, and what with hogſheads and pipes, he conueied ouer the broad riuer of Seine a great companie of his ſoldiers, without anie reſiſtance made by his enimies. For they which were on the hither ſide of Seine, thinking that the Engliſhmen had gone to winne ſome other place, followed them not, but ſtudied how to defend their towne, which was inough for them to doo.

The Engliſh armie paſſeth the riuer of Seine.

And to put the French men in doubt, leaſt the Engliſhmen ſhould ſéeke paſſage ſomewhere elſe, the king appointed certeine of the ſoldiers which had ſkill in ſwimming, to go to a place thrée miles from the ſiege by the riuer ſide, and there to enter into the water, making great clamor and noiſe, as though they had meant to haue paſſed; but they had in commandement not to trauerſe paſt halfe the riuer, ſo to procure the Frenchmen to make thitherwards, whileſt the king in one place, and his brother the duke of Clarence in another, got ouer their men, and that in ſuch number, before the Frenchmen had anie vnderſtanding thereof, that when they made towards them, and perceiued that they were not able to incounter them, they fled backe, and durſt not abide the Engliſh footmen, which would faine haue béene doing with them.

A good policie.

When the king ſaw that his men were on the other ſide of the water, he (the next daie earlie) returned to the towne, & aſſaulted it on both ſides. When the inhabitants therefore ſaw themſelues compaſſed on both ſides, contrarie to their expectation, with humble heart and ſmall ioy they rendered vp the towne vnto the kings hands. After this, the king hauing no let nor impediment, determined forthwith to beſiege the citie of Rone, and firſt ſent before him his vncle the duke of Exceſter, with a great companie of horſſemen & archers to view the place, & thervpon with banner diſplaied came before the citie, and ſent Windſore an herauld at armes to the capteins within, willing them to deliuer the citie vnto the king his maiſter, or elſe he would purſue them with fire and ſword. To whome they proudlie anſwered, that none they receiued of him, nor anie they would would deliuer him, except by fine force they were therevnto compelled: and herewith there iſſued out of the towne a great band of men of armes, and incountered fiercelie with the Engliſhmen, the which receiuing them with like manhood, and great force, draue the Frenchmen into the towne againe to their loſſe, for they left thirtie of their fellowes behind priſoners and dead in the field.

The duke returned with this good ſpeed and proud anſwer of the Frenchmen vnto the king, who remained yet at Pont de Larch, and had giuen the towne of Louiers to his brother the duke of Clarence, which made there his deputie ſir Iohn Godard knight. After that the duke of Exceſter was returned to Pont Larch, the French capteins within Rone ſet fire on the ſuburbs, beat downe churches, cut downe trees, ſhred the buſhes, deſtroied the vines round about the citie, to the intent that the Engliſhmen ſhould haue no releefe nor comfort either of lodging or fewell. When the king heard of theſe deſpitefull dooings, he with his whole armie remooued from Pont Larch, and the laſt daie of Iulie came before the citie of Rone, and compaſſed it round about with a ſtrong ſiege. This citie was verie rich in gold, ſiluer, and other pretious things, in ſo much that when the ſame was taken and ſeized vpon by the Engliſh, the ſpoile was verie great and exceeding aduantagable: which the compiler of Anglorum prælia hath verie well noted, in a few lines, but pithie; ſaieng:

The king laie with a great puiſſance at the Chartreux houſe, on the eaſt ſide of the citie, and the duke of Clarence lodged at S. Geruais before the port of Caux on the weſt part. The duke of Exceſter tooke his place on the north ſide: at port S. Denis, betweene the dukes of Exceſter and Clarence, was appointed the earle marſhall, euen before the gate of the caſtell; to whome were ioined the earle of Ormond, and the lords Harington and Talbot, vpon his comming from Dampfront: and from the duke of Exceſter toward the king, were incamped the lords Ros, Willoughbie, Fitz Hugh, and ſir William Porter, with a great band of northerne men, euen before the port of ſaint Hilarie. The earles of Mortaigne and Saliſburie were aſſigned to lodge about the abbie of ſaint Katharine. Sir Iohn Greie was lodged directlie againſt the chappell called mount S. Michaell: ſir Philip Leech treaſuror of the warres kept the hill next the abbeie, and the baron of Carew kept the paſſage on the riuer of Seine, and to him was ioined that valiant eſquier Ienico Dartois.

On the further ſide of the riuer were lodged the earles of Warren and Huntington, the lords Neuill and Ferrers, ſir * Gilbert Vmfreuile with a well furniſhed companie of warlike ſoldiers directlie before the gate called Port de Pont. And to the intent that no aid ſhould paſſe by the riuer toward the citie, there was a great chaine of iron deuiſed at Pont Larch, ſet on piles from the one ſide of the water to the other: and beſide that chaine, there was ſet vp a new forced bridge, ſufficient both for cariage and paſſage, to paſſe the riuer from one campe to another. The erle of Warwike that had latelie wonne Dampfront, was ſent to beſiege Cawdebecke, a towne ſtanding on the riuer ſide, betweene the ſea and the citie of Rone. [A memorable feat in ſeruice neere to that place was doone at that time by a well minded man then noted ſoone after in writing: which matter vnable to be better reported than by him that had ſo well marked it, nor like to be more trulie expreſſed than by the ancient ſimplicitie (and yet effectuall) of the ſelfe ſame words wherein they were written, therefore thought meeteſt to haue them rehearſed as they were in order, thus.

The truth of the ſaid memorable feat as it was reported in writing.

MEmorandum, that my lord the earle of Warwike did ſend out my coſin ſir Iohn Bromley and my coſin George Vmfreuile with an hundred archers, and about two hundred ſoldiers a ſtrett, to keepe at a little caſtell called the Strow neere to Cawdebeke where they wearen met with aboue eight hundred Frenchmen & the fraie betweene them long yfought, and the Engliſhmen in great dread and perill: till at length by the might of God and ſaint George, the feeld did fall to our Engliſhmen, & the Frenchmen wearen put to flizt, and thear wearen yſlaine aboue two hundred Frenchmen, and as manie ytaken priſoners, and their capteine who was ycalled the lord of Eſtriſles was thear alſo yſlaine, and thear wearen yſlaine of our Engliſhmen my ſaid coſin George Vmfreuile and about twentie mo: on whoſe ſolles Ieſus haue mercie, and thear wearen hurt in the face my ſaid coſin ſir Iohn Bromley & my coſin Walter Audeley ſore wounded and maimed in the right arme of his bodie, he then being but of the age of eighteene yeares. But thankes be giuen to the bleſſed Trinitee, thear wearen manie noble victories ywoon by the ſaid noble erle of Warwike and his folke, as in his officiall booke (written by Maiſter Iohn le Tucke then preſent with the ſaid noble earle) is amplie recorded. My ſaid coſin Walter Audeley died at Warwike the ſeauenteenth daie of Iulie * anno Domini one thouſand foure hundred and twentie, and was buried at Acton in Cheſhire, neere the bodie of my ſaid coſin ſir Iohn Bromley: on whoſe ſolles Ieſus haue mercie. By me ſir Richard Braie, chapleine to my ladie the old counteſſe of Warwike; Ieſus Maria, Amen, Pater noſter, Aue Maria.

* And this ſir Iohn Bromley departed from this life the fourth day of Sept. 1419. which was in anno reg. 7. as by the office takē after his death remaining of record in yͤ caſtell of Cheſter doth manifeſtlie appeare.

After this conflict, this towne was ſo hardlie handled with fierce and continuall aſſaults, that the capteins within offered to ſuffer the Engliſh nauie to paſſe by their towne without impeachment, vp to the citie of Rone. And alſo if Rone yeelded, they promiſed to render the towne without delaie. Herevpon the Engliſh nauie, to the number of an hundred ſailes, paſſed by Cawdebecke, and came to Rone, and ſo beſieged it on the water ſide. There came alſo to this ſiege the duke of Gloceſter, with the earle of Suffolke, and the lord Aburgauennie, which had taken (as before yee haue heard) the towne of Cherburgh, & lodged before the port of S. Hilarie, neerer to their enimies by fortie rodes than any other perſon of the armie.

During this ſiege alſo, there arriued at Harflue the lord of Kilmaine in Ireland, with a band of ſixteene hundred Iriſhmen, in maile, with darts and ſkains after the maner of their countrie, all of them being tall, quicke, and nimble perſons, which came and preſented themſelues before the king lieng ſtill at the ſiege, of whom they were not onelie gentlie receiued & welcomed; but alſo becauſe it was thought that the French king and the duke of Burgognie would ſhortlie come, and either attempt to raiſe the ſiege, or vittell and man the towne by the north gate, they were appointed to keepe the north ſide of the armie, and ſpeciallie the waie that commeth from the foreſt of Lions. Which charge the lord of Kilmaine and his companie ioifullie accepted, and did ſo their deuoir therein, that no men were more praiſed, nor did more damage to their enimies than they did: for ſuerlie their quickeneſſe & ſwiftneſſe of foot did more preiudice to their enimies, than their barded horſſes did hurt or damage to the nimble Iriſhmen. Alſo the kings coſine germane and alie (the king of Portingale) ſent a great nauie of well appointed ſhips vnto the mouth of the riuer of Seine, to ſtop that no French veſſels ſhould enter the riuer, and paſſe vp the ſame, to the aid of them within Rone.

The good ſeruice of the Iriſhmen at this ſiege.

Titus Liuius.

The king of Portingale ſendeth aid to king Henrie.

Thus was the faire citie of Rone compaſſed about with enimies, both by water and land, hauing neither comfort nor aid of King, Dolphin, or Duke. And yet although the armie was ſtrong without, there lacked not within both hardie capteins and manfull ſouldiers. And as for people, they had more than inough: for as it is written by ſome that had good cauſe to know the truth, and no occaſion to erre from the ſame, there were in the citie at the time of the ſiege, two hundred and ten thouſand perſons. Dailie were iſſues made out of the citie at diuerſe gates, ſometime to the loſſe of the one partie, and ſometime of the other, as chances of warre in ſuch aduentures happen. The Frenchmen in deed preferring fame before worldlie riches, and deſpiſing pleaſure (the enimie to warlike prowеſſe) ſware ech to other neuer to render or deliuer the citie, while they might either hold ſword in hand or ſpeare in reſt.

The number within Rone.

The king of England aduertiſed of their haultie courages, determined to conquer them by famine, which would not be tamed with weapon. Wherefore he ſtopped all the paſſages, both by water and land, that no vittels could be conueied to the citie: he caſt trenches round about the wals, and ſet them full of ſtakes, and defended them with archers, ſo that there was left neither waie for them within to iſſue out, nor for anie that were abroad to enter in without his licence. To rehearſe the great paines, trauell and diligence, which the king tooke vpon him in his owne perſon at this ſiege, a man might woonder. And becauſe diuerſe of the ſouldiers had lodged themſelues for their more eaſe, in places ſo farre diſtant one from an other, that they might eaſilie haue beene ſurpriſed by their enimies, yer anie of their fellowes could haue come to their ſuccors; he cauſed proclamation to be made, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould lodge without the precinct appointed them, nor go further abroad from the campe than ſuch bounds as were aſſigned.

Titus Liuius.

Now as it chanced, the king in going about the campe, to ſuruеie and view the warders, he eſpied two ſouldiers that were walking abroad without the limits aſſigned, whom he cauſed ſtraightwaies to be apprehended and hanged vpon a tree of great height, for a terrour to others, that none ſhould be ſo hardie to breake ſuch orders as he commanded them to obſerue. Whileſt the king laie thus with his power about the mightie citie of Rone, the Frenchmen ſought to indamage as well thoſe that were at that ſiege, as other of the Engliſhmen that laie in garriſons within the townes that were alreadie in the king of Englands poſſeſſion, inſomuch that (as ſome haue written) within the octaues of the Aſſumption, three notable victories chanced to the Engliſhmen in three ſeuerall places. Firſt an hundred Engliſhmen at Kilbuef tooke three great lords of the Frenchmen, beſides fourеſcore other perſons, and put three hundred to flight.

King Henrie his iuſtice.

Thom. Walſ.

Three great victories on the Engliſh ſide within a ſhort time togither.

Alſo vpon the thurſdaie within the ſame octaues, foure hundred Frenchmen that were entered within the ſuburbes of Eureux were repelled by eleuen Engliſhmen, that tooke foure of thoſe Frenchmen priſoners, ſlue twelue of them, and tooke fortie horſſes. On the ſaturdaie following, the Frenchmen tooke in hand to ſteale vpon them that laie in garriſon within Louiers, in hope to ſurpriſe the towne earlie in the morning: but the capteine perceiuing their purpoſe, ſallied foorth with a hundred of his men, and putting the Frenchmen to flight, being a thouſand, tooke an hundred and foureſcore of them being all gentlemen. But to returne to them before Rone. The ſiege thus continuing from Lammas, almoſt to Chriſtmas, diuerſe enterpriſes were attempted, and diuerſe policies practiſed, how euerie part might indamage his aduerſaries: no parte greatlie reioiſed of their gaine. But in the meane time vittels began ſore to faile them within, that onelie vineger and water ſerued for drinke.

If I ſhould rehearſe (according to the report of diuerſe writers) how deerelie dogs, rats, miſe, and cats were ſold within the towne, and how greedilie they were by the poore people eaten and deuoured, and how the people dailie died for fault of food, and yoong infants laie ſucking in the ſtreets on their mothers breaſts, lieng dead, ſtarued for hunger; the reader might lament their extreme miſeries. A great number of poore ſillie creaturs were put out at the gates, which were by the Engliſhmen that kept the trenches beaten and driuen backe againe to the ſame gates, which they found cloſed and ſhut againſt them. And ſo they laie betweene the wals of the citie and the trenches of the enimies, ſtill crieng for helpe and releefe, for lacke whereof great numbers of them dailie died.

Extreame famine within Rone.

Howbeit, king Henrie mooued with pitie, vpon Chriſtmaſſe daie, in the honor of Chriſtes Natiuitie, refreſhed all the poore people with vittels, to their great comfort and his high praiſe: yet if the duke of Burgognies letters had not beene conueied into the citie, it was thought they within would neuer haue made reſiſtance ſo long time as they did; for by thoſe letters they were aſſured of reſcue to come. Diuerſe lords of France hauing written to them to the like effect, they were put in ſuch comfort herewith, that immediatlie, to expreſſe their great reioiſing, all the bels in the citie were roong foorth cheerefullie, which during all the time of the ſiege till that preſent had kept ſilence. In deed by reaſon of a faint kind of agreement procured betwixt the Dolphin and the duke of Burgognie, it was thought verelie that a power ſhould haue beene raiſed for preſeruation of that noble citie, the looſing or ſauing thereof being a matter of ſuch importance.

A vertuous and charitable prince.

The king of England, to preuent the enimies purpoſe, cauſed a large trench to be caſt without his campe, which was pight full of ſharpe ſtakes, with a great rampire fenſed with bulworks, and turnepikes, in as defenſible wiſe as might be deuiſed. Sir Robert Bapthorpe, knight, was appointed comptroller, to ſee this worke performed, which he did with all diligence accompliſh; in like caſe as he had doone, when the other trench and rampire ſtronglie ſtaked and hedged was made at the firſt betwixt the campe and the citie, to reſtreine ſuch as in the begining of the ſiege reſted not to pricke foorth of the gates on horſſe backe. And ſo by this meanes was the armie defended both behind and before.

within the citie were brought to ſuch an extremitie for want of vittels, that they were in danger all to haue ſtarued. Wherevpon being now paſt hope of reléaſe, they determined to treat with the king of England, and ſo vpon Newyeares euen there came to the wals ſuch as they had choſen amongſt them for commiſſioners, which made a ſigne to the Engliſhmen lieng without the gate of the bridge, to ſpeake with ſome gentleman, or other perſon of authoritie. The earle of Huntington, which kept that part, ſent to them ſir Gilbert Umfreuile; vnto whom they declared, that if they might haue a ſafe conduct, they would gladlie come forth to ſpeake with the king. Sir Gilbert repairing to the duke of Clarence, and other of the kings councell, aduertiſed them of this requeſt.

They within Rone demand parlée.

Herevpon the duke of Clarence with the other councellors reſorted to the kings lodging, to informe him of the matter, and to know his pleaſure therein; who after good aduiſement and deliberation taken, willed ſir Gilbert to aduertiſe them, that he was content to heare twelue of them, which ſhould be ſafelie conueied into his preſence. This anſwer being brought to the Frenchmen by the ſaid ſir Gilbert, on the next daie in the morning, foure knights, foure learned men, and foure ſage burgeſſes, all clothed in blacke, came forth of the citie, and were receiued at the port ſaint Hilarie by ſir Gilbert Umfreuile, accompanied with diuerſe gentlemen and yeomen of the kings houſhold, commonlie called yeomen of the crowne, by whome they were conueied to the kings lodging, whome they found at maſſe, which being ended, the king came out of his trauerſe, ſternelie, and princelie beholding the French meſſengers, and paſſed by them into his chamber. And incontinentlie after he commanded that they ſhould be brought in before his preſence, to heare what they had to ſay.

A preſumptuous orator.

One of them ſéene in the ciuill lawes, was appointed to declare the meſſage in all their names, who ſhewing himſelfe more raſh than wiſe, more arrogant than learned, firſt tooke vpon him to ſhew wherin the glorie of victorie conſiſted, aduiſing the king not to ſhew his manhood in famiſhing a multitude of poore, ſimple, and innocent people, but rather ſuffer ſuch miſerable wretches as laie betwixt the wals of the citie, and the trenches of his ſiege, to paſſe through the campe, that they might get their liuing in other places, and then if he durſt manfullie aſſault the citie, and by force ſubdue it, he ſhould win both worldlie fame, and merit great méed at the hands of almightie God, for hauing compaſſion of the poore, néedie, and indigent people.

The kings anſwer to this proud meſſage.

When this orator had ſaid, the king who no requeſt leſſe ſuſpected, than that which was thus deſired, began a while to muſe; and after he had well conſidered the craftie cautell of his enimies, with a fierce countenance, and bold ſpirit he reprooued them, both for their ſubtill dealing with him, and their malapert preſumption, in that they ſhould ſeeme to go about to teach him what belonged to the dutie of a conquerour. And therefore ſince it appeared that the ſame was vnknowne vnto them, he declared that the goddeſſe of battell called Bellona, had thrée handmaidens, euer of neceſſitie attending vpon hir, as blood, fire, and famine. And whereas it laie in his choiſe to vſe them all thrée; yea, two, or one of them at his pleaſure, he had appointed onelie the méekeſt maid of thoſe thrée damſels to puniſh them of that citie, till they were brought to reaſon.

And whereas the gaine of a capteine atteined by anie of the ſaid thrée handmaidens, was both glorious, honourable, and worthie of triumph: yet of all the thrée, the yongeſt maid, which he meant to vſe at that time was moſt profitable and commodious. And as for the poore people lieng in the ditches, if they died through famine, the fault was theirs, that like cruell tyrants had put them out of the towne, to the intent he ſhould ſlaie them; and yet had he ſaued their liues, ſo that if anie lacke of charitie was, it reſted in them, and not in him. But to their cloked requeſt, he meant not to gratifie them within ſo much, but they ſhould kéepe them ſtill to helpe to ſpend their vittels. And as to aſſault the towne, he told them that he would they ſhould know, he was both able and willing thereto, as he ſhould ſée occaſion: but the choiſe was in his hand, to tame them either with blood, fire, or famine, or with them all, whereof he would take the choiſe at his pleaſure, and not at theirs.

This anſwer put the French ambaſſadors in a great ſtudie, muſing much at his excellent wit and hawtineſſe of courage. Now after they had dined (as his commandement was they ſhould) with his officers, they vpon conſultation had togither, required once againe to haue acceſſe to his roiall preſence, which being granted, they humbling themſelues on their knées, beſought him to take a truce for eight daies, during the which they might by their commiſſioners take ſome end and good concluſion with him and his councell. The king like a mercifull prince granted to them their aſking, with which anſwer they ioifullie returned. After their departure were appointed and ſet vp thrée tents, the one for the lords of England, the ſecond for the commiſſioners of the citie, and the third for both parties to aſſemble in, and to treat of the matter.

A truce for eight daies.

The commiſſioners for the Engliſh part were the earles of Warwike and Saliſburie, the lord Fitz Hugh, ſir Walter Hungerford, ſir Gilbert Umfreuile, ſir Iohn Robſert, and Iohn de Uaſques de Almada. And for the French part were appointed, ſir Guie de Butteler, and ſix others. Theſe commiſſioners met euerie daie, arguing and reaſoning about a concluſion, but nothing was doone the ſpace of eight daies, nor ſo much as one article concluded: wherefore the Engliſhmen tooke downe the tents, & the Frenchmen tooke their leaue: but at their departing they remembring themſelues, required the Engliſh lords (for the loue of God) that the truce might indure till the ſunne riſing the next daie, to the which the lords aſſented.

Commiſſioners appointed.

When the French commiſſioners were returned into the citie without any concluſion of agréement, the poore people ran about the ſtreets, crieng, and calling the capteins and gouernors murtherers and manquellers, saieng that for their pride and ſtiffe ſtomachs all this miſerie was happened, threatning to ſlea them if they would not agrée vnto the king of Englands demand. The magiſtrats herewith amazed, called all the townesmen togither to know their minds and opinions. The whole voice of the commons was, to yéeld rather than to ſterue. Then the Frenchmen in the euening came to the tent of ſir Iohn Robſert, requiring him of gentlenes to mooue the king, that the truce might be prolonged for foure daies. The king therevnto agréed, and appointed the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the other ſeuen before named for his part, and the citizens appointed a like number for them.

The articles cõcerning the yéelding vp of Rone.

The tents were againe ſet vp, and dailie they met togither, and on the fourth daie they accorded on this wiſe, that the citie and caſtell of Rone ſhould be deliuered vnto the king of England, at what time after the middeſt of the ninetéenth daie of that preſent moneth of Ianuarie, the ſaid king willed the ſame; and that all the capteins and other men whatſoeuer, dwelling or being within the ſaid citie and caſtell, ſhould ſubmit them in all things to the grace of the ſaid king: and further, that they ſhould paie to the ſaid king thrée hundred thouſand ſcutes of gold, whereof alwaies two ſhould be worth an Engliſh noble, or in ſtead of euerie ſcute thirtie great blankes white, or fiftéene grotes.

Moreouer it was accorded, that euerie ſouldier and ſtranger, being in the ſaid citie and caſtell, ſhould ſweare on the euangeliſts before their departure, not to beare armour againſt the king of England before the firſt daie of Ianuarie next to come. Alſo they within the towne ſhould ſuffer all the poore people lieng in ditches, or about the ditches of the citie, which for penurie were thruſt out, to enter the citie againe, and to find them ſufficient food till the ſaid ninetéenth daie of Ianuarie. There were diuerſe other articles, in all to the number of two and twentie agréed as well on the behalfe of the citizens, as of king Henrie: who granted, that all the ſouldiers, ſtrangers, and other within the ſaid citie and caſtell at that time, being not willing to become his lieges, ſhould depart after that the citie and caſtell was once yéelded, fréelie without let, leauing to the ſaid king all their armors, horſſes, harneſſe & goods, except the Normans, which if they ſhould refuſe to become lieges to him, were appointed to remaine as his priſoners, togither with one Luca Italico, and certeine others.

Luca Italico. The vicar generall of the archbiſhoprike of Rone for excommunicating the king was deliuered to him and remained in priſon till he died. Titus Liuius. One Alane Blanchard was likewiſe deliuered to him, & by his commandement put to death. Caxton. or Titus Liuius. King Henrie entreth into Rone.

When the daie of appointment came, which was the daie of ſaint Wolſtane, ſir Guie le Botelier, and the burgeſſes deliuered the keies of the citie and caſtell vnto the king of England, beſéeching him of fauour and compaſſion. The king incontinentlie appointed the duke of Excester with a great companie to take poſſeſſion of the citie, who like a valiant capteine mounted on a goodlie courſer firſt entered into the citie, and after into the caſtell. The next daie being fridaie, the king in great triumph like a conqueror, accompanied with fiue dukes, ten earles, eight biſhops, ſeuentéene barons, and a great multitude of knights, eſquiers, and men of warre entered into Rone, where he was receiued by the cleargie, with two and fourtie croſſes, and then met him the ſenat, and the burgeſſes of the towne, offering to him diuerſe faire and coſtlie preſents.

In this manner he paſſed through the citie to our ladie church, and there hauing ſaid his oriſons, he cauſed his chapleins to ſing this anthem: Quis eſt tam magnus dominus? Who is ſo great a lord as our God. This doone, he came to the caſtell, where he continued a good ſpace after, receiuing homages and fealties of the burgeſſes and townesmen, and ſetting orders amongſt them. He alſo recouered diuerſe fortreſſes, and townes, during which time he made proclamation, that all men which would become his ſubiects, ſhould inioy their goods, lands & offices, which proclamation made manie townes to yéeld, and manie men to become Engliſh the ſame ſeaſon.

Titus Liuius.

The duke of Britaine, vnderſtanding that if the king of England ſhould continue in poſſeſſion of Normandie, his countrie could not but be in great danger, if he prouided not to haue him his friend, vpon ſafe conduct obteined for him & his retinue, came to Rone with fiue hundred horſſes, and being honorablie receiued of the king, after conference had betwixt them of diuerſe things, at length they agréed vpon a league on this wiſe, that neither of them ſhould make warre vnto the other, nor to any of the others people or ſubiects, except he that meant to make war denounced the ſame ſix moneths before. Thus this league being concluded, the duke tooke leaue of the king, and ſo returned into Britaine.

A league concluded betwixt king Henrie and the duke of Britaine.

About the ſame time, at the ſute of certeine biſhops and abbats of Normandie, the king confirmed vnto them their ancient priuileges, granted by the former dukes of Normandie and kings of France, except ſuch as were granted by thoſe whome he reputed to be vſurpers, and no lawfull kings or dukes. He alſo eſtabliſhed at Caen the chamber of accounts of the reuenues of his dukedome of Normandie. At Rone he began the foundation of a ſtrong tower within the caſtell, that from the caſtell to the tower, and from the tower to his palace, the men of warre appointed there in garriſon, might paſſe in ſafetie without danger of the citie, if perhaps the citizens ſhould attempt any rebellion.

In this ſeuenth yeare, whileſt theſe things were dooing in Normandie, quéene Ione late wife of king Henrie the fourth, and mother in law to this king, was arreſted by the duke of Bedford the kings lieutenant in his abſence, and by him committed to ſafe kéeping in the caſtell of Léeds in Kent, there to abide the kings pleaſure. About the ſame time, one frier Randoll of the order of Franciſcanes that profeſſed diuinitie, and had béene confeſſor to the ſame quéene, was taken in the Ile of Gernſey, and being firſt brought ouer into Normandie, was by the kings commandement ſent thither into England, and committed to the Tower, where he remained till the parſon of the Tower quarelling with him, by chance ſlue him there within the Tower ward. It was reported that he had conſpired with the quéene by ſorcerie and nigromancie to deſtroie the king.

Whileſt the king remained in Rone, to ſet things in order for the eſtabliſhment of good policie in that citie, he ſent abroad diuerſe of his capteins, with conuenient forces to ſubdue certeine townes & caſtels in thoſe parties, as his brother the duke of Clarence, who wan the ſtrong townes of Vernon and Mante. In Vernon was ſir William Porter made capteine, and in Mant the earle of March. The earle of Saliſburie wan Homflue, after he had beſieged it from the fourth of Februarie vntill the fourth of March. This towne was giuen afterwards vnto the duke of Clarence. Alſo the ſaid earle of Saliſburie wan the townes of Monſter de Villiers, Eu, Newcaſtell, and finallie all the places in that quarter which till that preſent were not vnder the Engliſh obeiſance. At Newcaſtell ſir Philip Leech was made capteine.

Vernon and Mante won by the Engliſh.

Titus Liuius. Homflue won.

After Candlemaſſe, the king departed from Rone to go to Eureux, whither he promiſed to come in like caſe, as the Dolphin promiſed to be at Dreux, to the end that they might aduiſe vpon a conuenient place where to méet, to intreat of peace to be concluded betwixt the two realmes. But the Dolphin by ſiniſter perſwaſion of ſome enimies to concord, brake his promiſe, and came not. When the king ſaw that through default of his aduerſarie, no treatie would be had, he remooued to Vernon, and there a while remained. Now from Eureux the king had diſpatched the earle of Warwike vnto the ſiege of la Roch Guion, which fortreſſe he ſo [illegible], that it was yéelded into his hands, the firſt of Aprill, in the beginning of this ſeuenth yeare of king Henries reigne, and giuen to ſir Guie Botelier late capteine of Rone, of the kings frée and liberall grant.

Anno Reg. 7.

Roch Guion rendered vp.

About the ſame time, the duke of Excester laid ſiege vnto Chateau Gaillard, which ſiege continued from the laſt of March, vnto the latter end of September, or (as ſome write) vnto the thirtéenth of December, as after ſhall appeare. The duke of Gloceſter being ſent to win the towne and caſtell of Yuri, tooke the towne by aſſault, and the caſtell was deliuered by compoſition after fortie daies ſiege. After this the Engliſhmen ouerran the countrie about Chartres, and did much hurt to their enimies in all places where they came. The hearts of the Frenchmen were ſore diſcouraged with the loſſe of Rone, and the other townes which yéelded one after another thus to the Ambaſſadors ſent on either ſide.

Titus Liuius.

Creation of earles.

Either part was appointed to bring with them not paſt two thouſand and fiue hundred men of warre as Tit. Liu. ſaith.

Engliſhmen, ſo that ſuch as loued the wealth of their countrie ſore lamented the imminent miſchéefes, which they ſaw by the diuiſion of the nobilitie, like ſhortlie to fall on their heads, namelie bicauſe they ſaw no remedie prepared.

But who euer elſe was diſquieted with this matter, Iohn duke of Burgognie raged and ſwelled, yea and ſo much freated therewith, that he wiſt not what to ſaie, and leſſe to doo: for he knew well that he was neither frée from diſdaine, nor yet deliuered from the ſcope of malice, bicauſe that he onelie ruled the king, and had the whole doings in all matters about him. And therefore he conſidered, that all ſuch miſhaps as chanced to the ſtate of the common-wealth would be imputed to his negligence and diſordred gouernement. To find ſome remedie againſt ſuch dangers at hand, he thought firſt to aſſaie, if he might by any reaſonable means conclude a peace betwixt the two mightie kings of England and France, which if he might bring to paſſe, he doubted not to reuenge his quarell eaſilie inough againſt the Dolphin Charles, and to repreſſe all cauſes of grudge and diſdaine.

Ambaſſadors ſent on either ſide.

Herewith intending to build vpon this fraile foundation, he ſent letters and ambaſſadors to the king of England, aduertiſing him, that if he would perſonallie come to a communication to be had betwéene him and Charles the French king, he doubted not but by his onlie meanes, peace ſhould be brought in place, and bloudie battell cléerelie exiled. King Henrie giuing courteous eare to theſe ambaſſadors, ſent with them the earle of Warwike as his ambaſſador, accompanied with two hundred gentlemen to talke with the duke, as then remaining in the French court at the towne of Prouince. The earle was aſſailed by the waie as he iournied, by a great number of rebellious perſons, gotten into armour of purpoſe to haue ſpoiled him of ſuch monie and things as he and his companie had about them. But by the high valiancie of the Engliſh people, with the aid of their bowes, the Frenchmen were diſcomfited and chaſed.

Titus Liuius.

The earle at his comming to Prouince was honorablie receiued, and hauing doone the effect of his meſſage, returned; and with him the earle of ſaint Paule, and the ſonne and heire of the duke of Burbon were alſo ſent as ambaſſadors from the French king, to conclude vpon the time and place of the méeting, with all the circumſtances. Wher vpon the king of England agréed to come to the towne of Mante, with condition that the duke of Burgognie, and other for the French king ſhould come to Pontoiſe, that either part might méet other in a conuenient place betwixt thoſe two townes néere to Meulan. According to this appointment, K. Henrie came to Mante, where in the feaſt of Pentecoſt he kept a liberall houſe to all commers, and ſate himſelfe in great eſtate. Vpon the which daie, either for good ſeruice alreadie by them doone, or for the good expectation of things to come, he created Gaſcoigne de Fois, otherwiſe called the captau or captall de Buef a valiant Gaſcoigne, earle of Longueuile; and ſir Iohn Greie earle of Tankeruile, and the lord Bourchier earle of Ew.

Creation of earles.

After this ſolemne feaſt ended, the place of enterview and méeting was appointed to be beſide Meulan on the riuer of Seine, where in a faire place euerie part was by commiſſioners appointed to their ground. When the daie of appointment approched, which was the laſt daie of Maie, the king of England accompanied with the dukes of Clarence, and Gloceſter, his brethren, the duke of Exceſter his vncle, and Henrie Beauford clerke his other vncle, which after was biſhop of Wincheſter and cardinall, with the earles of March, Saliſburie, and others, to the number of a thouſand men of warre, entred into his ground, which was barred about and ported, wherein his tents were pight in a princelie maner.

Either part was appointed to bring with them not paſt two thouſand and fiue hundred men of warre as Ti. Liu. ſaith.

Likewiſe for the French part came Iſabell the French quéene, bicauſe hir huſband was fallen into his old frantike diſeaſe, hauing in hir companie the duke of Burgognie, and the earle of ſaint Paule, and ſhe had attending vpon hir the faire ladie Katharine hir daughter, with ſix and twentie ladies and damoſels; and had alſo for hir furniture a thouſand men of warre. The ſaid ladie Katharine was brought by hir mother, onelie to the intent that the king of England beholding hir excellent beautie, ſhould be ſo inflamed and rapt in hir loue, that he to obteine hir to his wife, ſhould the ſooner agrée to a gentle peace and louing concord. But though manie words were ſpent in this treatie, and that they met at eight ſeuerall times, yet no effect inſued, nor any concluſion was taken by this fréendlie conſultation, ſo that both parties after a princelie faſhion tooke leaue ech of other, and departed; the Engliſhmen to Mante, and the Frenchmen to Pontoiſe.

A treatie of peace.

Seuen times the laſt being on the laſt day of Iune.

Titus Liuius.

Some authors write that the Dolphin to ſtaie that no agréement ſhould paſſe, ſent ſir Taneguie de Chaſtell to the duke of Burgognie, declaring that if he would breake off the treatie with the Engliſhmen, he would then common with him; and take ſuch order, that not onelie they but the whole realme of France ſhould thereof be glad and reioiſe. Howſoeuer it came to paſſe, truth it is, that where it was agréed, that they ſhould eftſoones haue met in the ſame place on the third of Iulie; the king according to that appointment came: but there was none for the French part, neither quéene nor duke that once appeared; ſo that it was manifeſt inough how the fault reſted not in the Engliſhmen, but in the Frenchmen. By reaſon wherof no concluſion ſorted to effect of all this communication, ſaue onlie that a certeine ſparke of burning loue was kindled in the kings heart by the ſight of the ladie Katharine.

Chro. of Flanders.

Titus Liuius.

The king without doubt was highlie diſpleaſed in his mind, that this communication came to no better paſſe. Wherefore he miſtruſting that the duke of Burgognie was the verie let and ſtop of his deſires, „ ſaid vnto him before his departure: Cooſine, we will haue your kings daughter, and all things that we de- „ mand with hir, or we will driue your king and you „ out of his realme. Well (ſaid the duke of Burgognie) „ before you driue the king and me out of his realme, you ſhall be well wearied, and therof we doubt little. „
Shortlie after, the duke of Burgognie and the Dolphin met in the plaine fields beſides Melun, and there comming togither, concluded apparantlie an open peace and amitie, which was proclamed in Paris, Amiens, and Pontoiſe.

This agréement was made the ſixt of Iulie in the yeare 1419. It was ingroſſed by notaries, ſigned with their hands, and ſealed with their great ſeales of armes: but as the ſequele ſhewed, hart thought not what toong ſpake, nor mind meant not that hand wrote. Whiles theſe things were a dooing, diuerſe of the Frenchmen in Rone went about a conſpiracie againſt the Engliſhmen, whereof the king being well aduertiſed, ſent thither certeine of his nobles, which tried out theſe conſpirators, cauſed them to be apprehended, had them in examination, and ſuch as they found guiltie were put to death; and ſo ſetting the citie in quietnes, returned to the king, who counted it great honor to kéepe the countries which he woone by conqueſt in obedience and aw; ſith ſuch victories are not obteined without ſore labour and toile, both of prince and people, as the poet rightlie ſaith:

An agréement betwéene the duke of Burgognie & the Dolphin.

Hall. Theſe bands belonged to the earle of Longueuile & to the lord de Leſpar Gaſcoignes. Hiſt. dez ducz de Normand. The king plaieth the porters part.

The king of England, perceiuing by this new aliance, that nothing was leſſe to be looked for, than peace at the hands of the Frenchmen, deuiſed ſtill how to win townes and fortreſſes, which were kept againſt him: and now that the truce was expired, on the thirtith daie of Iulie, he being as then within the towne of Mante, appointed certeine bands of ſouldiers in the after noone to paſſe out of the gates, giuing onelie knowledge to the capteins what he would haue them to doo. And to the intent that no inkling of the enterpriſe ſhould come to the enimies eare, he kept the gates himſelfe as porter. Theſe that were thus ſent forth being guided by the earle of Longueuile, otherwiſe called the captau de Buef, were commanded in as ſecret maner as they could to draw toward the towne of Pontoiſe, and to keepe themſelues in couert till the darke of the night, and then approch the walles of that towne, and vpon eſpieng their aduantage to enter it by ſcaling, hauing ladders and all things neceſſarie with them for the purpoſe.

This captau was brother to the earle of Fois.

Moreouer, about the cloſing of the daie and night in the euening, he ſent forth the erle of Huntington with other bands of ſoldiers, to ſuccor and aſſiſt the other, if they chanced to enter the towne according to the order taken. Thoſe that were firſt ſent forth (according to their inſtructions) conueid themſelues ſo cloſelie to their appointed places, that the enimies heard nothing of their dooings. Wherevpon when the night was come, they came in ſecret wiſe vnder the walles, and there watched their time till the morning began to draw on. In the meane time, whileſt the watch was departed, and before other were come into their places to relieue it, the Engliſhmen ſetting vp their ladders, entered and brake open one of the gates to receiue the other that followed.

Pontoiſe ſurpriſed by the Engliſhmen.

The Frenchmen perceiuing that the walles were taken, and their enimies entered into the towne, at the firſt were ſore amazed: but after perceiuing the ſmall number of the Engliſhmen, they aſſembled togither and fiercelie aſſailed them, ſo that they were conſtreined to retire to the walles and turrets which they had taken, and with much adoo defended the ſame; ſome leaping downe into the diches, and hiding them in the vines, till at length the earle of Huntington, with his companies came to their ſuccors, and entring by the gate which was open, eaſilie did beat backe the enimies, & got the market place. Which when the lord Liſle Adam capteine of the towne perceiued, he opened the gate towards Paris, by the which he with all his retinue, and diuerſe of the towneſmen to the number of ten thouſand in all, (as Enguerant de Monſtr. recounteth) fled towards Paris, taking awaie with them their coine, iewels, and plate. Some of them fleeing towards Beauuois were met with, and ſtripped of that they had, by Iehan de Guigni, and Iehan de Claw, two capteins that ſerued the Orlientiall faction.

Hall.

Hall.

There were within the towne of Pontoiſe at that time when it was thus taken by the Engliſhmen, a thouſand lances, and two thouſand arcubaliſters, as Thomas Walſingham affirmeth, and of Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes that went firſt forth of Mante with the captau de Buef, not paſt fifteene hundred, as Hall reporteth: although Enguerant de Monſtrellet ſaith, they were about thrée thouſand. But how manie ſoeuer they were, they durſt not at the firſt, by reaſon of their ſmall number (as may be thought) once diuide themſelues, or deale with booties, till about the houre of prime, that the duke of Clarence came to their aid with fiue thouſand men, who much praiſing the valiantneſſe of the earle and his retinue that had thus woone the towne, gaue to them the chéefe ſpoile of the which there was great plentie.

The duke of Clarence commeth before Paris with his armie.

Then went the duke forth towards Paris, and comming thither, lodged before it two daies and two nights, without perceiuing anie proffer of iſſue to be made forth againſt him by his enimies, and therefore ſeeing they durſt not once looke vpon him, he returned to Pontoiſe, for the taking of which towne the whole countrie of France, and ſpeciallie the Pariſians were ſore diſmaied: ſith now there was no fortreſſe able to withſtand the Engliſh puiſſance; for that the Iriſhmen ouerran all the Iſle of France, did to the Frenchmen damages innumerable (as their writers affirme) brought dailie preies to the Engliſh armie, burſt vp houſes, laid beds on the backes of the kine, rid vpon them, carried yoong children before them, and ſold them to the Engliſhmen for ſlaues. Theſe ſtrange dooings ſo feared the Frenchmen within the territorie of Paris, and the countrie about, that the ſorie people fled out of the villages with all their ſtuffe into the citie.

The Iriſhmen ſpoile the Iſle of France.

The French king, and the duke of Burgognie lieng at ſaint Denis, in this ſeaſon, departed from thence with the quéene and hir daughter, and went to Trois in Champaigne, there to conſult of their buſineſſe, hauing left at Paris the earle of S. Paule, and the lord Liſle Adam, with a great puiſſance to defend the citie. The king of England immediatlie after that Pontoiſe was woone (as before yée haue heard) came thither in perſon, as well to giue order for the placing of a ſufficient garriſon there for defenſe thereof; as to proceed further into the countrie for the getting of other townes and places: and ſo after he had well prouided for the good gouernment, & ſafe kéeping thereof, the eightéenth daie of Auguſt he departed out of the ſame with his maine armie.

Titus Liuius.

And bicauſe they of the garriſon that laie in the caſtell of Vancon Villers had doone, & dailie did diuerſe and ſundrie diſpleaſures to the Engliſhmen, he pight downe his field néere to the ſame, the better to reſtraine them from their hoſtile attempts, and withall ſent part of his armie to beſiege the caſtell, which put them in ſuch feare, that they deſpairing of all reléefe or ſuccour, and perceiuing they ſhould not be able long to defend the place againſt the kings puiſſance, yéelded the place, with all their coins and other goods into the kings hands. The ſoldiers of that garriſon, and the inhabitants, at the contemplation of a certeine ladie there amongſt them, were licenced by the king to depart without armor or weapon, onelie with their liues ſaued. Iohn of Burgh that was after bailiffe of Giſours, was appointed capteine of this caſtell.

The caſtell of Vancon Villers beſieged and taken.

Titus Liuius.

Giſours beſieged & yelded to the Engliſhmen.

After this, all the townes and caſtels within a great circuit offered to yéeld themſelues vnto the Engliſh obeiſance; the ſtrong towne and caſtell of Giſours onelie excepted, which ſtill held out, & would ſhew no token of will to yéeld. Héerevpon the king the laſt of Auguſt began to approch the ſame, but at the firſt he could not come néere, by reaſon of the mariſhes and fennes: but yet ſuch was the diligence of the Engliſhmen, aduanced by the preſence of the king, readie in all places to commend them that were forward in their buſineſſe, and to chaſtiſe ſuch as ſlacked their duetie, that dailie they came néerer and néerer, although the Frenchmen iſſued forth dailie to encounter them, giuing them manie ſharpe ſkirmiſhes. For the towne being double walled and fenſed with thoſe broad mariſhes, ſo incouraged them within, that they thought no force had béene able to haue ſubdued them.

But at length calling to remembrance, that the king of England came before no towne nor fortreſſe, from which he would depart before he had brought it vnder his ſubiection, they offered to come to a parlée, and in the end compounded to render the towne into the kings hands the eight daie of September next inſuing, and the caſtell (bicauſe it was the ſtronger péece) they couenanted to deliuer the foure and twentith of the ſame, if in the meane time no reſcue came to raiſe the ſiege. Herevpon when no ſuch reléeſe could be heard of, at the daies limited, the ſoldiers of the garriſon, & the more part of the townſmen alſo ſubmitted themſelues, and receiued an oth to be true ſubiects to the king, and ſo remained ſtill in their roomes. The earle of Worceſter was made capteine there.

Titus Liuius.

About the ſame time, to wit, the thrée and twentith of September (as ſome write) was caſtell Gaillard ſurrendred to the hands of the duke of Exceſter, which had béene beſieged euer ſince the laſt daie of March (as before yée haue heard.) But others write that it held out ſeauen moneths, and was not deliuered vp till the twentith of December. This caſtell was not onelie ſtrong by ſituation, ſtanding vpon the top of a ſtéepe hill, but alſo cloſed with mightie thicke walles, and furniſhed with men, and all maner of munition and things neceſſarie. The king appointed the lord Ros capteine of it. After that Giſours and caſtell Gaillard were thus yéelded to the Engliſh obeiſance, all the other townes and caſtels thereabout, and in the countrie of Veulqueſſin, ſhortlie after yéelded to the king, as Gourneie, Chaumount, Neaufle, Dangu, and other ſmall fortreſſes. Of Gourneie, was ſir Gilbert Umfreuile made capteine; at Neaufle, the earle of Worceſter; and at Dangu, Richard Wooduile. Shortlie after was the caſtell Daumall yéelded to the earle of Warwike, to whome it was giuen. And thus was the whole duchie of Normandie (Mont ſaint Michael onelie excepted) reduced to the poſſeſſion of the right heire, which had béene wrongfullie deteined from the kings of England euer ſince the daies of king Iohn, who loſt it about the yeare one thouſand two hundred and ſeauen.

Normandie brought into ẏ kings ſubiection, that had béene loſt & deteined a long time frõ the Engliſh.

To ſatiſfie thoſe that be deſirous to know what capteins were appointed by the king in diuerſe townes that were yéelded to him (of which we haue made no mention heretofore but in generall) here their names doo follow, and of the townes, as we find them in the chronicles of maiſter Hall. At Crewleie, ſir Henrie Tanclux an Almaine; at Torignie, ſir Iohn Popham, to whome it was giuen; at Chamboſe, the lord Fitz Hugh; at Verneuil in Perch, ſir Iohn Neuill; at Eſſaie, ſir William Huddleſton bailiffe of Alanſon; at Crulie ſir Lois Robſert; at Conde Norean ſir Iohn Faſtolfe; at Cawdebecke, ſir Lois Robſert; at Déepe, William lord Bourchier earle of Eu; at Aubemarle, the earle of Warwike, and his deputie thereof William Montfort; at Bellincombre, ſir Thomas Ramſton lord thereof by gift; at Longueuille, the capitall de Beuf or Buz, earle thereof by gift; at Danuille, ſir Chriſtopher Burden; at Couches, ſir Robert Marburie; at Chierburg, ſir Iohn Gedding; at Bacqueuille, the lord Ros; at Arques ſir Iames Fines, bailiffe of Caux; at Monceaux, ſir Philip Léech; at Eſtrie Pagnie, Richard Abraham; at Sentler Surget, William Baſſet; at Bretueill, ſir Henrie Mortimer bailiffe of Hunflew.

The duke of Burgognie murthered.

But now to returne where we left. The wiſe and graue perſonages of the realme of France, ſore lamenting & bewailing the miſerie of their countrie, ſaw they had puiſſance inough to defend their enimies, if they were of perfect concord amongſt themſelues. And therefore to remooue all rancor and diſpleaſure betwixt the Dolphin, and the duke of Burgognie, they procured a new méeting, which was appointed to be at Monſtreau ou fault Yonne, where the two princes at the daie aſſigned met. But ſuch was the fortune of France, that the duke of Burgognie was there murthered, as he knéeled before the Dolphin: wherevpon inſued greater debate than before. For Philip earle of Charolois, the ſonne and heire of the ſaid duke, tooke the matter verie gréeuouſlie, as he had no leſſe cauſe, and determined to be reuenged on the Dolphin, and other that were guiltie of the murther: ſo that now there was great expectation of ſlaughter and bloudſhed, but no hope for the moſt part of tranquillitie & peace. France therefore, what with ouerthrowes giuen by the Engliſh, & diuiſion among themſelues, was verie ſore afflicted; inſomuch that one miſerie riding on anothers necke, the whole land was in danger of deſolation by ciuill diſſention & mutuall mutinies; as the poet noteth:

Ambaſſadors ſent to king Henrie. Titus Liuius.

When he had well conſidered of the matter, and taken aduiſe with his councell, he firſt ſent ambaſſadours to the king of England, then lieng at Giſours to treat and conclude a truce betwéene them both for a certeine ſpace, that they might talke of ſome concluſion of agréement. King Henrie receiued the ambaſſadors verie courteouſlie, and granted that communication might be had of peace, but vtterlie denied anie abſtinence from warre, bicauſe he would not loſe time, if the treatie ſorted not to good effect. Herevpon hauing his armie aſſembled at Maunt, he diuided the ſame into thrée parts, appointing the duke of Gloceſter with one part to go vnto the caſtell of S. Germane in Laie, and to laie ſiege therevnto. The duke according to his commiſſion, comming before that caſtell, within a while conſtreined them within by continuall ſkirmiſhes and aſſaults to deliuer vp the place into his hands. An other part of the armie was ſent vnto the caſtell of Montioie, which likewiſe by ſuch fierce aſſaults and manfull approches, as the Engliſhmen made thereto, was ſhortlie giuen ouer and yéelded. The third part of the hoaſt went to Meulanc, a verie ſtrong towne compaſſed about with the riuer of Seine.

A wiſe and princelie caution.

The caſtell of S. Germane in Laie and Montioie yéelded to the Engliſhmen.

A policie for redie bridges.

But the king deuiſed to faſten botes and barges togither, and to rere vp certeine frames of timber aloft on the ſame for defenſe of his ſoldiers, that ſhould by that meanes approch the walles, wherewith thoſe that had the towne in kéeping were ſo put in feare, that their capteine was glad to come to a communication, & agréed to deliuer the towne into the kings hands, if no reſcue came before the thirtith daie of October next inſuing. On which daie, for that no ſuccours appeared, the towne (according to the couenants) was giuen vp into the kings hands. Sir Thomas Ramſton was made capteine there, and after him ſir Iohn Faſtolfe. The king, whileſt theſe places were beſieged, and thus brought vnder his ſubiection, continued for the moſt part at Maunt; but yet oftentimes he went forth to viſit his campes, and to ſée that nothing ſhould be wanting, that might further the ſpéedie diſpatch of his enterpriſes.

The ſtrong town of Meulanc yéelded to the Engliſh.

About the ſame time, there came againe ambaſſadours to him from Charles the French king, & from the yoong duke of Burgognie to treat with him of ſome good concluſion of peace to be had; who had no ſuch truſt in their ſute, but that he doubted their meaning, and therefore ceaſſed not to procéed in the winning of townes and caſtels, as he was in hand. Now when Chriſtmaſſe approched, the king withdrew to Rone, and there kept the ſolemnization of that feaſt, appointing in the meane time his men of warre to be occupied as occaſion ſerued. The earle of Saliſburie was ſent to beſiege the towne of Freſneie, the which after ſtout reſiſtance made at the firſt, ſhortlie after was deliuered to him to the kings vſe. The earles Marſhall and Huntington, ſir Iohn Gréene Cornewall, wall, ſir Philip Léech, and diuerſe other, were ſent into the countrie of Maine, where, not farre from the citie of Mens they were incountered by a power of Frenchmen, which the Dolphin had ſent againſt them. There was at the firſt a ſharpe bickering betwixt them, but in the end the victorie remained with the Engliſhmen; ſo that manie of the Frenchmen were ſlaine, and taken, and the reſidue chaſed out of the field. There were ſlaine (as Thomas Walſingham ſaith) at the point of fiue thouſand, and two hundred taken priſoners, among whome was the marſhall de Rous, and diuerſe other of good account. The two Engliſh earles remained there as victors, in the countrie which was by the king to them aſſigned.

A great victorie on the Engliſh ſide.

Whileſt theſe victorious exploits were thus happilie atchiued by the Engliſhmen, and that the king laie ſtill at Rone, in giuing thanks to almightie God for the ſame, there came to him effſoones ambaſſadours from the French king and the duke of Burgognie to moue him to peace. The king minding not to be reputed for a deſtroier of the countrie, which he coueted to preſerue, or for a cauſer of chriſtian bloud ſtill to be ſpilt in his quarell, began ſo to incline and giue eare vnto their ſute and humble requeſt, that at length (after often ſending to and fro) and that the biſhop of Arras, and other men of honor had béene with him, and likewiſe the earle of Warwike, and the biſhop of Rocheſter had béene with the duke of Burgognie, they both finallie agréed vpon certeine articles, ſo that the French king and his commons would thereto aſſent.

King Henrie condeſcendeth to a treatie of peace.

Now was the French king and the quéene with their daughter Katharine at Trois in Champaigne gouerned and ordered by them, which ſo much fauoured the duke of Burgognie, that they would not for anie earthlie good, once hinder or pull backe one iot of ſuch articles as the ſame duke ſhould ſéeke to preferre. And therefore what néedeth manie words, a truce tripartite was accorded betwéene the two kings and the duke, and their countries, and order taken that the king of England ſhould ſend in the companie of the duke of Burgognie his ambaſſadours vnto Trois in Champaigne ſufficientlie authoriſed to treat and conclude of ſo great matter. The king of England, being in good hope that all his affaires ſhould take good ſucceſſe as he could wiſh or deſire, ſent to the duke of Burgognie his vncle, the duke of Exceſter, the earle of Saliſburie, the biſhop of Elie, the lord Fanhope, the lord Fitz Hugh, ſir Iohn Robſert, and ſir Philip Hall, with diuerſe doctors, to the number of fiue hundred horſſe, which in the companie of the duke of Burgognie came to the citie of Trois the eleuenth of March. The king, the quéene, and the ladie Katharine them receiued, and hartilie welcomed, ſhewing great ſignes and tokens of loue and amitie.

A truce tripartite.

Ambaſſadors from K. Henrie to the French king.

After a few daies they fell to councell, in which at length it was concluded, that king Henrie of England ſhould come to Trois, and marie the ladie Katharine; and the king hir father after his death ſhould make him heire of his realme, crowne and dignitie. It was alſo agréed, that king Henrie, during his father in lawes life, ſhould in his ſtéed haue the whole gouernement of the realme of France, as regent thereof, with manie other couenants and articles, as after ſhall appéere. To the performance whereof, it was accorded, that all the nobles and eſtates of the realme of France, as well ſpirituall as temporall, and alſo the cities and commonalties, citizens and burgeſſes of townes, that were obeiſant at that time to the French king, ſhould take a corporall oth. Theſe articles were not at the firſt in all points brought to a perfect concluſion. But after the effect and meaning of them was agréed vpon by the commiſſioners, the Engliſhmen departed towards the king their maiſter, and left ſir Iohn Robſert behind, to giue his attendance on the ladie Katharine.

The articles of the peace concluded betwéene king Henrie and the French king.

King Henrie being informed by them of that which they had doone, was well content with the agréement and with all diligence prepared to go vnto Trois, and therevpon hauing all things in a readineſſe, he being accompanied with his brethren the dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, the earles of Warwike, Saliſburie, Huntington, Eu, Tankeruile, and Longuile, & fiftéene thouſand men of warre, went from Rone to Pontoiſe; & departing from thence the eight daie of Maie, came to ſaint Denis two leagues from Paris, and after to Pontcharenton, where he left a ſtrong gariſon of men, with ſir William Gaſcoigne, to kéepe the paſſage; and ſo then entering into Brie, he tooke by the waie a caſtell which was kept againſt him, cauſing them that ſo kept it, ſome to be hanged, and the reſidue to be led forth with him as priſoners. And after this kéeping on his iournie by Prouins, and Nogent, at length he came to Trois.

The duke of Burgognie accompanied with manie noble men, receiued him two leagues without the towne, and conueied him to his lodging. All his armie was lodged in ſmall villages thereabout. And after that he had repoſed himſelfe a little, he went to viſit the French king, the quéene, and the ladie Katharine, whome he found in ſaint Peters church, where was a verie ioious méeting betwixt them (and this was on the twentith daie of Maie) and there the king of England, and the ladie Katharine were affianced. After this, the two kings and their councell aſſembled togither diuerſe daies, wherein the firſt concluded agréement was in diuerſe points altered and brought to a certeinetie, according to the effect aboue mentioned. When this great matter was finiſhed, the kings ſware for their parts to obſerue all the couenants of this league and agréement. Likewiſe the duke of Burgognie and a great number of other princes and nobles which were preſent, receiued an oth, the tenor whereof (as the duke of Burgognie vttered it in ſolemne words) thus inſueth, accordinglie as the ſame is exemplified by Titus Liuius De Foro Luuiſiis in Latine.

King Henrie commeth to Trois to the French king.

King Henrie affieth the French kings daughter.

The oth of the duke of Burgognie.

EGo Philippus Burgundiæ dux, per me meóſque hæredes, ad ſacra Dei euangelia domino regi Henrico Angliæ, Franciæque, pro Carolo rege regenti iuro, quòd humiliter ipſi Henrico fideliterq́; cunctis in rebus, quæ rempublicam ſpectant & Franciæ coronam, obediemus, & ſtatim poſt mortem Caroli domini noſtri, domino Henrico regi ſuiſque ſucceſſoribus in perpetuum ligei fideles erimus; nec alium quempiam pro domino noſtro ſupremo Franciæ rege, quàm Henricum & ſuos hæredes habebimus, néque patiemur. Non erimus præterea in conſilio vel conſenſu cuiuſquam damni regis Henrici, ſuorúmue ſucceſſorum, vbi quicquam detrimenti patiantur capitis ſiue membri, vel vitam perdant; ſed prædicta (quantum in nobis fuerit) quàm citiſsimis literis vel nuntijs, vt ſibi meliùs prouidere valeant, eis ſignificabimus.

The ſame in Engliſh.

I Philip duke of Burgognie, for my ſelfe, and for mine heires, doo here ſweare vpon the holie euangeliſts of God, to Henrie king of England, and regent of France for king Charles, that we ſhall humblie and faithfullie obeie the ſaid Henrie in all things which concerne the common-wealth and crowne of France. And immediatlie after the deceaſſe of our ſoueraigne lord king Charles, we ſhall be faithfull liegemen vnto the ſaid king Henrie, and to his ſucceſſors for euer. Neither ſhall we take or ſuffer anie other ſoueraigne lord and ſupreme king of France, but the ſame Henrie and his heires: neither ſhall we be of counſell or conſent of anie hurt towards the ſaid king Henrie or his ſucceſſors, wherby they may ſuffer loſſe & detriment of life or lim, but that the ſame ſo farre as in vs may lie, we ſhall ſignifie to them with all ſpéed, by letters or meſſengers, that they may the better prouide for themſelues in ſuch caſes.

The like oth a great number of the princes and nobles both ſpirituall and temporall, which were preſent, receiued at the ſame time. This doone, the morow after Trinitie ſundaie, being the third of Iune, the mariage was ſolemnized and fullie conſummate betwixt the king of England, and the ſaid ladie Katharine. Herewith was the king of England named and proclamed heire and regent of France. And as the French king ſent the copie of this treatie to euerie towne in France: ſo the king of England ſent the ſame in Engliſh vnto euerie citie and market towne within his realme, to be proclamed and publiſhed. The true copie whereof, as we find it in the chronicles of maiſter Hall, we haue thought good here to ſet downe, for the more full ſatiſfieng of thoſe that ſhall deſire to peruſe euerie clauſe and article thereof, as followeth.

The articles & appointments of peace betweene the realmes of England and France.

HEnrie by the grace of God king of England, heire and regent of France, lord of Ireland, to perpetuall mind of chriſtian people, and all thoſe that be vnder our obeiſance, we notifie and declare, that though there hath béene here before diuerſe treaties betwéene the moſt excellent prince Charles our father of France and his progenitors, for the peace to be had betwéene the two realmes of France and England, the which heretofore haue borne no fruit: we conſidering the great harmes, the which haue not onelie fallen betwéene thoſe two realmes, for the great diuiſion of that hath béene betwéene them, but to all holy church; we haue taken a treatie with our ſaid father, in which treatie betwixt our ſaid father and vs, it is concluded & accorded in the forme after the manner that followeth.

2 Alſo we ſhall not diſtrouble, diſeaſon or let our father aforeſaid, but that he hold and poſſede as long as he liueth, as he holdeth and poſſedeth at this time, the crowne and dignitie roiall of France, with rents and profits for the ſame, of the ſuſtenance of his eſtate and charges of the realme. And our foreſaid mother alſo hold as long as ſhe liueth, the ſtate and dignitie of quéene, after the manner of the ſame realme, with conuenable conuenient part of the ſaid rents and profits.

3 Alſo that the foreſaid ladie Katharine ſhall take and haue dower in our realme of England as quéenes of England here tofore were woont for to take and haue, that is to ſaie, to the ſumme of fortie thouſand ſcutes, of the which two algate ſhall be a noble Engliſh.

4 And that by the waies, manners, and meanes that we without tranſgreſſion or offenſe of other made by vs, for to ſpeake the lawes, cuſtomes, vſages and rights of our ſaid realme of England, ſhall done our labour and purſuit, that the ſaid Katharine, all ſo ſoone as it maie be doone, be made ſure to take, and for to haue in our ſaid realme of England, from the time of our death, the ſaid dower of fortie thouſand ſcutes yearelie, of the which twaine algate be worth a noble Engliſh.

5 Alſo if it happe the ſaid Katharine to ouerliue vs, we ſhall take and haue the realme of France immediatlie, from the time of our death, dower to the ſumme of twentie thouſand franks yearelie, of and vpon the lands, places and lordſhips that held and had Blanch ſometime wife of Philip Beaſaill to our ſaid father.

6 Alſo that after the death of our ſaid father aforeſaid, and from thence forward, the crowne and the realme of France, with all the rights and appurtenances, ſhall remaine and abide to vs, and béene of vs and of our heires for euermore.

7 And forſomuch as our ſaid father is withholden with diuerſe ſickeneſſe, in ſuch manner as he maie not intend in his owne perſon for to diſpoſe for the néeds of the foreſaid realme of France: therefore during the life of our foreſaid father, the faculties and exerciſe of the gouernance and diſpoſition of the publike & common profit of the ſaid realme of France, with councell, and nobles, and wiſemen of the ſame realme of France, ſhall be and abide to vs: ſo that from thenceforth we maie gouerne the ſame realme by vs. And alſo to admit to our counſell and aſſiſtance of the ſaid nobles, ſuch as we ſhall thinke méet. The which faculties and exerciſe of gouernance thus being toward vs, we ſhall labour and purpoſe vs ſpéedfullie, diligentlie, and trulie, to that that maie be and ought for to be vnto the worſhip of God, and our ſaid father and mother, and alſo to the common good of the ſaid realme, and that realme with the counſell & helpe of the worthie and great nobles of the ſame realme for to be defended, peaſed and gouerned after right and equitie.

8 Alſo that we of our owne power ſhall doo the court of parlement in France to be kept and obſerued in his authoritie and ſoueraignetie, and in all that is doone to it in all manner of places that now or in time comming is or ſhall be ſubiect to our ſaid father.

9 Alſo we to our power ſhall defend and helpe all and euerie of the péeres, nobles, cities, townes, communalties, and ſingular perſons, now or in time comming, ſubiects to our father in their rights, cuſtomes, priuileges, fréedomes, and franchiſes, longing or due to them in all manner of places now or in time comming ſubiect to our father.

10 Alſo we diligentlie and truelie ſhall trauell to our power, and doo that iuſtice be adminiſtred and doone in the ſame realme of France after the lawes, cuſtomes, and rights of the ſame realme, without perſonall exception. And that we ſhall kéepe and hold the ſubiects of the ſame realme in tranquillitie and peace, and to our power we ſhall defend them againſt all manner of violence and oppreſſion.

11 Alſo we to our power ſhall prouide, and doo to our power, that able perſons and profitable beene taken to the offices as well of iuſtices and other offices belonging to the gouernance of the demaines, and of other offices of the ſaid realme of France, for the good right and peaceable iuſtice of the ſame, and for the adminiſtration that ſhall be committed vnto them; and that they be ſuch perſons, that after the lawes and rights of the ſame realme, and for the vtilitie and profit of our ſaid father, ſhall miniſter, and that the foreſaid realme ſhall be taken and departed to the ſame offices.

12 Alſo that we of our power, ſo ſoone as it may commodiouſlie be doone, ſhall trauell to put into the obedience of our ſaid father, all manner of cities, townes, and caſtels, places, countries, and perſons within the realme of France, diſobedient, and rebels to our ſaid father, holding with them which beene called the Dolphin or Arminacke.

13 Alſo that we might the more commodiouſlie, ſuerlie and freelie doone, exerciſe, & fulfill theſe things aforeſaid, it is accorded that all worthie nobles and eſtates of the ſame realme of France, as well ſpirituals as temporals, and alſo cities notable and communalties, and citizens, burgeſſes of townes of the realme of France, that beene obeiſant at this time to our ſaid father, ſhall make theſe othes that followen.

14 Firſt to vs hauing the facultie, exerciſe, diſpoſition, and gouernance of the foreſaid common profit to our heſts and commandements, theſe ſhall meekelie & obedientlie obeie and intend in all maner of things concerning the exerciſe of gouernance of the ſame realme.

15 Alſo that the worthie, great, and noble eſtates of the ſaid realme, as well ſpirituals as temporals, and alſo cities and notable communalties, and citizens and burgeſſes of the ſame realme, in all maner of things well and trulie ſhall keepe and to their power ſhall doo to be kept of ſo much as to them belongeth, or to anie of them, all thoſe things that beene appointed and accorded betweene our foreſaid father and mother and vs, with the counſell of them whome vs liſt to call to vs.

16 And that continuallie from the death, and after the death of our ſaid father Charles, they ſhall be our true liegemen, and our heires; and they ſhall receiue and admit vs for their liege and ſoueraigne and verie king of France, and for ſuch to obeie vs without oppoſition, contradiction, or difficultie, as they beene to our foreſaid father during his life, neuer after this realme of France ſhall obey to man as king or regent of France, but to vs and our heires. Alſo they ſhall not be in counſell, helpe, or aſſent that we leeſe life or limme, or be take with euill taking, or that we ſuffer harme, or diminution in perſon, eſtate worſhip, or goods; but if they know anie ſuch thing for to be caſt or imagined againſt vs, they ſhall let it to their power, & they ſhall doone vs to weeten thereof, as haſtilie as they maie by themſelfe, by meſſage, or by letters.

17 Alſo that all maner of conqueſts that ſhould be made by vs in France vpon the ſaid inobedients, out of the duchie of Normandie, ſhall be doone to the profit of our ſaid father; and that to our power we ſhall doo, that all maner of lands and lordſhips that beene in the places ſo for to be conquered, longing to perſons obeieng to our foreſaid father, which ſhall ſweare for to keepe this preſent accord, ſhall be reſtored to the ſame perſons to whom they long to.

18 Alſo that all manner of perſons of the holie church, beneficed in the duchie of Normandie, or any other places in the realme of France, ſubiect to our father, and fauouring the partie of the dukes of Burgognie, which ſhall ſweare to keepe this preſent accord, ſhall inioy peaceablie their benefices of holie church in the duchie of Normandie, or in other places next aforeſaid.

19 Alſo likewiſe, all maner of perſons of holie church, obedient to vs, and beneficed in the realme of France, and places ſubiect to our father, that ſhall ſweare to keepe this preſent accord, ſhall inioy peaceablie their benefices of holie church in places next aboueſaid.

20 Alſo that all maner of churches, vniuerſities, and ſtudies generall, and all colleges of ſtudies, and other colleges of holie church, being in places now or in time comming ſubiect to our father, or in the duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of France ſubiect to vs, ſhall inioy their rights and poſſeſſions, rents, prerogatiues, liberties, & franchiſes, longing or due to them in any maner of wiſe in the ſaid relme of France, ſauing the right of the crowne of France, and euerie other perſon.

21 Alſo by Gods helpe, when it happeneth vs to come to the crowne of France, the duchie of Normandie, and all other places conquered by vs in the realme of France, ſhall bow vnder the commandement, obeiſance, and monarchie of the crowne of France.

22 Alſo that we ſhall force vs, & doo to our power, that recompenſe be made by our ſaid father without diminution of the crowne of France to perſons obeieng to him, and fauoring to that partie that is ſaid Burgognie, to whom longeth lands, lordſhips, rents, or poſſeſſions in the ſaid duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of France, conquered by vs hither toward, giuen by vs in places and lands gotten or to be gotten, and ouercome, in the name of our ſaid father vpon rebels and inobedients to him. And if ſo be that ſuch maner of recompenſe be not made to the ſaid perſons, by the life of our ſaid father, we ſhall make that recompenſe in ſuch maner and places, of goods, when it happeneth by Gods grace to the crowne of France. And if ſo be that the lands, lordſhips, rents, or poſſeſſions, the which longeth to ſuch maner of perſons in the ſaid duchie and places be not giuen by vs, the ſame perſons ſhall be reſtored to them without any delaie.

23 And during the life of our father, in all places now or in time comming ſubiect to him, letters of common iuſtice, and alſo grants of offices and gifts, pardons or remiſſions, and priuileges ſhall be written and proceed vnder the name and ſeale of our ſaid father. And for ſomuch as ſome ſingular caſe maie fall, that maie not be foreſeene by mans wit, in the which it might be neceſſarie and behoouefull, that we doo write our letters; in ſuch maner caſe, if any hap for the good and ſuertie of our father, and for the gouernance that longeth to vs, as is beforeſaid; and for to eſchewen perils that otherwiſe might fall, to the preiudice of our ſaid father, to write our letters, by the which we ſhall command, charge, and defend after the nature and qualitie of the need, in our fathers behalfe and ours as regent of France.

24 Alſo, that during our fathers life, we ſhall not call nor write vs king of France; but verelie we ſhall abſteine vs from that name, as long as our father liueth.

25 Alſo that our ſaid father, during his life, ſhall name, call, and write vs in French in this maner: Noſtre treſchier filz Henry roy d' Engleterre heretere de France. And in Latine in this maner: Præclariſſimus filius noſter Henricus rex Angliæ & hæres Franciæ.

26 Alſo that we ſhall put none impoſitions or exactions, or doo charge the ſubiects of our ſaid father without cauſe reaſonable and neceſſarie, ne otherwiſe than for common good of the realme of France, and after the ſaieng and aſking of the lawes and cuſtomes reaſonable approoued of the ſame realme.

27 Alſo that we ſhall trauell to our power to the effect and intent, that by the aſſent of the three eſtates of either of the realmes of France and England, that all maner of obſtacles maie be doone awaie, and in this partie, that it be ordeined and prouided; that from the time that we or any of our heires come to the crowne of France, both the crownes, that is to ſaie, of France and England perpetuallie be togither in one & in the ſame perſon, that is to ſaie, from our fathers life to vs, and from the tearme of our life thenceforward in the perſons of our heires, that ſhall be one after an other, and that both realms ſhall be gouerned from that we or any of our heires come to the ſame, not ſeuerallie vnder diuerſe kings in one time, but vnder the ſame perſon which for the time ſhall be king of both realms, and our ſouereigne lord (as it is before ſaid) keeping neuertheleſſe in all maner of other things to either of the ſame realmes, their rights, liberties, cuſtomes, vſages, and lawes, not making ſubiect in any maner of wiſe one of the ſame realmes, to the rights, lawes, or vſages of that other.

28 Alſo that thenceforward, perpetuallie, ſhall be ſtill reſt, and that in all maner of wiſe, diſſentions, hates, rancors, enuies and wars, betweene the ſame realmes of France and England, and the people of the ſame realmes, drawing to accord of the ſame peace, may ceaſſe and be broken.

29 Alſo that there ſhall be from henceforward for euermore, peace and tranquillitie, & good accord, and common affection, and ſtable friendſhip betweene the ſaid realmes, and their ſubiects before ſaid. The ſame realmes ſhall keepe themſelues with their councell, helps, and common aſſiſtance againſt all maner of men that inforce them for to doen or to imagine wrongs, harmes, diſpleaſures, or grieuances to them or either of them. And they ſhall be conuerſant and merchandizen freelie and ſuerlie togither, paieng the cuſtome due and accuſtomed. And they ſhall be conuerſant alſo, that all the confederats and alies of our ſaid father and the realme of France aforeſaid, and alſo our confederats of the realme of England aforeſaid, ſhall in eight moneths from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, ſauing neuertheleſſe either of the ſame crownes, and alſo all maner actions, rights and reuenues, that longen to our ſaid father and his ſubiects, and to vs and our ſubiects, againſt all maner of ſuch alies and confederats.

30 Alſo neither our father, neither our brother the duke of Burgognie ſhall begin, ne make with Charles, cleping himſelfe the Dolphin of Viennes, any treatie, or peace, or accord, but by councell and aſſent of all and ech of vs three, or of other the three eſtates of either of the ſaid realmes aboue named.

31 Alſo that we with aſſent of our ſaid brother of Burgognie, and other of the nobles of the realme of France, the which thereto owen to be called, ſhall ordeine for the gouernance of our ſaid father ſekerlie, louinglie, & honeſtlie, after the aſking of his roiall eſtate and dignitie, by the maner that ſhall be to the worſhip of God, and of our father, and of the realme of France.

32 Alſo all maner of perſons, that ſhall be about our father to doo him perſonall ſeruice, not onelie in office, but in all other ſeruices, aſwell the nobles and gentlenes as other, ſhall be ſuch as hath beene borne in the realme of France, or in places longing to France, good, wiſe, true, and able to that foreſaid ſeruice. And our ſaid father ſhall dwell in places notable of his obedience, and no where elſe. Wherefore we charge and command our ſaid liege ſubiects, and other being vnder our obedience, that they keepe and doo to be kept in all that longeth to them, this accord and peace, after the forme and maner as it is accorded; and that they attempt in no maner wiſe, any thing that may be preiudiciall or contrarie to the ſame accord and peace, vpon paine of life and lim, and all that they may forfeit againſt vs. Yeuen at Troes, the thirtith day of Maie, 1420, & proclamed in London the twentith day of Iune.

33 Alſo that we for the things aforeſaid, and euerie one of them, ſhall giue our aſſent by our letters patents, ſealed with our ſeale vnto our ſaid father, with all approbation and confirmation of vs, and all other of our blood roiall, and all other of the cities and townes to vs obedient. Sealed with our ſeales accuſtomed. And further our ſaid father, beſides his letters patents ſealed with our great ſeale, ſhall make or cauſe to be made letters approbatorie, and confirmations of the peeres of his realme, and of the lords, citizens, and burgeſſes of the ſame, vnder his obedience. All which articles we haue ſworne to keepe vpon the holie euangeliſts.

On the fourteenth of Iune being fridaie, there was a ſolemne proceſſion at London, and a ſermon at Paules croſſe, in which the preacher openlie declared the effect of the kings mariage, and the articles concluded vpon the ſame, by reaſon wherof (he ſaid) there muſt be a new great ſeale deuiſed, and the old broken, and in the new the kings name with a new addition of his title as regent of France, and heire apparant of that kingdome was to be ingrauen. Beſide the league thus concluded by king Henrie with the French king, and the whole bodie of the realme of France, there was a priuat league accorded betwixt him and the duke of Burgognie, the effect wherof was comprehended in articles as followeth.

Tho. Walſ.

A league betweene king Henrie & the duke of Burgognie.

First, that the duke of Burgognie ſhould procure
1 this peace latelie before concluded, to be obſerued firme and ſtable in all couenants and points therof, ſo far as he by any meanes might further the ſame:
in conſideration whereof, one of the brethren of king
Henrie ſhould take to wife one of the ſaid duke of 2 Burgognies ſiſters. That king Henrie ſhould euer haue in ſingular fauour the ſaid duke of Burgognie, as his moſt deere brother, and ſupport him in all his 3 rights. That the ſaid duke, after the deceaſſe of king
Charles, ſhould take an oth of fealtie to be true to K. Henrie & his heires, according to the forme & tenor therof before expreſſed, & ſhould in all things be 4 friend to king Henrie and his heires for euer. That king Henrie ſhould doo his vttermoſt indeuour, that due puniſhment might be had for the murther of duke Iohn, father to the ſaid duke of Burgognie, aſwell vpon Charles that named himſelfe Dolphin, as vpon others that were guiltie and priuie to that murther.

5 If the ſaid Dolphin chanced to be taken, either in battell or towne beſieged, or if anie other chanced ſo to be taken, that ſhould be prooued guiltie or priuie to the murther of the ſaid duke Iohn, he ſhould not be deliuered without iuſt puniſhment for his deeds, nor without the conſent of the two kings Charles and Henrie, & of the three eſtates of both the realmes.
6 In conſideration of the great diligence, and painfull trauell ſuſteined by the duke of Burgognie, it was alſo agreed, that he ſhould haue by patent granted of king Charles and queene Iſabell a fee of twentie thouſand pounds Pariſien, of yeerelie reuenues, aſſigned forth neere to the confines of his countrie, to inioy the ſame to him and to his wiſe the duches Michaell, and to the heires males betwixt them two, lawfullie begotten, to the obteining whereof, king Henrie ſhould ſhew all his furtherance; & if it might not be brought to paſſe till king Henrie had obteined the crowne of France, then ſhould he ſée the ſame performed, vpon the receiuing of his] homage.

The effect of king Henries oration to the French king.

The king of England, after all the articles of the ſaid treaties and agréements were concluded, paſſed and ſworne vnto, made to the French king, the duke of Burgognie, and other the French lords, a ſumptuous banket; and before they departed from the ſame, he ſadlie and with great grauitie made to them a right pithie and ſententious oration, declaring to them both how profitable the ioining of the two kingdomes ſhould be to the ſubiects of the ſame, and alſo the right that he had thereto, being by lineall deſcent of the womans ſide (which is the ſureſt) rather a Frenchman than an Engliſhman. And though he was an Engliſhman borne, yet he aſſured them to tender the wealth of the realme of France, as much as he would the aduancement of his owne natiue countrie of England.

Herewith, he inueied againſt Charles the Dolphin, being the head and onelie mainteiner of all the ciuill diſcord, whoſe wicked nature, and cruell diſpoſition, did well appeare in the murther of the late duke of Burgognie. He therefore willed them, according to their dutie, oth, and agréement, to ſtand with him, and helpe to reduce ſuch a ſtubborne and diſloiall ſonne vnto the obeiſance of his father king Charles, that he might ſhew himſelfe conformable vnto ſuch orders and decrées, as they had taken, appointed, and agréed vpon: and for his part, he promiſed to worſhip, loue, and honor his father in law the ſaid K. Charles, in place of his owne father, according to the true meaning of this concord and agréement, truſting the ſame to be a peace finall.

It was rendered vp the tenth of Iune Titus Liuius.

Sens & Mõſtreau beſieged and taken.

The ſiege was laid the 16. of Iune.

And to conclude, he promiſed, that if they ſhewed themſelues true and loiall to him, according to the ſame agréement; the Ocean ſea ſhould ſooner ceaſſe to flow, and the bright ſunne loſe his light, than he would deſiſt from dooing that which became a prince to doo to his ſubiect, or a father to his naturall child. When he had thus perſuaded the nobilitie, and diſpatched his buſineſſe at Troies, he with all his armie, hauing with him the French king, and the duke of Burgognie, departed from thence the fourth of Iune; and vpon the ſeauenth daie of the ſame moneth, came before the towne of Sens in Burgognie, which held on the Dolphins part: but after foure daies ſiege, it was yéelded vnto the king, and there he made capteine, the lord Genuille. From thence, he remooued to Monſtreau ou fault Yonne, which towne was taken on the thrée and twentith daie of Iune, by aſſault, ſo that manie of the Dolphins part were apprehended, before they could get to the caſtell.

Whileſt the ſiege laie there, and before the towne was entred, the duke of Bedford came thither vnto the king, bringing with him a faire retinue of ſouldiers out of England. After the getting of the towne, the caſtell being well vittelled and manned, denied to render, and therefore was it enuironed with a ſtrong ſiege. During the which, the duke of Burgognie was informed, in what place of the towne the duke his father was buried, who was ſlaine there (as before you haue heard) and now his corps was taken vp againe by his ſonnes appointment, and ſeared, and ſo conueied vnto Digeon in high Burgognie, and there buried by his father Philip; to the end that the remembrance of him ſhould remaine to poſterities, by the reſeruation of ſome monument abiding in the place of his interment, after that his bodie was conſumed, and his naturall countenance forgotten. Which is the laſt point of reuerend dutie (as we may well thinke) which pietie of children towards their parents dooth require; namelie, that they be decentlie buried when they be departed; and that their graues or toome ſtones may put vs that are aliue in mind of going the ſame waie, and to ſet no more by this flitting life, than ſtandeth with the vncerteintie and ſhortneſſe of the ſame; as one right well ſaith:

Cùm tumulum cernis, cur non mortalia ſpernis?
Eſto memor mortis, quo viuis tempore fortis.

Bicauſe they within the caſtell of Monſtreau, gaue opprobrious words vnto the kings herald that was ſent to them, the king cauſed a gibet to be ſet vp before the caſtle, on the which were hanged twelue of thoſe ſpitefull offendors, all gentlemen & fréends to the capteine named monſieur de Guitrie, who at length, perceiuing that by no means he could be ſuccoured; and fearing to be taken by force, began to treat with the king of England, who for the ſpace of eight daies would hearken to none of his offers; but in concluſion, he and his rendred themſelues ſimplie, their liues onelie ſaued, ſix wéekes after they had béene beſieged. The earle of Warwike was made capteine, both of the towne and caſtell, who fortified it with men, munition, and vittels.

It held not out ſo long as ſhould appeare by Tit. Liuius, who ſaith, yͭ it was rendred yͤ fourth of Iulie.

W.P. Buchan. lib. 7.

[About this time Robert the gouernour of Scotland, the fiftéenth yéere after his brothers reigne, and in the thirtith yeare of his owne regiment deceaſſed, in whoſe ſtéed and office his ſonne Mordac duke of Albanie was by and by choſen, who had ſonnes thrée, Walter, Alexander, and Iames, whereof the two eldeſt beginning betimes to be obſtinate, grew ſoone after verie graceles and wicked: that in one flagitious feat among the reſt by this Walter verie impiouſlie againſt his parents was vttered. The gouernour had a faire, a gentle, and well flieng falcon, whereby he ſet great ſtore. The ſonne verie deſirous of the ſame, made manie meanes and motions to haue hir, not without note of malapert importunitie and lacke of reuerence toward his parents pleaſure, which the father diſſembling to ſée, would not yet in anie wiſe forgo his hawke. Whereat this child reiecting regard of dutie, and receiuing an vnnaturall hate and heat by broth of iniquitie ſet a boiling in his breſt, came in on a time, where ſtanding a while at a ſudden braid, pluckt awaie the bird from his fathers fiſt, and ſtraight before his face wrang of hir necke. The gouernour héereat ſore aſtonied, for verie gréefe gaue a great grone; Well ſonne (quod he) ſince yée cannot bridle your brunts for dutie and reuerence toward me your parent and ſoueraigne, I will bring in one that ſhall bridle vs both. Héere vpon ſoone after, he with one Calen Campbell, a noble man & of much authoritie (vnto whome this Walter had doone a great deſpight) and with other of the nobilitie fell ſtraight in conſultation about the calling home of their king. Which all with one aſſent they did right well allow, whereby ſoone after (as is touched afore, and followeth more at large) he was by them in his kingdome right roiallie placed. But this came of it. Theſe miſchéefous children Walter and Alexander, the verie cauſe of their fathers confuſion and their owne, within few yeares after condemned by law, vpon a hill by Sterling caſtell, had their heads chopt off at once. Walters wife with hir two ſonnes, Andrew and Alexander, ran for refuge awaie into Ireland; thus for their long iniquities their hires iuſtlie paid all in a daie.]

Melun beſieged by king Henrie.

Now to procéed in our proceſſe of France. After the thus winning of the towne and caſtell of Monſtreau; the king departing from thence, came to Melun vpon Seine, the thirtéenth daie of Iulie, and beſieged it round about, hauing then in companie with him the French king, and the yong king of Scots, the dukes of Burgognie, Clarence, Bedford, Gloceſter, and Bar, the prince of Orainge, and one and twentie earles, beſides lords, barons, & knights, equall to lords in degree, to the number of ſeauen and fiftie, what of England and France; and beſide alſo fifteene maiſter ſoldiers. This ſiege continued the ſpace almoſt of ſeuen moneths, or (as Thomas Walſingham ſaith) foureteene weekes, and foure daies, with ſkirmiſhing, ſcaling, aſſaulting, and defending, to the loſſe (no doubt) of both parts. Capteine of this towne was one monſieur de Barbaſon, a Gaſcoine of ſuch experience and approoued valiancie in wars, that his renowme and fame was ſpred through the world.

The king of Scots in K. Henries armie

Eighteene weekes haue the chronicles of Flanders. Titus Liuius.

Monſieur de Barbaſon a valiãt captein.

At the firſt laieng of the ſiege, he called all the ſoldiers there in garriſon, and likewiſe the towneſmen afore him, and warned them all on paine of death, that none of them ſhould be ſo hardie, as to treat, or once to motion anie word of ſurrendring the towne, or of comming to anie compoſition or agreement with the two kings; except they made him being their capteine priuie thereto, before they attempted anie ſuch thing. ¶ In the meane ſeaſon, the French queene, the queene of England, and the duches of Burgognie, lieng at Corbeill, came diuerſe times to viſit their huſbands, and to ſee their freends; whome the king of England highlie feaſted, and louinglie interteined, that euerie creature reported great honour of him. This towne of Melun ſeemed verie ſtrong, both by reaſon of the riuer of Seine, which compaſſed part thereof, and alſo by ſtrong walles, turrets, ditches, and bulworks made about it.

Titus Liuius.

The king therefore, to take awaie all the iſſues and entries from them within, made a bridge ouer the riuer, able to beare horſſes and carriage: and againe, appointed diuerſe botes furniſhed with men of warre, to keepe the ſtreame; ſo that they within ſhould haue no waie to come abroad, either by water or land: yet on a daie, the Frenchmen ſailed foorth, and aſſailed the Engliſh lodgings, where the earle of Warwike was incamped on the eaſt ſide of the towne, not farre from the duke of Burgognie; but by the valiant prowesſe and manlie courage of the Engliſhmen, the enimies were eaſilie beaten backe and conſtreined to retire into the towne againe, with their loſſe. Heere is to be remembred, that during this ſiege before Melun, there came to the king the duke of Bauiere, the kings brother in law (but the kings ſiſter that had beene married to him, was not then liuing) and brought with him ſeauen hundred well appointed horſſemen, which were reteined to ſerue the king, and right worthilie they bare themſelues, and therefore moſt liberallie recompenſed at the kings hand, for the time they continued in his ſeruice.

The duke of Bauiere commeth to king Henrie with a number of horſſemen.

The king inforced this ſiege by all waies and meanes poſſible, to bring the towne into ſubiection, as well by mines as otherwiſe, but they within the towne ſo valiantlie behaued themſelues, as well by countermines (whereby at length they entered into the kings mines) as by other waies of reſiſtance, that by force of aſſaults it was not thought anie eaſie matter to win the ſame. It fortuned on a daie, that whileſt there roſe a contention betwixt two lords of the kings hoſt, who ſhould haue the honor to go firſt into the mine, to incounter with the Frenchmen, that now had brought their mine through into the Engliſh mines, and made barriers betwixt, that they might ſafelie come and fight with the Engliſhmen: the king (to auoid the ſtrife) entered the mine himſelfe firſt of all other, and by chance came to fight hand to hand with the lord Barbaſon, who was likewiſe entered the mine before all other of them within the towne.

The trãſlator of Tit. Liuius.

K. Henrie and mõſieur Barbaſon fight hand to hand.

After they had fought a good ſeaſon togither, at length they agreed to diſcouer either to other their names; ſo as the lord Barbaſon, firſt declaring what he was; the king likewiſe told him, that he was the king of England. Wherevpon, Barbaſon perceiuing with whome he had fought, cauſed the barriers forthwith to be cloſed, and withdrew into the citie, and the king returned backe to his campe. At length, vittels within the towne began to faile, and the peſtilence began to wax hot, ſo that the lord Barbaſon began to treat; and in concluſion, about the middeſt of Nouember (as Fabian ſaith) the towne was yeelded vpon certeine conditions, whereof one was, that all that were conſenting to the death of the duke of Burgognie, ſhould be deliuered to the king of England, of whome the lord Barbaſon was ſuſpected to be one. The king ſent them vnder the conduct of his brother the duke of Clarence, to the citie of Paris, whereof the French king made him capteine, and ſo at his comming thither, he tooke poſſeſſion of the Baſtill of S. Anthonie, the Loure, the houſe of Neelle, and the place of Bois de Vincennes.

It was ſurrendred about Alhalontide, as Thom. Wal. noteth.

Melun yeelded vp to king Henrie.

Monſieur de Barbaſon was accuſed by the duke of Burgognie, and his ſiſters as guiltie to their fathers death; but he in open court defended himſelfe as not guiltie of that crime, granting indeed and confeſſing, that he was one of the familiar ſeruants to the Dolphin, but that he was priuie or conſenting to the death of the duke of Burgognie, he vtterlie denied. Wherevpon he was not condemned, neither yet acquited, by reaſon of ſuch preſumptions and coniectures as were alledged and brought againſt him, ſo that he remained in priſon at Paris and elſe-where, the ſpace of nine yeares, till at length, being brought vnto caſtell Galliard, it chanced that the ſame caſtell was woone by thoſe of the Dolphins part, and he being as then priſoner there, eſcaped out of danger, and ſo by that means was ſet at libertie, as after ſhall appeare.

Titus Liuius.

Some write, that he had beene put to death, if he had not appealed from king Henries ſentence, vnto the iudgement of the officers at armes; alledging, that by the lawe of armes, no man hauing his brother in armes within his danger, afterwards ought to put him to death for any cauſe or quarell. And that he was the kings brother in armes he prooued it, for that he had fought with him hand to hand within the mines (as before yee haue heard) which combat was thought of equall force by the heralds, as if he had fought with the king bodie to bodie, within ſolemne liſts. The credit of this matter we leaue to the conſideration of the readers. The earle of Huntington was made capteine of Melum. In defenſe of this towne and caſtell, the French had gotten vnto them manie Scots. At the ſiege heere the king kept with him yoong Iames of Scotland, who ſent to thoſe Scots, that they ſhould come out and yeeld them vnto him, and not to ſtand in armes againſt their liege lord and king; but they gaue word backe againe, they could not take him for king, that was in the power of another, and ſo kept them in hold and in their armor ſtill. King Henrie vpon winning of theſe forts, for their rebellion againſt their prince, which they would haue to be counted conſtancie, and for their contemptuous anſwer vnto him, twentie of the proudeſt, in example of the reſt, cauſed he there to be hanged at once.

Note this appeale.

W. P.

From thence the king departed with his armie vnto Corbeill, where the French king and the two queenes then ſoiourned; and after, both the kings, accompanied with the dukes of Bedford, Burgognie, Gloceſter, and Exceſter, and the earls of Warwike and Saliſburie, with a great number of noble men and knights, ſet forth towards Paris, whome the citizens in good order met without the gates, and the cleargie alſo with ſolemne proceſſion. All the ſtreets were hanged with rich clothes, the two kings rode togither (the king of England giuing the vpper hand to his father in lawe) through the great citie of Paris, to our ladie church, where after they had ſaid their deuotions, they departed vnto their lodgings; the French king to the houſe of S. Paule, and the king of England to the caſtell of Louer.

King Henrie is receiued in at Paris.

The next daie, the two quéenes made their entrie and were receiued with like ſolemnities, as their huſbands were the day before. During all the ſeaſon that theſe two kings laie in Paris, there was a great aſſemblie called, as well of the ſpiritualtie, as of the nobles of the temporaltie, in the which, the kings ſat as iudges, before whom the duches of Burgognie by hir proctor, appealed the Dolphin, and ſeauen other, for the murther of duke Iohn hir huſband. To the which appeale, the counſell of the other part made diuerſe offers of amends, as well of foundations of chantries for préeſts, to praie for the ſoule, as recompenſe of monie to the widow and children: for the finall determination thereof, the kings, to take further aduiſe and counſell therein, appointed another daie.

The duches of Burgognie hir appeale.

At this ſame time, the thrée eſtates of the realme of France aſſembled at Paris, and there euerie perſon ſeuerallie ſware vpon the holie euangeliſts, to kéepe, ſupport, mainteine and defend the treatie and finall accord, which was concluded betwéene the two kings, and thereto euerie noble man, ſpirituall gouernour and temporall ruler, ſet to their ſeales, which inſtruments were ſent to the kings treaſurie of his eſchecker at Weſtminſter ſafelie to be kept, where they yet remaine. The French king at the ſame time being in good and perfect ſtate of health, openlie there in parlement declared, that peace was concluded, accorded, and made by his frée aſſent, and with the aduiſe of all the councell of France, and that he would for his owne part, and that his ſucceſſors ought for their parts, obſerue and kéepe the ſame, with all the articles therein conteined. And likewiſe, that all his ſubiects were bound for euer, to obſerue and kéepe the ſame, without breaking or dooing anie thing preiudiciall therevnto.

The oth of the thrée eſtates of Frãce.

During the time that the two kings thus ſoiourned in Paris, the French king kept a ſmall port, verie few, and thoſe of the meaner ſort reſorting vnto his court: but the king of England kept ſuch a ſolemne ſtate, with ſo plentifull an houſe, and ſhewed himſelfe ſo bountifull in gifts, and ſetting forth of warlike ſhewes and princelie paſtimes, that all the noble men and other reſorted to his palace, to ſée his eſtate, and to doo him honor. He tooke vpon him as regent of France, to redreſſe cauſes, remooue officers, reforme things that were amiſſe, and cauſed a new coine to be made, called a ſalute, wherein were the armes of France, and the armes of England and France quarterlie ſtamped. Alſo, to ſet all things in quiet, he conſtituted ſir Gilbert Umfreuile capteine of Melun, with a good number of valiant ſoldiers, to remaine there in garriſon, and the earle of Huntington (cooſine germane to the king) was deputed capteine at Blois de Vincenes; and the duke of Exceſter, with fiue hundred men of warre, was aſſigned to kéepe Paris. Thus had king Henrie (when he was conſtituted gouernour of the land) the diſpoſing of prouinces, townes, and caſtels at his pleaſure; and the making of lawes and ordinances, ſtanding with the drift of his policie to kéepe both people in due obedience; as Anglorum prælia bréefelie noteth; ſaieng:

The duke of Bauier about the ſame time, with the kings licence, departed into his countrie, both he and his retinue, receiuing large gifts of the kings great liberalitie, and amongſt other things, the king gaue him a cup of gold, garniſhed and ſet with pretious ſtones of great price and value. Moreouer, he had a penſion giuen him of a thouſand markes by yeare, vnder the kings letters patents, to be had and receiued of the kings frée and liberall grant, during the life of the ſaid duke. A right roiall reward ⁊ worthie the maieſtie of a king, beſtowed vpon the ſaid duke; and his retinue, partlie in reſpect of the aliance betwixt the king and him (for he had maried the kings ſiſter) but ſpeciallie for the notable ſeruice which they did him at the ſiege before Melun. So that hereby is commended vnto vs an example of gratitude and beneficence; teaching vs, that to ſuch as haue béene good and gratious vnto vs, we ſhould be alwaies forward with a right hand and readie mind to make amends in ſome proportion and meaſure.

When the king had thus ordered his buſineſſe, he with the quéene his wife, the princes, ⁊ nobles of the realme departed from Paris, the firſt of Ianuarie, and came to Rone, but firſt before his departing, he cauſed proceſſe to be made and awarded forth againſt Charles the Dolphin, commanding him to appéere at the marble table at Paris; where for lacke of appearance, he was with all ſolemnitie in ſuch caſe requiſite, denounced guiltie of the murther and homicide of Iohn duke of Burgognie, and by the ſentence of parlement baniſhed the realme: but the Dolphin withdrew into Languedoc, and after to Poictiers, getting to him ſuch fréends as he could; and namelie, he found the earle of Arminacke verie faithfull to him, not onelie aiding him with men, but alſo with his owne perſon he continuallie ſerued him againſt all his aduerſaries.

Sentence againſt the Dolphin.

The king of England comming to Rone, ſoiourned there a certeine time, and receiued the homage of all the nobles of Normandie, amongſt whome, the earle of Stafford did homage for the countie of Perch, and Arthur of Britaine likewiſe for the countie of Yurie. He alſo ordeined his lieutenant generall, both of France and Normandie, his brother Thomas duke of Clarence; and his deputie in Normandie was the earle of Saliſburie. When the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe was paſſed, he departed from Rone, with the quéene his wife, and by Amiens came to Calis, where he tooke ſhip the morow after Candlemaſſe daie, and landed at Douer, and came to Canturburie, and from thence to Eltham, and ſo through London to Weſtminſter. I paſſe ouer to write what ioy and triumph was ſhewed by the citizens of London, and of all other his ſubiects in euerie place where he came.

The king himſelfe, to render vnto God his moſt humble ⁊ hartie thanks, cauſed ſolemne proceſſions to be obſerued and kept fiue daies togither in euerie citie and towne. After that doone, he made great puruciance for the coronation of his quéene ⁊ ſpouſe, the faire ladie Katharine: which was doone the daie of S. Matthew, being the twentie fourth of Februarie, with all ſuch ceremonies and princelie ſolemnitie as apperteined. Which becauſe it was full of roialtie and honour (the qualitie of the principall perſonages requiring no leſſe) and recorded by writers of former ages, it ſéemeth neceſſarie and conuenient in this place to report it, in ſuch ſort as it is found at large in ſome, though others glanſinglie paſſe by it, as a matter of no great obſeruation. A roiall banket.

¶ After the great ſolemnization at the foreſaid coronation in the church of ſaint Peters at Weſtminſter was ended, the quéene was conueied into the great hall of Weſtminſter, and there ſet to dinner. Upon whoſe right hand ſat at the end of the table the archbiſhop of Canturburie, & Henrie ſurnamed the Rich cardinall of Wincheſter. Upon the left hand of the quéene ſat the king of Scots in his eſtate, who was ſerued with couered meſſe, as were the forenamed biſhops; but yet after them. Upon the ſame hand and ſide, néere the boords end, ſat the ducheſſe of Yorke and the counteſſe of Huntington. The earle of March, holding a ſcepter in his hand, knéeled vpon the right ſide: the earle marſhall in like manner on the left of the quéene. The counteſſe of Kent ſat vnder the table at the right foot, and the counteſſe marſhall at the left. The duke of Gloceſter ſir Humfrie was that daie ouerſéer, and ſtood before the quéene bareheaded. Sir Richard Neuill was that daie caruer to the quéene, the earles brother of Suffolke cupbearer, ſir Iohn Steward ſewar, the lord Clifford pantler in the earle of Warwikes ſtéed, the lord Willoughbie buttler in ſtéed of the erle of Arundell, the lord Graie Ruthin or Riffin naperer, the lord Audleie almoner in ſtéed of the earle of Cambridge, the earle of Worceſter was that daie earle marſhall in the earle marſhals abſence; who rode about the hall vpon a great courſer with a multitude of tipped ſtaues about him, to make and kéepe roome in the ſaid hall. Of the which hall the barons of the cinque ports began the table vpon the right hand, toward ſaint Stephans chappell; and beneath them at the table ſat the vowchers of the chancerie. Upon the left hand next to the cupboord ſat the maior and his brethren the aldermen of London. The biſhops began the table againſt the barons of the cinque ports; and the ladies againſt the maior. Of which two tables, for the biſhops, began the biſhop of London and the biſhop of Durham; and for the ladies, the counteſſe of Stafford, and the counteſſe of March.

The feaſt was all of fiſh: for the ordering of the ſeruice whereof were diuerſe lords appointed head officers, as ſteward, controller, ſurueior, and other honourable officers. For the which were appointed the earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, the lord Fitz Hugh, the lord Furneuall, the lord Graie of Wilton, the lord Ferres of Grobie, the lord Poinings, the lord Harrington, the lord Darcie, the lord Dacres, and the lord de la Ware. Theſe with others ordered the ſeruice of the feaſt as followeth; and thus for the firſt courſe. Brawne and muſtard, éeles in burneur, frument with balien, pike in herbarge, lamprie powdered, trowt, codling, plaice fried, martine fried, crabs, léech lumbard flouriſhed, tartes; and a deuiſe called a pellican, ſitting on hir neſt with hir birds, and an image of ſaint Katharine holding a booke, and diſputing with doctors, holding this poeſie in hir right hand, written in faire and legible letters, Madame le Royne; and the pellican anſwering,

The firſt courſe.

C'eeſt la ſigne & du roy, pour tenir ioy,
Et a tout ſa gent, elle mette ſa entent.

The ſecond courſe.

The ſecond courſe was: gellie coloured with columbine flowers, white potage or creame of almonds, breame of the ſea, conger, ſoles, cheuen, barbill and roch, freſh ſalmon, halibut, gurnard, rochet broiled, ſmelts fried, creuis or lobſter; léech damaſke, with the kings poeſie flouriſhed therevpon, Vne ſans plus; lamprie freſh baked, flampeine flouriſhed with a ſcutchion roiall, and therein thrée crownes of gold planted with flourdeluces and floure of camomill wrought of confections: with a deuiſe of a panther, and an image of ſaint Katharine with a whéele in one hand, & a ſcroll with a poeſie in the other, to wit,

La royne ma file, in ceſta ile,
Per bon reſoun, aues renoun.

The third courſe.

The third courſe was, dates in compoſt, creame motle, carpe deore, turbut, tench, pearch with goion, freſh ſturgion with welks, porperous roſted, mennes fried, creuiſſe de eau doure, pranis, éeles roſted with lamprie, a léech called the white léech flouriſhed with hawthorne leaues & red hawes; a marchpane garniſhed with diuerſe figures of angels, among which was ſet an image of S. Katharine, holding this poſie,

Il eſt eſcrit, pur voir & eit,
Per marriage pure, ceſt guerre ne dure.

And laſtlie a deuiſe of a tiger looking in a mirror, and a man ſitting on horſſe-backe all armed, holding in his armes a tigers whelpe with this poeſie; Per force ſans reſoun ie ay priſe ceſte beſt: and with his owne hand making a countenance of throwing of mirrors at the great tiger, which held this poeſie; Gile che mirrour ma feſte diſtour. Thus with all honour was finiſhed the ſolemne coronation, after which the quéene ſoiourned in the palace of Weſtminſter till Palmeſundaie following; and on the morow ſhe tooke hir iournie towards Windſor; where the king and ſhe held their Eaſter.]

After the ſolemne feaſt of the coronation was ended, the king as well to viſit certeine places for deuotion by waie of pilgrimage, as alſo to ſée in what ſtate and order diuerſe parts of his realme ſtood, departed from the quéene, appointing daie and place where ſhe ſhould méet him, and ſo iournied forth from place to place, thorough ſundrie countries, as well of Wales as England, and in euerie quarter where he came, he heard with diligent care the complaints of ſutors, and tooke order for the adminiſtration of iuſtice both to high and low, cauſing manie miſdemeanours to be reformed. At length he came to the towne of Leiceſter, where he found the quéene according to the appointment before taken. Here at Leiceſter, he held the feaſt of Eaſter. ¶ How then ſtandeth this with the report of Fabian, who ſaith, that the king and quéene kept their Eaſter at Windſor; and that when the ſaid feſtiuall time was expired, the king made prouiſion for his warres in France, during the tearme of Richard Whitinghams meraltie of London, which was in the eight yeare of this king Henries reigne? Suerlie there muſt néeds be an errour, either in miſtaking the yeare or the place: vnleſſe we will grant the king and quéene (with their court of attendants) to haue béene Hîc ibi ſimul, which priuilege is granted to none but Ubiquitaries.

Anno Reg. 9.

But while theſe things were thus adooing in England, the duke of Clarence, the kings lieutenant in France and Normandie, aſſembled togither all the garriſons of Normandie, at the towne of Bernaie, and from thence departed to the countrie of Maine, and at Pont le Gene he paſſed the riuer of Yonne, and rode through all the countrie to Lucie, where he paſſed the riuer of Loire, and entered into Aniou, and came before the citie of Angiers, where he made manie knights, that is to ſaie, ſir William Ros, ſir Henrie Goddard, ſir Rowland Rider, ſir Thomas Beaufort, called the baſtard of Clarence, and diuerſe other; and after that he had forraied, burnt, and ſpoiled the countrie, he returned with preie and pillage to the towne of Beaufort in the vallie, where he was aduertiſed, that a great number of his enimies, Frenchmen, Scots, Spaniards, and other were aſſembled togither, at a place called Uiell Bauge, that is, Old Baugie, with the duke of Alanſon, calling himſelfe lieutenant generall for the Dolphin.

Forguſa, a Lombard betraieth the duke of Clarence.

The duke of Clarence had a Lombard reſorting vnto him, reteined with the part aduerſe (his name was Andrew Forguſa) of whom the duke inquired the number of his enimies, to whome he reported, that their number was but ſmall, & not of puiſſance to match with halfe the power of his ſtrong armie, intiſing him with aſſurance of victorie, to ſet on the Frenchmen. The duke like a couragious prince, aſſembled togither all the horſſemen of the armie, and left the archers vnder the guiding of the baſtard of Clarence, and two Portingales, capteins of Freſnie le vicount, ſaieng, that he onelie and the nobles would haue the honor of that iournie. When the duke was paſſed a certeine ſtreict and narrow paſſage, he eſpied his enimies ranged in good order of battell, by the monition of the Lombard, which had ſold him to his enimies, & his aduerſaries had laid ſuch ambuſhments at the ſtreicts, that the duke by no waie without battell could either retire or flée.

The Engliſh men diſcomfited.

The duke of Clarence and diuerſe nobles of England ſlaine.

The Engliſhmen ſéeing this, valiantlie ſet on their enimies, who were foure to one, by reaſon whereof at length the Engliſhmen were oppreſſed with multitude, and brought to confuſion. There were ſlaine, the duke of Clarence, the earle of Tankeruile, the lord Ros, ſir Gilbert Vmfreuile earle of Angus, and ſir Iohn Lomlie, ſir Robert Verend, and almoſt two thouſand Engliſhmen: & the earles of Summerſet, Suffolke, and Perch, the lord Fitz Water, ſir Iohn Berkelie, ſir Rafe Neuile, ſir Henrie Inglis, ſir William Bowes, ſir Wiliam Longton, ſir Thomas Borough, and diuerſe other taken priſoners. And of the Frenchmen were ſlaine aboue twelue hundred of the beſt men of warre they had, ſo that they gained not much.

The baſtard of Clarence which tarried at Beaufort, being informed of the great number of the Frenchmen, made forward with all the archers, to come to the ſuccor of the duke, but they came too late. For the Frenchmen hearing of the approching of the archers, fled with their priſoners, and left the bodie of the duke, and other the dead carcaſes behind them. The archers buried them all ſauing the dukes corpſe, which with great ſolemnitie was ſent to England, and buried at Canturburie beſide his father. After this the Engliſhmen burnt and ſpoiled the countrie of Maine, and ſo returned to Alanſon, and after departed euerie man to his garriſon. This battell was fought on Eaſter euen, in the yeare 1421. But now to returne to the king.

After he had kept his Eaſter at Leiceſter, he with the quéene remoued and went northward, till they came to Yorke, where they were receiued with great ioy of the citizens, and other the nobles and gentlemen of the countrie. The king went vnto Beuerlie, to viſit the ſhrine of ſaint Iohn, and immediatlie vpon his departure from thence, the ſorowfull newes of his brother the duke of Clarences death, came to him, for which he was right penſife. But ſith mourning would not auaile, he called to remembrance what he had to doo, and therevpon without delaie, ſent Edmund earle of Mortaigne, brother to the earle of Summerſet into Normandie, giuing to him like authoritie and preheminence, as his brother the late deceaſſed duke of Clarence had before enioied.

The earle of Mortaigne made lieutenant of Normandie.

A parlement.

After this, he called his high court of parlement, in the which he declared with ſuch great wiſedome & grauitie, the acts which had béene doone in France, the ſtate of the time preſent, and what was neceſſarie to be prouided for the time to come (if they would looke to haue that iewell and high kingdome, for the which they had ſo long laboured and ſought) that the communaltie gladlie granted a fiftéenth, & the clergie beneuolentlie offred a double diſme. And bicauſe no delaie ſhould be in the kings affaires for lacke of paiment, the biſhop of Wincheſter the kings vncle lent vnto him twentie thouſand pounds, to be paid him againe of the ſame diſmes. When all things neceſſarie for this iournie were readie and prepared, he ſent his brother the duke of Bedford before him to Calis with all his armie, being (as ſome write) foure thouſand men of armes, and twentie thouſand archers and others; though ſome haue written, that the whole armie paſſed not twelue thouſand of one and other.

The biſhop of Wincheſter lent the king 20000.

King Henrie ſaileth into France againe.

He tooke ſea at Douer the fourth of Iune, as Titus Liuius ſaith, and ſo ſaie the chronicles of Flanders.

The king himſelfe ſhortlie after, about the middle of Maie, paſſed the ſeas to Calis, and ſo from thence he marched through the countrie vnto Bois de Vincennes, where the French king and the quéene as then ſoiourned. The duke of Burgognie alſo that had receiued him at Monſtruell, attended him to Dowaſt in Ponthieu, and there hauing taken leaue of him for ſix daies, returned now againe to him, according to his promiſe. Then did they conſult togither about their affaires, and appointed in all haſt to fight with the Dolphin, and to raiſe the ſiege of Chartres which he had there planted. Herevpon, the king of England with all his puiſſance, came to the towne of Mante, and thither repaired the duke of Burgognie; but yer they departed from thence, they had knowledge, that the Dolphin hearing of the puiſſant armie of the king of England approching towards him, was recoiled with his people towards Towers in Touraine.

The king of Scots ſerueth king Henrie.

Dreux beſieged & rendred to the Engliſhmen.

Herevpon the king of England incontinentlie, did not onlie ſend backe the duke of Burgognie into Picardie, to reſiſt the attempts of ſir Iaques de Harecourt, which made war in that countrie for the Dolphin; but alſo appointed the king of Scots, with the duke of Gloceſter, to beſiege the towne of Dreux. They comming thither about the eightéenth of Iulie, planted ſiege on euerie ſide, both of the towne and caſtell; and what with power of batrie, and other forcible meanes, ſo conſtreined them within, that on the eight daie of Auguſt they compounded, that if no ſufficient reſcue came to raiſe the ſiege, before the end of twelue daies next inſuing, both the towne and caſtell ſhould be deliuered to the king of Englands vſe, ſo as the ſoldiers might depart with their goods whither they would, except one Engliſhman, which was knowen to be amongſt them, being fled for treaſon out of the kings dominions.

On the twentith daie of Auguſt, which was the day of the appointment, the king of Scots receiued the towne and caſtell to the behoofe of his ſoureigne lord the king of England, who (during all the time of the ſiege) laie at Moraumall. The towneſmen that would remaine ſtill in their houſes, were ſworne to be true ſubiects to the king; and the other which refuſed, departed with the ſouldiers. The Engliſhman that was excepted, was deliuered according to the couenants; and after executed, as he had deſerued. The earle of Worceſter was made capteine of Dreux, and ſir Henrie Mortimer bailiffe there. This doone, the king hearing that the Dolphin ſhould be at Baugencie, aſſembling his power, haſted thitherwards: but at his comming into thoſe parties, he found no appearance of enimies in the field, and ſo he remained there fiftéene daies.

King Henrie purſueth the Dolphin.

In which meane while, the earle of Suffolke was ſent forth to diſcouer the countrie, and the king wan by aſſault the towne of Baugencie, and after when vittels began to faile, he marched forward, meaning to purſue the Dolphin. But the Dolphin douting the Engliſh puiſſance, conueied all the vittels forth of thoſe quarters, and retired himſelfe to Burges in Berrie, chooſing that place as his firſt refuge, & therefore determined there to remaine, till fortune turning hir whéele, ſhuld looke on them with a more fauorable countenance, hereof in ſcorne was he commonlie called king of Berrie. The king of England followed, till vittels and forrage began ſore to faile on all ſides, and then returning, paſſed towards Orleance, taking the caſtell of Rouge Mont by aſſault.

The Dolphin, why called king of Berrie.

He ſtaied thrée daies before Orleance, and from thence, for want of vittels, marched through Gaſtinois, till he came to Vignie ſur Yonne, where he remained for a ſeaſon, to refreſh his people that were ſore trauelled, in that painefull paſſed iournie: in which the king loſt not onelie manie of his men for lacke of vittels, but alſo a great number of horſſes and carriages. Some haue written, that about the ſame time, he ſhould win the citie of Sens, otherwiſe called the kings new towne by ſurrender; but after he had remained for a time at Vignie, we find that he remoued to Paris, where he was honorablie receiued. ¶ For he came among them as one hauing empire and dominion in his hand, ſo that to him they were no leſſe forward in ſubmiſſion for feare of his indignation, than readie to giue him all the interteinement that they could deuiſe for the kéeping of his fauour: the lacke whereof they knew ſtood with the hazard of their ſafetie, as the contrarie tended to their welfare.

Abr. Fl.

Shortlie after, conſidering with himſelfe that the towne of Meaux in Brie, being repleniſhed with enimies, was not to be ſuffered to remaine in that ſtate, in the middes of his new gotten ſubiects; he determined to take awaie the open ſcruple that might poiſon and infect the members, dwelling hard by: wherefore with a great number of earles and barons in his companie, he came to beſiege it. This towne was no leſſe well vittelled than manned, and no better manned than fortified; ſo that the king could neither haue it to him deliuered at his pleaſure, nor gaine it by aſſault, without the great loſſe of his people: yet neuertheleſſe, he determined not to depart, till he had got it by one meane or other. The riuer of Marne diuided this towne into two parts, ſo that there was no enterie from the one into the other, but by a bridge, raiſed vp, and made ouer the riuer, ſuſteined with manie arches. The one part is called the citie, and the other la March, being the ſtrongeſt and beſt fortified. The king firſt lodged a mile off in a caſtell, and ſent the duke of Exceſter to begin the ſiege, which he did, according to his inſtructions, vpon the ſixt of October.

The ſtrong towne of Meaux beſieged by the Engliſhmen.

Shortlie after, the king himſelfe came, and lodged in the abbeie of Pharon, the duke of Exceſter in the abbeie de Chage, the earle of March at the greie friers, and the earle of Warwike directlie againſt that part that is called la March. They within defended themſelues right valiantlie, ſo that the Engliſhmen were not all at their eaſe, but ſpecialie through lacke of vittels manie died, and manie fell ſicke, by reaſon whereof, no ſmall number returned home into England; where in the meane time, on the firſt of December, a parlement was called and holden at Weſtminſter, by the duke of Bedford, gouernour of the realme in the kings abſence. ¶ In this parlement, a fiftéenth was granted to the king towards the maintenance of the warres, the one moitie to be paid at Candlemaſſe, and the other at Martinmaſſe, of ſuch monie as at the time of the grant was currant.

A parlement called by the duke of Bedford, the king being in France.

Windſore. The birth of king Henrie the ſixt.

This yeare at Windſore on the daie of ſaint Nicholas in December, the quéene was deliuered of a ſonne named Henrie, whoſe godfathers were Iohn duke of Bedford, and Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter, and Iaquet, or (as the Frenchmen called hir) Iaqueline of Bauier, counteſſe of Holland was his godmother. The king being certified hereof, as he laie at ſiege before Meaux, gaue God thanks, in that it had pleaſed his diuine prouidence to ſend him a ſonne, which might ſuccéed in his crowne and ſcepter. But when he heard reported the place of his natiuitie; were it that he warned by ſome propheſie, or had ſome foreknowledge, or elſe iudged himſelfe of his ſonnes fortune, he ſaid vnto the lord Fitz Hugh his truſtie chamberleine theſe words; My lord, I Henrie borne at Monmouth, ſhall ſmall time reigne, & much get; and Henrie borne at Windſore, ſhall long reigne, and all loſe: but as God will, ſo be it.

King Henrie propheſieth of his ſonne.

The king held his Chriſtmaſſe at the ſiege before Meaux, for he would not giue ouer that ſiege, although his armie was greatlie diminiſhed, by reaſon of lacke of vittels, extreame cold, foule weather, and other diſcommodities that bred great ſtore of diſeaſes and ſickeneſſe among his people; notwithſtanding, all the helps and means that might be, he deuiſed to remedie the ſame: ſo that beſide ſuch as died, as well of ſickeneſſe as by the enimies hand, manie returned home into their countries. But yet he ceaſſed not to continue the ſiege, beating the walles with his ordinance, and caſting downe bulworkes and rampiers on ech ſide the towne, made approches as well by water as land, with mightie engines deuiſed of boords to defend the Engliſhmen, as they approched the walles, and gaue aſſaults. The walles alſo were in diuerſe places vndermined.

Titus Liuius.

After this, the Engliſhmen found meanes, by bridges made of boats, to paſſe the riuer; but yet the ſouldiers and other within defended their rampiers and breaches moſt ſtoutlie, and with guns and quarrels ſtill ſhot at the Engliſhmen, of whome they ſlue manie, and among other the earle of Worceſter was ſlaine, with a bullet of the great artillerie, & the lord Clifford with a quarrell of a croſſebow; yet the Engliſhmen ſtill wan ground, and got néerer and néerer to the walles. They alſo wonne the chiefeſt part of a bridge from the enimies, and kept watch and ward vpon and about the ſame. The earle of Warwike had alſo taken a Vawmure from them of the market place, built on the ſouthſide thereof, able to receiue and lodge a good number of men, which ſeruing to good purpoſe, for the better brideling of them within, he cauſed to be kept, and thus were they within Meaux ſore oppreſſed on euerie ſide.

Herevpon in Februarie, the capteins doubting leaſt the citie could not be defended long, cauſed all the vittels and goods to be conueied into the market place, and retired all the men of warre into the ſame, leauing none in the other part of the citie, but the commons, and ſuch as were not able to doo any auaileable ſeruice in the warre. The king aduertiſed hereof, commanded in all haſt to aſſault the citie, which was quicklie doone; ſo that the citie by fine force was within thrée houres taken and ſpoiled; and the ſame daie the market place beſieged round about, and a mill wonne adioining vnto the ſame. In Aprill, the quéene paſſed ouer into France, with a faire retinue of men, vnder the conduct of the duke of Bedford, the duke of Gloceſter remaining lord gouernour of the realme in his place. At hir comming thither, ſhe was ſo welcommed and honorablie receiued, firſt of hir huſband, and after of hir father and mother, that ſhe appeared to be no leſſe loued of hir noble huſband, than of hir déere and naturall parents.

Meaux taken by aſſault.

Anno Reg. 10. Quéene Katharine ſaileth into France.

Whileſt the ſiege ſtill continued before Meaux, Oliuer Mannie a valiant man of warre of the Dolphins part (which before was capteine of Faleiſe, and yéelding it, ſware neuer to beare armour againſt the king of England) aſſembled a great number of men of warre, as well Britaines as Frenchmen, that is to ſaie, the lord Montborchier, the lord of Coinon, the lord of Chatelgiron, the lord Tintignace, the lord de la Howſſaie, and diuerſe other, which entered into the countrie of Conſtantine in Normandie, and robbed and killed the Engliſhmen, where they might either eſpie or take them at their due aduantage. But the earle of Suffolke keeper of the marches, hearing of their dooings, ſent for the lord Scales, ſir Iohn Aſton bailiffe of Conſtantine, ſir William Hall, ſir Iohn Banaſter, and many other, out of the garriſons within that territorie, the which incountred with their enimies at a place called Le parke leueſque, in Engliſh, The biſhops parke.

A ſore cõflict.

There was a ſore fight and a long betwixt them, but finallie, the Frenchmen were put to flight, ſo that in the conflict and chaſe were ſlaine, the lord of Coinon, the lord of Chatellgiron, and thrée hundred other: and there were taken priſoners, the lord de la Howſſaie, and ſir Oliuer Mannie, with thréeſcore others. The king pardoned ſir Oliuer Mannie his life, though he ill deſerued ſo great a benefit, for that he had broken his oth and promiſe, but he was ſent into England, there to learne to ſpeake Engliſh, and ſo being brought to London, ſhortlie after died, being as then a verie aged man, & was buried in the white friers. ¶ But here note (by the waie) the roiall hart of this king, who as he tempered all his actions with ſingular circumſpection; ſo with a pitifull mind he pondered the miſerie of his enimies; ſo that when he might (Iure belli, by the law of armes) haue ſpoiled them of goods and life, he diuerſe times ſpared both; with clemencie cõmonlie making conqueſt of them, who ſéemed by open hoſtilitie ſcarſe conquerable.

Abr. Fl.

The king lieng ſtill before the market place at Meaux in Brie (as ye haue heard) ſore beat the wals with his ordinance, and caſt downe bulworkes and rampiers on euerie ſide the towne, ſo that he had made an open breach for his people to enter. Wherof the lord of Offemont being aduertiſed, with a companie of choſen perſons ſent by the Dolphin, aſſaied in the night ſeaſon to enter the towne, to the ſuccours of them within. But though diuerſe of his people got ouer the walles, by helpe of ladders which they had ſet vp; yet ſuch was his chance, that as he paſſed a planke, to haue come to the walles, he fell into a déepe ditch; and in the meane time, the Engliſhmen perceiuing by the noiſe what the matter meant, came running to the ditch, tooke the lord of Offemont, and ſlue diuerſe of his companie that ſtood in defenſe.

Continuation de la chronicles de Flanders.

The capteins within, perceiuing in what caſe they ſtood, by reaſon their ſuccours were thus intercepted, and doubting to be taken by aſſault, for that they wanted munition and weapon, began to treat with the king of England, who appointed the earle of Warwike, and the lord Hungerford, to commune with them; and in concluſion an accord was taken, and ſo the towne and market place with all the goods were deliuered into the king of Englands hands, the tenth daie of Maie, in the yeare 1422. The appointment taken with them of this towne was this, that they ſhould yéeld themſelues ſimplie vnto the kings pleaſure, their liues onlie ſaued: and hereupon manie of them were ſent ouer into England, amongſt whome was the biſhop of that towne, which ſhortlie after his arriuall here fell ſicke and died.

Titus Liuius. The conditions of the ſurrender of Meaux into the kings hands.

There were alſo foure perſons excepted, againſt whome the king might by order of law and iuſtice procéed as he ſaw cauſe, for their faults and treſpaſſes committed. As firſt, the capteine of the towne, named the baſtard of Vaurcu, the which had doone manie gréeuous oppreſſions to the people of the countrie thereabouts, in ſpoiling them of their goods and ranſoming them at his pleaſure. He had alſo put diuerſe to death moſt cruellie, when they were not able to paie ſuch finance and ranſomes as he demanded. Whereupon, being now put to death himſelfe, his bodie was hanged vpon a trée that ſtood on an hill without the towne, on the which he had cauſed both huſbandmen and townesmen, with other priſoners, to be hanged before time. His ſtandard alſo, which was woont to be borne before him in battell, was ſet vp in the ſame trée. The bailiffe alſo of the towne, and two of the chéefeſt burgeſſes that had béene of counſell with him in his vnlawfull dooings, were likewiſe executed. Alſo beſide theſe, there were found in this towne diuerſe that were accuſed to be guiltie of the duke of Burgognies death, wherefore they were put to their triall, in the parlement at Paris, and ſome of them being found guiltie, were executed.

When the deliuerie of the ſtrong towne of Meaux was publiſhed thorough out the countrie, all the townes and fortreſſes in the Ile of France, in Lannois, in Brie, & in Champaigne, yéelded themſelues to the king of England, which appointed in the ſame valiant capteins, and hardie ſoldiers. After that he had thus got poſſeſſion of Meaux, and the other fortreſſes, he returned againe to Bois de Vincennes, and being there receiued of the king and quéene of France, and of the quéene his wife the thirtith daie of Maie, being Whitſun éeuen, they remooued all togither vnto Paris, where the king of England lodged in the caſtell of Loure, and the French king in the houſe of ſaint Paule. Theſe two kings kept great eſtate with their quéenes, at this high feaſt of Pentecoſt, but the king of Englands court greatlie excéeded, ſo that all the reſort was thither. The Pariſiens that beheld his princelie port & high magnificence, iudged him rather an emperour than a king, and their owne king to be in reſpect of him like a duke or marqueſſe.

The roiall port of the K. of England.

The Dolphin hauing knowledge by eſpials where the king of England and his power laie, came with all his puiſſance ouer the riuer of Loire, and beſieged Coſneie, a towne ſituate vpon that riuer, a ſix ſcore miles diſtant from Paris, and appointed part of his armie to waſte and deſtroie the confines of the duchie of Burgognie, to the intent to diuide the power of the king of England, from the ſtrength of the duke of Burgognie, ſuppoſing (as it came to paſſe indéed) that the duke would make haſt towards Burgognie, to defend his owne lands. In the meane time, they within Coſneie were ſo hard handled, that they promiſed to render their towne to the Dolphin, if they were not reſcued by the king of England within ten daies. King Henrie hearing theſe newes would not ſend anie one creature, but determined to go himſelfe to the raiſing of that ſiege, and ſo with all diligence came to the towne of Corbeill, and ſo to Senlis, where (whether it were with heat of the aire, or that he with his dailie labour were féebled or weakened) he began to wax ſicke, yea and ſo ſicke, that he was conſtreined to tarrie, and ſend his brother the duke of Bedford to reſcue them of Coſneie, which he did to his high honor. For the Dolphin hearing that the duke of Bedford was comming to raiſe his ſiege departed thence into Berrie, to his great diſhonor, and leſſe gaine.

Coſneie beſieged by the Dolphin.

The king falleth ſicke.

Coſneie reſcued by the duke of Bedford.

About the ſame time, the duke of Britaine ſent his chancellor the biſhop of Naunts, with the biſhop of Vannes, and others of his councell, as ambaſſadors from him vnto king Henrie, with full commiſſion, to ratifie and allow for him and his people the peace concluded at Troies: but by reaſon of the kings gréeuous ſickneſſe, nothing was then doone in that matter. Neuertheleſſe, the duke himſelfe in perſon came afterwards to Amiens, and there performed that which he had appointed his ambaſſadors at this time, in his name, to haue doone and accompliſhed.

Titus Liuius. The duke of Britaine ſendeth ambaſſadors to the K. of England.

The king of England is brought ſicke to Bois de Vincennes.

ſhed. In the meane ſeaſon, king Henrie waxed ſicker and ſicker, and ſo in an horſelitter was conueied to Bois de Vincennes, to whome ſhortlie after repaired the dukes of Bedford and Gloceſter, & the earles of Saliſburie and Warwike, whome the king louinglie welcomed, and ſeemed glad of their preſence.

His aduiſe vpon his death bed.

Now, when he ſaw them penſiſe for his ſickneſſe, and great danger of life wherein he preſentlie laie, he with manie graue, courteous, and pithie words, recomforted them the beſt he could, and therewith exhorted them to be truſtie and faithfull vnto his ſonne, and to ſee that he might be well and vertuouſlie brought vp. And as concerning the rule and gouernance of his realms, during the minoritie and yoong yeares of his ſaid ſonne, he willed them to ioine togither in freendlie loue and concord, keeping continuall peace and amitie with the duke of Burgognie, and neuer to make treatie with Charles that called himſelfe Dolphin of Vienne, by the which anie part either of the crowne of France, or of the duches of Normandie and Guien may be leſſened or diminiſhed; and further, that the duke of Orleance, and the other princes ſhould ſtill remaine priſoners, till his ſonne came to lawfull age, leaſt returning home againe, they might kindle more fire in one daie than might be quenched in three.

He further aduiſed them, that if they thought it neceſſarie, that it ſhould be good to haue his brother Humfreie duke of Gloceſter to be protector of England, during the nonage of his ſonne, and his brother the duke of Bedford, with the helpe of the duke of Burgognie to rule and to be regent of France, commanding him with fire and ſword to perſecute the Dolphin, till he had either brought him to reaſon and obeiſance, or elſe to driue and expell him out of the realme of France. And herewith he proteſted vnto them, that neither the ambitious deſire to inlarge his dominions, neither to purchaſe vaine renowme and worldlie fame, nor anie other conſideration had mooued him to take the warres in hand; but onelie that in proſecuting his iuſt title, he might in the end atteine to a perfect peace, and come to enioie thoſe peeces of his inheritance, which to him of right belonged: and that before the beginning of the ſame warres, he was fullie perſuaded by men both wiſe and of great holineſſe of life, that vpon ſuch intent he might and ought both begin the ſame warres, and follow them, till he had brought them to an end iuſtlie and rightlie, and that without all danger of Gods diſpleaſure or perill of ſoule.

Titus Liuius.

Cheſlie Chichelie archb. of Cantur. for daſhing ẏ bill againſt the cleargie, as appeares before, pag. 545, 546.

The noble men preſent, promiſed to obſerue his precepts, and to performe his deſires; but their hearts were ſo penſiſe, and repleniſhed with ſorrow, that one could not for weeping behold an other. Then he ſaid the ſeauen pſalmes, and receiued the ſacrament, and in ſaieng the pſalmes of the paſſion ended his daies heere in this world, at Bois ſaint Vincent, the laſt of Auguſt, in the yeare a thouſand foure hundred twentie and two. This Henrie was a king, of life without ſpot, a prince whome all men loued, and of none diſdained, a capteine againſt whome fortune neuer frowned, nor miſchance once ſpurned, whoſe people him ſo ſeuere a iuſticer both loued and obeied (and ſo humane withall) that he left no offenſe vnpuniſhed, nor freendſhip vnrewarded; a terrour to rebels, and ſuppreſſour of ſedition, his vertues notable, his qualities moſt praiſe-worthie.

He departed this life the laſt of Auguſt 1422.

The commendation of king Henrie the fift as is expreſſed by maiſt. Hall.

In ſtrength and nimbleneſſe of bodie from his youth few to him comparable, for in wreſtling, leaping, and running, no man well able to compare. In caſting of great iron barres and heauie ſtones he excelled commonlie all men, neuer ſhrinking at cold, nor ſlothfull for heat; and when he moſt laboured, his head commonlie vncouered; no more wearie of harneſſe than a light cloake, verie valiantlie abiding at needs both hunger and thirſt; ſo manfull of mind as neuer ſeene to quinch at a wound, or to ſmart at the paine; not to turne his noſe from euill ſauour, nor cloſe his eies from ſmoke or duſt; no man more moderate in eating and drinking, with diet not delicate, but rather more meet for men of warre, than for princes or tender ſtomachs. Euerie honeſt perſon was permitted to come to him, ſitting at meale, where either ſecretlie or openlie to declare his mind. High and weightie cauſes as well betweene men of warre and other he would gladlie heare, and either determined them himſelfe, or elſe for end committed them to others. He ſlept verie little, but that verie ſoundlie, in ſo much that when his ſoldiers ſoong at nights, or minſtrels plaied, he then ſlept faſteſt; of courage inuincible, of purpoſe vnmutable, ſo wiſehardie alwaies, as feare was baniſht from him; at euerie alarum he firſt in armor, and formoſt in ordering. In time of warre ſuch was his prouidence, bountie and hap, as he had true intelligence, not onelie what his enimies did, but what they ſaid and intended: of his deuiſes and purpoſes few, before the thing was at the point to be done, ſhould be made priuie.

He had ſuch knowledge in ordering and guiding an armie, with ſuch a gift to incourage his people, that the Frenchmen had conſtant opinion he could neuer be vanquiſhed in battell. Such wit, ſuch prudence, and ſuch policie withall, that he neuer enterpriſed any thing, before he had fullie debated and forecaſt all the maine chances that might happen, which doone with all diligence and courage he ſet his purpoſe forward. What policie he had in finding preſent remedies for ſudden miſcheeues, and what engines in ſauing himſelfe and his people in ſharpe diſtreſſes: were it not that by his acts they did plainlie appeare, hard were it by words to make them credible. Wantonneſſe of life and thirſt in auarice had he quite quenched in him; vertues in deed in ſuch an eſtate of ſoueraigntie, youth, and power, as verie rare, ſo right commendable in the higheſt degree. So ſtaied of mind and countenance beſide, that neuer iolie or triumphant for victorie, nor ſad or damped for loſſe or misfortune. For bountifulneſſe and liberalitie, no man more free, gentle, and franke, in beſtowing rewards to all perſons, according to their deſerts: for his ſaieng was, that he neuer deſired monie to keepe, but to giue and ſpend.

Although that ſtorie properlie ſerues not for theme of praiſe or diſpraiſe, yet what in breuitie may well be remembred, in truth would not be forgotten by ſloth, were it but onlie to remaine as a ſpectacle for magnanimitie to haue alwaies in eie, and for incouragement to nobles in honourable enterpriſes. Knowen be it therefore, of perſon and forme was this prince rightlie repreſenting his heroicall affects, of ſtature and proportion tall and manlie, rather leane than groſe, ſomewhat long necked and blacke haired, of countenance amiable, eloquent and graue was his ſpeech, and of great grace and power to perſuade: for concluſion, a maieſtie was he that both liued & died a paterne in princehood, a lode-ſtarre in honour, and mirrour of magnificence: the more highlie exalted in his life, the more deepelie lamented at his death, and famous to the world alwaie. Peter Baſſet (a cheefe man in his chamber) affirmed that he deceaſſed of a pleuriſie, though the Scots and French ſet it downe to be of ſaint Feacres diſeaſe, that they ſaie was a palſie with a crampe, which Enguerant reports to be ſaint Anthonies fire, but neither of them trulie. ¶ Anglorum prælia ſaith, that it was a ſharpe feuer, which happening vnto him (wearied with the broiles of warre) in a verie vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, namelie the dogdaies, tormented him the ſorer, and grew to be not onelie dangerous, but alſo deſperat; for it left him not till life was extinguiſhed: the poets report is, as followeth:

Interea fractúmq; æstu nimióq; labore
Corripit Henricum languentem febris acuta,
Cæli intemperies, ſextili Sirius ardens
*Virus *peſtiferi fecit ingrandeſcere morbi.

*A peſtilent feuer.

His bodie imbalmed and cloſed in lead, was laid in a chariot roiall, richlie apparelled with cloth of gold. Upon his coffin was laid a repreſentation of his perſon, adorned with robes, diadem, ſcepter, & ball, like a king; the which chariot, ſix horſſes drew richlie trapped, with ſeuerall appointments; the firſt with the armes of S. George, the ſecond with the armes of Normandie, the third of king Arthur, the fourth of ſaint Edward, the fift of France, and the ſixt with the armes of England and France. On this ſame chariot gaue attendance James K. of Scots, the principall mourner, king Henries vncle Thomas duke of Exceſter, Richard earle of Warwike, the earle of March Edmund, the earle of Stafford Humfrie, the earle of Mortaigne Edmund Beaufort, the lord Fitz Hugh Henrie, the lord Hungerford Walter, ſir Robert Robſert lord Bourchier, ſir John Cornwall lord Fanhope, and the lord Crumwell were the other mourners. The lord Louell, the lord Audeleie, the lord Morleie, the lord Sowch bare the baners of ſaints and auowries, as then they were called; the baron of Dudleie bare the ſtandard, and the earle of Longuile the baner. The hachments were caried onelie by capteins to the number of twelue; and round about the chariot rode fiue hundred men of armes all in blacke armour, their horſſes barbed blacke, and they with the but ends of their ſpeares vpwards.

Lord Crumwell.

The conduct of this dolorous funerall was committed to ſir William Philip, treaſuror of the kings houſhold, and to ſir William Porter, his chéefe caruer, and others. Beſide this, on euerie ſide of the chariot went thrée hundred perſons, holding long torches, & lords bearing baners, banerols, and penons. With this funerall appointment was he conueied from Bois de Uincennes, to Paris, and ſo to Rone, to Abuile, to Calis, to Douer, from thence thorough London to Weſtminſter, where he was interred with ſuch ſolemne ceremonies, mourning of lords, praier of prieſts, and ſuch lamenting of commons, as neuer before then the like was ſéene in England. Shortlie after this ſolemne buriall, his ſorowfull quéene returned into England, and kept hir eſtate with the yong king hir ſonne.

Thus ended this puiſſant prince his moſt noble and fortunate reigne, whoſe life (ſaith Hall) though cruell Atropos abbreuiated; yet neither fire, malice, nor fretting time ſhall appall his honour, or blot out the glorie of him that in ſo ſmall time had doone ſo manie and roiall acts. [In this yeare, the one and twentith of October deceaſſed the gentle and welbeloued Charles French king the ſixt of that name, who was buried at S. Denis.] ¶So that betwéene the death of theſe two kings, namelie the one of England, the other of France, there was no great ſpace of time; ſith Charles departed in October, and Henrie in Auguſt: by the priuation of whoſe liues, which of the two realmes ſuſteined the greater loſſe, it is a queſtion not to be diſcuſſed. Certeine it is that they were both ſoucreigns tenderlie loued of their ſubiects, as they were princes greatlie fauouring their people. Finallie, in memorie of this Henrie the fift, a king of a roiall hart, and euerie waie indued with imperiall vertues, I find ſo fit a report conſpiring in truth with his properties and diſpoſition, that I thinke it verie conuenient here to be inſerted in place of an epitaph:

Henrici illuſtris properans mors occupat artus,

Dilexit, nunc rarò iracundior ore.

Of learned men and writers, theſe I find remembred by Bale and others, to haue liued in the daies of this noble and valiant king Henrie the fift. Firſt, Alaine de Lin, borne in Lin, and profeſſed a Carmelite frier in that towne, he at length became prior of that conuent, procéeded doctor of diuinitie in Cambridge, and wrote manie treatiſes; Thomas Otterborne that wrote an hiſtorie of England, is thought to liue about this ſeaſon, he was a Franciſcan or graie frier, as they called them, a great ſtudent both in diuinitie and philoſophie; John Seguard an excellent poet, and a rhetorician, kept a ſchoole, and read to his ſcholers in Norwich, as is ſuppoſed, writing ſundrie treatiſes, reprouing as well the profaning of the chriſtian religion in monks and prieſts, as the abuſe of poetrie in thoſe that take vpon them to write filthie verſes and rimes; Robert Roſe a frier of the Carmelites order in Norwich commonlie called the white friers, both an excellent philoſopher, and diuine, procéeded doctor at Oxenford, promoted to be prior of his houſe, and writing diuerſe treatiſes: amongſt all the ſophiſts of his time (as ſaith Bale) he offended none of the Wickleuiſts, who in that ſeaſon ſet forth purelie the word of God, as maie appeare by his workes.

Moreouer, John Lucke, a doctor of diuinitie in Oxenford, a ſore enimie to the Wickleuiſts; Richard Caiſter borne in Norfolke, vicar of ſaint Stephans in Norwich, a man of great holineſſe and puritie in life, fauouring (though ſecretlie) the doctrine of the Wickleuiſts, and reprouing in his ſermons, the vnchaſt manners and filthie example that appeared in the cleargie. Of ſir John Oldcaſtell lord Cobham ye haue heard before; William Walleis a blacke frier in Lin, and prouinciall of his order here in England, made a booke of moralizations vpon Ouids Metamorphôſeis, comparable to poſtils vpon Aeſops Fables; Richard Snetiſham, a ſtudent in Oxenford, where he profited ſo greatlie in learning and wiſedome, that he was accounted the chéefeſt in all that vniuerſitie, in reſpect whereof he was made chancellor of the ſame, choſen alſo to be one of the twelue to examine and iudge vpon Wickliffes doctrine by the archbiſhop of Canturburie; John Langdene a monke of Chriſtes church in Canturburie, an other of thoſe twelue; William Tailor a prieſt, and a maſter of art in Oxenford, a ſtedfaſt follower of Wickliffes doctrine, & burnt for the ſame in Smithfield at London, the ſecond day of March, in the yeare of our Lord 1422, & laſt of king Henrie the fift his reigne.

W.P.

Furthermore, Richard Graſdale ſtudent in Oxenford, one of thoſe twelue alſo; William Lindwood a lawier excellentlie learned, as well in the ciuill as canon lawes, aduanced to the ſeruice of this king, and made by him kéeper of the priuie ſeale, ſent in ambaſſage both to the kings of Spaine and Portingale, about buſineſſe of moſt weightie importance. It is ſaid that he was promoted to the biſhoprike of ſaint Dauid; Bartholomew Florarius, ſuppoſed (as Bale ſaith) by Nicholas Brigham, to be an Engliſhman, wrote a treatiſe called Florarium, whereof he tooke his ſurname; and alſo an other treatiſe of abſtinence, in which he reproueth certeine corrupt manners in the cleargie, and the profeſſion of friers mendicants; Adam Hemmelington, a Carmelite frier, ſtudied both in Oxenford and Paris; William Batecombe is placed by Bale about the time of other learned men that liued in this kings time, he was an excellent mathematician, as by the the title of his works which he wrote it ſhould appeare.

Titus Liuius de Foro Luuiſiis liued alſo in theſe daies, an Italian borne: but ſith he was both reſiant here, and wrote the life of this king, I haue thought good to place him among other of our Engliſh writers. One there was that tranſlated the ſaid hiſtorie into Engliſh, adding (as it were by waie of notes in manie places of that booke) ſundrie things for the more large vnderſtanding of the hiſtorie: a copie whereof I haue ſeene belonging to Iohn Stow citizen of London. There was alſo about the ſame time an other writer, who (as I remember) hath followed the ſaid Liuius in the order of his booke, as it were chapter for chapter, onelie changing a good, familiar and eaſie ſtile, which the ſaid Liuius vſed, into a certeine poeticall kind of writing: a copie whereof I haue ſeene (& in the life of this king partlie followed) belonging to maſter Iohn Twine of Kent, who (as I was informed) meant to leaue to poſteritie ſome fruits of his labours for the due vnderſtanding thereof.

Thus farre Henrie the fift ſonne and ſucceſſor to Henrie the fourth.

Buchan. lib. 10.

AFter that death had bereft the world of that noble prince king Henrie the fift, his onelie ſonne prince Henrie, being of the age of nine moneths, or thereabouts, with the ſound of trumpets was openlie proclamed king of England and France the thirtith daie of Auguſt, by the name of Henrie the ſixt; in the yeare of the world fiue thouſand, three hundred, eightie and nine, after the birth of our Sauiour 1422, about the twelfe yeare of the emperour Frederike the third, the fortith and two and laſt of Charles the ſixt, and the third yeare of Mordaks regiment (after his father Robert) gouernour of Scotland. The cuſtodie of this yoong prince was appointed to Thomas duke of Exceſter, & to Henrie Beauford biſhop of Wincheſter. The duke of Bedford was deputed regent of France, and the duke of Gloceſter was ordeined protectour of England; who taking vpon him that office, called to him wiſe and graue councellors, by whoſe aduiſe he prouided and tooke order as well for the good gouernment of the realme & ſubiects of the ſame at home, as alſo for the maintenance of the warres abroad, and further conqueſt to be made in France, appointing valiant and expert capteins, which ſhould be readie, when need required. Beſides this, he gathered great ſummes of monie to mainteine men of warre, and left nothing forgotten that might aduance the good eſtate of the realme.

While theſe things were a dooing in England, the duke of Bedford regent of France ſtudied moſt earneſtlie, not onelie to keepe and well order the countries by king Henrie late conquered; but alſo determined not to leaue off warre & trauell, till Charles the Dolphin (which was now aflote, becauſe king Charles his father in the moneth of October in this preſent yeare was departed to God) ſhould either be ſubdued, or brought to obeiſance. And ſuerlie the death of this king Charles cauſed alterations in France. For a great manie of the nobilitie, which before, either for feare of the Engliſh puiſſance, or for the loue of this king Charles (whoſe authoritie they followed) held on the Engliſh part, did now reuolt to the Dolphin, with all indeuour to driue the Engliſh nation out of the French territories. Whereto they were the more earneſtlie bent, and thought it a thing of greater facilitie, becauſe of king Henries yoong yeares; whome (becauſe he was a child) they eſteemed not, but with one conſent reuolted from their ſworne fealtie: as the recorder of the Engliſhmens battels with forren nations verie aptlie doth note, ſaieng:

Hîc Franci puerum regem neglectui habentes
Deſciſcunt, violátque fidem gens perfida ſacro
Conſilio ante datam.

The duke of Bedford being greatlie mooued with theſe ſudden changes, fortified his townes both with garriſons of men, munition, and vittels, aſſembled alſo a great armie of Engliſhmen and Normans, and ſo effectuouſlie exhorted them to continue faithfull to their liege and lawfull lord yoong king Henrie, that manie of the French capteins willinglie ſware to king Henrie fealtie and obedience, by whoſe example the communaltie did the ſame. Thus the people quieted, and the countrie eſtabliſhed in order, nothing was minded but warre, and nothing ſpoken of but conqueſt.

The Dolphin which lay the ſame time in the citie of Poitiers, after his fathers deceaſſe, cauſed himſelfe to be proclamed king of France, by the name of Charles the ſeuenth: and in good hope to recouer his patrimonie, with an haultie courage preparing war, aſſembled a great armie: and firſt the warre began by light ſkirmiſhes, but after it grew into maine battels. The Dolphin thinking not to loſe anie occaſions of well doing, ſent the lord Grauile to the towne of Pont Meulan, ſtanding on the riuer of Seine, who comming to the ſame vpon the ſudden, the fourteenth of Ianuarie, tooke it, and ſlue a great number of Engliſh ſouldiors, which he found within it.

When the duke of Bedford the regent, aduertiſed of this ſudden ſurpriſe, appointed the lord Thomas Montacute earle of Saliſburie (a man both for policie and courage, liker to the old Romans than to men of his daies) accompanied with the earle of Suffolke, the lord Scales, the yong lord Poinings, ſir Iohn Faſtolfe maiſter of the houſhold, with himſelfe, and diuerſe others, to beſiege the ſaid towne of Pont Meulan, which after two moneths ſiege was rendred to the ſaid earle, and the lord Grauile ſware to be true to the king of England euer after that day: but ſhortlie after, forgetting his oth, he turned French againe.

Lord Grauile falſified his oth.

The earle of Saliſburie appointed ſir Henrie Mortimer, and ſir Richard Vernon, capteins of the towne, and from thence went into Champaigne, and there beſieged the towne of Sens, tooke it, and ſir William Marin the capteine within it, and ſlue all the ſouldiors that kept it, made capteins there ſir Hugh Godding, & ſir Richard Aubemond. ¶ In this ſeaſon, Humfrie duke of Glouceſter, either ſtriken in loue, or vpon ſome other occaſion, maried the ladie Iaquet or Iaquelin, daughter and ſole heire to William of Bauier duke of Holland, which was lawfull wife to Iohn duke of Brabant then liuing, who afterwards (as after ye ſhall heare) recouered hir out of the dukes hands.

The chances thus happening (as you before haue heard) Iohn duke of Bedford, Philip duke of Burgognie, and Iohn duke of Britaine made a freendlie meeting in the citie of Amiens, where they renewed the old league and ancient amitie made betweene the noble prince king Henrie the fift and them, adding thereto theſe conditions and agreements, ech of them to be to the other freend and aider; and the enimie of the one to be enimie to the other; and all they to be freends and aiders to the king of England, welwiller to his welwillers, and aduerſarie to his aduerſaries. And (bicauſe that affinitie is commonlie the bond of amitie) there was concluded a mariage betweene the duke of Bedford, and the ladie Anne ſiſter to the duke of Burgognie, which was after ſolemnized at Trois in Champaigne, in the preſence of the duke of Burgognie brother to the bride, and of hir vncle the duke of Brabant, the earles of Saliſburie and Suffolke, and of nine hundred lords, knights, and eſquiers, with ſuch feaſt and triumph, as before that time had not beene ſeene of the Burgognions.

Affinitie an interteiner of friendſhip.

Whileſt theſe matters were in hand, the Pariſiens, thinking to blind the eies of the duke of Bedford, wrote to him how diuerſe caſtels and fortreſſes lieng about their territories, were repleniſhed with their enimies, dailie ſtopping their paſſages, and robbing their merchants, to their vtter vndoing, if they by his helpe were not releeued. But this was but a gloſe of the Pariſiens, meaning to cauſe him to go about the winning of ſome ſtrong hold, whileſt they in his abſence might bring into the citie Charles the Dolphin, that then called himſelfe French king; for ſo had they appointed, aſſigning to him the daie of his comming, and the poſt of his entrie. But their practiſe being diſcouered to the duke of Bedford, he with a great power entered into Paris, one daie before the faire was appointed, & two nights before he was looked for of his enimies being vnprouided, and ſuddenlie cauſed the conſpirators within the citie to be apprehended, and openlie to be put to execution.

The Pariſiens preuented of their practiſes.

This doone, putting a miſtruſt in the Pariſiens, he cauſed the caſtels and fortreſſes neere and adioining to the citie, to be furniſhed with Engliſhmen. And to auoid all night-watchers about Paris, and the confines thereof, he firſt tooke into his poſſeſſion either by aſſault or compoſition, the towne of Trainelle and Braie vpon Seine. And bicauſe two caſtels, the one called Pacie, and the other Courſaie were alſo euill neighbors to the Pariſiens, he ſent ſir Iohn Faſtolfe great maiſter of his houſhold with a notable armie to win the ſame caſtels; which he did, and with preie and priſoners returned backe againe to his maiſter the regent.

In this verie ſeaſon, the Dolphin ſent the lord William Steward earle of Buchquhane that was conſtable of France, and the earle of Ventadour in Auuergne, and manie other noble men of his part, to laie ſiege to the towne of Crauant in the countie of Auxerre, within the parts of Burgognie. Whereof hearing the lord regent, and the duke of Burgognie they aſſembled a great armie, and appointed the earle of Saliſburie to haue the guiding thereof; who with his capteins and men of warre, Engliſh and Burgognions, came in good arraie to giue battell to the beſiegers. And bicauſe the riuer of Yonne, which runneth by the ſaid towne, was betweene the Engliſh armie, and their aduerſaries, they could not well aſſaile their enimies, which defended the bankes and paſſages verie ſtronglie: yet notwithſtanding, both horſſemen and footmen of the Engliſh part couragiouſlie put themſelues into the riuer, and with fine force recouered the banke, whome the Burgognions incontinentlie followed.

The Engliſh armie entreth the riuer and winneth the banke.

When they were all gotten into the plaine, the archers ſhot, the bill men ſtrake, and long was the fight in doubtfull balance. But in concluſion the Frenchmen not able to reſiſt the force of the Engliſh nation, were diſcomfited, ſlaine, and chaſed, leauing a glorious victorie to the Engliſhmen and Burgognions. There were ſlaine of the Frenchmen an eighteene hundred knights and eſquiers, beſide commons: of Scots neere hand three thouſand. Amongeſt the Frenchmen theſe were chiefeſt that were ſlaine: the earle of Leſtrake, the earle of Comigens, the earle of Tonnoire, the lord Coquart de Comeron, the baſtard of Arminake, the vicount of Touraine, the baſtard of Forreſtes, the lord de Port, and the lord Memorancie.

Of Scots the lord of ſaint Iohns towne, ſir Iohn of Balgarie, ſir Iohn Turnbull, ſir Iohn Holiburton, ſir Robert Liſlie, ſir William Coningham, ſir William Dowglas, ſir Alexander Hume, ſir William Liſlie, ſir Iohn Rotherford, ſir William Craiford, ſir Thomas Seton, ſir William Hamilton, and his ſonne, Iohn Pillot. There were taken the earle of Buchquhane conſtable of France, which loſt his eie, the earle of Ventadour, ſir Alexander Meldrine, ſir Lewes Ferignie, and two and twentie hundred gentlemen of the French part. Of Engliſhmen there were ſlaine ſir Iohn Greie, ſir William Hall, ſir Gilbert Halſall one of the marſhals of the field, Richard ap Madocke, and one and twentie hundred ſouldiers and men of warre.

Anno Reg. 2.

After this fortunate victorie was the earle of Saliſburie made (by the lord regent) lieutenant and vicegerent for the king and the ſaid lord regent in the countries of France, Brie, and Champaigne; and ſir Iohn Faſtolf was ſubſtituted deputie vnder the lord regent within the duchie of Normandie on this ſide the riuer of Seine; and withall he was alſo made gouernour of the countries of Aniou and Maine. The earle of Saliſburie after fiue moneths ſiege, wan by ſurrender the towne and caſtell of Montaguillon in Brie; the capteins whereof, the one named Pregent of Cotinie, and Guille Bourgois Britons, ſware neuer to beare armour againſt the Engliſhmen on this ſide the riuer of Loire. In the meane time of that ſiege, the earle of Suffolke tooke by force the caſtell of Coucie, and the ſtrong caſtell of la Roch in Maſconnois he got by appointment.

1424 Ann.1423, per Buchanan.

In this ſecond yeare of king Henrie the ſixt, James (the firſt of that name & the hundred & ſecond K. of Scotland, tooke to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to John earle of Summerſet deceaſſed, and ſiſter to John then duke of Summerſet, and alſo cooſine germane remoued to king Henrie, and neece to the duke of Wincheſter, and to the duke of Exceſter) was ſet at libertie, couenanting to paie a ſmall portion of monie more than was allowed to him for his wiues marriage monie, and left hoſtages for the ſame. But before his departure out of the realme, he did his homage vnto the yong king of England Henrie the ſixt at the caſtell of Windſor, before three dukes, two archbiſhops, twelue earles, ten biſhops, twentie barons, and two hundred knights and eſquiers, beſide others, in order of words according to the tenour hereafter following.

Homage doone by the king of Scotland to king Henrie the ſixt.

The formall recogniſance or acknowledgement of the ſaid homage.

I James Steward, K. of Scots, ſhall be true and faithfull vnto you lord Henrie by the grace of God king of England & France, the noble and ſuperiour lord of the kingdome of Scotland; and to you I make my fidelitie for the ſame kingdome of Scotland, which I hold and claime of you; and I ſhall beare you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldlie honour againſt all men; and faithfullie I ſhall knowledge and ſhall doo you ſeruice due for the kingdome of Scotland aforeſaid. So God helpe me, and theſe holie euangeliſts.

But notwithſtanding this his oth, and the great bounteous liberalitie of the mother & vncles of his wife, in beſtowing on him abundance of plate & treaſure, with rich clothes of arras; he had not beene long at home, but that ſoone out of France into Scotland ouer came there James Steward, who (after manie of the Scotiſh nobilitie by diuerſe occaſions in France conſumed) grew to be capteine of the horſemen there. With him came the archbiſhop of Remes with power and commiſſion for concluding a league betweene France and Scotland, and alſo of a mariage betweene Lewes the Dolphins ſonne and Margaret Jameſes daughter, though both verie yong. Which matters accordinglie accompliſhed, to France againe they got them. So James became as firme French as any of his predeceſſours.]

Buchan.lib.10. An.1425. W.P.

But now to leaue the Scotiſh king amongſt his countriemen in Scotland, and returne to the dooings of England. I find that the duke of Gloceſter, being protector and gouernour of the realme, prepared an armie of ten thouſand men, and ſent them ouer to his brother the regent into France; who comming into the territorie of Paris, were ioifullie of him receiued. About the ſame time the Frenchmen got by ſtealth diuerſe townes out of the Engliſhmens hands, and amongſt other the faire towne of Compiegne was one, and the pretie towne of Crotoie an other. When the duke of Bedford was aduertiſed hereof, he determined not to let the matter paſſe in ſuch ſort, but with all conuenient ſpeed ſent forth a force to recouer thoſe townes againe. And firſt the earle of Suffolke with the earle of Lignie, and diuerſe other capteins of the Engliſhmen went to beſiege Compiegne, and lodged on the one ſide of the riuer of Sohame, as the lord Liſle Adham, ſir Thomas Rampſton, and the prouoſt of Paris laie on the other ſide. The Frenchmen within the towne well furniſhed with good ſouldiers, munition, and vittels, couragiouſlie defended themſelues.

Compiegne ſurrendred to the Engliſh by a policie.

The Engliſhmen remembring that Guilliam Remond, other wiſe called Mariolaine had beene the leader of the ſouldiers within the towne (which Mariolaine before at Pacie was taken priſoner by ſir John Faſtolfe) cauſed him to be brought from Paris vnto the campe, and ſet him in a chariot with an halter about his necke, and conueied him to the gibet without the towne, ſending word to them within, that if they would not without delaie render the towne, their capteine ſhould incontinentlie be ſtrangled afore their faces. Which moued the ſouldiers ſo much, by reaſon of the loue they bare to their old capteine and gouernour, that for the deliuerance of him and partlie of themſelues they yeelded the towne, ſo that both he and they might depart with horſſe and harneſſe onelie in ſure conduct and ſafetie. Yet yer this towne of Compiegne was deliuered, ſir Philip Hall, which was ſent to Crotoie by the lord regent with eight hundred men to beſiege it, got it ſuddenlie by aſſault, yer the Frenchmen had either diſpoſed their garriſon, or appointed their lodgings.

Compeigne & Crotoie recouered from ỹ French.

About the ſame time ſir John de la Poole brother to the duke of Suffolke, being capteine of Auranches in Normandie, aſſembled all the garriſons of the baſe marches of the countrie of Aniou, and came before the citie of Angiers, burnt the ſuburbes, ſpoiled and deſtroied the whole countrie; and hauing as manie priſoners as his men might go awaie with, he was incountered by the earle of Aumarle, the vicount of Narbonne, and ſix thouſand Frenchmen; which finding the Engliſhmen out of araie, incumbred with carriage of their great ſpoile, ſuddenlie ſet on them, gaue them the ouerthrow, ſlue three hundred and tooke manie priſoners; as the ſaid ſir John de la Poole, ſir John Baſſet, John Aufort lieutenant of Faleiſe, John Clifton, Henrie Mortimer, and other to the number of ſix hundred.

But though the Frenchmen got here in this place, they went not awaie with like gaine in an other: for the baſtard de la Baulme, and the lord Craignar capteins of Courallon, with a great band made rode into Maſconnois, whom by chance Matthew * Gough and other Engliſhmen, which were alſo abroad in the countrie, met and incountred. There was a ſore fight betweene the parties, being of courage and number in maner equall. But after long conflict, the Frenchmen almoſt all were ſlaine and taken, and the baſtard being well horſſed, fled; after whome followed vpon the ſpurres, Matthew * Gough chaſing him euen to his caſtell gate, and there tooke him: for the which act he was much praiſed of the erle of Saliſburie (to whom he preſented the ſaid baſtard) and had not onelie the rights giuen him that belonged to the priſoner, but alſo was rewarded with a goodlie courſer at the earles hands.

* Goche.

About this ſeaſon, Arthur brother to John duke of Britaine, commonlie called the earle of Richmond, hauing neither profit of the name, nor of the countrie, notwithſtanding that king Henrie the fift had created him earle of Yurie in Normandie, and gaue him not onelie a great penſion, but alſo the whole profits of the ſame towne of Yurie; yet now, bicauſe that the duke his brother was returned to the part of the Dolphin, he likewiſe reuolting from the Engliſh obeiſance, came to the Dolphin to Poitiers, and there offered himſelfe to ſerue him, whom the Dolphin gladlie accepted, reioiſing more thereof, than if he had gained an hundred thouſand crownes: for the Britons within the towne of Yurie, hearing that their maiſter was ioined with the Dolphin, kept both the towne and caſtell againſt the duke of Bedford, furniſhing it dailie with new men and munition.

The lord regent aduertiſed hereof, raiſed an armie of Engliſhmen and Normans, to the number of eightéene hundred men of armes, and eight thouſand archers and other. He had in his companie the earles of Saliſburie and Suffolke, the lords Scales, Willoughbie, and Poinings, ſir Reginald Graie, ſir Iohn Faſtolfe, ſir Iohn Saluaine, ſir Lancelot Liſle, ſir Philip Hall, ſir Iohn Paſhleie, ſir Iohn Greie, ſir Thomas Blunt, ſir Robert Harling, ſir William Oldhall, and manie other, both knights and eſquiers, with whom he came before the towne of Yurie, which was well defended, till they within perceiued themſelues in danger, by reaſon of a mine which the Engliſhmen made, wherevpon they yéelded the towne. But the capteins of the caſtell would not preſentlie render the place, howbeit they promiſed to deliuer it, if the ſame were not reſcued at a day aſſigned by the Dolphin or his power.

Vpon this promiſe, hoſtages were deliuered into the poſſeſſion of the lord regent, by whoſe licence an herald was ſent to the Dolphin, to aduertiſe him of the time determined; who vnderſtanding the diſtreſſe of his fréends, incontinentlie ſent Iohn duke of Alanſon, as his lieutenant generall, the erle Douglas, whome at their ſetting forth he made duke of Touraine, and the earle Buchquhane as then conſtable of France, the erls of Aumarle, Ventadoure, Tonnere, Maulieurier, and Foreſts, the vicounts of Narbonne, and Touars, the lords of Grauile, Gaules, Malicorne, Mannie, Ballaie, Fountains, Montfort, and manie other noble knights and eſquiers, to the number of fiftéene thouſand Frenchmen & Britons, beſides fiue thouſand Scots, whome the earle Dowglas had but latelie tranſported out of Scotland.

This roiall armie approched within two miles of Yurie. But when the duke of Alanſon vnderſtood by ſuch as he had ſent to view the conduict of the Engliſhmen, that he could not get anie aduantage by aſſailing them (although the Dolphin had giuen him ſtreict commandement to fight with the regent) he retired backe with his whole armie to the towne of Verneuill in Perch, that belonged to the king of England; ſending word to the garriſon, that he had diſcomfited the Engliſh armie, and that the regent with a ſmall number with him by ſwiftneſſe of horſſe had ſaued himſelfe. The inhabitants of Verneuill, giuing too light credit herevnto receiued the duke of Alanſon with all his armie into the towne.

Verneuil gotten from the Engliſhmen by crediting a lie.

In the meane time came the daie of the reſcues of Yurie, which for want thereof was deliuered to the duke of Bedford by the capteine called Gerard de la Pallier, who preſenting vnto the duke of Bedford the keies of the caſtell, ſhewed him a letter alſo ſigned and ſealed with the hands and ſeales of eightéene great lords, who the daie before promiſed by the tenour of the ſame letter to giue the duke battell, and to raiſe the ſiege. Well (ſaid the duke) if their hearts would haue ſerued, their puiſſance was ſufficient once to haue proffered, or to haue performed this faithfull promiſe: but ſith they diſdaine to ſéeke me, God and ſaint George willing, I ſhall not deſiſt to follow the trac of their horſſes till one part of vs be by battell ouerthrowne. And herewith he ſent forth the earle of Suffolke with ſix hundred horſſemen, to eſpie the doings of the Frenchmen, and where they were lodged. The earle riding forth, paſſed by Dampuſle, and came to Bretueill, where he heard certeine newes where the Frenchmen had gotten Verneuill, and remained there ſtill.

These newes he ſent by poſt vnto the duke of Bedford, the which incontinentlie vpon that aduertiſement ſet forward in great haſt towards his enimies. The Frenchmen hearing of his comming, ſet their people in arraie, and made all one maine battell without foreward or rereward; and appointed foure hundred horſſemen, Lombards and others to breake the arraie of the Engliſhmen, either behind, or at the ſides, of the which was capteine ſir Stephan de Vinoiles, called the Hire. The duke of Bedford likewiſe made one entier battell, and ſuffered no man to be on horſſebacke, and ſet the archers (euerie one hauing a ſharpe ſtake) both on the front of the battell, and alſo on the ſides, like wings. And behind were all their horſſes tied togither, either by the reins or by the tailes, with the carts and cariages, to the defenſe whereof were two thouſand archers appointed.

The ordering of their battels.

Hérewith either part being come almoſt to the ioining, the duke of Alanſon, on the one ſide, exhorted his people to plaie the men, declaring vnto them, that the concluſion of this battell ſhould either deliuer them out of vile ſeruitude, or place them in the vale of bondage. On the other ſide, the duke of Bedford, to incourage his men, willed them to remember how oft they had ſubdued thoſe their aduerſaries in battell (with whome they ſhould now cope) for the moſt part, euer being the leſſe number againſt the greater. Againe, he declared how neceſſarie it was to tame the bold attempts of the preſumptuous Dolphin now in the beginning, leaſt if the fire were ſuffered further to burne, it muſt haue néed of the more water to quench it.

Manie words he vttered, to put them in hope of good ſucceſſe and victorie. But ſcarſe had he ended his exhortation, when the Engliſhmen ruſhed forth, and boldlie ſet on their enimies, crieng; Saint George, a Bedford, a Bedford: and the Frenchmen likewiſe cried Montioy ſaint Denis. Then began the battell right fierce on both ſides, continuing for the ſpace of thrée houres in doubtfull balance, fortune ſhewing hir ſelfe ſo equall, that no eie could iudge to whether part ſhe was more fauourable. But at length, after that thoſe foure hundred horſſemen, which were appointed, as yée haue hard, to breake the arraie of the Engliſhmen, had paſſed thorough on the one ſide vnto the place where the cariages and horſſes ſtood, and could not paſſe further, by reaſon of the fierce ſhot of the Engliſh bowes, they falling to the ſpoile made a hand, and therewith departed. Thoſe archers then that were appointed to kéepe the cariages, being now at libertie, came forward, and ſo fiercelie ſhot at the thickeſt preaſe of their enimies fighting on foot, that in the end they were not able longer to indure, but were borne downe by fine force, and ſo vanquiſhed.

The battell of Vernoile, the 28 of Auguſt, 1424.

This battell was fought the eight and twentith of Auguſt, in the yeare of our Lord a thouſand foure hundred twentie and foure, in the which battell were ſlaine of the Frenchmen the earles of Aumarle, Ventadour, Foreſt, Marie, the lords Grauile, Gaules, Fountaines, Ambois, Touars, Montenie, Combreſte, Brunell, Tumble, and Poiſie, beſide thrée hundred knights. The vicount Narbonne was hanged on a gibbet, bicauſe he was one of the murtherers of the duke of Burgognie. Of Scots alſo were ſlaine, Archembald earle Dowglas, that was made (as before is mentioned) duke of Touraine, Iames Dowglas ſonne to the ſaid Archembald earle of Wicton, Iohn earle of Bouqhen newlie made conſtable of France, ſir Alexander Meldrin, ſir Henrie Balglauie, ſir Iohn Sterling, William of Homelſdon, ſir

James Graie, ſir Robert Randen, ſir Alexander Linſaie, ſir Robert Steward, ſir Robert Swinton, and ſeauen and twentie hundred Scots of name and armes, beſide others.

So that in this battell were ſlaine by report of Montioy king at armes in France, and the Engliſh haralds there preſent, of Frenchmen & Scots nine thouſand and ſeauen hundred: and of Engliſhmen one and twentie hundred, but no man of name, ſauing fiue yong eſquiers. And there were taken priſoners, John duke of Alanſon, the baſtard of Alanſon, the lord of Faiect, the lord of Hormit, ſir Piers Hariſon, ſir Lois de Gaucourt, ſir Robert Bruſſet, ſir John Turnebull a Scot, and two hundred gentlemen, beſide common ſoldiers. The Frenchmen within Vernoill, ſéeing the Dolphins armie thus ouerthrowne, deliuered the towne to the regent, their liues ſaued. Then was ſir Philip Hall appointed capteine there, and the lord regent returned, and came to Rone, and after to Paris.

Fiue thouſãd ſaith Aemilius, but Nicholas Giles ſaith there died but foure thouſãd on both parts.

Dudley and Charleton two of yͤ Engliſh nobilitie were ſlaine at this battell, as Ja. Meir. ſaith.

The Dolphin that called himſelfe king of France, was ſore appalled with the ouerthrow of his armie: for he was driuen out of all the countries in maner, that apperteined to the crowne of France, & might reſort to none except to Bourbonois, Aluergne, Berrie, Poictow, Touraine, a part of Aniow, and Languedoc: yet to ſhew himſelfe as king, he erected his court of parlement, his chancerie, & all other courts in the citie of Poictiers, and there eſtabliſhed his great ſeale, with all due circumſtances thereto apperteining: where he continued fouretéene yeares togither, and then was remooued to Paris, after he had got that citie, and expelled the Engliſhmen, as after ſhall appeare.

The duke of Bedford lieng at Paris, ſent the lord Scales, ſir John Montgomerie, ſir John Faſtolfe, with two thouſand men to winne the countries of Aniow, and Maine, vnto whom were rendred without aſſault, the ſtrong caſtels of Beaumont le Vicount, Teune, Sillie, Oſce, Courceriers, Rouſſie, Vaſſe, Couetemenant, and twentie other, which I doo héere paſſe ouer. Such was then the opinion conceiued of the Engliſh puiſſance, ſo oft tried, prooued, and preuailing, that the Frenchmen thought the Engliſhmen would haue all which they wiſhed for or wrought for.

The lord Scales ſent to conquer Aniow and Maine.

The earle of Saliſburie, with the ſaid lord Scales, and the other capteins before named, were appointed with an armie of ten thouſand men, to beſiege the rich and ſtrong citie of Mans, the chéefe citie of all the countrie of Maine; whither when they came, they made their approches, and planted their batterie to the wals, ſo that with the ſhot of their great péeces (which kind of engins before that time had not béene much ſéene nor heard of in France) the citie was within a few daies deſpoiled of all hir towers and outward defenſes. The citizens and ſoldiers, perceiuing in what danger they ſtood, & knowing not how to remedie the matter, offered the towne vpon this condition, that all perſons which would tarrie within the towne, might abide; and all that would depart with horſſe and harneſſe onelie, ſhould be permitted: which offers were accepted, and the towne rendered, whereof the earle made capteine the earle of Suffolke, and his lieutenant ſir John Faſtolfe.

Mans deliuered to the Engliſhmen.

After this, the earle of Saliſburie beſieged the faire towne of ſaint Suſan, whereof was capteine one Ambroſe de Lore, a right valiant chéefteine. The earle cauſed the towne to be aſſaulted at his firſt comming to it; but he loſt more than he gained, and therefore left off his aſſaults, and cauſed a trench to be caſt about the towne, and ſo planted his batterie, by force whereof he ouerthrew the walles, in ſuch ſort that the capteine offered for himſelfe and his ſoldiers 200000 crownes, ſo that they might depart in their doublets onelie, which ſumme (bicauſe winter approched) was accepted, and the towne yéelded. Of this towne ſir John Popham was made capteine. Then the erle went to Maine la Juhez, which towne after fiue wéekes ſiege was yéelded, and appointed to the kéeping of ſir John Montgomerie, knight.

After the feaſt of the Purification of our ladie, the earle of Saliſburie beſieged the caſtell de la Fert Barnard; during which ſiege a ſale was made of the towne of Alanſon being in the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion, by a Gaſcoigne that was one of the garriſon there. But this ſale being opened to the erle of Saliſburie by the ſame Gaſcoigne at the daie appointed, the lord Willoughbie and ſir John Faſtolfe, with two thouſand men were ſent to incounter with the buiers of that towne; ſo that when Charles de Villiers chéefe merchant of this ware, came earlie in a morning with two hundred horſemen, and thrée hundred footmen, and approached the towne, abiding for the Gaſcoigne, yer he was aware, the Engliſhmen had compaſſed him and his companie round about, and ſetting vpon the Frenchmen, ſlue and tooke all the whole number of them, ſaue Peter Danthenazie and fiue and twentie other, which by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſſes ſaued themſelues.

After this conflict, the lord Willoughbie returned to the earle of Saliſburie, lieng ſtill at ſiege before the towne de la Fert Barnard, which ſhortlie after was rendered vp into the erle of Saliſburies hands, to whome the lord regent gaue it, to inioie to him and his heires for euer. Beſide this, the ſaid earle partlie by aſſalt, & partlie by compoſition tooke diuers other, as ſaint Kales; where he made capteine Richard Gethin eſquier; Thanceaux Lermitage, where he made gouernour Matthew *Gough; Guerland, of the which he aſſigned ruler John Banaſter; Malicorne, whereof he made capteine William Glaſdale eſquier; Liſle Soubz Boulton, whereof was made capteine ſir Lancelot Liſle knight; Loupelland, whereof was made capteine Henrie Branch; Montſeur, of the which was made capteine ſir William Oldhall knight; la Suze was aſſigned to the kéeping of John Suffolke, eſquier. And beſides this, aboue fortie caſtels and piles were ouerthrowne and deſtroied. The newes hereof reported in England, cauſed great reioiſing among the people, not onelie for the conqueſt of ſo manie townes & fortreſſes, but alſo for that it had pleaſed God to giue them victorie in a pitched field: whereof generall proceſſions were appointed, to render vnto God humble thanks for his fauour ſo beſtowed vpon them.

*Or rather Goche.

Generall proceſſions after victorie.

Anno Reg. 3.

This yeare after Eaſter, the king called a parlement at Weſtminſter, by aduiſe of the péeres; and comming to the parlement houſe himſelfe, he was conueied through the citie vpon a great courſer, with great triumph, the people flocking into the ſtréets to behold the child, whome they iudged to haue the liuelie image and countenance of his father, and like to ſuccéed him, and be his heire in all princelie qualities, martiall policies, and morall vertues, aſwell as in his realmes, ſeigniories and dominions. In this parlement was granted to the king a ſubſidie of twelue pence the pound, towards the maintenance of his warres, of all merchandize, comming in or going out of the realme, as well of Engliſhmen as ſtrangers.

A ſubſidie of tunnage and poundage.

During which parlement, came to London Peter duke of Quimbre, ſonne to the king of Portingale, couſine germane remooued to the king; which of the duke of Exceſter and the biſhop of Wincheſter his vncles was highlie feaſted, he was alſo elected into the order of the garter. During the ſame ſeaſon, Edmund Mortimer, the laſt earle of March, of that name (which long time had beene reſtreined from his libertie, and finallie wared lame) deceaſſed without iſſue, whoſe inheritance deſcended to the lord Richard Plantagenet, ſonne and heire to Richard earle of Cambridge, beheaded (as before yee haue heard) at the towne of Southampton. ¶In the time of this parlement alſo was ſir Iohn Mortimer couſine to the ſame earle, either for deſert or malice, atteinted of treaſon, and put to execution, of whoſe death no ſmall ſlander aroſe amongſt the common people.

The prince of Portingale commeth to London.

After all theſe things doone in England and in France, Humfreie duke of Gloceſter, who had married the ladie Iaquet, or Iaqueline of Bauier, counteſſe of Heinault, Holland, and Zeland (notwithſtanding ſhe was coupled in marriage afore to Iohn duke of Brabant, as yet liuing, and had continued with him a long ſpace) paſſed now the ſea with the ſaid ladie, and went to Mons or Bergen in Heinault, where the more part of the people of that countrie came and ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, as to their ſoureigne lord, in right of his ſaid wife, the ladie Iaquet or Iaqueline: with which dooing hir former huſband was greatlie mooued. And likewiſe the duke of Burgognie, being great friend to the ſame duke of Brabant, was much offended: who of old familiaritie wrote louinglie to the duke of Gloceſter, requiring him to reforme himſelfe according to reaſon, and to forſake his vngodlie life, both in keeping of an other mans wife, and alſo in ſeeking to vſurpe other mens rights and titles.

Herevpon went letters betwixt them for a time, but at length when the duke of Burgognie perceiued that the duke of Gloceſter meant to mainteine his intereſt, & to make warre againſt the duke of Brabant; he tooke part with the duke of Brabant ſo earneſtlie, that he conſented to fight with the duke of Gloceſter bodie to bodie within liſts in defenſe of the duke of Brabants quarell, and further aided the duke of Brabant in his warres againſt the duke of Gloceſter, with all his puiſſance, inſomuch that in the end (after the duke of Gloceſters returne into England) the duke of Brabant recouered all the towns in Heinault, which the ladie Iaquet or Iaqueline held againſt him. And further the ſame ladie was by compoſition deliuered by them of the towne of Mons vnto the duke of Burgognie; who cauſed hir to be conueied vnto Gant, from whence ſhe made ſhift to eſcape into Holland, where ſhe was obeied as counteſſe of the countrie.

Then made ſhe warre in hir owne defenſe againſt the dukes of Burgognie and Brabant, who ſought to ſpoile hir of all hir towns and lands: but they procured pope Martin the fift (before whome the matter was) to giue ſentence that the firſt matrimonie with the duke of Brabant was good, and the ſecond with the duke of Gloceſter to be vnlawfull. But in the meane time, the lord Fitz Walter was ſent ouer to the aid of the ladie Iaquet or Iaquelin, with a power of Engliſhmen, landed in Zeland, neere vnto the towne of Zerixe, aginſt whome came the duke of Burgognie, and incountering with them and other ſuch Hollanders and Zelanders, as were ioined with them, neere to a place called Brewers hauen, there diſcomfited them; ſo that of Engliſh, Hollanders, and Zelanders, with the ſaid lord Fitz Walter, were ſlaine ſeauen or eight hundred, and the reſidue chaſed to the water. At length, when the duke of Gloceſter vnderſtood the ſentence pronounced againſt him by the pope, he began to wax wearie of his wife the ſaid ladie Iaquet, by whome he neuer had profit, but loſſe, and tooke in a ſecond marriage Eleanor Cobham, daughter to the lord Cobham of Sterberow, which before (as the fame went) was his ſoueraigne paramour, to his ſlander and diſhonour.

Alias Beuron.

Twentie thouſand ſaith Nicholas Giles.

S. Iames de Beuuron beſieged.

A little before this time, ſir Thomas Rampſton, ſir Philip Branch, ſir Nicholas Burdet, and other Engliſhmen, to the number of fiue hundred men of warre, repared and fortified the towne of S. Iames de Beuuron, ſituate on the frontiers of Normandie towards Britaine, within halfe a league of the duke of Britains ground, with whome as then they had open warre; and ſo began to doo manie diſpleaſures to his people. Wherevpon Arthur earle of Richmont and Iuerie, brother to the ſaid duke, and latelie before created conſtable of France, aſſembled an huge power of men to the number of fortie thouſand (as ſome haue written) and with the ſame came before the ſaid towne of S Iames de Beuuron, and planted his ſiege verie ſtronglie about it, inforcing with his great ordinance to ouerthrow the wals. And one day amongſt other, he determined to giue the aſſault, and ſo did, the which continued a long ſpace verie hot and earneſt.

Sir Nicholas Burdet.

Enguerant de Monſtrellet.

The Britons Britonants were come downe into a low bottome, where there was a little pond or fiſhpoole, and they muſt needs paſſe by a ſtreict waie to come to the walles in great danger. On that ſide of the towne was a little bulworke, which ſir Nicholas Burdet kept, hauing with him a fortie or eightie fighting men: and ouer againſt the ſame bulworke there was a gate well furniſhed alſo with Engliſh ſouldiers; ſo that the Britons which came downe into the ditches in great number to giue the aſſault, heard on either ſide them the Engliſhmen (within the ſaid bulworke and gate) make a great noiſe, in crieng Saliſburie and Suffolke; with the which crie the Britons being maruelouſlie aſtonied, began to recoile in great diſorder. And therewith the ſaid ſir Nicholas Burdet iſſued foorth vpon them, and purſuing them right valiantlie, ſlue them downe, ſo that there died of them what by the ſword, and what by drowning in the ſaid poole, about ſeauen thouſand or eight hundred, and to the number of fiftie were taken priſoners. And beſide this, thoſe Engliſhmen gained eighteene ſtandards and one baner.

Incontinentlie the newes hereof were reported to the conſtable of France, who was buſie at the aſſault on the other ſide of the towne, whereof he was ſore diſpleaſed, and no leſſe amazed; ſo that he cauſed the retreit to be ſounded, for all the ſiege on that ſide toward the poole was alreadie raiſed. After this, vpon counſell taken amongſt the Frenchmen, it was determined that they ſhould diſlodge: and ſo about the middeſt of the next night, the conſtable and all the reſidue of his people departed toward Fougiers, leauing behind them great plentie of artillerie both great and ſmall, with victuals, and all their other prouiſions: as fourteene great guns and fortie barrels of powder, three hundred pipes of wine, two hundred pipes of biſket and flower, two hundred frailes of figs and reiſins, and fiue hundred barrels of herrings.

Diſſention betwixt the duke of Gloceſter and the biſhop of Wincheſter.

Somewhat before this ſeaſon fell a great diuiſion in the realme of England, which of a ſparkle was like to haue grown to a great flame. For whether the biſhop of Wincheſter called Henrie Beaufort, ſonne to Iohn duke of Lancaſter by his third wife, enuied the authoritie of Humfreie duke of Gloceſter, protectour of the realme; or whether the duke diſdained at the riches and pompous eſtate of the biſhop: ſure it is that the whole realme was troubled with them and their partakers: ſo that the citizens of London were faine to keepe dailie and nightlie watches, and to ſhut vp their ſhops for feare of that which was doubted to haue inſued of their aſſembling of people about them. The archbiſhop of Canturburie and the duke of Quimbre, called the prince of Portingale, rode eight times in one daie betwéene the two parties, and ſo the matter was ſtaied for a time. But the biſhop of Wincheſter, to cléere himſelfe of blame ſo farre as he might, and to charge his nephue the lord protectour with all the fault, wrote a letter to the regent of France, the tenor whereof inſueth.

The biſhop of Wincheſters letter excuſatorie.

RIght high and mightie prince, and my right noble, and after one, lieueſt lord, I recommend me vnto you with all my hart. And as you deſire the welfare of the king our ſouereigne lord, and of his realmes of England and France, your owne health, and ours alſo: ſo haſt you hither. For by my truth, if you tarie, we ſhall put this land in aduenture with a field; ſuch a brother you haue here, God make him a good man. For your wiſedome knoweth, that the profit of France ſtandeth in the welfare of England, &c. Written in great haſt on Allhallowen euen. By your true ſeruant to my liues end, Henrie Wincheſter.

The duke of Bedford being ſore gréeued and diſquieted with theſe newes, conſtituted the earle of Warwike, which was latelie come into France with ſix thouſand men, his lieutenant in the French dominions, and in the duchie of Normandie; and ſo with a ſmall companie, he with the ducheſſe his wife returned againe ouer the ſeas into England, and the tenth daie of Ianuarie he was with all ſolemnitie receiued into London, to whome the citizens gaue a paire of baſins of ſiluer and gilt, and a thouſand markes in monie. Then from London he rode to Weſtminſter, and was lodged in the kings palace. The fiue and twentith daie of March after his comming to London, a parlement began at the towne of Leiceſter; where the duke of Bedford openlie rebuked the lords in generall, bicauſe that they in the time of warre, thorough their priuie malice and inward grudge, had almoſt mooued the people to warre and commotion, in which time all men ought or ſhould be of one mind, hart, and conſent: requiring them to defend, ſerue, & dread their ſouereigne lord king Henrie, in performing his conqueſt in France, which was in manner brought to concluſion. In this parlement the duke of Gloceſter laid certeine articles to the biſhop of Wincheſter his charge, the which with the anſwers hereafter doo inſue; as followeth.

A parlement holden at Leiceſter.

The articles of accuſation and accord betweene the lord of Gloceſter, and the lord of Wincheſter.

Articles ſet foorth by the duke of Gloceſter, againſt Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter.

HEre inſueth the articles, as the kings councell hath conceiued, the which the high and mightie prince my lord of Gloceſter hath ſurmiſed vpon my lord of Wincheſter chancellor of England, with the anſwer to the ſame.

1 Firſt, whereas he being protectour, and defendour of this land, deſired the Tower to be opened to him, and to lodge him therein; Richard Woodnile eſquier (hauing at that time the charge of the kéeping of the Tower) refuſed his deſire, and kept the ſame Tower againſt him vndulie and againſt reaſon, by the commandement of my ſaid lord of Wincheſter; and afterward in approuing of the ſaid refuſall, he receiued the ſaid Woodnile, and cheriſhed him againſt the ſtate and worſhip of the king, and of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter.

2 Item, my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, without the aduiſe and aſſent of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, or of the kings councell, purpoſed and diſpoſed him to ſet hand on the kings perſon, and to haue remooued him from Eltham, the place that he was in, to Windſor, to the intent to put him in gouernance as him liſt.

3 Item, that where my ſaid lord of Gloceſter (to whome of all perſons that ſhould be in the land, by the waie of nature and birth, it belongeth to ſée the gouernance of the kings perſon) informed of the ſaid vndue purpoſe of my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, declared in the article next aboueſaid, and in letting thereof, determining to haue gone to Eltham vnto the king to haue prouided as the cauſe required: my ſaid lord of Wincheſter vntrulie, and againſt the kings peace, to the intent to trouble my ſaid lord of Gloceſter going to the king, purpoſing his death, in caſe that he had gone that waie, ſet men of armes and archers at the end of London bridge next Suthworke: and in forebarring of the kings high waie, let draw the chaine of the ſtoupes there, and ſet vp pipes and hurdles in manner and forme of bulworks: and ſet men in chambers, cellars, & windowes, with bowes and arrowes and other weapons, to the intent to bring finall deſtruction to my ſaid lord of Gloceſters perſon, as well as of thoſe that then ſhould come with him.

4 Item, my ſaid lord of Gloceſter ſaith and affirmeth, that our ſouereigne lord his brother that was king Henrie the fift, told him on a time, when our ſouereigne lord being prince was lodged in the palace of Weſtminſter in the great chamber, by the noiſe of a ſpaniell, there was on a night a man ſpied and taken behind a * tapet of the ſaid chamber, the which man was deliuered to the earle of Arundell to be examined vpon the cauſe of his being there at that time; the which ſo examined, at that time confeſſed that he was there by the ſtirring and procuring of my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, ordeined to haue ſlaine the ſaid prince there in his bed: wherefore the ſaid earle of Arundell let ſacke him foorthwith, and drowned him in the Thames.

* Or hanging.

5 Item, our ſouereigne lord that was, king Henrie the fift, ſaid vnto my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, that his father king Henrie the fourth liuing, and viſited then greatlie with ſickeneſſe by the hand of God, my ſaid lord of Wincheſter ſaid vnto the king (Henrie the fift then being prince) that the king his father ſo viſited with ſickneſſe was not perſonable, & therfore not diſpoſed to come in conuerſation and gouernance of the people; and for ſo much, counſelled him to take the gouernance and crowne of this land vpon him.

The anſwer of the biſhop.

HEre inſue the anſwers to the accuſations made by my lord of Wincheſter chancellour of England, vnto the cauſes and matters of heauineſſe, declared in the articles againſt him by my lord of Gloceſter.

1 Firſt, as of the refuſall made vnto my lord of Gloceſter, of opening the Tower to him, of his lodging therein, by the commandement of my ſaid lord of Wincheſter; he anſwereth, that in the preſence of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter before his comming out of his countrie of Heinault, for cauſes ſuch as were thought reſonable, it ſéemeth lawfull that the Tower ſhould haue béene notablie ſtored and kept with vittels:

tels: howbeit it was not forthwith executed, and that in likewiſe after that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, was gone into his ſaid countrie of Heinault, for ſeditious and odious billes and languages, caſt and vſed in the citie of London, ſounding of inſurrection and rebellion againſt the kings peace, and deſtruction aſwell of diuerſe eſtates of this land, as ſtrangers being vnder the defenſe, in ſo much that in doubt thereof, ſtrangers in great number fled the land. And for the more ſure kéeping of the ſaid Tower, Richard Wooduile eſquier ſo truſted with our ſoueraigne lord the king that dead is (as well ye know) & alſo chamberlaine and councellor vnto my lord of Bedford, with a certeine number of defenſible perſons aſſigned vnto him, was made deputie there by the aſſent of the kings councell, being that time at London, for to abide therein, for the ſafegard thereof; and ſtreictlie charged by the ſaid councell, that during that time of his ſaid charge, he ſhould not ſuffer any man to be in the Tower ſtronger than himſelfe, without ſpeciall charge or commandement of the king by the aduiſe of his councell.

2 Item, that ſoone after (vpon the comming of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter into this land from his countrie of Heinault) the ſaid lords of the kings councell were informed, that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter grudged with the ſaid maner of inforcing the Tower, and let ſaie to them of London, that he had well vnderſtand that they had béene heauilie threatened for the time of his abſence, and otherwiſe than they ſhuld haue béene, if he had béene in this land. Wherefore he was right euill contented, and eſpeciallie of the ſaid forcing of the Tower, ſet vpon them in manner of a chaſed villain, conſidering the good equitie and truth that they had alwaies kept vnto the king, offering them there vpon remedie if they would.

3 Item, that after this, Richard Scot lieutenant of the Tower, by the commandement of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, brought vnto him frier Randolph, the which had long before confeſſed treaſon doone by him againſt the kings perſon that dead is, for the which knowlege he was put to be kept in the ſaid Tower, & ſtreictlie commanded vnder great paine giuen vnto the ſaid Scot, to kéepe him ſtreictlie & ſuerlie, & not to let him out of the ſaid Tower without cõmandment of the king by aduiſe of his councell. The which frier Randolph, my ſaid lord of Gloceſter kept then with himſelfe (not witting to the ſaid Scot) as he declared to my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, ſoone after that he had brought the ſaid frier Randolph to my lord of Gloceſter; ſaieng to my lord of Wincheſter, that he was vndoone but he helped him, & expreſſed, as for cauſe of the withholding of frier Randolph: and ſaieng moreouer, that when he deſired of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, the deliuerance of the ſaid frier Randolph, to lead him againe vnto the Tower, or ſufficient warrant for his diſcharge: my ſaid lord of Gloceſter anſwered him, that his commandement was ſufficient warrant and diſcharge for him. In the which thing aboueſaid, it was thought to my lord of Wincheſter, that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter tooke vpon him further than his authoritie ſtretched vnto, and cauſed him to doubt and dread, leaſt that he would haue procéeded further. And at ſuch time as the ſaid Wooduile came vnto him, to aſke his aduiſe and counſell, of lodging my ſaid lord of Gloceſter in the Tower; he aduiſed and charged him, that before he ſuffered my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, or any perſon to lodge therein ſtronger than himſelfe, he ſhould purueie him a ſufficient warrant therof, of the king, by the aduiſe of his councell.

Frier Randolph.

4 Item, as to the ſaid article of the foreſaid cauſes of heauineſſe, my ſaid lord chancellor anſwereth, that he neuer purpoſed to ſet hand on the kings perſon, nor to remoue him, or that he ſhould be remoued, or put in any manner of gouernance, but by the aduiſe of the kings councell. For he would not perceiue any manner of goodneſſe or of aduantage that might haue growne to him thereof, but rather great perill and charge; and hereof my ſaid lord of Wincheſter is readie to make proofe, in time and place conuenient.

5 Item, as to the third article of the foreſaid cauſes and heauines, my ſaid lord chancellor anſwereth, that he was oft and diuerſe times warned, by diuerſe credible perſons, aſwell at the time of the kings laſt parlement, holden at Weſtminſter, as before and ſince, that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter purpoſed him bodilie harme, & was warned therof, and counſelled by the ſaid perſons, and that diuerſe times, to abſteine him from comming to Weſtminſter, as my ſaid lord of Wincheſter declared vnto my ſaid lord of Gloceſter.

6 Item, that in the time of the ſaid parlement, diuerſe perſons of low eſtate of the citie of London, in great number aſſembled on a day vpon the wharfe, at the crane of the vinetrée, and wiſhed and deſired that they had there the perſon of my lord of Wincheſter, ſaieng, that they would haue throwen him into the Thames, to haue taught him to ſwim with wings. Whereof billes and language of ſlander and threatnings were caſt and ſpoken in the ſaid citie by my ſaid lord the chancellor, which cauſed him to ſuppoſe that they that ſo ſaid and did, willed and deſired his deſtruction, although they had no cauſe.

7 Item, that after the comming to London of ſir Raſe Botiller, and maiſter Lewes, ſent from my lord of Bedford, to the reſt of the lords of the councell, they being informed, that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter did beare diſpleaſure to my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, they came to the ſaid lord of Gloceſter to his In, the ſecond ſundaie next before All hallondaie, and there opened vnto him, that they had knowledge and vnderſtanding of the ſaid diſpleaſure, praieng him to let them know if he bare ſuch diſpleaſure againſt my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, and alſo the cauſes thereof. At the which time (as my ſaid lord of Wincheſter was afterwards informed) my ſaid lord of Gloceſter affirmed that he was heauie toward him, and not without cauſes that peraduenture he would put in writing.

8 Item, that after the mondaie next before All hallondaie laſt paſt in the night, the people of the ſaid citie of London, by the commandement of my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, as it was ſaid (for what cauſe my lord the chancellor wiſt not) aſſembled in the citie, armed and arraied, and ſo continued all the night. Amongſt diuerſe of the which (the ſame night by what excitation, my ſaid lord the chancellor wiſt not) ſeditious and heauie language was vſed, and in eſpeciall againſt the perſon of my lord the chancellor. And ſo the ſame mondaie at night, my ſaid lord of Gloceſter ſent vnto the Ins of court at London, charging them of the court dwelling in the ſame, to be with him vpon the morrow at eight of the clocke in their beſt arraie.

9 Item, that on the morrow being tueſdaie next following, my ſaid lord of Gloceſter ſent earlie vnto the maior and aldermen of the ſaid citie of London, to ordeine him to the number of thrée hundred perſons on horſſe backe, to accompanie him vnto ſuch a place as he diſpoſed him to ride, which (as it was ſaid) was vnto the king, to the intent to haue his perſon, and to remoue him from the place that he was in, without aſſent or aduiſe of the kings councell. The which thing was thought vnto my ſaid lord the chancellor, that he ought in no wiſe to haue doone, nor had not béene ſéene ſo before.

10 Item, that my ſaid lord the chancellor, conſidering the things aboue ſaid, and doubting therefore of perils that might haue inſued thereof, intending to purueie there againſt, and namelie for his owne ſuertie and defenſe, according to the law of nature, ordeined to let, that no force of people ſhould come on the bridge of London towards him, by the which he or his might haue béene indangered or noied, not intending in any wiſe bodilie harme vnto my ſaid lord of Gloceſter, nor to any other perſon, but onelie his owne defenſe, in eſchewing the perill aboueſaid.

11 Item, as toward the fourth and fift of the ſaid articles, my lord the chancellor anſwereth, that he was euer true to all thoſe that were his ſouereigne lords and reigned vpon him, and that he neuer purpoſed treaſon or vntruth againſt any of their perſons, and in eſpeciall againſt the perſon of our ſaid ſouereigne lord Henrie the fift. The which conſidering the great wiſdome, truth, and manhood that all men knew in him, he would not for the time that he was king, haue ſet on my ſaid lord the chancellor ſo great truſt as he did, if he had found or thought in him ſuch vntruth. The which thing my ſaid lord the chancellor offered to declare and ſhew, as it belongeth to a man of his eſtate to doo, requiring therevpon my lord of Bedford and all the lords ſpirituall and temporall in this parlement, that it might be ſéene that there were iudges conuenient in this caſe, that they would doo him right, or elſe that he might haue leaue of the king by their aduiſe to go ſue his right, before him that ought to be his iudge.

12 And as toward the letter ſent by my lord of Wincheſter vnto my lord of Bedford, of the which the tenor is before rehearſed, of the which my lord of Gloceſter complained him of the malicious and vntrue purpoſe of my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, as toward the aſſembling of the people, and gathering of a field in the kings land, in troubling thereof, and againſt the kings peace: my ſaid lord of Wincheſter anſwereth, that if his ſaid letters duelie vnderſtand, and in ſuch wiſe as he vnderſtood and meant in the writing of them, it maie not reaſonablie be gathered and taken, that my ſaid lord of Wincheſter intended to gather any field, or aſſemble people in troubling of the kings land, and againſt the kings peace, but rather purpoſed to acquite him to the king in his truth, and to kéepe the reſt and peace in the kings land, and to eſchew rebellion, diſobedience and all trouble. For by that that in the beginning of the ſaid letter, he calleth my ſaid lord of Bedford his lieueſt lord after one, that is the king, whome he ought to accept of dutie of his truth, the which he hath euer kept, and will kéepe.

13 Moreouer, in the ſaid letter he deſireth the comming home of my lord of Bedford, for the welfare of the king and of his realmes of England and of France, which ſtand principallie in kéeping of his reſt and peace, and praieth my ſaid lord of Bedford to ſpéed his cōming into England, in eſchewing of ieopardie of the land, and of a field, which he dread him might haue followed if he had long taried. As toward thoſe words; “If ye tarie, we ſhall put this land “in aduenture with a field, ſuch a brother ye haue here, &c. My ſaid lord of Wincheſter ſaith, the ſooth is: before or he wrote the ſaid letter, by the occaſion of certeine ordinances made by the maior and aldermen of London againſt the exceſſiue taking of maſons, carpentars, tilers, plaſterers, and other labourers for their dailie iournies, and approued by the kings deuiſe and councell, there were caſt manie heauineſſes and ſeditious billes vnder the names of ſuch labourers, threatning riſing with manie thouſands, and menacing of eſtates of the land, and likewiſe ſeditious and euill language ſowen and ſo continued and likelie to haue inſued, of purpoſe and intent of diſobedience and rebellion. To the redreſſing of which, it ſéemed to my lord the chancellor, that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter did not his indeuour nor diligence that he might haue ſhewed. For lacke of which diligence, they that were diſpoſed to doo diſobeiſance were incouraged & imboldned, ſo that it was like, that they ſhould haue made a gathering, and that the king and his true ſubiects ſhould haue béene compelled to haue made a field to haue withſtand them; the which field making, had béene aduenturing of this land, and in tokening that it was neuer my ſaid lord chancellors intent, to gather no field, but as truth moſt ſtirred him againſt ſuch as riotouſlie would make ſuch aſſemblie againſt our ſouereigne lord, and the weale of this land, he deſired ſo haſtilie the comming of my ſaid lord of Bedford: the which he would in no wiſe haue ſo greatlie deſired, if he would haue purpoſed him vnto any vnlawfull making of a field; for he wiſt well, that my ſaid lord of Bedford would moſt ſharplie haue chaſtiſed and puniſhed all thoſe, that ſo would make any riotous aſſemblie.

When this anſwer was made, the duke cauſed this writing following openlie to be proclamed.

BE it knowne to all folkes, that it is the intent of my lord of Bedford, and all the lords ſpirituall & temporall, aſſembled in this preſent parlement, to acquite him and them, and to procéed truelie, iuſtlie, and indifferentlie, without any parcialitie in any maner of matter or quarels, moued or to be moued betwéene my lord of Gloceſter on that one partie, & my lord of Wincheſter chancellor of England on that other partie. And for ſuer kéeping of the kings peace it is accorded by my ſaid lord of Bedford, & by my ſaid lords ſpirituall and temporall, an oth to be made in forme as followeth, that is to ſaie.

The oth of the lords.

THat my ſaid lord of Bedford, and my ſaid lords, ſpirituall and temporall, and ech of them ſhall (as far forth as their cunnings and diſcretions ſuffice) trulie, iuſtlie, and indifferentlie counſell and aduiſe the king, and alſo procéed and acquit themſelues in all the ſaid matters, and quarels, without that they or any of them ſhall priuilie and apertlie make or ſhew himſelfe to be partie or parciall therein, not leauing or eſchewing ſo to doo for affection, loue, méed, doubt, or dread of any perſon or perſons. And that they ſhall in all wiſe kéepe ſecret all that ſhall be commoned by waie of councell, in the matters and quarrels aboueſaid, in the ſaid parlement, without that they or any of them ſhall by word, writing of the king, or in any wiſe open or diſcouer it to any of the ſaid parties, or to any other perſon that is not of the ſaid councell: but if he haue a ſpeciall commandement or leaue therevnto of the king or my ſaid lord of Bedford. And that ech of them ſhall with all his might and power, aſſiſt by waie of counſell, or elſe ſhew it vnto the king, my lord of Bedford, and to the reſt of my ſaid lords to put the ſaid parties to reaſon; and not to ſuffer that any of the ſaid parties by them, or by their aſſiſtance, procéed or attempt by way of fight againſt the kings peace; nor helpe, aſſiſt, or comfort any of them thereto: but let them with all their might and power withſtand them, and aſſiſt vnto the king, and my ſaid lord of Bedford, in kéeping of the kings peace, and redreſſing all ſuch maner of procée-ding by waie of fight or force.

Dukes: the duke of Bedford, the duke of Norfolke, the duke of Exceſter. Biſhops: the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhop of Carleill, the biſhop of Bath, the biſhop of Landaffe, the biſhop of Rocheſter, the biſhop of Chicheſter, the biſhop of Worceſter, the biſhop of ſaint Dauids, the biſhop of London, the biſhop of Dureſme. Earles: the earle of Northumberland, the earle of Stafford, the earle of Oxford. Lords: the lord Hungerford, the lord Tiptoft, the lord Poinings, the lord Cromwell, the lord Borough, the lord Louell, the lord Botreux, the lord Clinton, the lord Zouch, the lord Audeleie, the lord Ferreis of Groubie, the lord Talbot, the lord Ros, the lord Greie, the lord Greie of Ruthen, the lord Fitz Walter, the lord Barkeleie. Abbats: the abbat of Waltham, the abbat of Glaſtenburie, the abbat of S. Auguſtines in Canturburie, the abbat of Weſtminſter, the abbat of S. Maries in Yorke, the abbat of S. Albons not ſworne bicauſe he was not preſent. ¶ Which oth in manner and forme aboue rehearſed, all the lords aſwell ſpirituall as temporall, being in this parlement at Leiceſter aſſembled, the fourth day of March, promiſed vpon their faith, dutie, and allegiance, which they owe to the king their ſoueraigne lord, truelie to obſerue and kéepe, according to the true meaning and purport of the ſame.

The arbitrement.

IN the name of God Amen. We Henrie archbiſhop of Canturburie, Thomas duke of Exceſter, Iohn duke of Norfolke, Thomas biſhop of Dureſme, Philip biſhop of Worceſter, Iohn biſhop of Bath, Humfrie earle of Stafford, William Alnwicke kéeper of the kings priuie ſeale, Raſe lord Cromwell, arbitrators in all maner of cauſes, matters and quarels of heauineſſes & greeuances, with all incidents, circumſtances, dependents, or connexes being and hanging betwéene the high & worthie princes Humfrie duke of Gloceſter on the one partie, and the worſhipfull father in God Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter and chancellor of England on the other partie, by either of them, for the peaſing of the ſaid quarrels and debates taken and choſen in maner and forme as it is conteined more plainelie in a compromiſe made therevpon, of the which the tenor inſueth in this forme.

1424 Anno Reg.4.

Memorandum, the ſeauenth daie of March in the fourth yeare of our ſoueraigne lord the king, Henrie the ſixt, the high and mightie prince Humfrie duke of Gloceſter at the reuerence of God, and for the good of the king our ſoueraigne lord in this land, & namelie at the reuerence, and eſpeciallie at the requeſt and praier of the mightie and high prince my lord of Bedford his brother, agréed him to put, and putteth all maner matters and quarels indéed, with all their incidents, circumſtances, dependents and connexes that touchen him and his perſon, that he hath in anie wiſe doo, or féeleth himſelfe gréeued or heauie againſt my lord his vncle, my lord of Wincheſter: or elſe that my lord of Wincheſter findeth him agréeued againſt him, in as much as they touch him or his perſon from the beginning of the world vnto this daie, in the aduiſe, ordinance and arbitrement of the worthie father in God, Henrie archbiſhop of Canturburie, the high and noble prince Thomas duke of Exceſter, and Iohn duke of Norffolke, the worſhipfull father in God Thomas biſhop of Dureſme, Philip biſhop of Worceſter, Iohn biſhop of Bath, the noble lord Humfrie earle of Stafford, the worſhipfull perſons maiſter William Alnewicke kéeper of the kings priuie ſeale, and Raſe lord Cromwell, promiſing and behighting by the faith of his bodie, & word of his princehood and kings ſonne, to doo, kéepe, obſerue, and fulfill for him and his behalfe, all that ſhall be declared, ordeined, and arbitrated, by the foreſaid archbiſhop, dukes, biſhops, earle, kéeper of the priuie ſeale, and lord Cromwell in all matters and quarels aboueſaid.

Granting alſo and promiſing ouer that, to be comprehended in the foreſaid arbitrement, as toward putting awaie all heauineſſes and diſpleaſures, in anie wiſe conteined, by my lord of Gloceſter againſt all thoſe that haue in anie wiſe aſſiſted, counſelled, or fauoured vnto his ſaid vncle of Wincheſter, and as toward anie matters that be touching my lord of Gloceſter, remitteth it, and the gouernance thereof vnto the king & his councell, they to déeme it by the aduiſe of his councell, as him thinketh it to be doone. In witneſſe of the which thing to this preſent compromiſe my ſaid lord of Gloceſter hath ſubſcribed his name with his owne hand: Humfreie Glocester. And in like forme my lord of Wincheſter in another compromiſe hath ſubſcribed with his owne hand vnder the word of his prieſthood, to ſtand at the aduiſe, ordinance, & arbitrement of the perſons aboueſaid, Mutatis mutandis.

A decree or order taken by the kings councell for the pacifieng of the quarels & variances that were betweene the duke of Glocester, and the bishop of Winchester.

THe cauſes aforeſaid and quarels by vs ſéene, heard, and diligentlie examined and decréed, by the aſſent of the ſaid parties, ordeine and award, that my lords of Gloceſter, and of Wincheſter, for any thing doone or ſpoken, by that one partie againſt that other, or by anie of theirs, or anie other perſon or perſons, afore the ſeuenth daie of this preſent moneth of March, neuer hereafter take cauſes, quarels, diſpleaſures, or heauineſſes, that one againſt the other, ne neither againſt the counſellers, adherents, or fauourers of that other for anie thing or things that are paſt. And that my ſaid lord of Gloceſter be good lord to my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, & haue him in loue and affection as his kinſman & vncle. And that my ſaid lord of Wincheſter haue to my ſaid lord of Gloceſter true and ſad loue and affection, doo and be readie to doo him ſuch ſeruice as aperteineth of honeſtie to my ſaid lord of Wincheſter and his eſtate to doo. And that each of them be good lord vnto all thoſe adherents, counſellers, and fauourers of that other, and ſhew them at all times fauourable loue and affection, as for anie thing by them doone or ſaid, before the ſeauenth daie of March.

And we decrée, ordeine, and award, that my ſaid lord of Wincheſter, in the preſence of the king our ſoueraigne lord, my lord of Bedford, and my lord of Gloceſter, and the reſidue of the lords ſpirituall and temporall, and commons being in this preſent parlement, ſaie and declare in maner and forme that followeth: My ſoueraigne lord, I haue well vnderſtand, that I am noiſed among the ſtates of your land, how that the king our ſoueraigne lord that was, at that time being prince, and lodged in the great chamber at Weſtminſter, by the baieng of a ſpaniell, there was on a night taken behind a * tapet in the ſame chamber, a man, that ſhould haue confeſſed, that he was there by mine excitation and procuring, to haue ſlaine the foreſaid prince there in his bed; wherevpon he was ſacked, and forthwith alſo drowned in the Thames.

* Or, henging.

Furthermore, I am accuſed, how that I ſhould haue ſtirred the king that laſt died, the time alſo that he was prince, to haue taken the gouernance of this realme, and the crowne vpon him, his father liuing the ſame time, being king. Through which language and noiſing, I féele my name and fame greatlie enblemiſhed in diuerſe mens opinions. Wherevpon, I take firſt God to my witnes, and after all the world, that I haue béene at all times, and am true louer, and true man, to you my ſoueraigne lord, and ſhall be all my life. And alſo, I haue béene to my ſoueraigne lord that was your father, all the time of his reigne, true man, and for ſuch he tooke me, truſted me and cheriſhed me to his liues end; and as I truſt, no man will affirme the contrarie, nor neuer in my life procuring nor imagining death nor deſtruction of his perſon, ne aſſenting to any ſuch thing, or like thereto, the time that he was king or prince, or elſe in other ſtate.

I was likewiſe true man to king Henrie the fourth, all the time that he was my ſoueraigne lord, and reigned vpon me. In which matters, in all maner of wiſe that it liketh to you my ſoueraigne lord for to command me, I am readie for to declare me: and furthermore, where, how, and when it ſhall like you, by the aduiſe of your councell, to aſſigne me, Wherfore I beſéech you my ſoueraigne lord, as humblie as I can, conſidering that there is no grounded proceſſe, by the which I might lawfullie in theſe matters abouesaid, be conuict (bleſſed be God) to hold me, and declare me, by the aduiſe of all the lords, ſpirituall and temporall, being in this preſent parlement, true man to you my ſoueraigne lord, and ſo to haue béene vnto my ſoueraigne lords that were your father and grandfather, and true man alſo to haue béene at all times to your ſaid father whileſt he was prince, or elſe in anie other eſtate, the ſaid ſlander and noiſe notwithſtanding, and this ſame declaration to be inacted in this your ſaid preſent parlement.

The which words declared in maner as it is aboueſaid, it ſéemeth to my ſaid lords the arbitrators, that it is méet, that my ſaid lord of Wincheſter draw him apart, and in the meane time, the lords being preſent, be ſingularlie examined therevpon, and ſaie their aduiſe. And if it be aſſented by them, in maner as my ſaid lord of Wincheſter deſireth, let him be called againe, and that then my lord of Bedford haue theſe words in effect that follow: Faire vncle, the king my lord by the aduiſe of his councell, hath commanded me to ſaie to you, that he hath well vnderſtand and conſidered all the matters which yée haue héere openlie declared in his preſence, and therevpon yée deſire a petition, that he will declare you, and by the aduiſe and aſſent of the lords ſpirituall and temporall, being in this preſent parlement, he declareth you a true man to him, and that yée haue ſo béene to my lord his father, and grandfather, alſo true man to my lord his father while he was prince, or elſe in anie other eſtate, the ſaid diſlander and noiſing notwithſtanding, and will that the ſaid declaration be ſo inacted in this preſent parlement.

After the which words thus ſaid (as before is declared) it was decréed alſo by the ſaid lords arbitrators, that the ſaid lord of Wincheſter ſhould haue theſe words that follow vnto my ſaid lord of Gloceſter: My lord of Gloceſter, I haue conceiued to my great heauineſſe, that yée ſhould haue receiued by diuerſe reports, that I ſhould haue purpoſed and imagined againſt your perſon, honor, and eſtate, in diuers maners, for the which, yée haue taken againſt me great diſpleaſure: Sir, I take God to my witneſſe, that what reports ſo euer haue béene to you of me, peraduenture of ſuch as haue had no great affection to me, God forgiue it them, I neuer imagined, ne purpoſed anie thing that might be hindering or preiudice to your perſon, honor, or eſtate: and therefore I praie you, that yée be vnto me good lord from this time forth; for by my will, I gaue neuer other occaſion, nor purpoſe not to doo hereafter by the grace of God. The which words ſo by him ſaid, it was decréed by the ſame arbitrators, that my lord of Gloceſter, ſhould anſwer and ſaie: Faire vncle, ſith yée declare you ſuch a man, as yée ſaie, I am right glad that it is ſo, and for ſuch a man I take you. And when this was doone, it was decréed by the ſame arbitrators, that euerie each of my lord of Gloceſter, and Wincheſter, ſhould take either other by the hand, in the preſence of the king and all the parlement, in ſigne and token of good loue & accord, the which was doone, and the parlement adiorned till after Eaſter.

At this reconciliation, ſuch as loued peace reioiſed (ſith it is a fowle & pernicious thing for priuat men, much more for noblemen to be at variance, ſith vpon them depend manie in affections diuerſe, whereby factions might grow to the ſhedding of bloud) though others, to whom contention & hartgrudge is delight, wiſhed to ſée the vttermoſt miſchéefe that might thereof inſue, which is the vtter ouerthrow and deſolation of populous tribes, euen as with a litle ſparkle whole houſes are manie times conſumed to aſhes; as the old prouerbe ſaith, and that verie well and aptlie;

Sola ſcintilla perit hæc domus aut domus illa.

But when the great fier of this diſſention, betwéene theſe two noble perſonages, was thus by the arbitrators (to their knowledge and iudgement) vtterlie quenched out, and laid vnder boord; all other controuerſies betwéene other lords, taking part with the one partie or the other, were appeaſed, and brought to concord, ſo that for ioy the king cauſed a ſolemne feſt to be kept on Whitſundaie; on which daie he created Richard Plantagenet, ſonne and heire to the erle of Cambridge (whome his father at Southhampton had put to death, as before yée haue heard) duke of Yorke, not foreſéeing that this preferment ſhould be his deſtruction, nor that his ſéed ſhould of his generation be the extreame end and finall concluſion. He the ſame daie alſo promoted Iohn lord Mowbraie, and earle marſhall, ſonne and heire to Thomas duke of Norffolke (by king Richard the ſecond exiled this realme) to the title, name, and ſtile of duke of Norffolke.

During this feaſt, the duke of Bedford adorned the king with the high order of knighthood, who on the ſame daie dubbed with the ſword theſe knights, whoſe names inſue: Richard duke of Yorke, Iohn duke of Norffolke; the earle of Weſtmerland, Henrie lord Perſie, Iohn lord Butler, ſonne to the earle of Ormond, the lord Roſſe, the lord Matrauers, the lord Welles, the lord Barkelie; ſir Iames Butler, ſir Henrie Greie of Tankaruile, ſir Iohn Talbot, ſir Rafe Greie of Warke, ſir Robert Véere, ſir Richard Greie, ſir Edmund Hungerford, ſir Water Wingfield, ſir Iohn Butler, ſir Reginald Cobham, ſir Iohn Paſſhelen, ſir Thomas Tunſtall, ſir Iohn Chedocke, ſir Rafe Langſtre, ſir William Drurie, ſir William ap Thomas, ſir Richard Carnonell, ſir Richard Wooduile, ſir Iohn Shirdlow, ſir Nicholas Blunket, ſir William Cheinie iuſtice, ſir William Babington, ſir Rafe Butler, ſir Robert Beauchampe, ſir Edmund Trafford, ſir Iohn Iune chéefe baron, and diuerſe others.

After this ſolemne feaſt ended, a great aid and ſubſidie was granted for the continuance of the conqueſt in France, and ſo therevpon monie was gathered, and men were prepared in euerie citie, towne, and countrie. During which buſineſſe, Thomas duke of Exceſter, great vncle to the king, a right ſage and diſ-

[Philip Morgan after the death of John Fortham (ſometime treaſuror of England, biſhop of Elie and Durham, both which biſhopriks, for anie thing that I can yet ſee, he inioied both at one time) was made biſhop of Elie in the yeare of our redemption 1425, in this ſort. Henrie the fift and manie of the nobilitie had written to the conuent of the church of Elie, to chooſe William Alnewicke (doctor of both lawes confeſſor to the king and keeper of the priuie ſeale) to be their biſhop. Notwithſtanding which (they hauing more regard to their owne priuileges and benefit) choſe Peter the prior of Elie to ſucceed in the place of John Fortham. But none of both theſe inioied that roome; for Martin biſhop of Rome (ſtepping into the matter to make the third part, neither fauouring the kings motion, nor approouing the monks election) remooued this William Morgan from the ſee of Worceſter vnto Elie, ſometime called Helix: as I haue ſeene it ſet downe in Saxon characters in an ancient booke of the liues of ſaints written in the Saxon toong, about the yeare of Chriſt 1010, before the time of Edward the confeſſor, and much about the time of Albo Floriacenſis. This Morgan ſat at Elie nine yeares, twentie and ſix weeks, and foure daies, departing this life in his manour of Hatfield, in the yeare 1434, and was buried at the Charterhouſe of London; being the twentie and fourth biſhop that was inſtalled in that place.]

While theſe things were thus a doing in England, the earle of Warwike, lieutenant for the regent in France, entered into the countrie of Maine, & beſieged the towne of Chateau de Loire, the which ſhortlie to him was rendered, whereof he made capteine Matthew* Gough, eſquier. After this, he tooke by aſſault the caſtell of Maiet, and gaue it for his valiantneſſe to John Winter eſquier, and after that he conquered the caſtell of Lude, and made there capteine William Gladeſdale gentleman. Here he was informed, that the Frenchmen were aſſembled in the countrie of Beauſſe, wherevpon he haſted thitherwards to haue giuen them battell, but they hauing knowledge of his approch, durſt not abide to trie the matter with him by a pight field, but fled before he came neere them.

The earle of Warwike made gouernour of the yong king.

The earle in his returne wan the caſtell of Montdublean by ſurrender; where he left the valiant lord Willoughbie, and then returned to Paris. During which ſeaſon, he was ordeined by the three eſtates of the realme of England, to be gouernour of the yong king in the place of the duke of Exceſter deceaſſed: howbeit, he did not as yet returne into England, but remained in France for a ſeaſon, and atchiued manie worthie enterpriſes. Whileſt the lord regent of France was thus in England, meanes was made by the duke of Burgognie, for the deliuerie of the duke of Alanſon, taken at the battell of Vernoile, and now for the ſumme of two hundred thouſand crownes he was ſet at libertie; but he would not by anie meanes acknowlege the king of England to be his liege and ſoureigne lord.

After that the duke of Bedford had ſet all things in good order in England, he tooke leaue of the king, and togither with his wife returned into France, firſt landing at Calis, where the biſhop of Wincheſter (that alſo paſſed the ſeas with him) receiued the habit, hat, and dignitie of a cardinall, with all ceremonies to it apperteining: which promotion, the late K. right deeplie perſing into the vnreſtrainable ambitious mind of the man, that euen from his youth was euer to checke at the higheſt: and alſo right well aſcerteined with what intollerable pride his head ſhould ſoone be ſwollen vnder ſuch a hat: did therefore all his life long keepe this prelat backe from that preſumptuous eſtate. But now the king being yong and the regent his freend, he obteined his purpoſe, to his great profit, and the impoueriſhing of the ſpiritualtie of this realme. For by a bull legantine, which he purchaſed from Rome, he gathered ſo much treaſure, that no man in maner had monie but he: ſo that he was called the rich cardinall of Wincheſter.

The biſhop of Wincheſter made a cardinall.

After that the lord regent was arriued in France, the lord of Ruſtinian, marſhall of Britaine, aſſembled a great companie of the Britiſh nation, which fortified and repared the towne of Pontorſon: and after, the ſaid marſhall, with a thouſand men, entered into the countrie of Conſtantine, and comming before the towne of Auranches, was incountered by the Engliſhmen of that garriſon; & after long fight, his people were put to the worſe, chaſed, and diſcomfited, and he himſelfe taken priſoner in the field. The duke of Bedford, hearing that the towne of Pontorſon, ſituate within two leagues of Mont Saint Michaell, was newlie fortified, and ſtronglie defended, ſent thither the earle of Warwike, accompanied with the lord Scales, and other valiant capteins and ſouldiers, to the number of ſeauen thouſand men, to beſiege the towne; who ſo inuironed it on euerie ſide, that no man could ſteale neither in nor out.

The lord of Ruſtinian taken and his people ſlaine and diſcomfited.

The ſiege thus long continuing, vittels began to wax ſcant in the Engliſh armie: wherefore the lord Scales, hauing in his companie ſir John Harpeleie bailiffe of Conſtantine, ſir William Brearton bailiffe of Caen, ſir Rafe Teſſon, ſir John Carbonell, and three thouſand good men of warre, departed from the ſiege to get vittels, powder, and other things neceſſarie for their purpoſe. And as they were returning with their cariages by the ſea coaſt, neere to Saint Michaels Mount, they ſuddenlie were incountered by their enimies, whereof were cheefe, the baron of Coloſes, the lord Dauſeboſt, capteine of the ſaid Mount, the lord Mountabon, the lord Montburchier, the lord of Chateaugiron, the lord of Tintignat, the lord of Chateaubrian, with ſix thouſand men of warre.

The lord Scales and his companie, perceiuing themſelues beſet on the one ſide with the ſea, & on the other with their enimies, alighted from their horſſes, and like couragious perſons, there in an vnſpeakeable furie, ſet on their enimies. The fight was fierce & cruell. The Engliſhmen kept themſelues cloſe togither; ſo that their enimies could get no aduantage of them. At the laſt, the lord Scales cried S. George they flee. Wherevpon, the Engliſhmen tooke ſuch courage, and the Frenchmen that fought before, were ſo diſmaied, that they began to flee in deed. The Engliſhmen leaped on horſſe-backe, and followed them ſo, that they ſlue and tooke aboue eleuen hundred perſons, among the which were taken the baron of Coloſes, the vicount of Rone, and others. The lord of Chateaugiron, with a Scotiſh capteine, & diuerſe other men of name were ſlaine. After this victorie, the lord Scales with his vittels, prouiſion, and priſoners, returned to the ſiege, where he was of the earle and other noble men ioiouſlie receiued.

Whileſt the ſiege continued thus before Pontorſon, Chriſtopher Hanſon, and other ſouldiers of the garriſon of Saint Suſan, made a rode into the countrie of Aniou, and came to a caſtell called Ramfort, which caſtell was ſo priuilie ſcaled, that the capteine within, and his companie, were taken or ſlaine, before they knew of their enimies approching. When knowledge hereof was giuen vnto the Frenchmen which were aſſembled, to the number of twentie thouſand, to raiſe the ſiege that laie before Pontorſon, they left that enterpriſe, and went to recouer the ſaid caſtell of Ramfort, and ſo comming before it, planted their ſiege ſo on ech ſide of it, that at length by compoſition the Engliſhmen within, doubting to be taken by force, rendered vp the caſtell, hauing libertie to depart with bag and baggage.

Shortlie after, the lord of Raix, calling himſelfe lieutenant generall for the Dolphin, entred into Maine with an armie of thrée thouſand men, and by force tooke the caſtell of Malicorne, wherof was capteine an Engliſhman, one Oliuer Oſbaterſbie. In like maner, they tooke the little caſtell of Lude, and therein William Blackborne, lieutenant for William Glaſdale eſquier. After this, the Frenchmen returned backe to the Dolphin, and kept not on their iourneie to Pontorſon, for that they vnderſtood by eſpials, that the earle of Warwike, and the Engliſhmen there, determined to giue them battell, if they once attempted to raiſe the ſiege. They within the towne, being ſtreictlie beſieged, perceiuing no likelihood of ſuccours, and ſéeing the Engliſh armie dailie increaſe, fell to treatie for doubt to be taken by force, and ſo rendered the towne vpon condition, that they might depart with horſſe and harneſſe onelie. Which being granted to them, the erle like a valiant capteine entered into the towne, and there appointed for gouernors, the lord Ros, and the lord Talbot, and leauing there a conuenient garriſon, returned to the lord regent.

Pontorſon rendered to the Engliſhmen.

After the taking of this towne of Pontorſon, there was a league and treatie concluded betwéene the regent and the duke of Britaine; by the articles of which agréement, the townes of Pontorſon and ſaint James de Beuuron were beaten downe to the ground and raced. When the lord of Raix was departed out of Maine (as ye haue heard) Chriſtopher Hanſon, Philip * Gough, Martin Godfrie, called the Scaler, tooke by ſtealth the caſtell of ſaint Laurence de Mortiers. At the ſame time, when the capteine and the moſt part of his companie were gone foorth to heare maſſe, in a church ouer againſt the ſame caſtell, and kéeping themſelues cloſe, till the capteine returned, they tooke him as he was entered within the firſt gate, & ſo was this caſtell ſtuffed with Engliſhmen, and capteine thereof was appointed ſir William Oldhall.

* Or rather Goche.

The ſame ſeaſon, ſir John Faſtolfe, gouernour of the countries of Aniou and Maine, aſſembled a great puiſſance of men warre, and laid ſiege before the caſtell of ſaint Owen Diſtais, beſide the towne of Lauall; and after he had laine there ten daies, the caſtell was deliuered, they within departing with their liues and armour onelie to them granted, by the tenor of the compoſition; which they tooke with the ſame ſir John Faſtolfe. After the winning of this caſtell, the Engliſhmen remooued to the ſtrong caſtell of Grauile, and after twelue daies, they within offered to yéeld the caſtell by a daie, if they were not ſuccoured by the Dolphin or his power: the offer was taken and pledges deliuered.

Then ſir John Faſtolfe returned in poſt to the regent, aduertiſing him of this compoſition and agréement; wherefore, the ſaid regent raiſed a great power to fight with the Frenchmen at the daie appointed, and in his companie were the earles of Mortaigne and Warwike, the lord Ros and Talbot, ſir John Faſtolfe, ſir John Aubemond, ſir John Ratcliffe, and diuerſe other, to the number of twentie thouſand men; and ſo marched forwards, in hope to méet and ioine battell with their aduerſaries. But the French power, being not far off from the place, durſt not approch. Wherefore, the regent ſent to ſir John Faſtolfe incontinentlie, to receiue the caſtell: but they within (contrarie to promiſe and appointment) had newlie vitteled & manned the place, and ſo forſaking the pledges, and their fellowes in armes, refuſed to render the fortreſſe; wherefore, the pledges were brought before their ſight, and there before the caſtell openlie put to death.

Hoſtages executed for promiſe broken.

After this the lord Talbot was made gouernour of Aniou and Maine, and ſir John Faſtolfe was aſſigned to an other place, which lord Talbot, being both of noble birth, and of haultie courage, after his comming into France, obteined ſo manie glorious victories of his enimies, that his onelie name was & yet is dreadfull to the French nation, and much renowmed amongſt all other people. This luſtie and moſt valiant capteine entered into Maine, where he ſlue men, deſtroied caſtels, burnt townes, and in concluſion ſuddenlie tooke the towne of Lauall. The lord Loehac, and diuerſe other, withdrew into the caſtell, in the which they were ſo ſtreictlie beſieged, that in the end they agréed to paie the lord Talbot an hundred thouſand crownes, for licence to depart, with all their bag and baggage.

The lord Talbot, a valiant capteine.

Then was this caſtell deliuered to the kéeping of Gilbert Halſall, which after was ſlaine at the ſiege of Orleance, in whoſe place Matthew * Gough was made capteine there: who being at the iournie of Senlis, by treaſon of a miller that kept a mill adioining to the wall, the Frenchmen entered into the towne, and brought it againe into their ſubiection. Now the duke of Bedford hearing that the towne of Montargis, in the territorie of Orleance, was but ſlenderlie kept, and not thoroughlie furniſhed, ſent the erle of Suffolke, with his brother ſir John Poole, and ſir Henrie Biſſet, hauing in their companie a ſix thouſand men, to aſſalt that towne; but when they came thither and found the towne both well manned and ſtronglie fortified, contrarie to their expectation, they ſurceaſſed from giuing the aſſault, and onelie laid their ſiege round about it.

* Or rather Goche.

The earle of Warwike was appointed to lie with a great number of men of warre, at S. Mathelines de Archempe, to incounter the Frenchmen, if they would attempt to aid or vittell thoſe within the towne. The ſituation of this towne was ſuch, that by reaſon of waters and mariſhes, the Engliſh armie muſt néeds ſeuer it ſelfe into thrée parts, ſo that the one could not eaſilie helpe the other, but either by boats or bridges. This ſiege continued aboue two moneths, ſo that in the meane time the Frenchmen had leaſure to prouide for the ſuccour thereof; and ſo it came to paſſe, that the conſtable of France Arthur of Britaine, the lord Boiſac one of the marſhals, Stephan la Hire, Pothon de Saintreiles, the lord Grauile, and diuerſe others, to the number of thrée thouſand horſſemen, were ſent foorth by the Dolphin.

These priuilie in the night ſeaſon came on that ſide, where ſir John de la Poole and ſir Henrie Biſſet laie, whome they found ſo out of order, and without good watch, that the Frenchmen entered into their lodgings, ſlue manie in their beds, and ſpared none, for their reſiſtance was but ſmall. Sir John de la Poole with his horſſe ſaued himſelfe, and ſir Henrie Biſſet eſcaped by a boat, and eight other with him. The reſidue fléeing in plumpes, and ſtriuing to paſſe by a bridge of timber, the which was peſtered with preaſſe of the multitude, brake, and ſo there were a great number drowned: inſomuch that there were ſlaine by the enimies ſword, and drowned in the water, fifteene hundred men.

The earle of Warwike hearing of this miſfortune, departed from ſaint Mathelines with all ſpeed, and comming before Montargis, offered battell to the French capteins, which anſwered, that they had manned and vittelled the towne, and intended to doo no more at that time. The Engliſhmen heerevpon came ſoftlie backe againe with all their ordinance to the duke of Bedford. Yet had not the French ſo great cauſe to vaunt of their ſucceſſe: for at this verie time, ſir Nicholas Burdet, appointed by the duke of Summerſet to indamage his enimies in the coaſts of Britaine, ſent horſſemen into euerie part, working all the diſpleaſure to the people that might be deuiſed. The countrie, through which he paſſed, was waſted, the townes were burnt, the houſes ſpoiled, and great number of priſoners taken, the ſmall villages were deſtroied, and the walled towns ranſomed, and ſo without hurt or damage the ſaid ſir Nicholas Burdet returned into Normandie.

Polydor.

Theſe newes being ſignified to the conſtable, and other the French capteins, aſſwaged their great mirth and triumphant ioy, conceiued for the victorie of Montargis, that loth they were to attempt anie further enterpriſes againſt the Engliſh nation. But the duke of Alanſon, who (as ye haue heard) was latelie deliuered out of captiuitie, reuiued againe the dulled ſpirits of the Dolphin, and ſomewhat aduanced, in hope of good ſpeed, the fainting harts of his capteins; ſo that (ſome occaſion offered) they determined to atchiue a notable feat (as they tooke it) againſt the Engliſhmen, which was the recouerie of the citie of Mans out of their hands: for ſo it happened, that diuers of the cheefe rulers in that citie, and namelie diuerſe ſpirituall perſons, meaning to reuolt to the Dolphins ſide, aduertiſed him by letters of their whole minds, which letters were conueied vnto him by certeine friers.

The Dolphin glad of thoſe newes, appointed the lords de la Breth and Faict, marſhals of France, accompanied with the lords of Mount Iehan, of Bueill, Dornall, Torſie, Beaumanor, the Hire, and his brother Guilliam, with fiue hundred other valiant capteins and ſouldiers, to the accompliſhing of this enterpriſe; who comming thither at the daie aſſigned, in the night ſeaſon approched towards the walles, making a little fire on an hill, in ſight of the towne, to ſignifie their comming, which perceiued by the citizens that neere to the great church were watching for the ſame, a burning creſſet was ſhewed out of the ſteeple, which ſuddenlie was put out and quenched. What needeth manie words?

The capteins on horſſebacke came to the gate, the traitors within ſlue the porters and watchmen, and let in their freends, whereby the footmen entered firſt, and the men of armes waited at the barriers, to the intent that if need required, they might fight it out in open field. Hereby manie Engliſhmen were ſlaine, & a great crie and garboile raiſed through the towne, as in ſuch ſurpriſes is woont. The cauſe of this miſcheefe was not knowen to any, but onelie to the conſpirators; for the remnant of the citizens being no partakers, imagined, that the Engliſhmen had made hauocke in the towne, and put all to the ſword. The Engliſhmen on the other ſide iudged, that the citizens had begun ſome new rebellion againſt them, or elſe had ſtriuen amongſt themſelues.

Mans loſt by treaſon of the citizens.

The earle of Suffolke, which was gouernour of the towne, hauing perfect knowledge by ſuch as ſcaped from the wals, how the matter went, withdrew without any tarriance into the caſtell, which ſtandeth at the gate of ſaint Vincent, whereof was conſtable Thomas Gower eſquier, whither alſo fled manie Engliſhmen; ſo as for vrging of the enimie, preaſe of the number, and lacke of vittels, they could not haue indured long: wherefore they priuilie ſent a meſſenger to the lord Talbot, which then laie at Alanſon, certifieng him in how hard a caſe they were. The lord Talbot hearing theſe newes, like a carefull capteine in all haſt aſſembled togither about ſeuen hundred men, & in the euening departed from Alanſon, ſo as in the morning he came to a caſtell called Guierch, two miles from Mans, and there ſtaied a while, till he had ſent out Matthew *Gough, as an eſpiall, to vnderſtand how the Frenchmen demeaned themſelues.

* Or rather Goche.

Matthew *Gough ſo well ſped his buſineſſe, that priuilie in the night he came into the caſtell, where he learned that the Frenchmen verie negligentlie vſed themſelues, without taking heed to their watch, as though they had beene out of all danger: which well vnderſtood, he returned againe, and within a mile of the citie met the lord Talbot, and the lord Scales, and opened vnto them all things, according to his credence. The lords then, to make haſt in the matter, bicauſe the daie approched, with all ſpeed poſſible came to the poſterne gate, and alighting from their horſſes, about ſix of the clocke in the morning, they iſſued out of the caſtell, crieng ſaint George, Talbot.

* Goche.

The Frenchmen being thus ſuddenlie taken, were ſore amazed, in ſo much that ſome of them, being not out of their beds, got vp in their ſhirts, and lept ouer the walles. Other ran naked out of the gates to ſaue their liues, leauing all their apparell, horſſes, armour, and riches behind them, none was hurt but ſuch as reſiſted. ¶ Hard ſhift was made on all hands for ſafetie of life, & happie was he that could find a place of refuge where to lurke vnſpide and vnhurt of the enimie; who in the execution of their vengeance were ſo peremptorie, that it was a matter of great difficultie or rather impoſſibilitie to eſcape their force. To be ſhort, there were ſlaine and taken, to the number of foure hundred gentlemen, the priuat ſouldiers were frankelie let go. After this, inquiſition was made of the authors of the treaſon, and there were found & condemned thirtie citizens, twentie preeſts, and fifteene friers, who according to their demerits were all hanged.

Mans recouered.

Abr. Fl.

Traitors executed.

The citie of Mans being thus recouered, the lord Talbot returned to Alanſon, and ſhortlie after the earle of Warwike departed into England, to be gouernour of the yoong king, in ſteed of Thomas duke of Exceſter, latelie departed to God, and then was the lord Thomas Montacute earle of Saliſburie ſent into France, to ſupplie the roome of the ſaid earle of Warwike, who landed at Calis with fiue thouſand men, and ſo came to the duke of Bedford as then lieng in Paris, where they fell in councell togither concerning the affaires of France, and namelie the earle of Saliſburie began maruellouſlie to phantaſie the gaining of the citie & countrie of Orleance.

Anno Reg. 6.

Duke of Exceſter deceaſſed.

1428

This earle was the man at that time, by whoſe wit, ſtrength, and policie, the Engliſh name was much fearefull and terrible to the French nation, which of himſelfe might both appoint, command, and doo all things in manner at his pleaſure, in whoſe power (as it appeared after his death) a great part of the conqueſt conſiſted: for ſuerlie, he was a man both painefull, diligent, and readie to withſtand all dangerous chances that were at hand, prompt in counſell, and of courage inuincible, ſo that in no one man, men put more truſt; nor any ſingular perſon wan the harts ſo much of all men.

Montacute earle of Saliſburie a politike and valiant man.

Heerevpon, after this great enterpriſe had long beene debated in the priuie councell, the earle of Saliſburies deuiſe therein was of them all granted and allowed, ſo that he being repleniſhed with good hope of victorie, and furniſhed with artillerie & munition apperteining to ſo great an enterpriſe, accompanied with the earle of Suffolke, and the lord Talbot, and with a valiant armie, to the number of ten thouſand men, departed from Paris, and paſſed through the countrie of Beauſſe. There he tooke by aſſault, the towne of Genuille, and within fiue daies after had the caſtell deliuered vnto him, by them that were fled into it for their ſafegard. He alſo tooke the towne of Baugencie, ſuffering euerie man which would become ſubiect to the king of England, to inioie their lands and goods. The townes of Meun vpon Loire, and Iargeaulx, hearing of theſe doings, preſented to them the keies of their townes vpon like agreement. [About Maie in this 1428, the towne of Naunts and territories there with a fearefull earthquake were ſhaken, houſes caſtels and ſtrong buildings, in ſuch terrour, as it was thought the end of the world had beene come.]

Anno Reg.7.
Orleance beſieged.
Baſtard of Orleance.

After this, in the moneth of September the earle came before the citie of Orleance, and planted his ſiege on the one ſide of the riuer of Loire; but before his comming, the baſtard of Orleance, the biſhop of the citie, and a great number of Scots, hearing of the earles intent, made diuerſe fortifications about the towne, and deſtroied the ſuburbes, in which were twelue pariſh churches, and foure orders of friers. They cut alſo downe all the vines, trees, and buſhes; within fiue leagues of the citie, ſo that the Engliſhmen ſhould haue neither refuge nor ſuccour.

A bulworke at Orleance taken.
Abr. Fl.

After the ſiege had continued full three weekes, the baſtard of Orleance iſſued out of the gate of the bridge, and fought with the Engliſhmen; but they receiued him with ſo fierce and terrible ſtrokes, that he was with all his companie compelled to retire and flee backe into the citie. But the Engliſhmen followed ſo faſt, in killing and taking of their enimies; that they entered with them. ¶ The bulworke of the bridge, with a great tower ſtanding at the end of the ſame, was taken incontinentlie by the Engliſhmen, who behaued themſelues right valiantlie vnder the conduct of their couragious capteine, as at this aſſault, ſo in diuerſe ſkirmiſhes againſt the French; partlie to keepe poſſeſſion of that which Henrie the fift had by his magnanimitie & puiſſance atchiued, as alſo to inlarge the ſame. But all helped not. For who can hold that which will awaie? In ſo much that ſome cities by fraudulent practiſes, otherſome by martiall proweſſe were recouered by the French, to the great diſcouragement of the Engliſh and the appalling of their ſpirits; whoſe hope was now daſhed partlie by their great loſſes and diſcomfitures (as after you ſhall heare) but cheeflie by the death of the late deceaſſed Henrie their victorious king; as Chr. Okland verie trulie and agreeablie to the ſtorie noteth:

Delphinus comiteſque eius fera prælia tentant,
Fraude domi capiunt alias, virtute receptæ
Sunt vrbes aliæ quædam, ſublapſa refertur
Anglûm ſpes retrò, langueſcere pectora dicas,
Quippe erat Henricus quintus, dux ſtrenuus olim,
Mortuus: hinc damni grauior cauſa atque doloris.

In this conflict, manie Frenchmen were taken, but more were ſlaine, and the keeping of the tower and bulworke was committed to William Glaſdale eſquier. By the taking of this bridge the paſſage was ſtopped, that neither men nor vittels could go or come by that waie. After this, the earle cauſed certeine bulworkes to be made round about the towne, caſting trenches betweene the one and the other, laieng ordinance in euerie place where he ſaw that any batterie might be deuiſed. When they within ſaw that they were enuironed with fortreſſes and ordinance, they laid gun againſt gun, and fortified towers againſt bulworkes, and within caſt new rampiers, and fortified themſelues as ſtronglie as might be deuiſed.

The baſtard of Orleance and the Hire were appointed to ſee the walles and watches kept, and the biſhop ſaw that the inhabitants within the citie were put in good order, and that vittels were not vainelie ſpent. In the tower that was taken at the bridge end (as before you haue heard) there was an high chamber, hauing a grate full of barres of iron, by the which a man might looke all the length of the bridge into the citie; at which grate manie of the cheefe capteins ſtood manie times, viewing the citie, and deuiſing in what place it was beſt to giue the aſſault. They within the citie well perceiued this tooting hole, and laid a peece of ordinance directlie againſt the window.

It ſo chanced, that the nine and fiftith daie after the ſiege was laid, the earle of Saliſburie, ſir Thomas Gargraue, and William Glaſdale, with diuerſe other went into the ſaid tower, and ſo into the high chamber, and looked out at the grate, and within a ſhort ſpace, the ſonne of the maiſter-gunner, perceiuing men looking out at the window, tooke his match (as his father had taught him) who was gone downe to dinner, and fired the gun; the ſhot whereof brake, and ſhiuered the iron barres of the grate, ſo that one of the ſame bars ſtrake the earle ſo violentlie on the head, that it ſtroke awaie one of his eies, and the ſide of his cheeke. Sir Thomas Gargraue was likewiſe ſtriken, and died within two daies.

The earle of Saliſburie ſlaine.

The earle was conueied to Meun on Loire, where after eight daies he likewiſe departed this world, whoſe bodie was conueied into England with all funerall appointment, and buried at Biſſam by his progenitors, leauing behind him an onelie daughter named Alice, married to Richard Neuill, ſonne to Rafe earle of Weſtmerland, of whome more ſhall be ſaid heereafter. The damage that the realme of England receiued by the loſſe of this noble man, manifeſtlie appeared; in that immediatlie after his death, the proſperous good lucke, which had followed the Engliſh nation, began to decline, and the glorie of their victories gotten in the parties beyond the ſea fell in decaie.

Though all men were ſorowfull for his death, yet the duke of Bedford was moſt ſtriken with heauineſſe, as he that had loſt his onelie right hand, and cheefe aid in time of neceſſitie. But ſith that dead men cannot helpe the chances of men that be liuing, he like a prudent gouernour appointed the earle of Suffolke to be his lieutenant and capteine of the ſiege, and ioined with him the lord Scales, the lord Talbot, ſir Iohn Faſtolfe, and diuerſe other right valiant capteins. Theſe perſons cauſed baſtilles to be made round about the citie, and left nothing vnattempted, that might aduance their purpoſe, which to bring to wiſhed effect there was not anie want, as of no cautelous policie, ſo of no valiant enterpriſe, tending to the enimies ouerthrow.

In the Lent ſeaſon, vittels and artillerie began to ware ſcant in the Engliſh campe, wherefore the earle of Suffolke appointed ſir Iohn Faſtolfe, ſir Thomas Rampſton, and ſir Philip Hall, with their retinues, to ride to Paris, to the lord regent, to informe him of their lacke, who incontinentlie vpon that information prouided vittels, artillerie, and munitions neceſſarie, and loded therewith manie chariots, carts, and horſſes: and for the ſure conueieng of the ſame, he appointed ſir Simon Morhier, prouoſt of Paris, with the gard of the citie, and diuerſe of his owne houſhold-ſeruants to accompanie ſir Iohn Faſtolfe and his complices, to the armie lieng at the ſiege of Orleance. They were in all to the number of fifteene hundred men, of the which there were not paſt fiue or ſix hundred Engliſhmen.

Enguerant.

Theſe departing in good order of battell out of Paris,

ris, came to Genuille in Beauſſe, and in a morning earlie, in a great froſt, they departed from thence toward the ſiege; and when they came to a towne called Rowraie, in the lands of Beauſſe, they perceiued their enimies comming towards them, being to the number of nine or ten thouſand of Frenchmen and Scots, of whome were capteins Charles of Cleremont, ſonne to the duke of Bourbon then being priſoner in England; ſir William Steward conſtable of Scotland, a little before deliuered out of captiuitie, the earle of Perdriake, the lord John Vandoſme, the Vidame of Chartres, the lord of Toures, the lord of Lohar, the lord of Eglere, the lord of Beauiew, the baſtard Tremoile, and manie other valiant capteins.

Wherefore ſir John Faſtolfe ſet all his companie in good order of battell, and pitched ſtakes before euerie archer, to breake the force of the horſſemen. At their backes they ſet all the wagons and carriages, and within them they tied all their horſſes. In this maner ſtood they ſtill, abiding the aſſault of their enimies. The Frenchmen by reaſon of their great number, thinking themſelues ſure of the victorie, egerlie ſet on the Engliſhmen, which with great force them receiued, and themſelues manfullie defended. At length, after long and cruell fight, the Engliſhmen droue backe and vanquiſhed the proud Frenchmen, & compelled them to flee. In this conflict were ſlaine the lord William Steward conſtable of Scotland, and his brother the lord Dorualle, the lord Chateaubriam, ſir John Baſgot, and other Frenchmen and Scots, to the number of fiue and twentie hundred, and aboue eleuen hundred taken priſoners, although the French writers affirme the number leſſe.

1500 Engliſh did ſlaie and vãquiſh 10000 French.

After this fortunate victorie, ſir John Faſtolfe and his companie (hauing loſt no one man of anie reputation) with all their cariages, vittels, and priſoners, marched forth and came to the Engliſh campe before Orleance, where they were ioifullie receiued, and highlie commended for their valiancie and worthie proweſſe ſhewed in the battell; the which bicauſe moſt part of the cariage was herring and lenton ſtuffe, the Frenchmen called it the battell of herrings. The earle of Suffolke being thus vittelled, continued the ſiege, and euerie daie almoſt ſkirmiſhed with the Frenchmen within, who (at length being in deſpaire of all ſuccours) offered to treat, and in concluſion, to ſaue themſelues and the citie from captiuitie of their enimies, they deuiſed to ſubmit the citie, themſelues, and all theirs vnder the obeiſance of Philip duke of Burgognie, bicauſe he was extract out of the ſtocke and blood roiall of the ancient kings of France, thinking by this means (as they did in deed) to breake or diminiſh the great amitie betweene the Engliſhmen and him.

The battell of herrings.

This offer was ſignified by them vnto the duke of Burgognie, who with thanks certified them againe, that he would gladlie receiue them, if the lord regent would therewith be contented. Herevpon he diſpatched meſſengers to the duke of Bedford, who though ſome counſelled that it ſhould be verie good and neceſſarie for him to agree to that maner of yeelding; yet he and other thought it neither conuenient nor honourable, that a citie ſo long beſieged by the king of England, ſhould be deliuered vnto anie other prince, than to him, or to his regent, for that might be a verie bad preſident to other townes in anie like caſe. Herevpon the regent anſwered the Burgognian ambaſſadors: that after ſo long a ſiege on his part, and obſtinat a reſiſtance of theirs, he might not receiue rendring and conditions at their appointment. At this anſwer the duke hoong the groine, as conceiuing that our ſide ſhould enuie his glorie, or not to be ſo forward in aduancing his honour as he would haue it.

In vita Bundvice.

In time of this ſiege at Orleance (French ſtories ſaie) the firſt weeke of March 1428, vnto Charles the Dolphin, at Chinon as he was in verie great care and ſtudie how to wreſtle againſt the Engliſh nation, by one Peter Badricourt capteine of Vacouleur, (made after marſhall of France by the Dolphins creation) was caried a yoong wench of an eighteene yeeres old, called Jone Arc, by name of hir father (a ſorie ſheepheard) James of Arc, and Iſabell hir mother, brought vp poorlie in their trade of keeping cattell, borne at Domprin (therefore reported by Bale, Jone Domprin) vpon Meuſe in Lorraine within the dioceſſe of Thoule. Of fauour was ſhe counted likeſome, of perſon ſtronglie made and manlie, of courage great, hardie, and ſtout withall, an vnderſtander of counſels though ſhe were not at them, great ſemblance of chaſtitie both of bodie and behauiour, the name of Jeſus in hir mouth about all hir buſineſſes, humble, obedient, and faſting diuerſe daies in the weeke. A perſon (as their bookes make hir) raiſed vp by power diuine, onelie for ſuccour to the French eſtate then deepelie in diſtreſſe, in whome, for planting a credit the rather, firſt the companie that toward the Dolphin did conduct hir, through places all dangerous, as holden by the Engliſh, where ſhe neuer was afore, all the waie and by nightertale ſafelie did ſhe lead: then at the Dolphins ſending by hir aſſignement, from ſaint Katharins church of Fierbois in Touraine (where ſhe neuer had beene and knew not) in a ſecret place there among old iron, appointed ſhe hir ſword to be ſought out and brought hir, that with fiue floure delices was grauen on both ſides, wherewith ſhe fought & did manie ſlaughters by hir owne hands. On warfar rode ſhe in armour *cap a pie & muſtered as a man, before hir an enſigne all white, wherin was Jeſus Chriſt painted with a floure delice in his hand.

*From head to foot.

Vnto the Dolphin into his gallerie when firſt ſhe was brought, and he ſhadowing himſelfe behind, ſetting other gaie lords before him to trie hir cunning from all the companie, with a ſalutation (that indeed marz all the matter) ſhe pickt him out alone, who therevpon had hir to the end of the gallerie, where ſhe held him an houre in ſecret and priuate talke, that of his priuie chamber was thought verie long, and therefore would haue broken it off; but he made them a ſigne to let hir ſaie on. In which (among other) as likelie it was, ſhe ſet out vnto him the ſingular feats (forſooth) giuen hir to vnderſtand by reuelation diuine, that in vertue of that ſword ſhee ſhould atchiue, which were, how with honor and victorie ſhee would raiſe the ſiege at Orleance, ſet him in ſtate of the crowne of France, and driue the Engliſh out of the countrie, thereby he to inioie the kingdome alone. Heerevpon he hartened at full, appointed hir a ſufficient armie with abſolute power to lead them, and they obedientlie to doo as ſhe bad them. Then fell ſhe to worke, and firſt defeated indeed the ſiege at Orleance, by and by incouraged him to crowne himſelfe king of France at Reims, that a little before from the Engliſh ſhe had wone. Thus after purſued ſhe manie bold enterpriſes to our great diſpleaſure a two yeare togither, for the time ſhe kept in ſtate vntill ſhe were taken and for hereſie and witcherie burned: as in particularities hereafter followeth. But in hir prime time ſhe armed at all points (like a iolie capteine) roade from Poictiers to Blois, and there found men of warre, vittels, and munition, readie to be conueied to Orleance.

This ſalutation appeereth after here.
Les grand chronic.

Heere was it knowne that the Engliſhmen kept not ſo diligent watch as they had beene accuſtomed to doo, and therefore this maid (with other French capteins) comming forward in the dead time of the night, and in a great raine and thunder entred into the citie with all their vittels, artillerie, and other neceſſarie prouiſions. The next daie the Engliſhmen boldlie aſſaulted the towne, but the Frenchmen defended the walles ſo, as no great feat worthie of memorie chanced that daie betwixt them, though the Frenchmen were amazed at the valiant attempt of the Engliſhmen, wherevpon the baſtard of Orleance gaue knowledge to the duke of Alanſon, in what danger the towne ſtood without his preſent helpe, who comming within two leagues of the citie, gaue knowledge to them within, that they ſhould be readie the next daie to receiue him.

This accordinglie was accompliſhed: for the Engliſhmen willinglie ſuffered him and his armie alſo to enter, ſuppoſing that it ſhould be for their aduantage to haue ſo great a multitude to enter the citie, whereby their vittels (whereof they within had great ſcarſitie) might the ſooner be conſumed. On the next daie in the morning, the Frenchmen altogither iſſued out of the towne, wonne by aſſault the baſtile of ſaint Lou, and ſet it on fire. And after they likewiſe aſſaulted the tower at the bridge foot, which was manfullie defended. But the Frenchmen (more in number) at length tooke it, yer the lord Talbot could come to the ſuccours, in the which William Gladeſdale the capteine was ſlaine, with the lord Mollins, and lord Poinings alſo.

The Frenchmen puffed vp with this good lucke, fetched a compaſſe about, and in good order of battell marched toward the baſtile, which was in the keeping of the lord Talbot: the which vpon the enimies approch, like a capteine without all feare or dread of that great multitude, iſſued foorth againſt them, and gaue them ſo ſharpe an incounter, that they not able to withſtand his puiſſance, fled (like ſheepe before the woolfe) againe into the citie, with great loſſe of men and ſmall artillerie. Of Engliſhmen were loſt in the two baſtiles, to the number of ſix hundred perſons, or thereabout, though the French writers multiplie this number of hundreds to thouſands, as their maner is.

The earle of Suffolke, the lord Talbot, the lord Scales, and other capteins aſſembled togither in councell, and after cauſes ſhewed to and fro, it was amongſt them determined to leaue their fortreſſes and baſtiles, and to aſſemble in the plaine field, and there to abide all the daie, to ſee if the Frenchmen would iſſue foorth to fight with them. This concluſion taken was accordinglie executed: but when the Frenchmen durſt not once come foorth to ſhew their heads, the Engliſhmen ſet fire of their lodgings, and departed in good order of battell from Orleance. The next daie, which was the eight daie of Maie, the earle of Suffolke rode to Jargeaur with foure hundred Engliſhmen, and the lord Talbot with an other companie returned to Mehun. And after he had fortified that towne, he went to the towne of Lauall, & wonne it, togither with the caſtell, ſore puniſhing the townſmen for their cankered obſtinacie againſt them.

The ſiege of Orleance broken vp.

Thus when the Engliſhmen had ſeuered themſelues into garriſons, the duke of Alanſon, the baſtard of Orleance, Jone le Puſell, the lord Gawcourt, and diuerſe other capteins of the Frenchmen, came the twelfe daie of June, before the towne of Jargeaur, where the earle of Suffolke and his two brethren ſoiourned, & gaue to the towne ſo fierce an aſſault on three parts, that Poiton de Sentrailes, perceiuing an other part void of defendants, ſcaled the wals on that ſide, and without difficultie tooke the towne, and ſlue ſir Alexander Poole, brother to the erle, and manie other, to the number of two hundred. But the Frenchmen gained not much thereby, for they loſt three hundred good men and more. Of the Engliſhmen fortie were taken, with the earle and his other brother named John.

The Frenchmen, as they returned to Orleance, fell at variance for their priſoners, and ſlue them all, ſauing the earle and his brother. Shortlie after, the ſame French armie came to Mehun, where they tooke the tower at the bridge foot, and put therein a garriſon. From thence they remoued to Baugencie, and conſtreined them that were within the towne to yeeld, vpon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. At the ſame place there came to the duke of Alanſon, the new conſtable Arthur of Britaine, and with him the lord Dalbret, and other. Alſo after this the earle of Vandoſme came to them, ſo that by the dailie repaire of ſuch as aſſembled togither to ſtrengthen the French part, they were in all to the number betweene twentie and three and twentie thouſand men.

Priſoners ſlaine by the French as they were taken.

All which being once ioined in one armie, ſhortlie after fought with the lord Talbot (who had with him not paſt ſix thouſand men) neere vnto a village in Beauſſe called Pataie: at which battell the charge was giuen by the French ſo vpon a ſudden, that the Engliſhmen had not leiſure to put themſelues in araie, after they had put vp their ſtakes before their archers, ſo that there was no remedie but to fight at aduenture. This battell continued by the ſpace of three long houres: for the Engliſhmen, though they were ouerpreſſed with multitude of their enimies, yet they neuer fled backe one foot, till their capteine the lord Talbot was ſore wounded at the backe, and ſo taken.

Nichol. Giles. Fiue thouſand ſaith Hall.

Then their hearts began to faint, and they fled, in which flight were ſlaine aboue twelue hundred, and fortie taken, of whome the lord Talbot, the lord Scales, the lord Hungerford, & ſir Thomas Rampſton were cheefe. Diuerſe archers, after they had ſhot all their arrowes, hauing onelie their ſwords, defended themſelues, and with helpe of ſome of their horſmen came ſafe to Mehun. This ouerthrow, and ſpeciallie the taking of the lord Talbot, did not ſo much reioiſe the Frenchmen; but it did as much abaſh the Engliſhmen: ſo that immediatlie therevpon, the townes of Jenuile, Mehun, Fort, and diuerſe other, returned from the Engliſh part, and became French. From this battell departed without anie ſtroke ſtriken ſir John Faſtolfe, the ſame yeare for his valiantneſſe elected into the order of the garter. But for doubt of miſdealing at this brunt, the duke of Bedford tooke from him the image of ſaint George, and his garter; though afterward by meanes of freends, and apparant cauſes of good excuſe, the ſame were to him againe deliuered againſt the mind of the lord Talbot.

Great loſſe on ẏ Engliſh ſide The lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford taken.

Charles the Dolphin that called himſelfe French K. perceiuing fortune to ſmile thus vpon him, aſſembled a great power, and determined to conquer the citie of Reimes, that he might be there ſacred, crowned, and annointed, according to the cuſtome of his progenitours, that all men might iudge that he was by all lawes and decrees a iuſt and lawfull king. In his waie thitherwards he beſieged the citie of Auxerre, the citizens whereof compounded with him to yeeld, if they were not reſcued within certeine daies. From thence he came before Trois, and after twelue daies ſiege had that citie deliuered vnto him, by compoſition, that the capteine ſir Philip Hall (with his people and moueables) might depart in ſafetie. After that Trois was yeelded, the communaltie of Chaalons rebelled againſt ſir John Aubemond their capteine, and conſtreined him to deliuer the towne vpon like compoſition. In ſemblable manner did they of Reimes, deſiring him to giue ſafe conduct to all the Engliſhmen ſafelie to depart. When Reimes was thus become French, the foreſaid Charles the Dolphin in the preſence of the dukes of Lorraine and Barre, and of all the noble men of his faction, was ſacred there king of France by the name of Charles the ſeauenth, with all rites and ceremonies thereto belonging. They of Auxerre, when the terme of their appointment was expired, ſubmitted themſelues to him; and ſo likewiſe did all the cities and townes adioining.

The duke of Bedford aduertiſed of all theſe dooings, aſſembled his power about him, and hauing togither ten thouſand good Engliſhmen (beſide Normans) departed out of Paris in warlike faſhion, & paſſing thorough Brie to Monſtreau fault Yonne, ſent by his herald Bedford, letters to the French king, ſignifieng to him; that where he had (contrarie to the finall concluſion accorded betwéene his noble brother K. Henrie the fift, & king Charles the ſixt, father to him that was the vſurper) by allurement of a diueliſh witch, taken vpon him the name, title, & dignitie of the king of France; and further had by murther, ſtealing, craft, and deceitfull meanes, violentlie gotten, and wrongfullie kept diuerſe cities and townes belonging to the king of England his nephue; for proofe thereof he was come downe from Paris with his armie, into the countrie of Brie, by dint of ſword and ſtroke of battell to prooue his writing and cauſe true, willing his enimie to chooſe the place, and in the ſame he would giue him battell.

Ione taken to be a witch.

The new French king being come from Reimes to Dampmartine, ſtudieng how to compaſſe them of Paris, was halfe abaſhed at this meſſage. But yet to ſet a good countenance on the matter, he anſwered the herald, that he would ſooner ſéeke his maiſter, than his maiſter ſhould néed to purſue him. The duke of Bedford hearing this anſwer, marched toward the king, and pitched his field in a ſtrong place. The French king though at the firſt he meant to haue abidden battell; yet when he vnderſtood that the duke was equall to him in number of people, he changed his purpoſe, and turned with his armie a little out of the waie. The duke of Bedford, perceiuing his faint courage, followed him by the hils and dales, till he came to a town not far from Senlis, where he found the French king and his armie lodged; wherefore he ordered his battels like an expert chéefteine in martiall ſcience, ſetting the archers before, and himſelfe with the noblemen in the maine battell, and put the Normans on both ſides for wings. The French king alſo ordered his battels with the aduiſe of his capteins.

Thus theſe two armies laie two daies and two nights either in ſight of other, without anie great dooing, except a few ſkirmiſhes, wherein the dukes light horſſemen did verie valiantlie. At length in the dead of the night (as priuilie as might be) the French king brake vp his campe, and fled to Braie. The duke of Bedford had much adoo to ſtaie his people in the morning from purſuit of the French armie: but for that he miſtruſted the Pariſiens, he would not depart farre from that citie, and ſo returned thither againe. ¶ In this ſeaſon pope Martin the fift of that name, meaning to ſubdue the Bohemers that diſſented from the church of Rome in matters of religion, appointed Henrie Beaufort Biſhop of Wincheſter & cardinall of ſaint Euſebie, to be his legat in an armie that ſhould inuade the kingdome of Boheme, and to bring a power of men with him out of England. And becauſe the warre touched religion, he licenced the cardinall to take the tenth part of euerie ſpirituall dignitie, benefice, and promotion.

The French armie fled in the night.

Boheme.

This matter was opened in the parlement houſe, and aſſented to: wherevpon the biſhop gathered the monie, and aſſembled foure thouſand men & aboue, not without great grudge of the people, which dailie were with tallages and aids wearied and ſore burdened. As this biſhop was come to Douer readie to paſſe the ſeas ouer into Flanders, the duke of Glouceſter hauing receiued letters from the duke of Bedford, conteining an earneſt requeſt to reléeue him with ſome ſpéedie aid of men of warre, was conſtreined to write vnto the biſhop of Wincheſter, willing him in time of ſuch néed, when all ſtood vpon loſſe or gaine, to paſſe with all his armie toward the duke of Bedford, to aſſiſt him againſt his aduerſaries; which thing doone, and to his honour atchiued, he might performe his iournie againſt the vngratious Bohemers. The cardinall (though not well contented with this countermand) yet leaſt he ſhould run into the note of infamie, if he refuſed to aid the regent of France in ſo great a cauſe, paſſed ouer with his power, and brought the ſame vnto his coſine to the citie of Paris.

About the ſame ſeaſon, the French king, in hope to be receiued into the townes of Campaigne and Beauuois (by reaſon of the fauour and good will which the inhabitants bare towards him) was come with an armie towards Campaigne. Whereof the duke of Bedford being aduertiſed, and hauing now his hoſt augmented with the new ſupplie, which the cardinall had of late brought vnto him, marched forward with great ſpéed toward the place where he vnderſtood the French king was lodged: and comming to Senlis, he perceiued how his enimies were incamped vpon the mount Pilioll, betwéene Senlis and Campaigne.

Here might either armie behold the other: wherevpon for the auoiding of dangers that might inſue, the campes were trenched, and the battels pitched, and the fields ordered as though they ſhould haue tried the matter by battell: but nothing was doone except with ſkirmiſhes, in the which the Normans ſore vexed the Frenchmen; and therefore receiued great commendations & praiſes of the lord regent: who vndoubtedlie determined to haue giuen battell to his enimies if they would haue abidden it. But after the armies had thus lien ether in ſight of other, for the ſpace of two daies togither, the French king not determining to aduenture in an open battell the whole chance of the game, leaſt he might thereby receiue a perpetuall checkemate, in the night ſeaſon remooued his campe, and fled to Creſpie, though his number was double to the Engliſh armie. The duke of Bedford, ſéeing that the French king was thus cowardlie recoiled with all his power and armie, returned againe to Paris, euer ſuſpecting the deceitfull faith of the Pariſiens.

Anno Reg. 8.

The biſhop of Wincheſter, after that the French king was retreated backe, went into Boheme, and there did ſomewhat, though ſhortlie after without anie great praiſe or gaine he returned into England, more glad of his comming backe than of his aduancing forward. Anon after the pope vnlegated him, and ſet an other in his place, wherewith he was nothing contented. On the ſixt daie of Nouember, being the daie of ſaint Leonard, king Henrie in the eight yeare of his reigne was at Weſtminſter with all pompe and honour crowned king of this realme of England. In the ſame yere the French king was receiued into the towne of Campaigne, and ſhortlie after were the townes of Senlis and Beauuois rendered to him. And the lord Longueuall tooke by ſtelth the caſtell of Aumarle, and ſlue all the Engliſhmen within it.

Alſo about the ſame time, the Frenchmen recouered caſtell Galiard forth of the Engliſhmens hands, where the lord Barbaſon was found in a dungeon, incloſed within a great grate of iron like to a little chamber, and forthwith they brake open the grate: but Barbaſon would not come forth; becauſe he had giuen his faith and promiſe to one Kingſton that was capteine of that fortreſſe for the king of England, to be true priſoner, vntill the Frenchmen had ſent to the ſame Kingſton (that was departed vpon ſuch couenants as they were agréed vpon at the deliuerie of that fortreſſe) willing him to come backe againe vpon ſafe conduct. Which at their earneſt requeſt he did, and withall diſcharged the lord Barbaſon of his oth; and ſo then he came forth, and remained at his libertie, to the great reioiſing of the Frenchmen, which iudged that he had béene rather dead than aliue all that time of his impriſonment.

About the ſame time alſo the French king ſought by all meanes poſſible to breake the amitie betwixt the realme of England, and the houſe of Burgognie. Whereof the duke of Bedford hauing intelligence, thought it ſtood him vpon the more earneſtlie to looke to his charge; and namelie as it were an anchorhold, he determined to prouide that he might defend and ſafelie kéepe the duchie of Normandie, and therefore appointing the biſhop of Terrowen and Elie, named Lewes of Lutzenburgh, chancellor for king Henrie of the realme of France, to remaine at Paris vpon the defenſe of that citie, with a conuenient number of Engliſhmen, he departed into Normandie, and comming to Rone, called a parlement there of the thrée eſtates of the duchie, in the which he declared manie things vnto them, touching the happie life, and great fréedome which they might be aſſured to inioy, ſo long as they continued vnder the Engliſh obeiſance: and therefore he exhorted them to abide conſtant in their allegiance, faith, and promiſe made and ſworne to his noble brother king Henrie the fift.

A parlement at Rone called by the duke of Bedford.

Whileſt the duke of Bedford was buſie to reteine the Normans in their due obedience, the French king departed from Senlis; and comming to the towne of ſaint Denis, found it in maner deſolate, ſo that he entered there without reſiſtance, and lodged his armie at Mount Martyr and Amberuilliers, néere vnto the citie of Paris; and from thence ſent Iohn duke of Alanſon, and his ſorcereſſe Ione la Puſell, with thrée thouſand light horſſemen to aſſault the citie, and followed himſelfe, in hope to get it, either by force or treatie. But the Engliſh capteins euerie one kéeping his ward and place aſſigned, ſo manfullie defended themſelues, their walles and towers, with the aſſiſtance of the Pariſiens, that they repelled the Frenchmen, and threw downe Ione their great goddeſſe into the bottome of the towne ditch, where ſhe lay behind the backe of an aſſe ſore hurt in the leg, till the time that ſhe (all filthie with mire and durt) was drawne out by Guiſchard of Thienbrone, ſeruant to the duke of Alanſon.

The French got ſaint Denis.

Ione had a hurt in the leg and a fall, drawen all durtie out of the mire.

The French king, perceiuing that he could not preuaile in this enterpriſe, left the dead bodies behind him, and taking with him the wounded capteins, returned into Berrie. But in the meane waie, the inhabitants of Laignie ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. The duke of Bedford being in Normandie, hearing of this ſudden attempt, with all haſt poſſible came to Paris, where he gaue manie great thanks, with high commendations vnto the capteins, ſouldiers and citizens for their aſſured fidelitie, great hardineſſe & manlie dooing. Which his gentle words ſo incouraged the harts of the Pariſiens, that they ſware, promiſed and concluded, to be fréends for euer to the king of England and his fréends, and enimies alwaies to his foes and aduerſaries, making proclamation by this ſtile: Fréends to K. Henrie, fréends to the Pariſiens; Enimies to England, enimies to Paris. Marie whether this was vttered from their harts, it is hard ſo to ſaie, for the ſequeale of their acts ſéemed to proue the contrarie.

Soone after theſe dooings, came to Paris with a great companie Philip duke of Burgognie, and then vpon long conſultation had for the recouerie of their loſſes, it was agréed that the duke of Bedford ſhould raiſe an armie, & that the duke of Burgognie ſhould be his deputie, and tarie at Paris for the defenſe of the citie. The duke of Bedford then without any great reſiſtance recouered againe the towne of ſaint Denis, with diuerſe other fortreſſes. And after this he ſent the baſtard of Clarence to laie ſiege to the caſtell of Torſie, the which (notwithſtanding the great ſtrength therof) after ſix moneths ſiege, was rendred vp into his hands. During the ſiege of this caſtell, ſir Thomas Kiriell knight, with foure hundred Engliſhmen departed from Gournеie in Normandie, and rode by Beauuois, ſpoiling and waſting the countrie to the ſuburbes of Cleremont. Whereof the earle of that towne hauing aduertiſement, aſſembled all the men of warre of the garriſons adioining, and with the ſame ſet forward to fight with the Engliſhmen, whom he found in a ſtreict place néere to Beauuois.

Saint Denis by vs recouered againe.

The earle of Cleremont, perceiuing that he could not hurt them with his men of armes, by reaſon of the ſtrength, came downe on foot with all his cõpanie, and fiercelie ſet on the Engliſhmen: but by the terrible ſhot of the Engliſh archers, the Frenchmen in the end were conſtreined to flée; and the Engliſhmen perceiuing the matter, ſtreight leapt on horſſebacke and followed the chaſe. In the which were taken two hundred priſoners, and thriſe as manie ſlaine. The earle eſcaped by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſſe. At the ſame ſeaſon the earle of Suffolke beſieging the towne of Aumarle (whereof was capteine the lord of Rambures) after foure and twentie great aſſaults, had the towne and caſtell ſimplie to him rendred. Thus by little and little the Engliſhmen recouered manie townes which before they had loſt. Howbeit about the verie ſame time, the Frenchmen ſtale the towne of Lauall, by treaſon wrought by a miller, which kéeping a mill that ioined to the wall, ſuffered the French to paſſe through his mill into the towne. Shortlie after alſo ſir Steuen de Vignoilles, ſurnamed la Hire, tooke by ſcaling the towne of Louiers in Normandie. The Engliſhmen in the cold moneth of December beſieged the towne of Laignie in the which was the Puſell, and diuerſe other good capteins.

[In the moneth of Maie 1430, with a valiant man in feats of armes on the duke of Burgognions ſide, one Franquet and his band of thrée hundred ſouldiers, making all towards the maintenance of the ſiege, the Puſell Ione and a foure hundred with hir did méet. In great courage and force did ſhe and hir people ſundrie times aſſaile him, but he with his (though much vnder in number) by meanes of his archers in good order ſet, did ſo hardilie withſtand them, that for the firſt and ſecond puſh ſhe rather loſt than wan: Wherat this captineſſe ſtriken into a fretting chafe, called out in all haſt the garriſon of Laignie, and from other the forts thereabout, who thicke and thréefold came downe with might and maine, in armour and number ſo far excéeding Franquets, that though they had doone hir much hurt in hir horſemen; yet by the verie multitude were they oppreſſed, moſt in hir furie put to the ſword; & as for to Franquet that worthie capteine himſelfe, hir rage not appeaſed, till out of hand ſhe had his head ſtroken off: contrarie to all manhood (but ſhe was a woman, if ſhe were that) & contrarie to common right & law of armes. The man for his merits was verie much lamented, and ſhe by hir malice then found of what ſpirit ſhe was.]

Campiegne beſieged.

After this the duke of Burgognie accompanied with the earles of Arundell, and Suffolke, and the lord John of Lutzenburgh beſieged the towne of Campiegne with a great puiſſance. This towne was well walled, manned, and vittelled, ſo that the beſiegers were conſtreined to caſt trenches, and make mines, for otherwiſe they ſaw not how to compaſſe their purpoſe. In the meane time it happened in the night of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, that Poiton de Saintreiles, Jone la Puſell, and fiue or ſix hundred men of armes iſſued out by the bridge toward Mondedier, intending to ſet fire in the tents and lodgings of the lord Bawdo de Noielle.

¶ In this yeare of our Lord, among diuerſe notable men of learning and knowledge, one Richard Fleming, Engliſh borne, a doctor of diuinitie profeſſed in Oxford, did flouriſh: who by the prouidence of God grew in ſuch fauour with this king Henrie the ſixt, & the nobles neere & about him, that he was preferred to the biſhops ſee of Lincolne. This man founded Lincolne college in Oxford, in which vniuerſitie he had beene a profitable ſtudent. Diuerſe bookes he wrote (as the vniuerſitie librarie dooth beare witneſſe) whereof theſe following haue beene ſeene vnder their names and titles; to wit: A proteſtation againſt the Spaniards, the Frenchmen, and the Scots, made in the generall councell holden at Sens: one booke of the Etymologie of England; beſides diuerſe other treatiſes, as Geſner reporteth Ex bibliotheca Oxonij, aforeſaid.]

Jone the Puſell taken.

At the verie ſame time that Campeigne was beſieged (as before is ſaid) ſir John of Lutzenburgh, with eight other gentlemen, chanced to be neere vnto the lodging of the ſaid lord Bawdo, where they eſpied the Frenchmen, which began to cut downe tents, ouerthrow pauilions, & kill men in their beds: whervpon they with all ſpeed aſſembled a great number of men, as well Engliſh as Burgognions, and couragiouſlie ſet on the Frenchmen, and in the end beat them backe into the towne, ſo that they fled ſo faſt that one letted another, as they would haue entered. In the chaſe and purſute was the Puſell taken, with diuerſe other, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine, which were no ſmall number. Diuerſe were hurt alſo on both parts. Among the Engliſhmen, ſir John Montgomerie had his arme broken, and ſir John Steward was ſhot into the thigh with a quarell.

Of hir louers (the Frenchmen) reporteth one, how in Campeigne thus beſieged, Guillaume de Flauie the capteine hauing ſold hir aforehand to the lord of Lutzenburgh, vnder colour of haſting hir with a band out of the towne towards their king, for him with ſpeed to come and leauie the ſiege there, ſo gotten hir forth he ſhut the gates after hir, when anon by the Burgognians ſet vpon and ouermatcht in the conflict ſhe was taken: marie yet (all things accounted) to no ſmall maruell how it could come ſo to paſſe, had ſhe beene of any deuotion or of true beleefe, and no falſe miſcreant, but all holie as ſhe made it. For earlie that morning ſhe gat hir to ſaint Jameſes church, confeſſed hir, and receiued hir maker (as the booke termes it) and after ſetting hir ſelfe to a piller, manie of the towneſmen that with a fiue or ſix ſcore of their children ſtood about there to ſee hir, vnto them “(quod ſhe) Good children and my deere freends, I tell you plaine one hath ſold me. Saith another booke, ſhe was intrapt by a Picard capteine of Soiſſons, who ſold that citie to the duke of Burgognie, and he then put it ouer into the hands of the lord of Lutzenburgh, ſo by that meanes the Burgognians approched and beſieged Campeigne, for ſuccour whereof as damſell Jone with hir capteins from Laignie was thither come, and dailie to the Engliſh gaue manie a hot ſkirmiſh, ſo happened it one a daie in an outſallie that ſhe made by a Picard of the lord of Lutzenburghs band, in the fierceſt of hir fight ſhe was taken, and by him by and by to his lord preſented, who ſold hir ouer againe to the Engliſh, who for witchcraft and ſorcerie burnt hir at Rone. Tiller telleth it thus, that ſhe was caught at Campeigne by one of the earle of Ligneis ſoldiers, from him had to Beaureuoir caſtell, where kept a three months, ſhe was after for ten thouſand pounds in monie and three hundred pounds rent (all Turnois) ſold into the Engliſh hands.

Li. 23. in vita H. 6.

After the beſtowing of this Puſell in ſort as yée haue heard, the ſiege ſtill continued before Campiegne, and the duke of Bedford ſent to the duke of Burgognie lieng at the ſiege, the earle of Huntington, and ſir Iohn Robſert (two iollie gentlemen, of no leſſe prudence to parle with the enimie, than puiſſance to incounter them) with a thouſand archers (whoſe actiuitie, I warrant you, ſtood not then vpon the firſt triall) which dailie ſkirmiſhed with them within, and made ſuch baſtiles & fortreſſes, that the towne had béene rendred into their hands, but that the duke of Burgognie departed from the ſiege to go into Brabant, to receiue the poſſeſſion of that duchie, by the death of his couſin Philip the duke of that countrie, as then departed this world.

Anno Reg. 9.

Sir Iohn de Lutzenburgh was left by the duke of Burgognie as generall of the ſiege before Campiegne, the which he raiſed within a ſhort ſpace after, contrarie to the minds of the Engliſhmen, which were verie deſirous to haue lien there till the towne had béene rendered, which if the ſiege had béene continued but eight daies longer, muſt néeds haue come to paſſe; by reaſon that peſtilence and famine had almoſt conſumed all the ſouldiers within the towne, ſo that it remained in maner without defenſe. After the breaking vp of this ſiege, Iohn duke of Norfolke tooke againe the townes of Dampmartine, and the Chaſſe Mongaie, with diuerſe other townes. Alſo the earle of Stafford tooke the towne of Brin countie Robert, and from thence forraged all the countrie to Sens, and after tooke Queſnoie in Brie, Grand Puis, and Rampellon.

During this time, the Frenchmen on the other ſide tooke Louiers, and Villeneuf. Then alſo did the towne of Melun rebell, and had ſuch aid of other townes adioining, that the Engliſh ſouldiers were faine to leaue Melun, Morret, and Corbell. Thus did things wauer in doubtfull balance betwixt the two nations Engliſh and French. But bicauſe the Engliſh ſore miſtruſted further danger, it was concluded, that king Henrie in his roiall perſon with a new armie ſhould come into France, partlie to viſit and comfort his owne ſubiects there, and partlie either by feare or fauour (bicauſe a child of his age and beautie dooth commonlie procure them loue of elder perſons) to moue the Frenchmen to continue their due obeiſance towards him.

Wherefore after a great hoſt conuenient for that purpoſe aſſembled, and monie for maintenance of the warre readie gathered, and the realme ſet in an order vnder the gouernement of the duke of Glocester protector (which during the kings abſence appeaſed diuerſe riots, and puniſhed the offendors) the king with a great power tooke ſhipping at Douer on ſaint Georges euen within night, and landed at Calis on the morrow being ſaint Georges daie, and ſundaie, by ſeuen of the clocke in the morning. He remained in Calis a good ſpace, and from thence he remoued to Rone, being there receiued with all triumph. He taried in that citie a long time, his nobles dailie conſulting on their great buſineſſe & weightie affaires.

King Henrie the ſixt in perſon goeth with an armie into France.

¶ In this kings time, & ſomewhat about this yeare, a certeine Breton, whome a good honeſt widow had receiued into hir houſe, and conceiued well of him in opinion, was by hir mainteined of hir owne purſſe, & (as Polychronicon ſaith) ſhe found him of almes and for Gods ſake. This charitable déed of hirs deſerued a deuout mind to God ward, and a thankfull hart to hir. But (good ſoule) how was ſhe recompenſed? * Euen murthered in hir bed by the hands of that villaine whome ſo bountifullie ſhe ſuccoured, and motherlike tendered. Vnto which bloudie fact (which was a preparatiue to a further miſchéefe bred in his vnnaturall hart) he added another offenſe: for when he had diſpatched the woman, vſing the riddance of hir to his aduantage, and as he had obteined oportunitie (to his thinking) he conueied all that ſhe had awaie with him for his owne reléefe. Li. 23. in vita H. 6.

After the beſtowing of this Puſell in ſort as yée haue heard, the ſiege ſtill continued before Campiegne, and the duke of Bedford ſent to the duke of Burgognie lieng at the ſiege, the earle of Huntington, and ſir Iohn Robſert (two iollie gentlemen, of no leſſe prudence to parle with the enimie, than puiſſance to incounter them) with a thouſand archers (whoſe actiuitie, I warrant you, ſtood not then vpon the firſt triall) which dailie ſkirmiſhed with them within, and made ſuch baſtiles & fortreſſes, that the towne had béene rendred into their hands, but that the duke of Burgognie departed from the ſiege to go into Brabant, to receiue the poſſeſſion of that duchie, by the death of his couſin Philip the duke of that countrie, as then departed this world.

Anno Reg. 9.

Sir Iohn de Lutzenburgh was left by the duke of Burgognie as generall of the ſiege before Campiegne, the which he raiſed within a ſhort ſpace after, contrarie to the minds of the Engliſhmen, which were verie deſirous to haue lien there till the towne had béene rendered, which if the ſiege had béene continued but eight daies longer, muſt néeds haue come to paſſe; by reaſon that peſtilence and famine had almoſt conſumed all the ſoldiers within the towne, ſo that it remained in maner without defenſe. After the breaking vp of this ſiege, Iohn duke of Norfolke tooke againe the townes of Dampmartine, and the Chaſſe Mongaie, with diuerſe other townes. Alſo the earle of Stafford tooke the towne of Brin countie Robert, and from thence forraged all the countrie to Sens, and after tooke Queſnoie in Brie, Grand Puis, and Rampellon.

During this time, the Frenchmen on the otherſide tooke Louiers, and Villeneuf. Then alſo did the towne of Melun rebell, and had ſuch aid of other townes adioining, that the Engliſh ſoldiers were faine to leaue Melun, Morret, and Corbell. Thus did things wauer in doubtfull balance betwixt the two nations Engliſh and French. But bicauſe the Engliſh ſore miſtruſted further danger, it was concluded, that king Henrie in his roiall perſon with a new armie ſhould come into France, partlie to viſit and comfort his owne ſubiects there, and partlie either by feare or fauour (bicauſe a child of his age and beautie dooth commonlie procure them loue of elder perſons) to moue the Frenchmen to continue their due obeiſance towards him.

Wherefore after a great hoſt conuenient for that purpoſe aſſembled, and monie for maintenance of the warre readie gathered, and the realme ſet in an order vnder the gouernement of the duke of Glouceſter protector (which during the kings abſence appeaſed diuerſe riots, and puniſhed the offendors) the king with a great power tooke ſhipping at Douer on ſaint Georges euen within night, and landed at Calis on the morrow being ſaint Georges daie, and ſundaie, by ſeuen of the clocke in the morning. He remained in Calis a good ſpace, and from thence he remoued to Rone, being there receiued with all triumph. He taried in that citie a long time, his nobles dailie conſulting on their great buſineſſe & weightie affaires.

* O fowle ingratitude.

Neuertheleſſe, God (whoſe mercifull nature abhorreth the effuſion of mans bloud) prepared a puniſhment for the malefactor, who paſſing through the ſuburbs of London, without Algate (the place where he had committed the murther) the women of the ſame pariſh and ſtréet (as it were inraged) came out with ſtones, ſtaues, kenell doong, and other things, wherewith they ſo bethwackt him on all parts of his bodie, that they laid him a ſtretching, and rid him quite of life. were not able to reſcue him out of the womens hands; who had ſworne in their hearts (as it ſeemed by the maner of their reuenge which was void of all mercie) to ſee the end of ſuch a villaine as moſt vnnaturallie had ſlaine a woman, a neighbour, a widow, a pitifull woman, a good neighbour, an honeſt widow; the wretch himſelfe being a fugitiue, a ſtranger borne, a begger, and he to whome ſhe ſhewed hir ſelfe the ſtaffe of his ſupport. O ſingular ingratitude which nature abhorreth, law diſalloweth, heauen diſclaimeth, God deteſteth, humanitie condemneth, and euerie good bodie to the verie death defieth; as the old diſtichon excellentlie and with good ſenſe noteth;

Lex & natura, cœlum, Deus, omnia iura
Damnant ingratum, mærent illum quoq; natum.

But to returne to the affaires of king Henrie, who in the moneth of Nouember remooued from Rone to Pontoiſe, and ſo to ſaint Denis, to the intent to make his entrie into Paris, and there to be ſacred king of France. There were in his companie of his owne nation, his vncle the cardinall of Wincheſter, the cardinall and archbiſhop of Yorke, the dukes of Bedford, Yorke, and Norffolke, the earles of Warwike, Saliſburie, Oxenford, Huntington, Ormond, Mortaigne, and Suffolke. Of Gaſcoigns, there were the earles of Longuille and Marche, beſides manie other noble men of England, Guien, and Normandie. And the cheefe of the French nation were the dukes of Burgognie, and Lewes of Lutzenburgh, cardinall and chancellor of France for king Henrie: the biſhops of Beauuois and Noion, both peeres of France, beſide the biſhop of Paris, and diuerſe other biſhops; the earle of Vandemount, and other noble men, whoſe names were ſuperfluous to rehearſe. And he had in a gard about his perſon three thouſand price archers, ſome on horſſebacke, and part on foot.

To ſpeake with what honour he was receiued into the citie of Paris, what pageants were prepared, and how richlie the gates, ſtreets, and bridges on euerie ſide were hanged with coſtlie clothes of arras & tapeſtrie, it would be too long a proceſſe, and therefore I do heere paſſe it ouer with ſilence. On the ſeauenteenth daie of December, he was crowned king of France, in our ladie church of Paris, by the cardinall of Wincheſter, the biſhop of Paris not being contented that the cardinall ſhould do ſuch an high ceremonie in his church and iuriſdiction. After all the ceremonies were finiſhed, the king returned toward the palace, hauing one crowne on his head, and another borne before him; and one ſcepter in his hand, and the ſecond borne before him. As touching other the roiall ſeruices and princelie appointments, they are verie diligentlie & at large ſet out in the French chronicle of that time. This coronation of the king, Anglorum prælia as manie other good and memorable matters, ſo this alſo he hath noted, ſaieng thereof in comelie breuitie and truth, as after followeth:

King Henrie the ſixt crowned in Paris.

Le Roſier hiſtoriall.

Aeternæ famæ paulo poſt rege ſepulto,
Pariſijs, diadema vias & compita circum
Iunior Henricus portat lepidiſsimus infans.

This high and ioious feaſt paſſed not without ſome ſpot of diſpleaſure among the Engliſh nobilitie: for the cardinall of Wincheſter, which at this time would haue no man be equall with him, commanded the duke of Bedford to leaue off the name of regent, during the time that the king was in France, affirming the cheefe ruler being in preſence, the authoritie of the ſubſtitute to be cleerelie derogate, according to the common ſaieng; In the preſence of the higher power, the ſmaller giueth place. The duke of Bedford tooke ſuch a ſecret diſpleaſure with this dooing, that he neuer after fauoured the cardinall, but ſtood againſt him in all things that he would haue forward. This was the root (as ſome haue thought) of that diuiſion amongſt the Engliſh nobilitie, where through their glorie within the realme of France began firſt to decline.

The next daie after the ſolemne feaſt of the kings coronation, were kept triumphant iuſts and torneis, in the which the earle of Arundell, and the baſtard of S. Paule, by the iudgement of the ladies wonne the price. The king kept open hall the ſpace of fiue daies to all commers, and after (bicauſe the aire of Paris ſeemed contrarie to his pure complexion) by the aduiſe of his councell, he remooued to Rone, where he kept his Chriſtmaſſe. But before his departure from Paris, the noble men as well of France and Normandie did to him homage, and the common people ſware to him fealtie. In this meane time, ſir Francis called the Aragoignois, a noble capteine of the Engliſh part in Normandie, tooke by force and policie the towne of Montargis, with a great preie of treaſure and priſoners, and put therein a garriſon, leauing it well furniſhed with vittels and munition.

Montargis recouered by the Engliſh.

About the ſame time, the earle of Arundell, being truelie informed that the lord Bouſac marſhall of France was come to Beauuois, intending to doo ſome feat in Normandie, aſſembled the number of three and twentie hundred men, and comming neere to the ſaid towne of Beauuois, ſent a great number of light horſſemen to run before the towne, to traine out the Frenchmen within; the which iſſuing out and following the Engliſh horſſemen vnto their ſtale, were ſo incloſed and fought with, that in maner all the number of them, ſaue a few which fled backe into the towne with the marſhall, were ſlaine or taken. Amongſt other of the cheefeſt priſoners, that valiant capteine Pouton de Santrails was one, who without delaie was exchanged for the lord Talbot, before taken priſoner at the battell of Pataie. There was alſo taken one called the ſheepheard, a ſimple man, and a ſillie ſoule; but yet of ſuch reputation for his ſuppoſed holineſſe amongſt the Frenchmen, that if he touched the wall of any of their aduerſaries townes, they beleeued verelie it would incontinentlie fall downe.

The lord Talbot ranſomed by exchange.

The holie ſheepheard.

This chance ſucceeded not fortunatlie alone vnto the Engliſh nation, for Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike had a great ſkirmiſh before the towne of Gournie, where he diſcomfited and repelled his enimies: and beſide thoſe that were ſlaine, he tooke fortie horſſemen, all being gentlemen of name and armes. Like chance happened to the freends of king Charles, towards the marches of Lorraine, where Reigner duke of Bar beſieged the towne of Vandemont perteining to the earle thereof named Anthonie, couſine to the ſame duke Reigner. This earle, before the dukes approching, left a conuenient crue within the towne to defend it, and with all ſpeed rode to the dukes of Bedford and Burgognie, being then at the foreſaid great triumph at Paris, where he purchaſed ſuch fauour at their hands, bicauſe he had euer taken their parts, that not onelie ſir Iohn Faſtolfe was appointed to go with him, hauing in his companie ſix hundred archers, but alſo the duke of Burgognies marſhall named ſir Anthonie Toulongon, accompanied with fifteene hundred other men of warre.

Vandemont beſieged.

When the duke of Bar heard that his enimies were thus comming towards him, like a hardie capteine he raiſed his ſiege, and met face to face with the earle and his companie, betweene whome was a cruell and mortall battell. The horſſemen of the French ſide endured long, but in concluſion the Engliſh archers ſo galled their horſſes, and ſo wounded the men, that the Barrois, Almains, and other of duke Reigners ſide were compelled to flee. In the chaſe was taken ken the duke of Bar, the biſhop of Metz, the lord of Roquedemaque, ſir Euerard of Salſeburgh, the Vicont Darcie, and two hundred other, beſide thrée thouſand which were ſlaine.

* Or rather Goche.

Saint Seuerine beſieged.

In this luckie time alſo, no leſſe occaſion of victorie was offered to the Engliſhmen in an other part, if they could haue vſed it with ſuch circumſpect warineſſe as had béene expedient. For Robert lord Willoughbie, and Matthew * Gough, a valiant Welſhman, with fiftéene hundred Engliſhmen, laid ſiege to a towne in Aniou called ſaint Seuerine. Whereof Charles the French king being aduertiſed, ſent with all ſpéed the lord Ambroſe de Lore, with manie noble men to the ſuccours of them within the towne, whereof the ſame lord Ambroſe was capteine: and therefore made the more haſt to reléeue his deputie, and the other being ſtreictlie beſieged, but yet ſtaied at the towne of Beaumont, till his whole power might come to him.

The Engliſhmen aduertiſed of this intent of the capteine, came vpon him in the night, and found the Frenchmens watch ſo out of order, that a thouſand men were entered into the campe before they were eſpied; by reaſon whereof the Engliſhmen found ſmall reſiſtance. But when the daie began to appeare, and that the ſunne had ſet forth his bright beames abroad, that all things might be ſéene, the Engliſhmen giuen wholie to ſpoile, followed not their enimies in chaſe, but being contented with their preie and gaine, began to retreit toward the ſiege againe, which the lord Willoughbie ſtill mainteined with a part of the armie.

But ſée the chance. The Frenchmen which were cõming after, hearing by the noiſe of the people that ſome fraie was at hand, put ſpurres to their horſſes, and ſet on the Engliſhmen peſtered with bag and baggage of the ſpoile and preie which they had gotten in the French campe. The other of the Frenchmen which before had fled, returned againe, and aided their fellowes; ſo that the Engliſhmen being taken out of order, were compelled to flée, of whome Matthew * Gough and diuerſe other were taken priſoners. And yet of the other part manie were ſlaine, and a great number taken: amongſt whom was the lord de Lore, who (for all that the Frenchmen could do) was kept, and not deliuered. The lord Willoughbie hearing of this miſhap, raiſed his ſiege, and departed verie ſore diſpleaſed in his mind, but could not remedie it.

* Goche.

A legat from Rome ſent to treat a peace betwixt the Engliſh and French.

A truce for ſix yeares.

Chartres taken by treaſon notwithſtanding the truce.

About this ſeaſon, Nicholas the cardinall of the holie croſſe was ſent into France, as a legat from Eugenie the fourth as then biſhop of Rome, to treat a peace betwéene the Engliſhmen and Frenchmen. But when after great inſtance and labour made betwéene the parties, he ſaw their obſtinate and froward minds, nothing inclined to anie agréement, he wan ſo much at their hands by earneſt ſute, that a truce was granted to indure for ſix yeares to come: but as the ſame was hardlie granted, ſo was it of the Frenchmen ſoone and lightlie broken. For the baſtard of Orleance newlie made earle of Dunois, tooke by treſon the towne of Chartres from the Engliſhmen, affirming by the law of armes, that ſtealing or buieng a towne, without inuaſion or aſſault, was no breach of league, amitie, or truce. In which towne he ſlue the biſhop, bicauſe he was a Burgognian. Hereby did new malice increaſe, and mortall warre began eftſoones to be put in vre.

The two errours.

Whileſt theſe things were dooing in France, the cardinall of Wincheſter was come backe againe into England, to appeaſe certeine commotions and ſturres attempted by ſundrie perſons vnder colour of religion: but after that William Mandeuile, and Iohn Sharpe the chéefe authors thereof were apprehended and executed by the gouernour and the kings iuſtices, the reſidue yéelded and confeſſed their offenſes, whereof two articles were theſe (as ſome write) that prieſts ſhould haue no poſſeſſions, and that all things by the order of charitie among chriſtian people ſhould be in common. Other thought their opinions were not ſuch errours, but that their enimies ſpread abroad ſuch rumors of them, to make them more odious to the people.

A parlement called by the duke of Gloceſter the king being in France.

A peace concluded with the Scots.

After that, a parlement was called by the duke of Gloceſter, in the which monie was aſſigned to be leuied, and men appointed, which ſhould paſſe ouer into France to the aid of the duke of Bedford, for the maintenance of the warres: bicauſe it was ſuſpected the truce would not long continue. During this parlement, Iames the king of Scots ſent ambaſſadors to conclude a peace with the duke of Gloceſter, who (bicauſe the king was abſent) referred the matter to the thrée eſtates. After long conſultation, not without great arguments, a peace was concluded. When the parlement was ended, the cardinall well furniſhed with men & monie, departed out of England, and came to Rone to the king, to whome alſo reſorted the duke of Bedford from Paris, to conſult of things not vnlikelie to follow.

Herevpon a great councell was kept in the caſtell of Rone, and manie doubts mooued, and few weightie things out of hand concluded. At length, after great diſputation, with manie arguments ended, the dukes of Bedford and Yorke, and Edmund late earle of Mortaigne, and now (by the death of Iohn duke of Summerſet, leauing behind him a ſole daughter and heire, maried to the earle, and called Margaret after the counteſſe of Richmond) atteined to the name and title of duke of Summerſet, approued the reaſon of thoſe, that held it expedient to haue an armie in a redineſſe for defenſe, leaſt the Frenchmen ſuddenlie ſhould attempt anie enterpriſe to the danger of the Engliſhmen, and loſſe of thoſe townes and countries that were vnder them.

King Henrie returneth out of France into England.

When all things were agréed, king Henrie came to Calis, from thence to Douer; and ſo by eaſie iournies the one and twentith daie of Februarie to London, where he was triumphantlie receiued, and richlie preſented, as in the chronicles of Robert Fabian it maie at large appeare. After that the king was departed into England, the duke of Bedford regent of France, and capteine of Calis, taried behind in the marches of Picardie, where he was informed certeine ſouldiers of Calis grudging at the reſtraint of woolles, began to murmur againſt the king and his councell, to ſome danger of the towne. The duke vpon due examination had, cauſed diuerſe to be put to death, and manie baniſhed that towne and marches for euer.

The ducheſſe of Bedford ſiſter to the duke of Burgognie deceaſed.

The duke of Bedford marieth with the earle of ſaint Paules daughter.

In the meane time, the ladie Anne ducheſſe of Bedford departed this life at Paris, by whoſe death the faſt knot of faithfull fréendſhip betwixt the duke of Bedford and his brother in law the duke of Burgognie began ſomewhat to ſlacken. Shortlie after, to wit, about the beginning of the next yeare 1433, the ſaid duke of Bedford being thus a widower, through the perſuaſion of the lord Lewes of Lutzenburgh biſhop of Terwine and Elie, and chancellor of France for king Henrie, agréed to marrie the ladie Iaquet, daughter to Peter earle of ſaint Paule, and néece to the ſaid biſhop, and to the lord Iohn of Lutzenburgh.

The mariage was ſolemnized at Terwine with great triumph. Which ended, the duke with his new ſpouſe (being about the age of ſeauentéene yeares) came vnto Calis, and ſo into England, from whence in the moneth of Auguſt next he returned to Paris. The duke of Burgognie, though nothing pleaſed with this new aliance contracted by the duke of Bedford, with the houſe of Lutzenburgh, but yet not able to doo anie thing to let it; bicauſe of the mariage conſummate yer he could find any power or knowledge to hinder it. Whileſt theſe things were a dooing, in ſome places the French ſouldiers of the Dolphins, lacking wages (as the time ſerued) tooke both Engliſhmen and Burgognians, ranſoming and ſpoiling them at their pleaſure. Herewith the regent much mooued, prepared for warre after ſix moneths the truce had béene taken: and ſo the warre againe was renewed.

The Frenchmen breake the peace and take the town of Saint Valerie.

The Frenchmen anon as open truce-breakers, raiſed a crue, and ſuddenlie tooke the towne of ſaint Valerie in Normandie, néere to the mouth of the riuer of Some. An other armie, vnder the leading of ſir Ambroſe de Lore, waſted and deſtroied all the countrie about Caen. The duke of Bedford on his part ſent the earle of Arundell, the earle of Warwikes ſonne, the lord Liſle Adam marſhall of France for king Henrie, and twelue hundred men of warre with ordinance and munition to beſiege the towne of Laignie vpon the riuer of Marne. The earle with ſhot of canon brake the arch of the bridge, and got from the Frenchmen their bulworke, and ſet it on fire. Diuerſe aſſaults were attempted, but the towne was well defended: for there were within it an eight hundred men of armes, beſides other meane ſouldiers.

Laignie beſieged.

The duke of Bedford herewith gathered an armie of ſix thouſand men, whereof were capteins; Robert lord Willoughbie, ſir Andrew Ogard chamberlaine to the duke, ſir John Saluaine bailiffe of Rone, ſir John Montgomerie bailiffe of Caux, ſir Philip Hall bailiffe of Vernoill, ſir Richard Ratcliffe deputie of Calis, ſir Rafe Neuill, ſir Rafe Standiſh, ſir John Hanford, ſir Richard Guthin, ſir Richard Harington bailiffe of Eureux, ſir William Fulthorpe, ſir Thomas Griffin of Ireland, Dauid Hall, Thomas Stranguiſh, Leonard Ormſtone eſquiers, and Thomas Gerard. All gentlemen of courage, and as forward to giue the French the foile, as the French for their liues to giue them the diſcomfiture. But vnto which ſide the victorie ſhould befall, vncerteine it was before the triall of both their chances had determined the doubt by the euent of the conflict.

The duke of Bedford furniſhed with this armie and companie of worthie capteins came to the ſiege before Laignie, where he made a bridge of boats, and brought his ordinance ſo néere the towne, that to all people it ſéemed not long able to reſiſt. But the earle of Dunois, otherwiſe called the baſtard of Orleance, with diuerſe hardie capteins, as valiantlie defended as the Engliſhmen aſſaulted. At length the French king, perceiuing this towne to be the thrée cornerd keie betwéene the territories Burgognion, Engliſh, and French, and the loſſe thereof ſhould turne him to irreuocable damage, ſent the lord of Rieux, Poiton, the Hire, the lord Gawcourt, and ſix thouſand men, with great plentie of vittels, to the intent either to raiſe the ſiege, or elſe to vittell the towne.

The Frenchmen made a brag, as though they would haue aſſailed the Engliſhmen in their campe, but when they perceiued the courage of the lord regent, and the deſire he had to fight, they framed themſelues ſo in order of battell, as though they could doo all things, and yet in effect did nothing: but that whileſt part of them mainteined a ſkirmiſh, a ſort of rude & ruſticall perſons were appointed to conueie into the towne thirtie oxen, and other ſmall vittels. But this ſwéet gaine was déerelie paied for, if the loſſe with the game be pondered in equall balance: for hauing regard to their 30 leane oxen, in the ſkirmiſh were ſlaine the lord Saintreiles brother to that valiant capteine Poiton de Saintreiles, alſo capteine John brother to the lord Gawcourt, and fiftie other noble and valiant perſonages.

The Frenchmen thus politiklie hauing doone their feat, in the beginning of Auguſt, remooued their armie vnto Fort vnder Yer, where, by a bridge of tuns they paſſed into the Ile of France. The duke of Bedford (like a wiſe prince) not minding to leaue the more in ieopardie for hope of the leſſe, nor the accident for the ſubſtance, raiſed his ſiege, and returned to Paris, nothing more minding than to trie his quarrell with dint of ſword againſt the enimies, if they would thereto agrée: And herevpon ſent Bedford his herald to the lord Gawcourt and other capteins of the French armie, offering them battell and a pitched field within a conuenient time, and where they would appoint. The French capteins anſwered the Engliſh herald, that there was time to gaine, and time to loſe: and for choiſe of times they would vſe their owne diſcretions.

The caſtell of Rone like to be taken by treaſon of the capteine.

Shortlie after, Piers Audebeuſe conſtable of the caſtell of Rone, corrupted with monie, ſuffered the marſhall of France, with two hundred other, as perſons diſguiſed to enter the place by ſtealth: but they were ſoone eſpied, and driuen to the dungeon, where they were conſtrained to yéeld themſelues priſoners: of the which ſome were hanged, ſome headed, and ſome ranſomed, at the pleaſure of the regent. This pageant thus plaied, the lord regent ſent the earle of ſaint Paule, and Robert lord Willoughbie, with a competent number of men to beſiege the towne of S. Valerie, which the Frenchmen a little before had taken. This ſiege continued the ſpace of thrée wéeks; at the end whereof the Frenchmen within yéelded the towne, and departed with their horſſe and harneſſe onelie to them ſaued.

The earle put there in garriſon freſh and valiant ſouldiers, and appointed capteine there, ſir John Aubemond. ¶ In the ſame towne (whether by infection of aire, or by corrupt vittels, which the townesmen did eat) a great peſtilence ſhortlie after happened, which conſumed within a ſmall time two parts of the people. The earle of ſaint Paule, and the lord Willoughbie returning backe to the regent, were ioifullie receiued, and within a while after, the earle departed from Paris to laie ſiege to the caſtell of Mouchas. But being incamped néere the towne of Blangie, he by a ſudden maladie departed this life, the laſt of Auguſt, leauing his ſeigniories to Lewes de Lutzenburgh his ſonne and heire. Bicauſe this dead earle was father in law to the regent, ſolemne obſequies were kept for him both in Paris and in London.

The lord of ſaint Paule deceaſſed.

Anno Reg. 12.

In the meane ſeaſon, the Frenchmen entering into high Burgognie, burnt, tooke, and deſtroied diuerſe townes; wherevpon the Burgognians aſſembled a great armie, both to reuenge their quarrels, and to recouer their townes taken from them. To whome as to his fréends the duke of Bedford ſent the lord Willoughbie, and ſir Thomas Kiriell, with a conuenient number of ſouldiers, which entering into the lands of Laonnois, were incountered with a great power of their enimies. But after long fight, the Frenchmen were ouerthrowne, and of them left dead in the field an hundred and ſixtie horſſemen, beſide priſoners, which after vpon vrgent cauſe were all killed.

The lord Talbot ſaileth into France.

Whileſt theſe things happened thus in France, John lord Talbot gathered togither a crue of choſen men of warre in England, to the number of eight hundred, and ſailed into Normandie, and paſſed by Rone to Paris. In his waie he tooke the ſtrong caſtell of Joing betwéene Beauuois and Giſours, and cauſed all the Frenchmen within to be taken and hanged, and after raced and defaced the caſtell. After he had reſted himſelfe a while at Paris, and taken aduiſe with the councell there, what waie it ſhould be beſt for him to take, without prolonging time; he with the lord de Liſle Adam and others, departed from thence, hauing in their retinues ſixtéene hundred men of warre. And comming to the caſtell of Beaumont vpon Oiſe, whereof was capteine ſir Amadour de Vignoils brother to the Hire, they found it abandoned by them that had it in kéeping, who were withdrawne to the towne of Creill.

The lord Talbot.

Thither therefore the lord Talbot followed, who ſlaieng in a ſkirmiſh the ſaid Amadour, he wan at length the ſaid towne of Creill, and after the townes of Pont S. Maxence, Neufuile in Eſmoie, la Rouge maiſon, Creſpie in Valois, & Clermont in Beauuois, and after with great riches and good priſoners returned to Paris. Neither had the lord Talbot ſuch good and proſperous ſucceſſe alone, but the earle of Arundell alſo at the verie ſame ſeaſon tooke the caſtell of Bomeline, & raced it to the ground, after he got by force the caſtell of Dorle, & from thence came to S. Selerine, where the lord Ambroſe de Lore, being capteine, iſſued out and fought with the Engliſhmen ſo egerlie, that he droue them backe an arrow ſhot by fine force: but the earle ſo incouraged his men, that they gaue a freſh onſet vpon the Frenchmen, and followed it ſo fiercelie, that they ſlue a great number of them, and droue the reſidue into the towne.

Earle of Arundell.

Louiers beſieged.

After this victorie, he beſieged Louiers, whereof was capteine the Hire, and his brother, who rendered the towne without aſſault. Then the earle aſſembling togither a great armie, returned againe to S. Selerine, & inuironed the towne with a ſtrong ſiege. When he had lien there almoſt thrée moneths, euerie daie attempting or dooing ſomewhat, he finallie gaue ſo fierce an aſſault, that by force he entered the towne, and ſlue John Almaigne, and Guilliam ſaint Albine, the chéefe capteins, and eight hundred other men of warre. The children of le ſeigneur de Lore were taken priſoners. The earle put new men of warre into the towne, and made capteine there ſir John Cornewall. After this, he before the ſtrong towne of Sillie pitched his campe. The inhabitants terrified at the loſſe of ſaint Selerine, deliuered him pledges, vpon condition; that if they were not reſcued within thirtie daies next, then they (their liues ſaued) ſhould render the towne into his poſſeſſion: which offer was receiued.

Saint Selerine won by aſſault.

The French king, being aduertiſed hereof by a poſt, appointed (as ſome ſaie) Arthur earle of Richmont (or as other write, John duke of Alanſon) with a great companie of men of warre to go to the reſcue of this towne. But whether it was the earle or duke, certeine it is at his approching to the ſiege, he incamped himſelfe by a brooke ſide, ouer the which a man might haue ſtriden, & perceiuing how ſtronglie the Engliſh were incamped againſt him, he thought it not for his profit to giue battell; & ſo in the night ſeaſon raiſed & went his waie without further attempt. When they within the towne knew that their ſuccours failed, they rendered themſelues to the mercie of the earle of Arundell, who gentlie receiued them, and leauing a garriſon in the towne, departed to Mans, and in his waie tooke the caſtels of Mellaie and ſaint Laurence. About this time the lord Willoughbie & ſir Thomas Kiriell, returning with great victorie out of Burgognie, paſſing by the towne of Louiers, latelie reduced to the Engliſh obeiſance, furniſhed it both with men and munition.

An inſurrection in Normandie.

Among ſo manie good chances, ſome euill are accuſtomed to happen, or elſe the gainers would not know themſelues. And ſo at this time it happened, that a great number of the common and ruſticall people in Normandie dwelling by the ſea coaſt, either prouoked by the French king, or deſirous of alteration and change (which thing the commons much couet and deſire) made an inſurrection, put on harneſſe, and by force expelled certeine Engliſh garriſons out of their holds, publiſhing and proclaming openlie, that their onelie purpoſe and intent was to expell and baniſh the whole Engliſh nation out of their countries and coaſts. Wherefore it maie be likelie, that the blacke Morian will ſooner become white, than the people bred in France will heartilie loue an Engliſh borne. For it ſtandeth not with their enuious nature to alter their malicious maners; as the old prouerbe ſaith truelie of them:

Celtica natura ſemper ſequitur ſua iura.

Theſe rebels thus frantikelie aſſembled, with all ſpéed marched toward Caen, to the intent there both to increaſe their number, and alſo to conſult what waie they ſhould follow in their new begun enterpriſe. But the dukes of Yorke and Summerſet, then lieng in Normandie, hauing perfect knowledge hereof, immediatlie ſent foorth the earle of Arundell, and the lord Willoughbie with ſix thouſand archers, and thirtéene hundred light horſſemen, to ſtaie and kéepe them from making anie further progreſſe. The earle of Arundell appointed the lord Willoughbie, with two thouſand archers, and certeine horſſemen to go afore him, and lie in a ſtale within ſome couert place. Which doone, the earle followed; & ſo kéeping in the multitude at the backe, droue them before him as deare into a buckeſtale: and when the miſerable wretches came néere to the ſtale, the earle made a token, whereat a gun ſhot off for a ſigne. Therewith the lord Willoughbie ſet on them before, and the earle behind, ſhooting ſo fiercelie, that the poore caitiues, wounded and galled with the ſhot of arrowes, threw awaie their harneſſe, and cried out inſtantlie for mercie.

The earle of Arundell mooued with compaſſion, cauſed his ſouldiers to ſtaie from further ſlaughter, and apprehending thoſe that were knowen to be ſtirrers and leaders of the reſt, let the other returne home without further damage: but yet, yer the ſouldiers could be brought backe vnder their ſtandards, there were aboue a thouſand of the rebels ſlaine. And this commotion thus appeaſed, vpon inquirie of the principall offendors, ſuch as were found guiltie were put to terrible executions; as they had well deſerued. During which rebellion, Peter Rokeford and his companie gat by treaſon the towne of Diepe, and diuerſe other holds thereto adioining. After the earle of Arundell had obteined ſo good ſucceſſe in his enterpriſes (as partlie ye haue heard) he attempted another, which was the laſt worke and finall labour of his liuing daies. For the duke of Bedford, being informed that his aduerſaries had gotten the towne of Rue, and therein put a garriſon, which ſore vexed the countries of Ponthieu, Arthois, and Bolennois, ſent word to the earle that he without delaie ſhould beſiege the ſaid towne.

The earle obeieng his commandement aſſembled his people, and came to Gourneie, where he heard tell how there was a caſtell néere to Beauuois called Gerberoie, the which being fallen in decaie, Charles the French king had appointed ſir Stephan de Vignoils, commonlie called the Hire, to repare and newlie to fortifie; bicauſe it ſtood commodiouſlie to ſerue as a countergarriſon againſt the Engliſh townes and fortreſſes on thoſe frontiers. The earle aduertiſed hereof, and perceiuing that this new building would be greatlie preiudiciall to the Engliſhmen, determined firſt to diſpoſſeſſe his enimies of that place, ſuppoſing to find ſmall reſiſtance; but he was deceiued. For there was the ſaid Hire, and thrée thouſand men of warre with him. The erle comming thither, incamped himſelfe with fiue hundred horſſemen in a little cloſe not farre from the caſtell.

The Frenchmen, perceiuing that the earle and his horſſes were wearie, and that his archers were not yet come, determined to ſet vpon him before the comming of his footmen, the which they knew to be little more than a mile behind. Wherfore for a policie, they ſet foorth fiftie horſſemen, as though there had béene no mo within the caſtell. The earle perceiuing this, ſent foorth ſir Randolfe Standiſh to incounter them, hauing with him an hundred horſſes. The Frenchmen fought couragiouſlie awhile, and ſuddenlie came out all the remnant, and ſlue ſir Randolfe Standiſh and all his companie, and boldlie ſet on the earle and his band, which manfullie reſiſted the Frenchmen, till at length the Hire cauſed thrée culuerings to be ſhot off amongſt the Engliſhmen, wherof one ſtrake the earle on the ancle, and ſo brake his leg, that for paine he fell from his horſſe.

The earle of Arundell deceaſſed.

Then the Frenchmen entered amongſt the Engliſhmen, tooke the earle lieng on the ground, with ſir Richard Wooduile, and ſix ſcore more, and there were ſlaine almoſt two hundred. The reſidue ſaued themſelues as well as they might. The earle was caried to Beauuois, where of his hurt he ſhortlie died, ⁊ was buried in the frier Minors. He was a man of ſingular vertue, conſtancie, and grauitie, whoſe death in ſo troublous a ſeaſon did ſore appall the harts of the Engliſh people. Thus oftentimes varied the chance of doubtfull warre, ſo that one time the Engliſhmen got by aſſault, and yéelded diuerſe ſtrong townes, caſtels, and piles: and at another ſeaſon the French people, ſometime by bargaine, ſometime by aſſault obteined the ſame againe, or other in their ſtéed.

The duke of Bourbon dieth at London.

W. P.

About the moneth of Iune in this twelfth yeare, Iohn duke of Bourbon and Auuergne, taken priſoner at the battell of Agincourt eightéene yéeres paſt (as before ye haue heard) now paieng his ranſome, which was eightéene thouſand pounds ſterling, was taken with a moſt ſore and grieuous feuer, the which made an end of his life in the citie of London, on the ſame daie that was appointed for his departure towards France, whoſe corpſe was interred in the graie friers of the ſame citie. ¶ This yeare alſo about the latter end of Maie, was a méeting appointed to be had at ſaint Omers betwixt the dukes of Bedford and Burgognie, for the qualifieng of certeine diſpleaſures and grudges betwixt them kindled and mainteined by ſome flattering taletellers, who raiſing matters of reproch touching their honors, bred ſuch grudges, that all loue betwixt them ceaſſed, all affinitie reiected, and all old fréendſhip forgotten; ſuch enuie inſueth where enimitie once hath princes harts poſſeſſed.

Theſe two dukes come into the towne of ſaint Omers, the duke of Bedford being then regent of France, ſonne, brother, and vncle to kings, thought that the duke of Burgognie ſhould haue come and viſited him in his lodging. The duke of Burgognie on the other part, being lord and ſoueraigne of the towne, iudged it as much vnméet for him to go to the regent where he was lodged. Howbeit by intreatie of fréends, to méet in a place indifferent betwéene both their lodgings was appointed; which offer not accepted, both parties departed diſcontent, and neuer after ſaw nor communed togither. Thus by the proud diſdaine ⁊ enuious diſcord of theſe two high ſtomached princes, Bedford not minding to haue anie péere, and Burgognie not willing to abide anie ſuperior, ſhortlie after England much loſt, and Burgognie greatlie gained not, as by the ſequeale may appeare.

Anno Reg. 13.

The baſtard of Orleance called, the earle of Dunois, the lord Rochford marſhall of France, with other, in the beginning of this thirtéenth yeare, tooke the towne of S. Denis by treaſon, ſkirmiſhed with them of Paris, and leauing behind them a great garriſon, tooke the towne of Howdone, and Pont ſaint Marence by compoſition. And at the ſame time was the towne of Pont Meulan taken by the ſudden ſcaling of two fiſhermen, who entered vp at a common priuie ſtanding in the wall. Thus warre continuallie laſted betwixt theſe two mightie nations, Engliſh and French, within the realme of France (than which therefore no countrie thought more miſerable.) And though the poore people and inhabitants of the good townes and villages, ſuſteined moſt loſſe in their ſubſtance, yet the men of warre oftentimes paied déereſt for the bargaine, being daily ſlaine, wounded, and taken priſoners: for warre ſeldome beareth anie other fruit.

Onuphrius Panuinius.

[It may ſerue verie well here to recount, how ſomewhat before theſe daies, Martin the fift, in the fiftéenth yeare of his popedome, An. 1431, agréeing vpon a generall councell to be holden at Baſill the ſame yeare, did anon after deceaſſe: whom Eugenie the fourth ſuccéeding, and liking right well of the time and place, by his authoritie ſignified and ſent with Iulian Ceſarine his legat, did confirme the choiſe. Wherevpon as the councell the ninetéenth of Iulie the ſame 1431 was there begun, and his holineſſe ſoone after aduertiſed how malapertlie his ghoſtlie children had imbuſied themſelues in checking at their holie fathers faults, and about reformation of his church at Rome; his ſublimitie therat highlie offended (for great cauſe it had) commanded his legat by and by to diſſolue that ſynod, and in his name to appoint a new at Ferrar, and ſo come his waie: vnder colour forſooth how that place was méeteſt for the prelats of the Gréeke church, who had to confer with the Latine councell abont points of religion, wherein they long had remained at ſquare.

But theſe Baſilien clerks, there ſtill faſtlie conteining themſelues, ſo ſmallie regarded this ſummons of Eugenie (who then with his prelats, as the time was run on, vpon prorogation from Ferrar kept an other councell at Florence 1439) as by a confident countermand cited Eugenie ⁊ all his cardinals to come to them at their ſolemne ſet councell at Baſill. Which his ſupremaſie (for ſo beſt became it, notwithſtanding ſundrie citations) vtterlie contemning to doo, they ſoone after like verie impious imps, firſt for contumacie accurſſed his holie fatherhood, then depriued him of his papaſie, and out of hand choſe another in his office, one Amedeus late duke of Sauoie, who afore that time hauing giuen vp his poſſeſſions ⁊ dignitie vnto his children, became an heremite in a monaſterie of his own building by mount Geuenna in Sauoie nigh the lake Leman, where he by title of Decanus militum Ieſu Chriſti, and ten more of nobilitie with him, had ſetled themſelues to liue.

The vertuous minded man thus choſen pope by ſpirituall counſell inueigled, left the holie life (ſuch as it was) that he had profeſt, tooke the papaſie vpon him the ſame 1439, and called Felix the fift, which promotion yet he not long inioied. For after, by his ſucceſſour Nicholas the fifts ambition, that had ſuborned emperour Frederike to be a worker in the matter, this ſillie Amedeus was cooſined of his popes golden crowne for a cardinals felt hat. Then (good man) at laſt could he find, whether were néerer to chriſten profeſſion, the life of a vertuous prince ruling in iuſtice, of a ſolitarie heremite vertuouſlie occupied, of an imperious pope that may know no péere, or of a licentious cardinall to liue as he liſt. This poore prince had experience of all, ⁊ then knew the the beſt: when well might he lament him, but too late repent him.

And in the fift yeare of this Baſilien councell that had a continuance of eleuen yeare (whereof an eight were run yer Felix was choſen, in which Eugenie remaining pope ſtill, though of curſt hart he neuer came at them) motion was made among Sigiſmund the emperour and other chriſten kings (who for appeaſing this ſchiſme betweene the pope and his prelats, were all preſent by perſon or proxie) that ſith ſuch horror of bloudſhed betweene the two nations continuallie ſo lamentablie raged in France, ſome mediation might be made for accord: whereof one thing ſeemed to miniſter occaſion of the more hope, bicauſe the duke of Burgognie was willing (ſo that it were not of his owne ſute) to returne and reconcile himſelfe with the French king his mortall enimie and ancient aduerſarie.]

A ſolemne tretie of peace at Arras.

Heerevpon by authoritie of this generall councell, two graue prelats, the one Nicholas Albergat a Carthuſian frier, intituled a preeſt cardinall of the holie croſſe; the other Hugh Luſignan a Cyprian, Greeke, biſhop cardinall of Preneſt in Italie, came to the towne of Arras in Arthois, whither were ſent from the king of England, Henrie Beauford cardinall of Wincheſter, Henrie archbiſhop of Yorke, William de la Poole earle of Suffolke, and Iohn Holland earle of Huntington, with diuerſe other knights and eſquiers. And for the French king were there preſent Charles duke of Bourbon, Lewes erle of Vandoſme, Arthur of Britaine conſtable of France, the archbiſhop of Reimes, and ſir Philip Harecourt. The duke of Burgognie was there in proper perſon, accompanied with the duke of Guelders, and the earles of Eſtampes, Lignie, S. Paule, Vaudemont, Neures, and Daniell ſonne to the prince of Orange, with a great gard and a gallant companie.

Vpon the daie of the firſt ſeſſion, the cardinall of S. Croſſe declared to the three parties the innumerable miſcheefes, that had followed to the whole ſtate of the chriſtian common-wealth by their continuall diſſention and dailie diſcord, exhorting them for the honour of God, & for the loue which they ought to beare towards the aduancement of his faith and true religion, to conforme themſelues to reaſon, and to laie aſide all rancor, malice and diſpleaſure; ſo that in concluding a godlie peace, they might receiue profit and quietneſſe heere in this world, and of God an euerlaſting reward in heauen. After this admonition, and diuerſe daies of communication, euerie partie brought in their demands, which were moſt contrarie, and farre from anie likelihood of comming to a good concluſion.

The Engliſhmen would that king Charles ſhould haue nothing but what it pleaſed the king of England, and that not as dutie, but as a benefit by him of his meere liberalitie giuen and diſtributed. The Frenchmen on the other part would that K. Charles ſhould haue the kingdome franklie and freelie, and that the king of England ſhould leaue the name, armes, and title of the king of France, and to be content with the dukedomes of Aquitaine and Normandie, and to forſake Paris, and all the townes which they poſſeſſed in France, betweene the riuers of Some and Loire, being no parcell of the duchie of Normandie. To be breefe, the demands of all parts were betweene them ſo farre out of ſquare, as hope of concord there was none at all.

The cardinals ſeeing them ſo farre in ſunder, minded not to diſpute their titles, but offered them reaſonable conditions of truce and peace for a ſeaſon, which notwithſtanding, either of frowardneſſe, or of diſdaine on both parts, were openlie refuſed. Inſomuch that the Engliſhmen in great diſpleaſure, departed to Calis, and ſo into England. ¶ One writer affirmeth, that they being warned of a ſecret conſpiracie mooued againſt them, ſuddenlie departed from Arras, and ſo returned into their countrie. But what cauſe ſo euer hindered their accord and vnitie (ſith this and that may be ſurmized) certeine it is, that the onelie and principall cauſe was, for that the God of peace and loue was not among them, without whom no diſcord is quenched, no knot of concord faſtened, no bond of peace confirmed, no diſtracted minds reconciled, no true freendſhip mainteined: for had he beene among them, their diſſenting and waiward willes had ſounded the ſweet harmonie of amiable peace, which of all things that God hath beſtowed vpon man is the verie beſt, and more to be ſet by than manie triumphs, as the poet excellentlie well ſaith:

Abr. Fl.

———pax optima rerum
Quas homini nouiſſe datum: pax vna triumphis
Innumeris potior, pax cuſtodire ſalutem
Et ciues æquare potens.

Sil.Ital.lib.11.

Now whiles this treatie of peace was in hand, the lord Talbot, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Scales, with the lord Liſle Adam, and fiue thouſand men of warre, beſieged the towne of ſaint Denis with a ſtrong band. The earle of Dunois hearing hereof, accompanied with the lord Lohac, and the lord Bucill, with a great companie of horſſemen haſted thitherwards to raiſe the ſiege, and by the waie incountred with ſir Thomas Kiriell, and Matthew * Gough, riding alſo toward ſaint Denis, betweene whom was a great conflict. But ſuddenlie came to the aid of the Frenchmen the garriſon of Pont Meulan, which cauſed the Engliſhmen to returne without anie great harme or damage: ſauing that Matthew *Gough by foundering of his horſſe was taken, and carried to Pont Meulan.

* Or rather Goche.

* Or Goche.

S. Denis taken by the Engliſhmen.

In the meane time was the towne of ſaint Denis rendered to the Engliſhmen, the which raced the walles and fortifications, ſauing the walles of the abbeie, and of the tower called Venin. Shortlie after the towne of Pontois, where ſir Iohn Ruppelleie was capteine, rebelled; and by force the Engliſhmen were expelled, the inhabitants yeelding themſelues to the French king. This towne was ſmall, but the loſſe was great, bicauſe it was the keie that opened the paſſage betwixt the cities of Paris and Rone. But now to returne to the communication at Arras, which after the departure of the Engliſh commiſſioners held betwixt the Frenchmen & Burgognians, till at length a peace was concluded, accorded, and ſworne betwixt king Charles and duke Philip of Burgognie, vpon certeine conditions, as in the French hiſtories more plainlie appeareth.

A peace betweene Charls of France and the duke of Burgognie.

And after, the duke of Burgognie, to ſet a vaile before the king of Englands eies, ſent Thoiſon Dore his cheefe herald to king Henrie with letters, excuſing the matter by way of information, that he was conſtreined to enter in this league with K. Charles, by the dailie outcries, complaints, and lamentations of his people; alledging againſt him, that he was the onlie cauſe of the long continuance of the wars, to the vtter impoueriſhing of his owne people, and the whole nation of France. Therefore ſith he could not otherwiſe doo, but partlie to content his owne people, and cheefelie to ſatiſfie the requeſt of the whole generall councell, was in manner compelled for his part to growe vnto a peace and amitie with king Charles.

He likewiſe wiſhed that king Henrie, vpon reaſonable and honorable conditions of agreement offered, ſhould in no wiſe refuſe the ſame: whereby the long continued warre at length might ceaſſe and take end, to the pleaſure of almightie God, which is the author of peace and vnitie: & hereto he promiſed him his aid and furtherance, with manie gaie words, which I paſſe ouer. The ſuperſcription of this letter was thus. [To the high and mightie prince, Henrie by the grace of God king of England, his welbeloued couſine.] Neither naming him king of France, nor his ſoueraigne lord, according as (euer before that time) he was accuſtomed to doo. This letter was much maruelled at of the councell, after they had thoroughlie conſidered all the contents thereof, & they could not but be much diſquieted, ſo far foorth that diuerſe of them offended ſo much with the vntruth of the duke, that they could not temper their paſſions, but openlie called him traitor.

Spoile vpon the Burgognian people in London.

But when the rumor of the dukes reuolting was publiſhed amongſt the people, they left words, and fell to beſtowing of ſtripes: for being pricked with theſe euill tidings, they ran in great outrage vpon all the Flemings, Hollanders, and Burgognions, which then inhabited within the citie of London, and the ſuburbes of the ſame, and ſlue and hurt a great number of them before they, by the kings proclamation, could be ſtaied from ſuch iniurious doing: for the king nothing more minded than to ſaue innocent bloud, and to defend them that had not offended. The officer at armes was willed to tell his maiſter, that it ſtood not with his honor to be enimie to the Engliſh nation; and that his dutie had béene to kéepe his ancient truth and allegiance, rather than to be occaſion of new warre. And what a new reconciled enimie was in reſpect of an old tried fréend, he might ſhortlie find. [When the meſſenger with this anſwer was diſpatched, and vpon conſultation found, a matter ſtanding both with good policie in forcing the proud ſubiect to know his obedience, and alſo with great equitie to twitch a quareller with ſuch pinſars as wherewith afore he had nipt an other, ſo was it anon brought about, that ſundrie of his good townes and cities rebelled againſt him, whereby (leſſe to his liking than to his deſeruing) he was verie well made to bite of a chokepeare of his owne grafting.]

Anno Reg. 14. The death of the duke of Bedford regent of Fráce

This yeare the fourtéenth daie of September died Iohn duke of Bedford, regent of France, a man both politike in peace, and hardie in warre, and yet no more hardie than mercifull when he had the victorie, whoſe bodie was with all funerall ſolemnitie buried in the cathedrall church of our ladie in Rone, on the north ſide of the high altar, vnder a ſumptuous and coſtlie monument. Which tombe when king Lewes the eleuenth, by certeine vndiſcreet perſons was counſelled to deface, affirming that it was a great diſhonour both to the king and to the realme, to ſée the enimie of his father and theirs to haue ſo ſolemne and rich a memoriall: he anſwered ſaieng, What honour ſhall it be to vs, or to you, to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground the dead bones of him, whome in his life neither my father nor your progenitours, with all their power, puiſſance, and fréends were once able to make flée one foot backward; but by his ſtrength, wit, and policie, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the realme of France, and out of this noble and famous duchie of Normandie? Wherefore I ſaie, firſt, God haue his ſoule, and let his bodie now lie in reſt, which when he was aliue, would haue diſquieted the proudeſt of vs all. And as for the tombe, I aſſure you, it is not ſo decent nor conuenient, as his honour and acts deſerued, although it were much richer, and more beautifull.

A worthy ſaieng of a wiſe prince.

Great froſt.

The froſt was ſo extreame this yeare, beginning about the fiue and twentith daie of Nouember, and continuing till the tenth of Februarie, that the ſhips with merchandize arriuing at the Thames mouth, could not come vp the riuer: ſo their lading there faine to be diſcharged, was brought to the citie by land. After the death of that noble prince the duke of Bedford, the bright ſunne in France toward Engliſhmen, began to be cloudie, and dailie to darken, the Frenchmen began not onelie to withdrawe their obedience by oth to the king of England, but alſo tooke ſword in hand & openlie rebelled. Howbeit all theſe miſhaps could not anie thing abaſh the valiant courages of the Engliſh people: for they hauing no miſtruſt in God and good fortune, ſet vp a new ſaile, began the warre afreſh, and appointed for regent in France, Richard duke of Yorke, ſonne to Richard earle of Cambridge.

The duke of Yorke made regent of France.

Although the duke of Yorke was worthie (both for birth and courage) of this honor and preferment, yet ſo diſdeined of Edmund duke of Summerſet being couſine to the king, that by all means poſſible he ſought his hinderance, as one glad of his loſſe, and ſorie of his well doing: by reaſon whereof, yer the duke of Yorke could get his diſpatch, Paris and diuerſe other of the chéefeſt places in France were gotten by the French king. The duke of Yorke perceiuing his euill will, openlie diſſembled that which he inwardlie minded, either of them working things to the others diſpleaſure, till through malice & diuiſion betwéene them, at length by mortall warre they were both conſumed, with almoſt all their whole lines and ofſpring.

The Normans of the countrie of Caux, being heartened by the death of the duke of Bedford, began a new rebellion, ſlue diuerſe Engliſhmen, robbed manie townes that were vnder the Engliſh obeiſance, and tooke the towne of Harflue by aſſault, and diuerſe other townes. But the lord regent being aduertiſed, ſent foorth the lord Scales, ſir Thomas Kiriell, and the lord Hoo, which ſo afflicted thoſe rebels of Caux, that they ſlue aboue fiue thouſand perſons, and burnt all the townes and villages in the countrie, not being walled: ſo that in that part was neither habitation nor tillage, for all the people fled into Britaine, and all the beaſts of the countrie were brought to Caudebecke, where a good ſhéepe was ſold for an Engliſh penie, and a Cow for twelue pence. Dailie was ſkirmiſhing and fighting in euerie part, in ſo much that the lord Scales at the Rie beſide Rone, diſcomfited the Hire, and fiftéene hundred valiant Frenchmen; of the which, aboue thrée hundred were taken priſoners, beſide the gaine of ſeauen faire courſers.

The treſon of ỹ Pariſiens.

Amongſt other of the priſoners, were ſir Richard Reginald de Fountaines, ſir Alain Gerond, Alain Monſaie, and Geffrie Grame, capteine of the Scots. But yet this victorie and others the like, ſtaied not the Frenchmen from working treaſon dailie, inſomuch that diuers townes turned to the part of K. Charles, and ſome were taken by practiſe, as Diepe, Bois, Vincennes, and others. ¶ So that here partlie was accompliſhed the propheſie of Henrie the fift, giuen out in the ninth yeare of his reigne when he laie at ſiege before Meaux, that Henrie of Windſore ſhould loſe all that Henrie of Monmouth had gotten (for ſo they are named according to the place of their natiuitie) and this prediction was complet and full by that time the yeares of his regiment were expired.

Abr. Fl. Sée before pag. 581.

Paris yéelded to ỹ French king.

But héere is one chéefe point to be noted, that either the diſdeine amongſt the chéefe péeres of the realme of England (as yée haue heard) or the negligence of the kings councell (which did not foreſée dangers to come) was the loſſe of the whole dominion of France, betwéene the riuers of Sone and Marne, and in eſpeciall, of the noble citie of Paris. For where before, there were ſent ouer thouſands for defenſe of the holds and fortreſſes, now were ſent hundreds, yea and ſcores, ſome raſcals, and ſome not able to draw a bowe, or carrie a bill: for the lord Willoughbie, and the biſhop of Terwine, which had the gouernance of the great citie of Paris, had in their companie not two thouſand Engliſhmen.

Which weakeneſſe king Charles well perceiued, and therefore by authoritie appointed the conſtable, Arthur of Britaine, the earle of Dunois, the lords de la Roch, and Liſle Adam, with other valiant capteins and men of warre, as well Burgognions as French, to go before Paris, truſting by fauour of certeine citizens, with whome he had intelligence, ſhortlie to be lord of the citie, without great loſſe or battell. So theſe capteins came before the citie of Paris. But perceiuing that all things ſucceeded not according to their expectation, they returned to Mont Martyr, and the next daie ſuddenlie ſet on the towne of ſaint Denis, and conſtreined the Engliſhmen that kept it, to flee into the abbeie, and into the tower Venin. In this conflict two hundred Engliſhmen were ſlaine, the reſidue vpon reaſonable compoſition rendered vp the place, and departed to Paris.

Thomas lord Beaumont, who of late was come to Paris with eight hundred men, iſſued foorth with ſix hundred ſouldiers, intending to view the doings and number of the French armie; but ſuddenlie compaſſed about, within a ſmall ſpace was diſcomfited and taken, with him foureſcore priſoners, beſide two hundred ſlaine in the field, the remnant chaſed to the verie gates of the citie. The Pariſiens, and eſpeciallie the maiſter of the halles, and ſome of the vniuerſitie, and Michaell Lallier, and manie notable burgeſſes of the citie (who euer with an Engliſh countenance couered a French hart) perceiuing the weakneſſe of the Engliſhmen, and force of the French; ſignified to the French capteins their toward minds willing them with all diligence to come & receiue ſo rich a preie without anie difficultie, readie to be giuen and deliuered into their hands.

The treſon of ÿ Pariſiens.

The conſtable delaieng no time, came with his power, lodged by the charter houſe: and the lord Liſle Adam, approching to the walles, ſhewed to the citizens a charter, ſealed with the great ſeale of king Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offenſes, and granted to them all their old liberties, and ancient priuileges, ſo that they would hereafter be to him true and obedient: which thing to them declared, they ran about the towne, crieng; S. Denis, liue king Charles. The Engliſhmen perceiuing this, determined to keepe the gate S. Denis, but they were deceiued: for the cheines were drawne in euerie ſtreet, and women and children caſt downe ſtones and ſcalding water on the Engliſhmens heads, and the citizens in armour fought with them and chaſed them from ſtreet to ſtreet, and from lane to lane, and ſlue and hurt diuerſe and manie of them.

The biſhop of Terwine, chancellor there for king Henrie, the lord Willoughbie, and ſir Simon Moruiher, tooke great paine to appeaſe the people: but when they ſaw that all auailed not, they withdrew into the baſtile of ſaint Anthonie, which fortreſſe they had well vittelled, and furniſhed with men and munitions. Whileſt this rumor was in the towne, the earle of Dunois and others ſcaled the walles, and ſome paſſed the riuer by botes, and opened the gate of ſaint Iames, by the which the conſtable with his banner diſplaied, entered, at whoſe entrie the Pariſiens made great ioy. The biſhop and the lord Willoughbie, with their ſmall companie, defended their fortreſſe ten daies, looking for aid: but when they ſaw that no comfort appeared, they yeelded their fortreſſe, ſo that they and theirs, with certeine baggage, might peaceablie returne to Rone. Thus was the citie of Paris brought into the poſſeſſion of Charles the French king, through the vntrue demeanour of the citizens, who contrarie to their oths, and promiſed allegiance, like falſe and inconſtant people, ſo reuolted from the Engliſh.

Paris yeelded to ÿ French king.

After this glorious gaine, the Frenchmen beſieged the towne of Craill vpon Oiſe, wherof ſir William Chamberlaine was capteine, the which with fiue hundred Engliſhmen iſſued out of the towne, and after long fight, diſcomfited his enimies, & ſlue two hundred, and tooke a great number priſoners: the remnant not liking the market, departed to Campaigne, and other townes adioining. During which ſeaſon, twelue burgeſſes of the towne of Giſours ſold it for monie vnto Poiton de Xantrailes. But he had not the caſtell deliuered, & therefore with all his power he beſieged the ſame; whereof the lord Talbot being aduertiſed, ſent for the lord Scales, and they both with eighteene hundred men reſcued the caſtell, tooke the towne, and diſcomfited their enimies, and ſlue of them aboue foure hundred perſons.

Now according to the old saieng (when the ſteed is ſtolen ſhut the ſtable doore) the duke of Yorke appointed at the laſt parlement to be regent of France (after that Paris, Saint Denis, Saint Germans in Laie, and diuerſe other townes in France were taken and betraied for lacke of conuenient ſuccours) was ſent ouer into Normandie with eight thouſand men, and in his companie, the earles of Saliſburie, and Suffolke, and the lord Fawconbridge, and diuerſe other valiant capteins. When he was landed, the earle of Saliſburie beſieged the caſtell of Chambois, which ſhortlie was to him rendered. Then the duke remooued to Rone, where he ſet good orders, and did great iuſtice to the countrie; wherefore the Normans in their chronicles highlie extoll him for that point. Howbeit they ſaie, that he gat by long ſiege the towne and abbeie of Fecampe, and did none other notable act, during the time of his rule and gouernment.

The duke ſet into France too late.

In this fourteenth yeare, the duke of Burgognie determined by the aduiſe of his councell, to attempt the winning of Calis. The prouiſion was woonderous great which was made for the atchiuing of this enterpriſe: whereof ſir Iohn Ratcliffe, deputie of the towne of Calis, hauing perfect intelligence, aduertiſed king Henrie, and his councell, who incontinentlie ſent thither the earle of Mortaigne, ſonne to the duke of Summerſet, and the lord Camois, with fifteene hundred men, and great foiſon of vittels, that iſſued out of Calis, and came before Grauelin, where they were incountered with a great number of Flemings, who were ſhortlie diſcomfited, foure hundred of them ſlaine, and ſix ſcore taken priſoners. Within two daies after, the Engliſhmen draue by fine force the lords of Warren and Bado to the barriers of Ard, and diſcomfited their whole companie, to the number of fifteene hundred, ſlue ſeauen valiant capteins, and tooke manie gentlemen priſoners.

The duke of Burgonie prepareth an armie againſt Calis.

The duke of Burgognie, remaining ſtill in his former purpoſe, aſſembled togither, of Flemings, Picards, Hollanders, and Heneweirs, a great armie, to the number of fortie thouſand, ſo well armed, ſo well vitteled, ſo well furniſhed with ordinance, and garniſhed in all things, that they thought and blazed amongſt themſelues, that the Caliſians would leaue their towne deſolate, and flee for their ſafegard, hearing onelie of the dukes approch: but they reckoned without their hoſt; and ſo paid a deerer ſhot than they looked for. Now when this mightie armie was paſt the water of Grauelin, the duke intending to begin his feats, aſſaulted the little poore caſtell of Oie, which hauing in it but fiftie ſouldiers, whereof twelue ſold their liues deerelie; the remnant (compelled by neceſſitie) yeelded themſelues to the dukes mercie, which to pleaſe the Gantois (being of number moſt puiſſant in all the armie) liberallie gaue to them, both the caſtell and priſoners, who (rude & cruell people) not onelie raced the caſtell, but alſo hanged nine and twentie of the captiues, and had ſo doone with the reſidue, if the duke, offended at their crueltie, had not willed a ſtaie.

After this feat doone, the Picards beſieged the caſtell of Marke, & gaue thrée aſſaults to it. The Engliſhmen within, being in number two hundred and ſix, vnder the gouernement of their capteine ſir John Gedding, valiantlie defended the place; vntill at length, deſpairing of ſuccours, they yéelded themſelues (their liues & lims ſaued.) The caſtell of Marke being thus deliuered, was raced to the ground. Then the duke, accompanied with the duke of Cleues, the earle of Eſtampes, the lords of Dantoing, Croie, Criſquie, Humiers, and manie other barons and knights, with his great armie, came before Calis, & placed his ſiege about the ſame, moſt to his aduantage: he gaue thrée aſſaults, and gained nothing by them, but conſtreined to kéepe them further off. At the firſt aſſault, the Hire which was come to ſée the duke of Burgognie, was ſore wounded and hurt. A cooling card it was alſo vnto them, ſtill to ſée ſhips arriued in the hauen out of England, openlie before their faces, laden with vittels, munition and men.

Calis beſieged by the duke of Burgogne.

The duke on a daie riding about to view the ſituation of the towne, to the intent to take his moſt aduantage (either by aſſault or otherwiſe) was quickelie eſpied, and with the ſhot of a canon, a trumpetter, which rode next before him, and thrée horſſes in his companie were ſlaine out of hand. The lord of Croie, and a conuenient number with him, was appointed to beſiege the caſtell of Guiſnes, where he got little profit, and did leſſe harme. Moreouer, for the better aduancing of his enterpriſe, the duke minded to ſtop vp the hauen; ſo that no ſuccours ſhould enter there. Hervpon, he cauſed foure great hulkes to be fraught with great ſquare ſtones, cemented and ioined togither with lead, to the intent they ſhould lie ſtill like a mount, and not ſeuer in ſunder.

The dukes enterpriſe to bar ẏ hauen.

Theſe ſhips, with the reſidue of the dukes nauie, were conueied into the mouth of Calis hauen, and at a full ſea, by craft and policie, were ſonke downe to the ground. But whether God would not that the hauen ſhould be deſtroied, either the conueiers of the hulkes knew not the verie chanell; theſe foure great ſhips, at the low water, laie openlie vpon the ſands, without hurting the rode or chanell. Which when the ſouldiers perceiued, they iſſued out of the towne, brake the ſhips, and caried both the ſtones and timber into the towne. An other deuiſe the duke had, which was the building of a ſtrong baſtile vpon a little mountaine, which he furniſhed with foure hundred men, and much artillerie, that did impeach the Engliſhmen from iſſuing forth of the towne, to their great diſpleaſure.

Whileſt theſe things were adoing, there came to the duke an herald called Penbroke, belonging to the duke of Gloceſter, who declared to the duke of Burgognie, that the protector of England his maiſter (if God would ſend him wind & weather) would giue him battell, either there, or in anie other place within his owne countrie, where he would appoint, and that with ſpéed, if God vouchſafed him wind and weather. The duke anſwered the herald; Sir, ſaie to your maiſter, that his challenge is both honorable and reaſonable: howbeit, he ſhall not néed to take the paines to ſéeke me in mine owne countrie, for (God willing) he ſhall find me héere, till I haue my will of the towne, readie to abide him and all the power he can bring. After the herald had receiued this anſwer, he was highlie chéered, and had a cup and an hundred guildens to him giuen in reward, and ſo he returned to Calis.

After whoſe departure, the duke called a councell in the chéefe pauilion of the Gantois, about this meſſage of the Engliſh herald, where it was determined with great courage, that they would abide the battell, if the duke of Gloceſter came to offer it. Whileſt this great matter was in conſultation, the Caliſians, not well content with the baſtile which the duke had newlie builded, iſſued out of the towne in great number, part on horſſebacke and part on foot. The footmen ran to aſſault the baſtile, and the horſſemen went betwéene the armie & the aſſailants, to ſtop the aid and ſuccours that might come. Vpon the ſounding of the alarme, the duke himſelfe in perſon was comming on foot, to reléeue his men: but being kept backe a ſpace by the Engliſh horſſemen, in that delaie of time, the baſtile was woone by fine force; and eight ſcore perſons of thoſe that kept it ſlaine, beſide the reſidue which were taken priſoners, and led to Calis, with all the ordinance and artillerie, to the high diſpleaſure of the duke and his prudent councell. The next daie after, there ſprang a rumor in the armie (no man could tell how) that the duke of Gloceſter with a great puiſſance was alreadie imbarked, and would arriue at the next tide. The ſame night the duke fled awaie, and ſent in all haſt to the lord of Croie, to raiſe his ſiege before Guiſnes, which tidings were to him verie ioious, for he neither got nor ſaued. So theſe two capteins departed, leauing behind them, both ordinance, vittels, & great riches.

The dukes baſtile woon.

The duke of Burgogne breaketh vp the ſiege before Calis, and fleeth the 26 of Julie.

¶ The French writers (to ſaue the honor of the duke of Burgognie) ſaie, that there was a certeine diſcord and commotion amongſt the Flemings and Duch nation, affirming, that the great lords and the Picards (whome the Frenchmen greatlie extoll) would betraie and ſell the Flemings and their fréends, and that for the ſame cauſe in a great furie they cried; Home, home: and would not tarrie for anie requeſt that the duke could make, and ſo by their miſgouernance, the duke was inforced to raiſe his ſiege, and to depart. The Flemiſh authors affirme the contrarie, ſaieng, that they were readie to abide the comming of the duke of Gloceſter: but the duke of Burgognie fearing to be intrapped betwéene the Engliſh armie without, and the garriſon within the towne of Calis, fled awaie in the night, giuing to them no warning thereof before, ſo that for lacke of time, and conuenient ſpace to lade and carrie their ſtuffe, and being commanded vpon the ſudden to diſlodge with all ſpéed, they left behind them their vittels, tents, and other things, to their great loſſe and detriment.

Howſoeuer the matter was, the truth is, that he fled the ſix and twentith daie of Julie, in the night. And the next daie in the morning, the duke of Gloceſter landed in Calis hauen, & ſtreight went into the campe, where his enimies the night before were lodged, and there he found manie faire péeces of ordinance, and ſpeciallie one called Digeon: ſo named, after the chéefe towne of Burgognie; beſide pauilions, wine, béere, meale, and innumerable vittels. The duke of Gloceſter, ſéeing his enimies reculed, hauing in his companie fiue and twentie thouſand men, entered into Flanders, burning houſes, killing ſuch as made reſiſtance, deſtroieng the countrie on euerie part, ſetting fire in the townes of Poperinch, Bailleull, and others. Alſo, they waſted the ſuburbes of diuerſe cloſed townes, and after paſſed by Newcaſtell, Rimeſture, and Walon chapell: and then entering into Artois, they came to Arques and Blandeſques, ſetting fire in euerie part where they came. Thus they paſſed by ſaint Omers, and finallie by Arde returned to Guiſnes: and ſo to Calis at the ſix wéeks end, with great booties of cattell and riches.

A gun called Digeon.

The duke of Gloceſter ſpoileth Flanders.

In all this their iournie, they had but ſmall ſtore of bread, which cauſed much faintneſſe and diuerſe diſeaſes in the armie, whereof a greater number died than did of the enimies ſword: and yet the Flemings write, that they of Bruges diſtreſſed to the number of two thouſand Engliſhmen in this iournie. Howbeit, the French writers affirme, that the Engliſhmen loſt more of their companie in the marches about Ard, than they did in all other places where they had béene before, hauing paſſed through the parties of Flanders, without incounter, or any damage doone to them by the enimies. After that, the duke of Gloceſter returned into England, where he was aduertiſed, that Iames king of Scots had beſieged the caſtell of Rockeſburgh with thirtie thouſand men: but the capteine thereof, ſir Raſe Greie defended it ſo manfullie, for the ſpace of twentie daies, that king Iames being then aduertiſed, that the earle of Northumberland was comming to fight with him, fled with no leſſe loſſe than diſhonor, and inough of both.

The king of Scots fled from his ſiege at Rockeſburgh.

Anno Reg. 15.

Shortlie after that the duke of Burgognie had béene before Calis, at the deſire of princes, a truce for a time was moued to be had betwéene the king of England & the ſaid duke. For which cauſe were ſent to Grauelin for the king of England, Henrie Beauford cardinall of Wincheſter, Iohn lord Mowbraie duke of Northfolke, Humfrie earle of Stafford, and diuerſe other well learned & honorable perſonages. And for the duke of Burgognie, there appeared the ducheſſe his wife, the biſhop of Arras, the lord of Croie, and diuerſe other. At this treatie, a truce was taken for a ſmall time, and for a leſſe obſerued, which was concluded betwéene the king of England, and the ducheſſe of Burgognie (interlacing the duke and his name.)

A truce taken betwéene the king of England and the ducheſſe of Burgognie.

Hall.

Some thinke, that the king of England would neuer enter in league with him, bicauſe he had broken his promiſe, oth, and writing ſealed to him, and to his father. Other imagined this to be doone of a cautell, to caſt a miſt before the French kings eies, to the intent he ſhould beléeue that this feat was wrought by the ducheſſe, without aſſent or knowledge of the duke or his councell; and ſo he was not bound to accompliſh anie act or thing doone in his wiues treatie. Thus may you ſée, that princes ſometime with ſuch vaine gloſſes and ſcornefull expoſitions will hide their doings, and cloke their purpoſes; to the intent they would not either be eſpied, or elſe that they may plucke their heads out of the collar at their pleaſure. But (as the common opinion goeth) he which is a promiſe-breaker eſcapeth not alwaies with impunitie. For it is well ſéene by dailie and vſuall euents both in princes and priuat perſons, that for violating their faith, and breaking of promiſe, manie diſcommodities ariſe, and inconueniences not a few doo follow. To the due kéeping whereof the heathen bare ſuch a religious conſcience, that a prophane man in reſpect of others, preferreth it before ſacrifice, the ſentence is of great excellencie out of a pagans mouth:

Non boue mactato cœleſtia numina gaudent,
Sed quæ præſtanda eſt & ſine teſte fide.

About this ſeaſon, quéene Katharine mother to the king of England departed out of this life, and was buried by hir huſband in the abbeie of Weſtminſter. This woman, after the death of king Henrie the fift hir huſband, being yoong and luſtie, following more hir owne wanton appetite than fréendlie counſell, and regarding more priuate affection than princelike honour, tooke to huſband priuilie a galant gentleman and a right beautifull perſon, indued with manie goodlie gifts both of bodie & mind, called Owen Teuther, a man deſcended of the noble linage and ancient line of Cadwallader laſt king of the Britains. By this Owen ſhe brought forth thrée goodlie ſonnes, Edmund, Iaſper, and another that was a monke in Weſtminſter, and liued a ſmall time: alſo a daughter which in hir youth departed out of this tranſitorie life.

Katharine mother to king Henrie maried Owen Teuther.

King Henrie, after the death of his mother, bicauſe, they were his brethren of one wombe, created Edmund earle of Richmund, and Iaſper earle of Penbroke: which Edmund of Margaret daughter and ſole heire to Iohn duke of Summerſet begat Henrie, who after was king of this realme, called Henrie the ſeuenth, of whome ye ſhall heare more in place conuenient. This Owen, after the death of the quéene his wife, was apprehended and committed to ward, bicauſe that (contrarie to the ſtatute made in the ſixt yeare of this king) he preſumptuouſlie had maried the quéene, without the kings eſpeciall aſſent, out of which priſon he eſcaped, and let out other with him, but was againe apprehended, and after eſcaped againe. ¶ Polychronicon ſaith that he was a ſquier of low birth and like degrée, the ſame author alſo reporteth that he was commanded to Newgate by the duke of Gloceſter then lord protector of the realme: out of which priſon he brake by the helpe of a préeſt that was his chapline. Neuertheleſſe he was apprehended afterwards by the lord Beaumont, & brought againe to Newgate, whence (when he had remained there a while) he was deliuered and ſet at libertie.]

Abr. Fl.

The ducheſſe of Bedford alſo, ſiſter to Lewes erle of S. Paule, more for affection than increaſe of honour, without counſell of hir fréends, maried a luſtie yoong knight, called ſir Richard Wooduile, to the great diſpleaſure of hir vncle the biſhop of Terwine, and the earle hir brother. This ſir Richard was made baron of Riuers, and after earle, and had by this ladie manie noble ſonnes, and faire daughters, of the which one was the ladie Elizabeth, after quéene of England, by reaſon ſhe was married vnto Edward the fourth. ¶ Whileſt this marriage was a celebrating, Iane late quéene of England, and before ducheſſe of Britaine, daughter to the king of Nauarre, and wife to king Henrie the fourth, died at the manor of Hauering, and was buried by hir huſband at Canturburie. ¶ About the ſame time, deceaſſed alſo the counteſſe of Warwike, and Henrie archbiſhop of Yorke.

Quéene Elizabeth.

In this yeare alſo, the duke of Summerſet, accompanied with the lords of Fauconbridge, Talbot, ſir Francis Surien, the Arrogonnois, Matthew * Gough, Thomas Paulet, Thomas Harington, Walter Limbrike, Iohn Gedding, William Watton eſquiers, and Thomas Hilton bailiffe of Rone, with a great companie of the Engliſh partie, beſieged the towne of Harflue (latelie before gotten by the Frenchmen) both by water and land: the capteine within the towne was one ſir Iohn d'Eſtouteuille, hauing his brother Robert with him, and a ſix hundred good fighting men. The aſſailants caſt trenches, and ſo fortified themſelues in their campe and lodgings, that when the earles of Ew and Dunois, the valiant baſtard of Bourbon, the lord Gawcourt, and other famous capteins, with a foure thouſand men, ſent to the reſcue of them within, came before the towne, they could not ſuccour their fréends, nor annoie their enimies by anie meanes they could deuiſe; & ſo for feare to loſe honour, they returned backe againe, with much trauell and little profit.

* Or rather Goche.

Harflue beſieged and wonne by the Engliſhmen.

The capteins within the towne perceiuing they could not be aided, did ſhortlie after render the towne to the duke of Summerſet; who after committed it to the kéeping of Thomas Paulet, William Limbrike, Chriſtopher Barber, and George ſaint George, which manie yeares (till the diuiſion began in England) manfullie and valiantlie defended both the towne and the hauen. But afterward, when this duke of Summerſet was regent and gouernour of Normandie, he not onlie loſt this towne of Harflue, but alſo the citie of Rone, and the whole duchie of Normandie, whereas now (being but a deputie) he got it to his high praiſe and glorie. In this yeare was James king of Scots murthered by certeine traitors of his owne ſubiects [euen in his bedchamber by night, which king (ſaith Polychr.) had béene priſoner in England fiftéene yeares, the murtherers of whom being afterwards taken, were terriblie executed.]

The lord Talbot beſieged Tankeruile, and after foure moneths had it ſimplie to him rendered. This towne was no great gaine to the Engliſhmen, for in the meane ſeaſon, the French king in his owne perſon beſieged the ſtrong towne of Monſtreau fault Yonne; whereof Thomas Gerard being capteine, more for deſire of reward, than for feare of enimies, ſold the towne to the French king, and had of him great gifts and interteinement, as afterwards was openlie knowen. This towne had béene reſcued of the French king fought withall, if one chance had not happened. For the duke of Yorke about that time was diſcharged of his office, and the earle of Warwike preferred to the ſame, ſo that the duke of Yorke, lieng as then at Rone, would haue gladlie reſcued the towne, if his authoritie had not ſurceaſſed; and the earle of Warwike could not come in time, for the wind was contrarie to him.

The earle of Warwike made regent of France.

This preſent yeare was a parlement holden at Weſtminſter, in the which manie good and profitable acts for the preſeruation of concord at home, and defenſe againſt the enimies abroad, were ordeined and deuiſed. ¶ Arthur of Britaine conſtable of France, and John duke of Alanſon, were ſent by the French king into Normandie, with a great armie, to beſiege the towne of Auranches, ſtanding vpon the knop of an hill: where after they had laien a certeine ſpace without gaine, the lord Talbot with a valiant companie of men came thither, and offered the enimies battell. Which when they at all hands refuſed, the lord Talbot perceiuing their faint harts, raiſed his field, and in the open ſight of them all, entered into the towne, and the next daie iſſued out; and finding the Frenchmen riding abroad to deſtroie the plaine countrie, he compaſſed them about, and ſlue manie of them, and tooke diuerſe priſoners. Although the Frenchmen got neither honor nor profit by this iournie, yet they enterpriſed a greater matter, as the winning of Rone; in ſo much that Pouton de Santreils, and the Hire, with manie other notable capteins, hauing promiſe of certeine burgeſſes of that citie to haue entrie made them, ſecretlie in the night came forward to a towne called Riſe or Riz, not paſt foure leagues from Rone, and there lodged.

The lord Talbot, the lord Scales, and ſir Thomas Kiriell hearing of their approch, ſet out of Rone at midnight, & with great paine came to Riſe ſo couertlie in the morning, that the French ſuddenlie ſurpriſed and ſet vpon, like men all amazed ran awaie and fled. In the chaſe were taken the lord of Fontains, ſir Aleine Geron, ſir Lewes de Walle, and thréeſcore knights, and eſquiers, beſide others; and there were ſlaine two hundred and more. The Hire eſcaped verie narrowlie, by ſwiftneſſe of his horſſe, though not vnwounded. The Engliſhmen returned to the towne of Riſe, and found there great number of horſſes & other baggages, which they ioiouſlie brought with them to Rone.

Anno Reg. 16. The earle of Warwike regent came into France.

On the ſixt daie of Nouember this preſent yeare, the earle of Warwike, as regent of France, paſſed the ſea, after he had béene ſeuen times ſhipped and vnſhipped, and landed at Homflue with a thouſand freſh ſouldiers, and came to Rone, and then the duke of Yorke returned into England. Betwéene the change of theſe two capteins, the duke of Burgognie (which ſore enuied the glorie of the Engliſhmen) beſieged the towne of Crotoy, with ten thouſand men and more, hauing with him great plentie of guns and goodlie ordinance. The earle of Warwike aduertiſed hereof, ſent the lord Fauconbridge, ſir Thomas Kiriell, ſir John Montgomerie, Thomas Limbrike, Thomas Chandois, Dauid Hall, and diuerſe other knights and eſquiers, and an hoſt of fiue thouſand men, which paſſed the riuer of Some, beſide the towne of ſaint Valerie, wading in the water vp to the chin, ſo glad were they to reſcue their felowes.

Crotoy beſieged by the duke of Burgognie.

When the duke of Burgognie was informed of the approching of the lord Talbot, he with all his power (ſauing foure hundred, which were left in a baſtile by him there newlie bulded) fled to Abuile, the baſtile was ſoone gained by the Engliſhmen, and thoſe within either ſlaine or taken. After this, the lord Talbot ſent to the duke of Burgognie, ſignifieng that except he would come forth, and bide by a battell, he would vtterlie waſt his countrie of Picardie. According wherevnto (the duke of Burgognie ſhrinking) he burnt townes, ſpoiled and ſlue manie people in Picardie. But for all thoſe his doings, the duke of Burgognie appeared not, but got him from Abuile to Amiens, ſo that the lord Talbot abode twentie daies full in Picardie and Arthois, deſtroieng all afore him, and after returned vntouched. In the meane ſeaſon, ſir Thomas Kiriell had gotten all the dukes cariages and ordinance, and left as much vittell in the towne of Croitoy, as would ſerue ſix hundred men a whole yeare, and conueied the reſidue to the earle of Warwike, who highlie praiſed them for their hardie doings.

After this, Henrie earle of Mortaigne, ſonne to Edmund duke of Summerſet, arriued at Chierburgh with foure hundred archers, & thrée hundred ſpeares, and paſſed through Normandie, till he came into the countie of Maine, where he beſieged a caſtell called ſaint Anian, in the which were thrée hundred Scots, beſides Frenchmen. This caſtell he tooke by aſſault, ſlue the Scots, and hanged the Frenchmen, bicauſe they were once ſworne Engliſh. After this he got alſo another caſtell, two miles from ſaint Julians, called Alegerche, which was ſhortlie after recouered; and the lord of Camewis, which came to the reſcue of the ſame, in the meane waie was intrapped and taken. Thus flowed the victorie, ſometime on the one partie, and ſometime on the other. For about the ſame time the townes of Meaux in Brie, and ſaint Suſan were ſold and deliuered to the French part, by the vntruth of the burgeſſes and inhabitants of the ſame towns, about the latter end of this ſixtéenth yeare.

Abr. Fl. ex Polychr.

This yeare (by reaſon of great tempeſts) raging winds, and raine, there roſe ſuch ſcarſitie, that wheat was ſold at thrée ſhillings foure penſe the buſhell, wine at twelue penſe the gallon, baiſalt at fourtéene penſe the buſhell, and malt at thirtéene ſhillings foure penſe the quarter, and all other graines at exceſſiue prices aboue the old rate. ¶ Wherevpon Steuen Browne (ſaith Polychronicon) at the ſame ſeaſon maior of London, tendering the ſtate of the citie in this want of breadcorne, ſent into Pruſe certeine ſhips, which returned loden with plentie of rie: wherwith he did much good to the people in that hard time, ſpeciallie to them of the citie, where the want of corne was not ſo extreame as in ſome other places of the land, where the poore diſtreſſed people that were hungerbitten, made them bread of ferne roots, and vſed other hard ſhifts, till God prouided remedie for their penurie by good ſucceſſe of huſbandrie.]

Bread made of ferne roots.

In the moneth of June, the earle of Huntington (as Steward of Guien) with two thouſand archers, and foure hundred ſpeares was ſent into Gaſcoigne, as a ſupplie to the countrie and cõmons of the ſame:

for the king of England and his councell were informed, that the earle of Dunois laie in the frontiers of Tholouſe ſecretlie, by rewards and faire promiſes practiſing to procure diuerſe townes in Guien to become French. Wherefore this earle (like a politike warrior) altered not onelie the capteins in euerie towne and citie, but alſo remoued the magiſtrates, and changed the officers from towne to towne, and roome to roome; ſo that by this meanes, the earle of Dunois at that time loſt both trauell and coſt.

A feat of a politike capteine & wiſe counſellor.

In the ſame moneth alſo, ſir Richard Wooduile, ſir William Chamberleine, ſir William Peito, and ſir William Storie, with a thouſand men, were ſent to ſtuffe the townes in Normandie, which at that time had therof great néed: for the Engliſh capteins had ſmall confidence in the Normans, and not too much in ſome of their own nation. For that harlot briberie, with hir fellow couetouſneſſe, ran ſo faſt abroad with French crownes, that hard was it to remaine vncorrupted. In this yeare, the Dolphin of France alied with Iohn duke of Alanſon, and Iohn duke of Burgognie, rebelled againſt his father king Charles: but in the end, by wiſe perſuaſions, and wittie handling of the matter, the knot of that ſeditious faction was diſſolued, and the king with his ſonne, and the other confederates openlie and apparantlie pacified. The Engliſhmen taking aduantage of this domeſticall diuiſion in France, raiſed an armie, and recouered againe diuerſe townes, which had béene ſurpriſed from them before, and prepared alſo to haue recouered the citie of Paris, till they hard of the agréement betwixt the father and the ſonne, and then they left off that enterpriſe.

Two ſhrewd perſuaders.

Anno Reg. 18.

In Nouember of this yeare, there was ſuch a great froſt, and after that ſo déepe a ſnow, that all the ground was couered therwith, and all the diches froſen. Which wether put the Engliſhmen in hope to recouer againe the towne of Ponthoiſe, by the French king gotten before, by corrupting with monie diuerſe burgeſſes of the towne. Hervpon the Engliſhmen clothed all in white, with Iohn lord Clifford their capteine, came in the night to the diches, paſſed them without danger by reaſon of the froſt, ſcaled the walles, ſlue the watch, and tooke the towne, with manie profitable priſoners. ¶ After the regaining of this towne, the lord Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwike died in the caſtell of Rone, from whence conueied into England, he was with ſolemne ceremonies buried at his college of Warwike, in a verie faire and ſumptuous ſepulchre.

Ponthoiſe recouered by the Engliſh.

Anno Reg. 19.

About the beginning of Lent, the duke of Summerſet, and the lord Talbot, with other capteins and men of warre to the number of two thouſand, which they had aſſembled in the marches of Normandie towards Rone, marching forward towards Picardie, paſſed ouer the riuer of Some; and through the towne of Monteruell, came before the fortreſſe of Folleuile, which the duke beſieged, whileſt the lord Talbot entered further into the countrie. After that the duke had mounted his great artillerie, and began to batter the hold, the capteine within chanced to be ſlaine with a ſhot of the ſame artillerie, & ſhortlie after, the batterie being ſtill continued, the reſt of the men of warre that ſerued vnder him yéelded the place, in which the duke left a competent garriſon of ſouldiers, which afterwards ſore indamaged the countrie.

Enguerant.

This doone, the duke followed the lord Talbot, who was alreadie entered a good waie within the countrie of Santhois, and now ioining their powers togither, they came to a fortreſſe called Lihons in Santhois, which was alſo rendered vnto them, after they had burnt the church; which the countrie people kept againſt them, and would not yéeld it, till they were fired out, burnt, and ſlaine; to the number of thrée hundred. After the fortreſſe was deliuered into their hands by compoſition, the duke with his power laie there about ten daies, ſending diuerſe troops of his men of warre abroad into the countrie, which ſpoiled the ſame, tooke the fortreſſe of Herbonneres, and the lord thereof within it, who for his ranſome, and to haue his ſubiects and houſe ſaued from ſpoile and fire, compounded with his takers for a thouſand ſaluz of gold, which he paid to them. Finallie, after the duke of Summerſet, and the lord Talbot with their power, had laine in Lihons about ten daies, they departed from thence, and returned into Normandie, without anie impeachment.

The duke of Yorke againe made regent of France.

After the death of the earle of Warwike, the duke of Yorke was againe made regent of France, which accompanied with the earle of Oxenford, the lord Bourchier called earle of Ewe, ſir Iames of Ormond, the lord Clinton, ſir Richard Wooduile, & diuerſe other noble men, ſailed into Normandie. Before whoſe ariuall, the French king ſore gréeued with the taking of the towne of Ponthoiſe, aſſembled a great armie, and beſieged the ſaid towne himſelfe in perſon, inuironing it with baſtiles, trenches, and diches, beating the walles and bulworks with ſhot of great ordinance, and giuing thereunto diuerſe great and fierce aſſaults. But Iohn lord Clifford, like a valiant capteine, defended the towne ſo manfullie, that the Frenchmen rather loſt than woone.

Ponthoiſe beſieged by the French king, but valiantlie defended.

The duke of Yorke at his landing receiued true aduertiſement of this ſiege, wherevpon he ſent for the lord Talbot, and a great number of ſoldiers, and ſo came néere to the towne of Ponthoiſe, and there incamped himſelfe; who therewith ſent word to the French king, that thither he was come to giue him battell, if he would come out of his ſtrength and baſtiles. But the French king by aduiſe of his councell, determined not to venture his perſon with men of ſo baſe degrée, but meant to kéepe his ground, bidding the lord regent to enter at his perill, and in the meane ſeaſon did what he could to ſtop the paſſage of the riuer of Oiſe, ſo that no vittels ſhould be brought to the Engliſh armie by that waie, in hope ſo to cauſe them to recule backe.

The duke of Yorke, perceiuing that the French king minded not to fight, purpoſed to paſſe ouer the riuer of Oiſe, and ſo to fight with him in his lodging. Wher vpon he remooued his campe, and appointed the lord Talbot and other, to make a countenance, as they would paſſe the riuer by force at the port of Beaumont: and appointed an other companie in boates of timber and leather, and bridges made of cords and ropes (whereof he had great plentie caried with him in chariots) to paſſe ouer beneath the abbie. Whileſt the lord Talbot made a crie, as though he would aſſault the gate, certeine Engliſhmen paſſed the water in botes, and drew a bridge of cords ouer, ſo that a great number of them were got to the other ſide, yer the Frenchmen were aduiſed what had happened. When they ſaw the chance, they ran like mad men, to haue ſtopped the paſſage, but it was too late: for the moſt part of the Engliſhmen were got ouer, in ſo much that they chaſed their enimies backe, and ſlue ſir Guilliam de Chaſtell, nephue to the lord Taneguie du Chaſtell, and diuerſe others.

A policie for a bridge.

The Frenchmen ſéeing their euill hap irrecouerable, returned to the French king, and told him what had chanced: wherevpon he doubting to be aſſailed to his diſaduantage, thought not good longer to tarrie, but with all ſpéed remoouing his ordinance into the baſtile of ſaint Martin, which he had newlie made, diſlodged in the night from Maubuiſſon, and went to Poiſſie, leauing the lord de Cotignie admerall of France, with thrée thouſand men to kéepe the baſtile. If he had taried ſtill at Maubuiſſon, the lord Talbot which had paſſed the riuer of Oiſe in two ſmall leather botes, had either taken or ſlaine him the ſame night. The Engliſhmen the next daie in good order of battell came before the towne of Ponthoiſe, thinking there to haue found the French king, but he was gone: and in his lodging they found great riches, and much ſtuffe which he could not haue ſpace for to carrie awaie for feare of the ſudden inuaſion.

Then the duke with his power entred into the towne, and ſent for new vittels, and repaired the towers and bulworks about the towne, & diuerſe times aſſaulted the baſtile of the Frenchmen, of the which he made no great accompt, bicauſe they were not of power either to aſſault or ſtop the vittels or ſuccors from the towne. After this, the duke intending once againe to offer the French king battell, left behind him at Ponthoiſe for capteine there, ſir Geruais Clifton, ſir Nicholas Burdet, Henrie Chandos, and a thouſand ſoldiers, and therewith remoouing with his whole armie, came before Poiſſie, where he ſet himſelfe and his men in good order of battell readie to fight. There iſſued out ſome of the French gentlemen to ſkirmiſh with the Engliſhmen, but to their loſſe: for diuerſe of them were ſlaine, and foure valiant horſſemen taken priſoners. The duke perceiuing the faint hearts of the Frenchmen, and that they durſt not incounter in field with the Engliſh power, diſlodged from Poiſſie, and came to Maunt, and ſoone after to Rone.

Anno Reg.20.

Ponthoiſe gotten by the French.

When the regent and the lord Talbot were returned againe into Normandie, the French king conſidering how much it ſhould redound to his diſhonour to let reſt the towne of Ponthoiſe in his enimies hands, ſith he had beene at ſuch charges and trauell about the winning thereof, he eftſoones aſſembled all his puiſſance. And returning ſuddenlie vnto Ponthoiſe, he firſt by aſſault got the church, and after the whole towne, tooke the capteine, and diuerſe other Engliſhmen, and ſlue to the number of foure hundred, which ſold their liues dearelie: for one French writer affirmeth, that the French king loſt there three thouſand men; and the whole garriſon of the Engliſhmen was but onelie a thouſand. Among other that were ſlaine here of the defendants, was ſir Nicholas Burdet knight, cheefe butler of Normandie. After this hot tempeſt, the weather began ſomewhat to war more calme: for king Henrie and king Charles agreed to ſend ambaſſadors to common of ſome good concluſion of peace: ſo that king Henrie ſent the cardinall of Wincheſter, with diuerſe other noble perſonages of his councell to Calis, with whome was alſo ſent Charles duke of Orleance yet priſoner in England, to the intent that he might be both author of the peace, and alſo procurer of his owne deliuerance.

Enguerant. Sir Nicholas Burdet ſlaine.

The French king ſent the archbiſhop of Reimes, and the earle of Dunois: and the duke of Burgognie ſent the lord de Creuecueur, and diuerſe other. All theſe met at Calis, where the duke of Orleance courteouſlie receiued the earle of Dunois (his baſtard brother) thanking him greatlie for his paines taken in gouerning his lands & countrie, during the time of his captiuitie and abſence. Diuerſe communications were had, as well for the deliuerance of the duke as for a finall peace; but nothing was concluded, ſauing that an other meeting was appointed, ſo that in the meane ſeaſon the demands of either partie might be declared to their ſouereigne lords and maiſters: and herevpon the commiſſioners brake vp their aſſemblie, and returned into their countries. The Engliſhmen (as the French writers record) required not onelie to poſſeſſe peaceablie the two duches of Aquitaine and Normandie, diſcharged of all reſort, ſuperioritie, & ſouereigntie againſt the realme of France, the kings and gouernours of the ſame; but alſo to be reſtored to all the townes, cities, and places, which they within thirtie yeeres next before gone and paſt, had conquered in the realme of France. Which requeſt the Frenchmen thought verie vnreaſonable, and ſo both parties, minding rather to gaine or ſaue than to looſe, departed for that time, as yee haue heard.

After this meeting thus proroged, Philip duke of Burgognie, partlie mooued in conſcience to make amends to Charles duke of Orleance (as yet priſoner in England) for the death of duke Lewes his father, whome duke Iohn, father to this duke Philip, cruellie murthered in the citie of Paris; and partlie intending the aduancement of his neece, the ladie Marie, daughter to Adolfe duke of Cleue (by the which aliance, he truſted, that all old rancor ſhould ceaſſe) contriued waies to haue the ſaid duke of Orleance ſet at libertie, vpon promiſe by him made to take the ſaid ladie Marie vnto wife. This duke had beene priſoner in England euer ſince the battell was fought at Agincourt, vpon the daie of Criſpine and Criſpinian, in the yeare 1415, and was ſet now at libertie in the moneth of Nouember, in the yeare 1440, paieng for his ranſome foure hundred thouſand crownes, though other ſaie but three hundred thouſand.

The cauſe whie he was deteined ſo long in captiuitie, was to pleaſure thereby the duke of Burgognie: for ſo long as the duke of Burgognie continued faithfull to the king of England, it was not thought neceſſarie to ſuffer the duke of Orleance to be ranſomed, leaſt vpon his deliuerance he would not ceaſſe to ſeeke meanes to be reuenged vpon the duke of Burgognie, for the old grudge and diſpleaſure betwixt their two families, and therefore ſuch ranſome was demanded for him as he was neuer able to pay. But after the duke of Burgognie had broken his promiſe, and was turned to the French part, the councell of the king of England deuiſed how to deliuer the duke of Orleance, that thereby they might diſpleaſure the duke of Burgognie. Which thing the duke of Burgognie perceiuing, doubted what might follow if he were deliuered without his knowledge, and therefore to his great coſt practiſed his deliuerance, paid his ranſome, and ioined with him amitie and aliance by mariage of his neece.

The duke of Orleance deliuered.

This duke being now deliuered, and ſpeaking better Engliſh than French, after his arriuall in France, repaired to the duke of Burgognie, and according to his promiſe and conuention, maried the ladie Marie of Cleue, in the towne of ſaint Omers, on whome he begat a ſonne, which after was French king, and called Lewes the twelfe. [Feſtered ſores that rankle inward, as they may perchance be palliat by ſleight of ſurgerie; ſo ſildome come they to ſound cure, but often doo burſt out againe to greater paine and perill of patient than euer afore: and ſo befell it betweene theſe two noble houſes of Orleance and Burgognie, who for all this mariage and plauſible peace (that continued a twentie yeares) fell out yet after at ſquare vnattonablie:] their children and couſins, to the great vnquieting of much part of chriſtendome, ſpeciallie in the times of king Francis the firſt, and his ſonne Henrie the ſecond, heires of the houſe of Orleance. For Iohn earle of Angoleſme, vncle to this duke Charles, begat Charles, father to the ſaid king Francis: which earle Iohn had beene as pledge in England for the debt of Lewes duke of Orleance, from the laſt yeare of king Henrie the fourth; till that now his nephue being deliuered, made ſhift for monie, and ranſomed him alſo, and at length reſtored him to his countrie.

In the beginning of this twentith yeare, Richard duke of Yorke, regent of France, and gouernour of Normandie, determined to inuade the territories of his enimies both by ſundrie armies, and in ſeuerall places, and therevpon without delaie of time he ſent the lord of Willoughbie with a great crue of ſoldiers to deſtroie the countrie of Amiens, and Iohn lord Talbot was appointed to beſiege the towne of Diepe; and the regent himſelfe accompanied with Edmund duke of Summerſet, ſet forward into the duchie of Aniou. The lord Willoughbie, according to his commiſſion, entred into the countrie of his enimies in ſuch wiſe vpon the ſudden, that a great number of people were taken yer they could withdraw into anie place of ſafegard.

Earle of ſaint Paule freend to ẏ Engliſh.

The Frenchmen in the garriſons adioining, aſtonied with the clamour and crie of the poore people, iſſued out in good order, and manfullie fought with the Engliſhmen. But in the end, the Frenchmen ſéeing their fellowes in the forefront ſlaine downe, and kild without mercie, turned their backes, and fled: the Engliſhmen followed, and ſlue manie in the chaſe; and ſuch as eſcaped the ſword, were robbed by the earle of ſaint Paule, who was comming to aid the Engliſhmen. In this conflict were ſlaine aboue ſix hundred men of armes, and a great number taken. The dukes of Yorke and Summerſet likewiſe entered into Aniou and Maine, and there deſtroied townes, and ſpoiled the people, and with great preies and priſoners repaired againe into Normandie, whither alſo the lord Willoughbie withdrew, after his valiant enterpriſe atchiued (as before yée haue heard) with rich ſpoiles and good priſoners.

This ſhould be as Enguerant noteth two yeares after this preſent yere 19, to wit, An. 1440.

The duke of Summerſet vpon further valiance, entered into the marches of Britaine, and tooke by fierce aſſault a towne named la Gerche, apperteining to the duke of Alanſon, ſpoiling and burning the ſame. This doone, he went to Ponzaie, where he ſoiorned two moneths, ſending foorth dailie his men of war to deſtroie the countries of Aniou, Craonnois, and Chatragonnois. The French king ſent the marſhall Loiach with foure thouſand men to reſiſt the inuaſions of the duke of Summerſet, which marſhall intended to haue ſet on the duke in his lodgings in the dead time of the night: but that (as by a wiſe and hardie capteine) well foreſéene, he marched forward, and met the Frenchmen halfe the waie, and after long fight, diſcomfited them, ſlue an hundred of the marſhals men, and tooke thrée ſcore and two priſoners, whereof the chéefe were the lord Dauſignie, ſir Lewes de Buell, all the other (almoſt) were knights and eſquiers.

After this incounter, the duke tooke the towne of Beaumont le vicount, and manned all the fortreſſes on the frontiers of his enimies, and with rich booties and priſoners returned againe to the duke of Yorke. In this meane time the lord Talbot, beſieging the towne of Diepe, inuironed it with déepe trenches; building alſo vpon the mount Paulet a ſtrong and noiſome baſtile. But at length perceiuing the towne to be ſtronglie defended, and that he lacked ſuch furniture of men, vittels, and ordinance as was neceſſarie for the winning of it, he deliuered the cuſtodie of the baſtile, with the gouernance of the ſiege to his baſtard ſonne, a valiant yoong gentleman, and departed to Rone for aid, monie, and munition. The French king aduertiſed hereof, ſent his ſonne the Dolphin of Vienne with the earle of Dunois, and fiftéene thouſand men to raiſe the ſiege from Diepe.

Thrée thouſand hath Nicholas Giles.

Thrée daies they aſſailed the baſtile, in the which ſix hundred Engliſhmen were incloſed, and at length bicauſe powder and weapon failed them within, the Frenchmen wan it, and tooke the baſtard Talbot priſoner, with ſir William Peltow, and ſir Iohn Repleie, which ſhortlie after were redéemed. The other Engliſh ſouldiers, ſéeing the baſtile woone by the Frenchmen, ſtood all a daie in good order of battell, and in the night following, politikelie ſaued themſelues and returned to Rone, without loſſe or damage. In the aſſaulting of the baſtile, the Frenchmen ſaie, they ſlue two hundred Engliſhmen; and denie not but that they loſt fiue hundred of their owne men, beſide thoſe that were hurt. Whileſt theſe things were a dooing, Philip duke of Burgognie made ſharpe warre againſt the earle of ſaint Paule, in taking from him his townes and caſtels, that made him to renounce his allegiance ſworne and promiſed to the king of England, and returned to the French part.

The earle of ſaint Paule reuolteth to the French.

Tartas beſieged.

The Engliſh capteins in Guien beſieged the ſtrong towne of Tartas, belonging to the lord Dalbreth their old and ancient enimie. The towne perceiuing that it was not able to reſiſt the force of the Engliſhmen (anie long time, tooke appointment, that the towne ſhuld remaine neuter. For aſſurance thereof, they deliuered Cadet the ſonne of the lord de la Breth in pledge, vpon this condition; that if the ſaid lord de la Breth would not aſſent to the agréement, then he ſhould ſignifie his refuſall to the Engliſh capteins within thrée moneths next inſuing, and he to haue his pledge, and they to doo their beſt. The French king, at the requeſt of the lords of Guien, cauſed the lord de la Breth to ſignifie his diſagréement vnto the earle of Huntington, as then lieutenant to the king of England in the duchie of Aquitaine. And therewith to gratifie the lords of Guien, he aſſembled an armie of thréeſcore thouſand men, & came to Tholouſe, and ſo to Tartas, to whome the chéefteins of the towne, ſéeing no ſuccours comming from the king of England, rendred the towne: and Cadet de la Breth, which was left there as a pledge, was alſo deliuered.

The French king, after the yéelding of Tartas, remooued to ſaint Seuerine, which towne he tooke by force, ſlue thrée hundred perſons, and tooke ſir Thomas Rampſton priſoner. After this, he came to the citie of Arques, tooke a bulworke by force, and had the towne yéelded to him by compoſition. The capteine, which was the lord of Montferrant, departed with all the Engliſh crue to Burdeaux, where he found the earle of Longuile, the Capdau de Beuſe, and ſir Thomas Rampſton, which was a little before deliuered. After this, the fortreſſes of the Rioll and Mermandie were alſo yéelded to the French king: who notwithſtanding at length was conſtreined for lacke of vittels (which were cut off by the Engliſhmen, that laie abroad in diuerſe fortreſſes for the purpoſe) to breake vp his armie, & to retire into France. And then after his departure, the Engliſhmen recouered againe the citie of Arques, & the other townes by the French king gained, and tooke priſoner his lieutenant called Reginald Guilliam the Burgognion, and manie other gentlemen, and all the meane ſouldiers were either ſlaine or hanged.

The change in warre.

The lord Talbot.

While the French king was in Guien, the lord Talbot tooke the towne of Couchet, and after marched toward Galliardon, which was beſieged by the baſtard of Orleance, otherwiſe called the earle of Dunois: which earle hearing of the lord Talbots approch, raiſed his ſiege, and ſaued himſelfe. The Frenchmen a little before this ſeaſon, had taken the towne of Eureux by treaſon of a fiſher. Sir Francis the Arragonois hearing of that chance, appareled ſix ſtrong fellowes, like men of the countrie, with ſacks and baſkets, as cariers of corne and vittels, and ſent them to the caſtell of Cornill, in the which diuerſe Engliſhmen were kept as priſoners, and he with an ambuſh of Engliſhmen laie in a vallie nigh to the fortreſſe.

An excellent fineſſe in warre.

The ſix counterfet huſbandmen entered the caſtell vnſuſpected, and ſtreight came to the chamber of the capteine, & laieng hands on him, gaue knowledge to them that laie in ambuſh to come to their aid. The which ſuddenlie made forth, and entered the caſtell, ſlue and tooke all the Frenchmen, and ſet the Engliſhmen at libertie: which thing doone, they ſet fire in the caſtell, and departed to Rone with their bootie and priſoners. This exploit they had not atchiued peraduenture by force (as happilie they miſtruſted) and therefore by ſubtiltie and deceit ſought to accompliſh it, which meanes to vſe in warre is tollerable, ſo the ſame warre be lawfull; though both fraud & bloudſhed otherwiſe be forbidden euen by the inſtinct of nature to be put in practiſe and vſe; and that dooth the poet inſinuat in a proper ſententious verſe, ſaieng:

Fraus abſit, vacuas cædis habete manus.

A new breach betwéene the duke of Gloceſter, and the biſhop of Wincheſter.

But now to ſpeake ſomewhat of the doings in England in the meane time. Whileſt the men of war were thus occupied in martiall feates, and dailie ſkirmiſhes, within the realme of France: ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after the cardinall of Wincheſter, and the duke of Gloceſter, were (as it ſéemed) reconciled either to other, yet the cardinall, and the archbiſhop of Yorke ceaſſed not to doo manie things without the conſent of the king or of the duke, being (during the minoritie of the king) gouernor and protector of the realme, whereas the duke (as good cauſe he had) greatlie offended, therevpon in writing declared to the king, wherein the cardinall and the archbiſhop had offended both his maieſtie, and the lawes of the realme. This complaint of the duke of Gloceſter was conteined in foure and twentie articles, which chieflie reſted, in that the cardinall had from time to time, through his ambitious deſire to ſurmount all others in high degrées of honor and dignitie, ſought to inrich himſelfe, to the great and notorious hinderance of the king, as in defrauding him not onelie of his treaſure, but alſo in dooing and practiſing things greatlie preiudiciall to his affaires in France, and namelie by ſetting at libertie the king of Scots, vpon ſo eaſie conditions, as the kings maieſtie greatlie loſt thereby, as in particularities thus followeth.

A complaint made to king Henrie the ſixt, by the duke of Gloceſter, vpon the cardinall of Wincheſter.

Ex Ed.Hall. 143, 144, 145, 146.

1 These be in part, the points and articles, which I Humfrie duke of Gloceſter, for my truth & acquitall, ſaid late, I would giue in writing (my right redoubted lord) vnto your highneſſe, aduertiſing your excellencie, of ſuch things in part, as haue béene doone in your tender age, in derogation of your noble eſtate, and hurt of both your realmes, and yet be doone and vſed dailie.

2 First, the cardinall then being biſhop of Wincheſter, tooke vpon him the ſtate of cardinall, which was naied and denaied him, by the king of moſt noble memorie, my lord your father (whome God aſſoile) ſaieng that he had as léefe ſet his crowne beſide him, as ſée him weare a cardinals hat, he being a cardinall. For he knew full well, the pride and ambition that was in his perſon, then being but a biſhop, ſhould haue ſo greatlie extolled him into more intollerable pride, when that he were a cardinall: and alſo he thought it againſt his fréedome, of the chéefe church of this realme, which, that he worſhipped, as dulie as euer did prince, that bleſſed be his ſoule. And howbeit, that my ſaid lord your father (whome God aſſoile) would haue agréed him to haue had certeine clearks of this land cardinals, and to haue no biſhoprikes in England; yet his intent was neuer to doo ſo great derogation to the church of Canturburie, to make them that were his ſuffragans, to ſit aboue their ordinarie and metropolitan. But the cauſe was that in generall, and in all matters which might concerne the weale of him, and of his realme, he ſhould haue proctors of his nation, as other kings Chriſten had, in the court of Rome, and not to abide in this land, nor to be in anie part of his councels, as béene all the ſpirituall and temporall, at parlements and other great councels, when you liſt to call them. And therefore, though it pleaſe you to doo him that worſhop, to ſet him in your priuie councell after your pleaſure: yet in your parlement, where euerie lord both ſpirituall and temporall, hath his place, he ought to occupie but his place as a biſhop.

3 Item, the ſaid biſhop, now being cardinall, was aſſoiled of his biſhoprike of Wincheſter, wherevpon he ſued vnto our holie father, to haue a bull declaratorie, notwithſtanding he was aſſumpt to the ſtate of cardinall, that the ſée was not void, where in déed it ſtood void by a certeine time, yer the ſaid bull were granted; and ſo he was exempt from his ordinarie, by the taking on him the ſtate of cardinall, and the church biſhoprike of Wincheſter, ſo ſtanding void, he tooke againe of the pope (you not learned thereof ne knowing whereby he was fallen into the caſe of prouiſion) ſo that all his good was lawfullie & cléerelie forfeited to you my right doubted lord, with more; as the ſtatute declareth plainelie for your aduantage.

4 Item, it is not vnknowen to you (doubted lord) how thorough your lands it is noiſed, that the ſaid cardinall and the archbiſhop of Yorke had and haue the gouernance of you, and all your land, the which none of your true liege men ought to vſurpe nor take vpon them. And haue alſo eſtranged me your ſole vncle, my coſine of Yorke, my coſine of Huntington, and manie other lords of your kin, to haue anie knowledge of anie great matter, that might touch your high eſtate, or either of your realmes. And of lords ſpirituall, of right, the archbiſhop of Canturburie ſhould be your chéefe councellor, the which is alſo eſtranged and ſet aſide. And ſo be manie other right ſad lords, and well aduiſed, as well ſpirituall as temporall, to the great hurt of you my right doubted lord, and of your realmes, like as the experience and workes ſhewen cléerelie and euidentlie, more harme it is.

5 Item, in the tender age of you, my right doubted lord, for the neceſſitie of an armie, the ſaid cardinall lent you foure thouſand pounds vpon certeine iewels, priſed at two and twentie thouſand markes, with a letter of ſale, that and they were not quited at a certeine daie, you ſhould léeſe them. The ſaid cardinall ſéeing your monie readie to haue quited your iewels, cauſed your treaſuror of England, at that daie being, to paie the ſame monie, in part of an other armie, in defrauding you my right doubted lord of your ſaid iewels, kéeping them yet alwaie to his owne vſe, to your right great loſſe, and his ſingular profit and auaile.

6 Item, the ſaid cardinall, then being biſhop of Wincheſter, and chancellour of England, deliuered the king of Scots, vpon certeine appointments (as maie be ſhewed) preſumptuouſlie, and of his owne authoritie, contrarie to the act of parlement. I haue heard notable men of law ſay, that they neuer heard the like thing doone among them: which was too great a defamation to your highneſſe, and alſo to wed his néece to the ſaid king, whom that my lord of notable memorie, your father, whome God aſſoile, would neuer haue ſo deliuered. And there as he ſhould haue paid for his coſts fortie thouſand pounds, the ſaid cardinall, chancellour of England, cauſed you to pardon him thereof ten thouſand marks, whereof the greater ſumme he paied you, right a little, what, I report me to your highneſſe.

7 Item, where the ſaid cardinall lent you, my redoubted lord, great and notable ſummes, he hath had and his aſſignes, the rule and profit of the port of Hampton, where the cuſtomers béene his ſeruants, where (by likelihood and as it is to be ſuppoſed) ſtanding the chéefe merchant of the wools of your land, that you be greatlie defrauded, and vnder that rule, what wools and other merchandizes haue béene ſhipped, and maie be from time to time, hard is to eſtéeme, to the great hurt and preiudice of you my right doubted lord, and of all your people.

8 Item, howbeit that the ſaid cardinall hath diuerſe times lent you great ſummes of monie, ſince the time of your reigne, yet his loane hath béene ſo deferred and delaied, that for the moſt part, the conuenable ſeaſon of the imploieng of the good lent was paſſed. So that litle fruit or none came thereof, as by experience both your realmes haue ſufficientlie in knowledge.

9 Item, where there was iewels and plate priſed at eleuen thouſand pounds in weight, of the ſaid cardinall, forfeited to you my right redoubted lord, he gat him a reſtorement thereof for a loane of a little parcell of the ſame: and ſo defrauded you wholie of them, to your great hurt, and his auaile, the which good might greatlie haue eaſed your highneſſe, in ſparing as much of the poore commons.

10 Item, the cardinall being feoff of my ſaid lord your father (whome God aſſoile) againſt his intent, gaue Elizabeth Beauchampe, thrée hundred markes liuelihood, where that his will was, that and ſhe were wedded within a yeare, then to haue it, or elſe not, where in déed it was two or thrée years after, to your great hurt, and diminiſhing of your inheritance.

11 Item, notwithſtanding that the ſaid cardinall hath no maner of authoritie nor intereſt in the crowne, nor none maie haue by anie poſſibilitie; yet he preſumeth and taketh vpon him in partie, your eſtate roiall, in calling before him, into great abuſion of all your land, and derogation of your highneſſe, which hath not béene ſéene nor vſed in no daies heretofore, in greater eſtate than he is, without your expreſſe ordinance and commandement.

12 Item, the ſaid cardinall, nothing conſidering the neceſſitie of you my right doubted lord, hath ſued a pardon of diſmes, that he ſhould paie for the church of Wincheſter, for terme of his life, giuing thereby occaſion to all other lords ſpirituall, to draw their good will for anie neceſſitie, to grant anie diſme: and ſo to laie all the charge vpon the temporaltie, and the poore people.

13 Item, by the gouernance and labour of the ſaid cardinall, and archbiſhop of Yorke, there hath béene loſt and diſpended much notable and great good, by diuerſe ambaſſadors ſent out of this realme. Firſt to Arras, for a feigned colourable peace, whereas by likelineſſe it was thought and ſuppoſed, that it ſhould neuer turne to the effectuall auaile of you my right doubted lord, nor to your ſaid realmes: but vnder colour thereof, was made the peace of your aduerſarie, and the duke of Burgognie. For elſe your partie aduerſe, & the ſaid duke, might not well haue found meanes nor waies to haue communed togither, nor to haue concluded with other their confederations and conſpirations made and wrought there, then, at that time, againſt your highneſſe, whereby you might haue (right doubted lord) the greater partie of your obeiſance, as well in your realme of France, as in your duchie of Normandie, and much other thing gone greatlie, as through the ſaid colourable treatie, & otherwiſe, ſince the death of my brother of Bedford (whome God aſſoile.)

14 Item, now of late was ſent an other ambaſſadour to Calis, by the labour and counſell of the ſaid cardinall, and archbiſhop of Yorke, the cauſe why of the beginning, is to me your ſole vncle, and other lords of your kin and councell vnknowen, to your great charge, and againſt the publike good of your realme; as it openlie appeareth. The which good if it be imploied for the defenſe of your lands, the merchandizes of the ſame might haue had other courſe, and your ſaid lands not to haue ſtand in ſo great miſchéefe as they doo.

15 Item, after that, to your great charge, and hurt of both your realmes, the ſaid cardinall & archbiſhop of Yorke went to your ſaid towne of Calis, and diuerſe lords of your kin, and of your councell in their fellowſhip, and there, as there was naturall warre betwéene the duke of Orleance, and the duke of Burgognie, for murther of their fathers, a capitall enimitie like to haue indured for euer: the ſaid cardinall and archbiſhop of Yorke licenced and ſuffered the ſaid duke of Orleance, to intreat and common apart with the councell of your ſaid aduerſaries, as well as with the duchies of Burgognie: by which meane the peace and aliance was made betwéene the two dukes, to the greateſt fortifieng of your ſaid capitall aduerſaries that could be thought, and conſequentlie (my deere redoubted lord) to your greateſt charge, and hurt to both your realmes. Vnder colour of which treatie, your ſaid aduerſaries in meane time wan your citie of Meaux, and the countrie thereabout, and manie diuerſe roades made into your duchie of Normandie, to the great noiſance and deſtruction of your people, as it ſheweth openlie.

16 Item, the ſaid archbiſhop of Yorke, ſent with other into this your realme from the ſaid cardinall, after communication had with your aduerſe partie, at your ſaid towne of Calis, made at his comming into your notable preſence at Windeſor, all the ſuaſions and colour, all motions in the moſt apparant wiſe that he could, to induce your highneſſe to your agréement, to the deſires of your capitall aduerſaries, as I ſaw there in your noble preſence of his writing, at which time (as I vnderſtood) it was his ſingular opinion, that is to ſaie: that you ſhould leaue your right, your title, and your honour of your crowne, and nomination of you king of France, during certeine yeares, & that you ſhould vtterlie abſteine you and be content onelie in writing, with Rex Angliæ, &c: to the great note of infamie that euer fell to you or anie of your noble progenitours, ſince the taking of them firſt, the ſaid title and right of your realme and crowne of France. To which matter in your preſence there, after that it had liked your ſaid highneſſe, to aſke mine aduiſe there vpon, with other of your blood and councell; I anſwerd and ſaid, that I would neuer agrée me thereto to die therfore, and of the ſame diſpoſition I am yet, and will be while I liue in conſeruation of your honour, and of your oth made vnto your ſaid crowne, in time of your coronation there.

17 Item, the ſaid cardinall and archbiſhop of Yorke, haue ſo laboured vnto your highneſſe, that you ſhould intend to a new daie of conuention, in March or Aprill next comming, where it is noiſed to be more againſt your worſhip than with it. And where it was euident to all the world, that the rupture and breaking of the ſaid peace, ſhould haue fallen heretofore, of your aduerſe partie; becauſe of the great vntruths. Now by that meanes it is like peraduenture to be laid vnto the verie great ſlander of you my doubted lord, like to come to none other purpoſe nor effect, than other conuentions haue doone afore time: and ſo by ſubtilties and counſell of your ſaid enimies, your land (they in hope and truſt of the ſaid treatie, not mightilie nor puiſſantlie purueied for) ſhall be like vnder the colour of the ſame treatie to be burnt vp and deſtroied, loſt, and vtterlie turned from your obeiſance.

18 Item it is ſaid, that the deliuerance of the ſaid duke of Orleance, is vtterlie appointed by the mediation, counſell, and ſtirring of the ſaid cardinall and archbiſhop of Yorke; and for that cauſe diuerſe perſons béene come from your aduerſaries, into this your realme, and the ſaid duke alſo brought to your citie of London, where as my lord your father (whom God aſſoile) peiſing ſo greatlie the inconueniences, and harme that might fall, onlie by his deliuerance, concluded, ordeined, and determined in his laſt will, vtterlie in his wiſedome, his conqueſt in his realme of France. And yet then it is to de doone, by as great deliberation, ſolemnitie and ſuertie, as may be deuiſed or thought. And ſéeing now the diſpoſition of your realme of France, the puiſſance and might of your enimies, and what aid they haue gotten againſt you there, aſwell vnder the colour of the ſaid treatie, as otherwiſe; what may or ought to be thought or ſaid, for that laboring the ſaid duke (all things conſidered) by ſuch particular perſons, the lords of your blood not called thervnto, I report me vnto your noble grace and excellencie, and vnto the ſaid wiſe true men of this your realme.

19 Item, where that euerie true councellor, ſpeciallie vnto anie king or prince, ought of truth and of dutie, to counſell, promote, increaſe, prefer, and aduance the weale and proſperitie of his lord: the ſaid cardinall, being of your councell (my right doubted lord) hath late purchaſed of your highneſſe, certeine great lands and liuelode: as the caſtell and lordſhip of Chirke in Wales, and other lands in this your realme; vnto which I was called ſuddenlie, and ſo in eſchewing the breaking and loſſe of your armies then againe, ſéeing none other remedie, gaue therevnto mine aſſent, thinking that who that euer laboured, moued or ſtirred the matter firſt vnto your lordſhip, counſelled you neither for your worſhip nor profit.

20 More, the ſaid cardinall hath you bound apart, to make him a ſure eſtate of all the ſaid lands, by Eaſter next comming, as could be deuiſed by anie learned counſell; or elſe that ſuertie not made, the ſaid cardinall to haue and reioy to him, and his heirs for euermore, the lands of the duchie of Lancaſter, in Norffolke, to the value of ſeuen or eight hundred marks by yeare. Which thing ſéemeth right ſtrange and vnſéene, and vnhard waies of anie liege man, to ſéeke vpon his ſouereigne lord, both in his inheritance and in his iewels and goods. For it is thought, but if right and extreame neceſſitie cauſed it, there ſhould, nor ought no ſuch things to be doone: from which neceſſitie God (for his mercie) euer preſerue your noble perſon. Wherfore my redoubted lord, ſéeing that ye ſhould be ſo counſelled, or ſtirred to leaue your crowne and inheritance in England; and alſo by fraud and ſubtill meanes, as is afore rehearſed, ſo to loſe your iewels: in my truth and in mine acquitall (as me ſéemeth) I may not nor ought not counſell ſo great an hurt to you and to all your land.

21 Item, it is not vnknowen to you my right doubted lord, how oftentimes I haue offered my ſeruice, to and for the defenſe of your realme of France, and duchie of Normandie, where I haue béene put therefro by the labour of the ſaid cardinall, in preferring other after his ſingular affection. Which hath cauſed a great part of the ſaid duchie of Normandie, aſwell as of your realme of France to be loſt, as it is well knowen. And what good (my right doubted lord) was loſt on that armie that was laſt ſent thither, which the earle of Mortaigne, your councell of France, hath well & cléerelie declared to your highneſſe here before?

22 Item, my right doubted lord, it is not vnknowen, that it had not béene poſſible to the ſaid cardinall, to haue come to his great riches, but by ſuch meanes, for of his church it might not riſe, and inheritance he had none. Wherfore my right doubted lord, ſith there is great good behouefull at this time, for the weale and ſafegard of your realmes, the pouertie, neceſſitie, & indigence of your liege people; in highneſſe vnderſtand, like it vnto your noble grace, to conſider the ſaid lucre of the ſaid cardinall, and the great deceipts that you be receiued in by the labour of him & of the archbiſhop, aſwell in this your realme as in your realme of France and duchie of Normandie, where neither office, liuelode, nor capteine may be had, without too great good giuen vnto him, wherby a great part of all the loſſe that is loſt, they haue béene the cauſers of; for who that would giue moſt, his was the price, not conſidering the merits, ſeruice, nor ſufficiance of perſons. Furthermore, it is greatlie to be conſidered, how, when the ſaid cardinall had forfeited all his goods, bicauſe of prouiſion, as the ſtatute thervpon more plainelie declareth; by hauing the rule of you my right doubted lord, purchaſed himſelfe in great defraudation of your highneſſe, a charter of pardon, the which good and it had be well gouerned, might manie yeares haue ſuſteined your warres, without anie tallage of your poore people.

23 Item, my redoubted lord, whereas I write much thing for the weale of you and of your realms, peraduenture ſome will ſaie and vnderſtand, that I would or haue written by waie of accuſement of all your councell, which God knoweth, I doo not: for your highneſſe may well ſée, that I name them that be cauſers of the ſaid inordinate rule. Wherfore, conſidering that the ſaid cardinall and archbiſhop of Yorke béene they, that pretend the gouernance of you, and of your realmes and lordſhips: pleaſe it vnto your highneſſe, of your rightwiſeneſſe to eſtrange them of your councell, to that intent, that men may be at their fréedome, to ſay what they thinke of truth.

24 For truth, I dare ſpeake of my truth, the poore dare not doo ſo. And if the cardinall and the archbiſhop of Yorke, may afterward declare themſelues, of that is, and ſhalbe ſaid of them; you my right doubted lord may then reſtore them againe to your councell, at your noble pleaſure.

When the king had heard the accuſations thus laid by the duke of Glouceſter againſt the cardinall, he committed the examination thereof to his councell, whereof the more part were ſpirituall perſons; ſo that what for feare, and what for fauour, the matter was winked at, and nothing ſaid to it: onelie faire countenance was made to the duke, as though no malice had béene conceiued againſt him. But venem will breake out, & inward grudge will ſoone appeare, which was this yeare to all men apparant: for diuers ſecret attempts were aduanced forward this ſeaſon againſt this noble man Humfreie duke of Glouceſter a far off, which in concluſion came ſo néere, that they bereft him both of life and land; as ſhall hereafter more plainelie appéere.

For firſt this yeare, dame Eleanor Cobham, wife to the ſaid duke, was accuſed of treaſon; for that ſhe by ſorcerie and inchantment intended to deſtroie the king, to the intent to aduance hir husband vnto the crowne. Upon this, ſhe was examined in ſaint Stephans chappell before the biſhop of Canturburie, and there by examination conuict, and iudged to dóo open penance in thrée open places within the citie of London. [Polychronicon ſaith ſhe was inioined to go through Cheapſide with a taper in hir hand] and after that adiudged to perpetuall impriſonment in the Ile of Man, vnder the kéeping of ſir Iohn Stanlie knight. At the ſame ſeaſon were arreſted, arreigned, and adiudged giltie, as aiders to the ducheſſe, Thomas Southwell prieſt, and canon of S. Stephans at Weſtminſter, Iohn Hun prieſt, Roger Bolingbroke a cunning necromancer (as it was ſaid) and Margerie Iordeine, ſurnamed the witch of Eie.

Abr. Fl. ex Polychron.

Alias Iohn Ham.

The matter laid againſt them, was for that they (at the requeſt of the ſaid ducheſſe) had deuiſed an image of wax, repreſenting the king, which by their ſorcerie by little and little conſumed, intending thereby in concluſion to waſte and deſtroie the kings perſon. Margerie Iordeine was burnt in Smithfield, and Roger Bolingbroke was drawne to Tiborne, and hanged and quartered; taking vpon his death that there was neuer anie ſuch thing by them imagined. Iohn Hun had his pardon, and Southwell died in the Tower the night before his execution: [for (ſaith Polychr.) he did propheſie of himſelfe, that he ſhould die in his bed, and not by iuſtice.] The duke of Gloceſter bare all theſe things patientlie, and ſaid little. Edward ſonne to the duke of Yorke was borne this yeare the nine and twentith of Aprill at Rone, his father being the kings lieutenant in Normandie. ¶ In this yeare was a great fraie in Fléetſtréet in the night time, betwéene gentlemen of courts and inhabitants of London; inſomuch that much bloud was ſpilt, diuerſe ſlaine outright, and ſome mortallie wounded; beſides great harme otherwiſe dóone and ſuffered.]

¶ Upon the daie of the tranſlation of ſaint Edward, or the twelfth of October, vpon which daie the maior and his brethren for the yeare following, and daie when the commoners of the citie, after their ancient cuſtome had choſen two aldermen, ſuch as before had béene ſhiriffes of London and of Middleſex, namelie Robert Clopton draper, and Raſe Holland tailor, and them preſented by name vnto the maior and his brethren, then ſitting in the vtter chamber where the maiors courts be kept, to the intent that the ſaid maior and his brethren might chóoſe one of the ſaid two, ſuch as they thought moſt neceſſarie and worſhipfull for the róome; the ſaid maior and his brethren chóoſing Robert Clopton, brought him after downe vpon his right hand towards the hall. Whereof when certeine tailors there preſent were aware, and ſaw that Raſe Holland was not choſen, anon they cried; Nay, nay: not this, but Raſe Holland. Therewith the old maior being aſtoniſhed, ſtóod ſtill vpon the ſtaire, and commanded them to kéepe ſilence, and ſo held on his waie to the eaſt end of the hall, where he ſat him downe, and his brethren about him. In the meane time, the ſaid tailors continued their crie, and incenſed others of baſe trades of the citie (as ſimple perſons) to take their part, and to crie as faſt as they, not proffering to ceaſe their miſrule for all that the maior could ſaie, no nor yet when the maiors ſergeant at armes had cried O-yes. Herevpon the maior, to appeaſe the rumor, ſent downe the ſhiriffes, and commanded them to take the offendors, and ſend them to the goale; which precept was fulfilled, & about twelue or ſixtéene of the principall committed to Newgate, where ſome of them abode a long time impriſoned; and others that were fined ſet at libertie. This is reported by Polychronicon, but in ſomewhat a differing maner.]

Anno Reg. 21.

The councell of England forgat not the late enterpriſe of the French king, atchiued in the duchie of of Guien, and therefore doubting ſome other the like attempt, they ſent thither ſir William Woduile with eight hundred men, to ſtrengthen the frontiers, and further, ſet forth a proclamation, that all men which would tranſport anie corne, chéeſe, or other vittels thither, ſhould paie no maner of cuſtome or tallage: which licence cauſed the countrie of Aquitaine to be well furniſhed of all things neceſſarie. About this ſeaſon Iohn the valiant lord Talbot for his approued proweſſe and wiſdome, aſwell in England as in France, both in peace & warre ſo well tried, was created earle of Shreweſburie, and with a companie of thrée thouſand men ſent againe into Normandie, for the better defenſe of the ſame.

Iohn lord Talbot created earle of Shreweſburie.

*This yéere died Lodowike or Lewes Liſchburne, biſhop of Elie, being the fiue and twentith that inioied that place, who came to the ſame after this maner. After the death of Philip Morgan biſhop of that ſée, the móonks of Elie choſe for their paſtor Robert fitz Hugh biſhop of London; but he dieng at ſaint Oſées before his confirmation, neuer poſſeſſed the honour thereof. Wherevpon the king directed his letters to the couent of Elie, to make election of Thomas Rudburne (biſhop of S. Dauids in Wales) for their biſhop. But they contrarie therevnto (taking it now for a cuſtome, hauing ſo often vſed it before, as did well appeare) made choiſe of Thomas Bourchier (borne of a noble houſe, ſonne to the counteſſe of Stafford, chancellor of Oxenford, and biſhop of Worceſter) to ſuccéed Philip Morgan. Which Bourchier, the king (offended with the móonkes for the little regard had to his requeſt) vtterlie refuſed, and would not admit him vnto that place. Wherevpon there were buls procured from Eugenius the fourth (then biſhop of Rome) which were ſent into England to confirme the election of the ſaid Bourchier.

But he wiſelie fearing to fall into the dangerous ſtatute of Premunire, durſt not receiue or execute the tenor of the popes commandement. By reaſon whereof, leaſt the ſée might otherwiſe remaine void, (if ſpéedie remedie were not prouided) the king did in commendam beſtow the biſhoprike of Elie vpon this Lodowike Liſchburne archbiſhop of Rone, by office, Card. 4. Coronat. Cancellar. Francia & Normannia, and kinſman to the ſaid king. Which dóone, Eugenius (when he ſaw no other remedie) did reuoke his buls made before to Thomas Bourchier, in the yeare of Chriſt 1437. This Lodowike remaining biſhop ſix yeares and ſo manie moneths, died in the yeare as before, the eightéenth of September, at his manor of Hatfield, whoſe bowels were buried in the ſaid church: his hart was caried to Rone, and there honourablie intóomed, and his bodie was committed to the earth, in the church of Elie, betwéene two marble pillors next to the altar of the relikes.]

In this yeare died in Guien the counteſſe of Comings, to whome the French king and alſo the earle of Arminacke pretended to be heire, in ſo much that the earle entred into all the lands of the ſaid ladie. And bicauſe he knew the French king would not take the matter well, to haue a Rouland for an Oliuer; he ſent ſolemne ambaſſadours to the king of England, offering him his daughter in mariage, with promiſe to be bound (beſide great ſummes of monie, which he would giue with hir) to deliuer into the king of Englands hands, all ſuch caſtels and townes, as he or his anceſtors deteined from him within anie part of the duchie of Aquitaine, either by conqueſt of his progenitors, or by gift and deliuerie of anie French king; and further to aid the ſame king with monie for the recouerie of other cities within the ſame duchie, from the French king; or from anie other perſon that againſt king Henrie vniuſtlie kept, and wrongfullie withholden them.

The erle with his ladie, his ſonne and two daughters taken.

This offer ſeemed ſo profitable and alſo honorable to king Henrie and the realme, that the ambaſſadours were well heard, honourablie receiued, and with rewards ſent home into their countrie. After whome were ſent for the concluſion of the marriage into Guien, ſir Edward Hull, ſir Robert Ros, and John Gralton deane of S. Seuerines, the which (as all the chronographers agree) both concluded the mariage, and by proxie affied the yong ladie. The French king not a little offended herewith, ſent his eldeſt ſonne Lewes the Dolphin of Vienne into Rouergue with a puiſſant armie, which tooke the earle and his yongeſt ſonne, with both his daughters, and by force obteined the countries of Arminacke, Louuergne, Rouergue, and Mouleſſonois, beſide the cities Seuerac & Cadeac, chaſing the baſtard of Arminacke out of his countries, and ſo by reaſon hereof, the concluded mariage was deferred, and that ſo long that it neuer tooke effect; as hereafter it may appeare.

A law againſt buieng and ſelling on the ſundaie.

¶ In this yeare was an act made by authoritie of the common councell of London, that vpon the ſundaie no maner of thing within the franchiſes and liberties of the ſaid citie ſhould be bought or ſold; neither vittels nor other thing. It was alſo enacted by the ſame common councell with full conſent, and ratified by the authoritie of the law-makers, that no artificer or handicrafts man ſhould bring his wares, commodities, or worke, vnto anie perſon or perſons to be worne or occupied on that daie: bicauſe it was iudged a foule prophanation thereof. And peoples minds giuen to couetouſneſſe, make no exception of times or places in a caſe of aduantage and gaine. In conſideration whereof, and for the ſuppreſſing of this abuſe, this law was ordeined and made: the force whereof did principallie extend to tailors and ſhoomakers (who as on that daie bring home their garments and ſhoos to the parties for whome they are made) and likewiſe to all other occupations and trades. But this ordinance (ſaith mine author) was too good for ſo bad an age, and therefore died within a ſhort time after the magiſtrate had giuen it life.

Paules ſteeple burnt.

¶ On Candlemaſſe eeue this yeere by lightning in a tempeſt that fell with claps of thunder at afternoone, Paules ſteeple was ſet on fier in the middeſt of the ſpeare or ſhaft in the verie timber worke; which was quenched by the painfulneſſe of diuerſe perſons, and ſpecialie by the diligent labour of a preeſt of Bow in Cheape. Howbeit the ſame was thought vnpoſſible to be quenched, but that the grace of God was cheefe worker in the ſame. This ſteeple hath diuerſe times beene ouerthrowne and defaced, partlie by winds, and partlie by lightning, as may be obſerued in the reading of this volume: yea when the ſame hath beene repared by the choiſeſt workemen, and of the ſubſtantialleſt ſtuffe, and all meanes (that ſtood with the deepe deuiſe of man) vſed to make it ſo ſure that it might continue, as a monument of perpetuitie for poſteritie to woonder at and admire. But to returne to the hiſtorie.

Anno Reg. 22.

The diet at Tours for a peace to be had betweene England and France.

Whileſt England was vnquieted (as you haue heard) and France by ſpoile, ſlaughter, and burning ſore defaced (a miſcheefe in all places much lamented) therefore to agree the two puiſſant kings, all the princes of chriſtendome trauelled ſo effectuouſlie by their oratours and ambaſſadours, that a diet was appointed to be kept at the citie of Tours in Touraine; where for the king of England appeared William de la Poole earle of Suffolke, doctor Adam Molins keeper of the kings priuie ſeale, alſo ſir Robert Ros, and diuers other. And for the French king were appointed Charles duke of Orleance, Lewes de Bourbon earle of Vandoſme, great maiſter of the French kings houſhold, Piers de Breſſe ſteward of Poictou, and Bertram Beauuan lord of Preſignie.

There were alſo ſent thither ambaſſadours from the empire, from Spaine, from Denmarke, & from Hungarie; to be mediatours betwixt the two princes. The aſſemblie was great, but the coſt was much greater, inſomuch that euerie part for the honour of their prince and praiſe of their countrie, ſet forth themſelues, as well in fare as apparell, to the vttermoſt. Manie meetings were had, and manie things mooued for a finall peace: but in concluſion, by reaſon of manie doubts which roſe on both parties, no full concord could be agreed vpon; but in hope to come to a peace, a certeine truce, as well by ſea as by land, was concluded by the commiſſioners for eighteene moneths, which afterward againe was prolonged to the yeare of our Lord 1449.

A truce for 18 moneths.

In treating of this truce, the earle of Suffolke aduenturing ſomewhat vpon his commiſſion, without the aſſent of his aſſociats, imagined, that the next waie to come to a perfect peace, was to contriue a mariage betweene the French kings kinſewoman, the ladie Margaret daughter to Reiner duke of Aniou, and his ſouereigne lord king Henrie. This Reiner duke of Aniou named himſelfe king of Sicill, Naples, and Jeruſalem, hauing onlie the name and ſtile of thoſe realmes; without anie penie, profit, or foot of poſſeſſion. This mariage was made ſtrange to the earle at the firſt, and one thing ſeemed to be a great hinderance to it; which was, bicauſe the king of England occupied a great part of the duchie of Aniou, and the whole countie of Maine, apperteining (as was alledged) to king Reiner.

The earle of Suffolke (I cannot ſaie) either corrupted with bribes, or too much affectioned to this vnprofitable mariage, condeſcended, that the duchie of Aniou and the countie of Maine ſhould be deliuered to the king the brides father, demanding for hir mariage neither penie nor farthing: as who would ſaie, that this new affinitie paſſed all riches, and excelled both gold and pretious ſtones. And to the intent that of this truce might inſue a finall concord, a daie of enterview was appointed betweene the two kings in a place conuenient betweene Chartres and Rone. When theſe things were concluded, the earle of Suffolke with his companie returned into England, where he forgat not to declare what an honourable truce he had taken, out of the which there was a great hope that a finall peace might grow the ſooner for that honorable mariage, which he had concluded, omitting nothing that might extoll and ſet forth the perſonage of the ladie, or the nobilitie of hir kinred.

The protector miſliked this ſecond motion of the kings mariage.

But although this mariage pleaſed the king and diuerſe of his councell, yet Humfrie duke of Gloceſter protector of the realme was much againſt it, alledging that it ſhould be both contrarie to the lawes of God, and diſhonorable to the prince, if he ſhould breake that promiſe and contract of mariage, made by ambaſſadours ſufficientlie thereto inſtructed, with the daughter of the earle of Arminacke, vpon conditions both to him and his realme, as much profitable as honorable. But the dukes words could not be heard, for the earles doings were onelie liked and allowed. So that for performance of the concluſions, the French king ſent the earle of Vandoſme, great maiſter of his houſe, and the archbiſhop of Reimes firſt peere of France, and diuerſe other into England, where they were honorablie receiued; and after that the inſtruments were once ſealed and deliuered on both parts, the ſaid ambaſſadours returned againe into their countries with great gifts and rewards.

When theſe things were doone, the king both for honour of his realme, and to aſſure to himſelfe mo freends, created Iohn Holland earle of Huntington duke of Exceſter as his father was: Humfrie earle of Stafford was made duke of Buckingham: and Henrie earle of Warwike was elected to the title of duke of Warwike, to whome the king alſo gaue the caſtell of Briſtowe, with the Ile of Ierneſeie, and Garneſeie. Alſo the earle of Suffolke was made marqueſſe of Suffolke, which marqueſſe with his wife and manie honorable perſonages of men and women richlie adorned both with apparell & iewels, hauing with them manie coſtlie chariots and gorgeous horſlitters, ſailed into France for the conueiance of the nominated queene into the realme of England. For king Reiner hir father, for all his long ſtile had too ſhort a purſſe to ſend his daughter honorablie to the king hir ſpouſe.

Creations of eſtates.

Anno Reg.23.
1445

This noble companie came to the citie of Tours in Touraine, where they were honorablie receiued both of the French king and of the king of Sicill. The marqueſſe of Suffolke as procurator to king Henrie, eſpouſed the ſaid ladie in the church of ſaint Martins. At the which mariage were preſent the father and mother of the bride; the French king himſelfe, which was vncle to the huſband; and the French queene alſo, which was aunt to the wife. There were alſo the dukes of Orleance, of Calabre, of Alanſon, and of Britaine, ſeauen earls, twelue barons, twentie biſhops, beſide knights and gentlemen. When the feaſt, triumph, bankets and iuſts were ended, the ladie was deliuered to the marqueſſe, who in great eſtate conueied hir through Normandie vnto Diepe, and ſo tranſported hir into England, where ſhe landed at Porteſmouth in the moneth of Aprill. This ladie excelled all other, as well in beautie and fauour, as in wit and policie, and was of ſtomach and courage more like to a man than a woman.

Margaret daughter to Reiner K. of Sicill & Ieruſalem maried to Henrie the ſixt. Abr. Fl. ex Polychron.

Shortlie after hir arriuall, ſhe was conueied to the towne of Southwike in Hamſhire, where ſhe with all nuptiall ceremonies was coupled in matrimonie to king Henrie the ſixt of that name. ¶ On the eighteenth of Maie ſhe came to London, all the lords of England in moſt ſumptuous ſort meeting and receiuing hir vpon the waie, and ſpeciallie the duke of Gloceſter with ſuch honour as ſtood with the dignitie of his perſon. Now when ſhe came to Blackheath, the maior, aldermen, and men of occupations, in blew gownes imbrodered with ſome deuiſe, expreſſing their art and trades whereby to be knowne, did all ſhew themſelues, with congratulation of hir comming; from whence they attended hir to London, where with goodlie pageants and ſundrie gallant hiſtoricall ſhewes in diuers places erected, ſhe was verie magnificallie welcomed. The maner and order of which pompe in ſundrie places exhibited to the high honour of the king, queene, & ſtates, is verie amplie ſet foorth by Fabian, pag. 423, 424, 425, 426, 427. Vpon the thirtith of Maie next following, ſhe was crowned queene of this realme of England at Weſtminſter, with all the ſolemnitie thereto apperteining.]

An ominous mariage.

This mariage ſeemed to manie both infortunate and vnprofitable to the realme of England, and that for manie cauſes. Firſt, the king had not one penie with hir; and for the fetching of hir, the marqueſſe of Suffolke demanded a whole fifteenth in open parlement. And alſo there was deliuered for hir the duchie of Aniou, the citie of Mans, and the whole countie of Maine, which countries were the verie ſtaies and backeſtands to the duchie of Normandie. And furthermore, the earle of Arminacke tooke ſuch diſpleaſure with the king of England for this mariage, that he became vtter enimie to the crowne of England, and was the cheefe cauſe that the Engliſhmen were expelled out of the whole duchie of Aquitaine.

But moſt of all it ſhould ſeeme, that God was diſpleaſed with this mariage: for after the confirmation thereof, the kings freends fell from him, both in England and in France, the lords of his realme fell at diuiſion, and the commons rebelled in ſuch ſort, that finallie after manie fields foughten, and manie thouſands of men ſlaine, the king at length was depoſed, and his ſonne killed, and this queene ſent home againe, with as much miſerie and ſorrow as ſhe was receiued with pompe and triumph: ſuch is the inſtabilitie of worldlie felicitie, and ſo wauering is falſe flattering fortune. Which mutation and change of the better for the worſe could not but nettle and ſting hir with penſiueneſſe, yea and anie other perſon whatſoeuer, that hauing beene in good eſtate, falleth into the contrarie: whereto the ſaieng of the poet giueth credit, in theſe few words following;

Quem res plus nimio delectauêre ſecundæ,
Mutatæ quatiunt.

Ouid. 2. de art.

This yeare, after the deceaſſe of Henrie Chicheleie archbiſhop of Canturburie, ſucceeded Iohn Stafford in that ſee, being tranſlated from Bath and Wels. He was the threeſcore and one archbiſhop, as Polydor noteth. During the time of the truce, Richard duke of Yorke and diuerſe other capteins repaired into England, both to viſit their wiues, children, and freends, and alſo to conſult what ſhould be doone, if the truce ended. For the which cauſe a parlement was called, in the which it was eſpeciallie concluded, that by good foreſight Normandie might be ſo furniſhed for defenſe before the end of the truce, that the French king ſhould take no aduantage through want of timelie prouiſion: for it was knowne, that if a peace were not concluded, the French king did prepare to imploie his whole puiſſance to make open warre. Heere vpon monie was granted, an armie leuied, and the duke of Summerſet appointed to be regent of Normandie, and the duke of Yorke thereof diſcharged.

Anno Reg.24.

The duke of Summerſet made regent of Normãdie, and the duke of Yorke diſcharged.

I haue ſeene in a regiſter booke belonging ſometime to the abbeie of ſaint Albons, that the duke of of Yorke was eſtabliſhed regent of France, after the deceaſſe of the duke of Bedford, to continue in that office for the tearme of fiue yeares; which being expired, he returned home, and was ioifullie receiued of the king with thanks for his good ſeruice, as he had full well deſerued in time of that his gouernement: and further, that now when a new regent was to be choſen and ſent ouer, to abide vpon ſafegard of the countries beyond the ſeas as yet ſubiect to the Engliſh dominion, the ſaid duke of Yorke was eftſoones (as a man moſt meet to ſupplie that roome) appointed to go ouer againe, as regent of France with all his former allowances.

The duke of Yorke appointed to ÿ charge againe.

But the duke of Summerſet ſtill maligning the duke of Yorkes aduancement, as he had ſought to hinder his diſpatch at the firſt when he was ſent ouer to be regent, as before ye haue heard: he likewiſe now wrought ſo, that the king reuoked his grant made to the duke of Yorke for enioieng of that office the terme of other fiue yeeres, and with helpe of William marqueſſe of Suffolke obteined that grant for himſelfe. Which malicious deling the duke of Yorke might ſo euill beare, that in the end the heate of diſpleaſure burſt out into ſuch a flame, as conſumed at length not onelie both thoſe two noble perſonages, but alſo manie thouſands of others, though in diuers times and ſeaſons, as in places hereafter (as occaſion ſerueth) it ſhall more euidentlie appeare. But now to returne to the parlement.

The appointmẽt diſappointed, and pointed to the marqueſſe of Suffolke.

The marques of Suffolke, ſuppoſing all men had as well liked his doings (during the time of his legation in France) as himſelfe, the ſecond daie of Iune

The marques of Suffolks requeſt.

Iune in the firſt ſeſſion of this parlement, in the higher houſe openlie, eloquentlie, and boldlie declared his paine, trauell, and diligence ſuſteined in his ſaid legation, as well for the taking and concluding an abſtinence of warre, as in the making of the mariage; remembring them alſo that the ſaid truce expired the firſt of Aprill next, except a finall peace, or a further truce were concluded in the meane ſeaſon: and therefore he aduiſed them to prouide and foreſée things neceſſarie for the warre (as though no concord ſhould ſuccéed) leaſt happilie the Frenchmen perceiuing them vnprouided, would take their aduantage, and agrée neither to peace nor amitie; ſaieng vnto them further, that ſith he had admoniſhed the king and them according to his dutie, if anie thing happened otherwiſe than well, he was thereof innocent and guiltleſſe, and had acquited himſelfe like a true and louing ſubiect, and a faithfull councellour, praieng the lords to haue it in remembrance.

Likewiſe on the morow after, he deſcended into the common houſe, accompanied with certeine lords, and there declared the ſame matter to the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, praieng the commons for his diſcharge, that as well all his dooings and procéedings in the kings affaires beyond the ſea, as alſo his aduertiſement and counſell opened to the lords and commons now togither aſſembled, might be by the king and them inacted and inrolled in the records of the parlement. Wherevpon the next daie after, the ſpeaker William Burghleie, and the companie of the lower houſe, repaired vnto the kings preſence, ſitting amongſt the lords of the vpper houſe, & there humblie required that the requeſt of the marqueſſe might be granted. And ſo likewiſe the lords made the like petition knéeling on their knées, inſomuch that the king condeſcended to their deſires: and ſo the labours, demeanours, diligences, and declarations of the ſaid marqueſſe, togither with the deſires not onelie of the lords, but alſo of the commons, as well for the honour of him and his poſteritie, as for his acquitall and diſcharge, were inacted and inrolled in the records of the parlement.

The marques of Suffolke, chéefeſt in fauour and authoritie with the king and quéene.

By the quéenes meanes ſhortlie after alſo was the ſaid marqueſſe aduanced ſo in authoritie, that he ruled the king at his pleaſure, and to his high preferment obteined the wardſhips both of the bodie and lands of the counteſſe of Warwike, and of the ladie Margaret ſole heire to Iohn duke of Summerſet, which ladie was afterward mother to king Henrie the ſeauenth: and beſides that, cauſed the king to create Iohn de Fois, ſonne vnto Gaſton de Fois, earle of Longuile, and the Capdau de Beuſe earle of Kendall, which Iohn had married his néece, and by his procurement the king elected to the order of the garter the ſaid Gaſton, and Iohn his ſonne, giuing to the ſonne towards the maintenance of his degrée, lands and caſtels, amounting to the ſumme of one thouſand pounds, which lands, name, and ſtile the iſſue and line of the ſaid earle of Kendall at this daie haue and inioy.

Theſe things being thus in dooing, the French king, ſéeing that the towne of Mans was not deliuered according to the appointment taken by force of the marriage, raiſed an armie for to recouer the ſame. Whereof the king of England being aduertiſed (leaſt the breach of the truce ſhould come by him) cauſed the towne to be deliuered without anie force.

A commotion in Norwich.

This yeare was a great commotion in Norwich againſt the prior of the place. At length the citizens opened the gates to the duke of Norffolke, who came thither to appeaſe the matter, though at the firſt they would not ſuffer him to enter. The chéefe offendors were (according to their demerits) gréeuouſlie puniſhed and executed, and the maior was diſcharged of his office, and ſir Iohn Clifton was made gouernour there, vntill the king had reſtored the citizens to their ancient liberties. This commotion was begun for certeine new exactions which the prior claimed and tooke of the citizens, contrarie to their ancient fréedome. But herein a wrong taken for getting of right was worthilie corrected.

The liberties of Norwich ſeized into the kings hands. Indirect meanes to reforme wrongs.

Combats in caſes of appeales touching treaſon.

Drunkenneſſe the ouerthrow of right and manhood.

¶ In the foure and twentith yeare of this kings reigne, the prior of Kilmaine appeached the earle of Ormond of treaſon. For triall whereof the place of combat was aſſigned in Smithfield, & the barriers for the ſame there readie pitcht. Howbeit, in the meane time a doctor of diuinitie, named maiſter Gilbert Worthington, parſon of ſaint Andrews in Holborne, and other honeſt men, made ſuch ſute with diligent labour and paines-taking to the kings councell, that when the daie of combat approched, the quarell was taken into the kings hands, and there ended. ¶ In the ſame yeare alſo, a certeine armourer was appeached of treaſon by a ſeruant of his owne. For proofe whereof a daie was giuen them to fight in Smithfield, inſomuch that in conflict the ſaid armourer was ouercome and ſlaine; but yet by miſgouerning of himſelfe. For on the morow, when he ſhould come to the field freſh and faſting, his neighbours came to him, and gaue him wine and ſtrong drinke in ſuch exceſſiue ſort, that he was therewith diſtempered, and réeled as he went, and ſo was ſlaine without guilt. As for the falſe ſeruant, he liued not long vnpuniſhed; for being conuict of felonie in court of aſſiſe, he was iudged to be hanged, and ſo was, at Tiburne.

Anno Reg. 25

Whileſt the warres betwéene the two nations of England & France ceaſſed (by occaſion of the truce) the minds of men were not ſo quiet, but that ſuch as were bent to malicious reuenge, ſought to compaſſe their prepenſed purpoſe, not againſt forren foes and enimies of their countrie, but againſt their owne countrie men, and thoſe that had deſerued verie well of the common-wealth: and this ſpeciallie for ouermuch mildneſſe in the king, who by his authoritie might haue ruled both parts, and ordered all differences betwixt them, but that in déed he was thought too ſoft for gouernor of a kingdome. The quéene contrariwiſe, a ladie of great wit, and no leſſe courage, deſirous of honour, and furniſhed with the gifts of reaſon, policie, and wiſedome; but yet ſometime (according to hir kind) when ſhe had béene fullie bent on a matter, ſuddenlie like a weather cocke, mutable and turning.

The deſcription of the quéene.

This ladie diſdaining that hir huſband ſhould be ruled rather than rule, could not abide that the duke of Gloceſter ſhould doo all things concerning the order of weightie affaires, leaſt it might be ſaid, that ſhe had neither wit nor ſtomach, which would permit and ſuffer hir huſband being of moſt perfect age, like a yoong pupill to be gouerned by the direction of an other man. Although this toy entered firſt into hir braine thorough hir owne imagination, yet was ſhe pricked forward to the matter both by ſuch of hir huſbands counſell, as of long time had borne malice to the duke for his plainneſſe vſed in declaring their vntruth (as partlie ye haue heard) and alſo by counſell from king Reiner hir father, aduiſing that ſhe and the king ſhould take vpon them the rule of the realme, and not to be kept vnder, as wards and maſtered orphanes.

The quéene taketh vpon hir the gouernement, and diſchargeth the duke of Gloceſter.

What néedeth manie words? The quéene perſuaded by theſe meanes, firſt of all excluded the duke of Gloceſter from all rule and gouernance, not prohibiting ſuch as ſhe knew to be his mortall foes to inuent and imagine cauſes and gréefs againſt him and his, inſomuch that by hir procurement, diuerſe noble men conſpired againſt him. The faint quarell piked to the duke of Gloceſter.

ters affirme the marqueſſe of Suffolke, and the duke of Buckingham to be the chéefe, not vnprocured by the cardinall of Wincheſter, and the archbiſhop of Yorke. Diuerſe articles were laid againſt him in open councell, and in eſpeciallie one; That he had cauſed men adiudged to die, to be put to other execution, than the law of the land aſſigned. Suerlie the duke verie well learned in the law ciuill, deteſting malefactors, and puniſhing offenſes in ſeueritie of iuſtice, gat him hatred of ſuch as feared condigne reward for their wicked dooings. And although the duke ſufficientlie anſwered to all things againſt him obiected: yet becauſe his death was determined, his wiſedome and innocencie nothing auailed.

A parlement at ſaint Edmundeſburie.

But to auoid danger of tumult that might be raiſed, if a prince ſo well beloued of the people ſhould be openlie executed; his enimies determined to worke their feats in his deſtruction, yer he ſhould haue anie warning. For effecting whereof, a parlement was ſummoned to be kept at Berrie, whither reſorted all the péeres of the realme, and amongſt them the duke of Gloceſter; which on the ſecond daie of the ſeſſion was by the lord Beaumont, then high conſtable of England, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and others, arreſted, apprehended, and put in ward, and all his ſeruants ſequeſtred from him, and thirtie two of the chéefe of his retinue were ſent to diuerſe priſons, to the great admiration of the people. The duke the night after he was thus committed to priſon, being the foure and twentith of Februarie, was found dead in his bed, and his bodie ſhewed to the lords and commons, as though he had died of a palſie, or of an impoſteme.

The duke of Gloceſter ſuddenlie murthered.

Edw. Hall.

But all indifferent perſons (as ſaith Hall) might well vnderſtand that he died of ſome violent death. Some iudged him to be ſtrangled, ſome affirme that an hot ſpit was put in at his fundament, other write that he was ſmouldered betwéene two featherbeds, and ſome haue affirmed that he died of verie gréefe, for that he might not come openlie to his anſwer. His dead corpſe was conueied to ſaint Albons, and there buried. After his death, none of his ſeruants ſuffered: although fiue of them, to wit, ſir Roger Chamberline knight, Middleton, Herbert, Arteiſe eſquiers, and Richard Nedham gentleman, were arreigned, condemned, and drawen to Tiborne, where they were hanged, let downe quicke, and ſtripped to haue béene bowelled and quartered: but the marques of Suffolke comming at that inſtant brought their pardons, ſhewed the ſame openlie, and ſo their liues were ſaued.

A pardon at a pinch.

Dukes of Gloceſter vnfortunate.

Some thinke that the name and title of Gloceſter hath béene vnluckie to diuerſe, which for their honours haue béene erected by creation of princes to that ſtile and dignitie, as Hugh Spenſer, Thomas of Woodſtoke, ſonne to king Edward the third, and this duke Humfreie: which thrée perſons by miſerable death finiſhed their daies; and after them king Richard the third alſo, duke of Gloceſter in ciuill warre ſlaine. So that this name duke of Gloceſter is taken for an vnhappie ſtile, as the prouerbe ſpeaketh of Seians horſſe, whoſe rider was euer vnhorſſed, & whoſe poſſeſſor was euer brought to miſerie. But ſuerlie, by the pitifull death of this noble duke and politike gouernour, the publike wealth of the realme came to great decaie, as by ſequele here may more at large appeare.

W.P.

[Oft times it hapneth that a man in quenching of ſmoke, burneth his fingers in the fire:] ſo the quéene in caſting how to kéepe hir huſband in honor, and hir ſelfe in authoritie, in making awaie of this noble man, brought that to paſſe, which ſhe had moſt cauſe to haue feared, which was the depoſing of hir huſband, & the decaie of the houſe of Lancaſter, which of likelihood had not chanced if this duke had liued: for then durſt not the duke of Yorke haue attempted to ſet forth his title to the crowne, as he afterwards did, to the great trouble of the realme, and deſtruction of king Henrie, and of manie other noble men beſide. This is the opinion of men, but Gods iudgements are vnſearchable, againſt whoſe decrée and ordinance preuaileth no humane counſell.

But to conclude of this noble duke: he was an vpright and politike gouernour, bending all his indeuours to the aduancement of the common-wealth, verie louing to the poore commons, and ſo beloued of them againe; learned, wiſe, full of courteſie, void of pride and ambition (a vertue rare in perſonages of ſuch high eſtate) but where it is moſt commendable. But ſith the praiſe of this noble man deſerueth a large diſcourſe, and méet for ſuch as haue cunning how to handle the ſame (ſith the ornaments of his mind were both rare & admirable, the feats of chiualrie by him commenſed and atchiued valiant and fortunate, his grauitie in counſell, and ſoundneſſe of policie profound and ſingular, all which with a traine of other excellent properties linked togither, require a man of manifold gifts to aduance them according to their dignitie) I refer the readers vnto maiſter Foxes booke of Acts and Monuments. Onelie this I ad, that in reſpect of his noble indowments, and his demeanor full of decencie, which he dailie vſed, it ſéemeth he might well haue giuen this prettie poeſie,

Virtute duce non ſanguine nitor.

Anno Reg. 26.

In this ſix and twentith yeare of the reigne of this king, but in the firſt of the rule of the quéene, I find nothing doone worthie of reherſall within the realme of England; but that the marqueſſe of Suffolke, by great fauour of the king, & more deſire of the quéene, was erected to the title and dignitie of duke of Suffolke, which he a ſhort time inioied. For Richard duke of Yorke being greatlie alied by his wife to the chiefe péeres and potentates of the realme, beſide his owne progenie, perceiuing the king to be no ruler, but the whole burthen of the realme to reſt in direction of the quéene, & the duke of Suffolke, began ſecretlie to allure his friends of the nobilitie; and priuilie declared vnto them his title and right to the crowne, and likewiſe did he to certeine wiſe gouernours of diuerſe cities and townes. Which attempt was ſo politikelie handled, and ſo ſecretlie kept, that prouiſion to his purpoſe was readie, before his purpoſe was openlie publiſhed; and his friends opened themſelues, yer the contrarie part could them eſpie: for in concluſion all ſhortlie in miſchiefe burſt out, as ye may hereafter heare.

The death of the biſhop of Wincheſter & his deſcriptiō.

During theſe dooings, Henrie Beauford biſhop of Wincheſter, and called the rich cardinall, departed out of this world, & buried at Weſtminſter. He was ſon to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, deſcended of an honorable linage, but borne in haſt, more noble in blood than notable in learning, hautie in ſtomach, and high of countenance, rich aboue meaſure, but not verie liberall, diſdainefull to his kin, and dreadfull to his louers, preferring monie before friendſhip, manie things beginning and few performing, ſauing in malice and miſchiefe; his inſatiable couetouſneſſe and hope of long life made him both to forget God, his prince, and himſelfe. Of the getting of his goods both by power legantine, and ſpirituall briberie, I will not ſpeake; but the kéeping of them, which he chiefelie gathered for ambitious purpoſe, was both great loſſe to his naturall prince and natiue countrie: for his hidden riches might haue well holpen the king, and his ſecret treaſure might haue relieued the communaltie, when monie was ſcant and charges great.

This William was a perſon by parentage borne a gentleman, for vertue and learning firſt conſecrate biſhop of Wincheſter, then anon after for wiſedome and integritie choſen lord chancellor of England: wherein his prudence made eminent, in warilie weilding the weight of that office at thoſe daies, which were ſo dangerous for all eſtates to liue in.

His vertuous diſpoſition was right apparant, and it were but by this the godlie erection of that worthie worke, Magdalene colledge in Oxford, a plot right aptlie choſen out for ſtudie at firſt, with ſtrength and workemanſhip ſoone after builded according, in proportion beautifull outward, and for vſe verie commodious within, ſorted into a faire manſion for the preſident, ſeuerall and méet for a man to that office of worſhip and grauitie, and alſo into other roomes for the fellowes, officers, and yoonger ſtudents. Not without a vertuous remembrance of the verie tenderlings, who might appeare to be toward and teachable; whereof part to be trained vp in the diuine ſcience of muſike iuſtlie reported in a diſtichon, that

Abr. Fl. ex Fabian.447.

A combat vpon triall of manhood betwéene a French and an Engliſhman.

¶ In this ſeuen and twentith yeare of king Henries reigne, as witneſſe the Engliſh chronicles, a knight of France called ſir Lewes de Bueill challenged an eſquier of England, named Rafe Challons, to triall of certeine feats of warre. Herevpon (as was thought conuenient) a daie was appointed them to make proofe thereof; the place alſo was aſſigned of their méeting, to wit, at a towne in France called Maunt or Maunce, where the French king at the ſame time was perſonallie preſent. But fortune (ſaith mine author) was to Challons ſo fauourable, and leaned ſo much to his ſide, that he ran the French knight through with the point of his fatall ſpeare:

Hunc illi finem lingua ſuperba dedit.

The compaſſion of the Engliſhman to his enimie.

The Engliſh eſquier ſéeing the infortunate euent of this triall to fall to the ſhame of the challenger, was ſo far from reioiſing at his ouerthrow, that he was touched with chriſtian compaſſion, & mourned for his enimie, for whome alſo he kept an obſequie as if he had béene his owne naturall brother, and deſcended of the ſame parents. For which mercifull motions of mind inwardlie working, and outwardlie appearing, he was of the king greatlie commended. But doubtfull it is, whether the other, if he had ſuruiued, and got the vpper hand, would haue had the like reuerend care of the Engliſhmans dead bodie, as to haue vouchſafed it a ſolemne interrement.]

Anno Reg. 27.

Sir Francis Suriennes.

Fougiers.

As the affaires in France now were neither well looked to, nor the gouernours there well aduiſed, an Engliſh capteine called ſir Francis Suriennes, ſurnamed the Aragonois, of the countrie where he was borne, a man for his wit and actiuitie admitted into the order of the garter, tooke by ſcaling ſuddenlie in the night of the euen of our ladie daie in Lent, a towne on the frontiers of Normandie, belonging to the duke of Britaine called Fougiers, ſpoiling the ſame, and killing the inhabitants. The duke of Britaine, taine, being hereof aduertiſed, ſent word by the biſhop of Reimes to the French king, beſeeching him of his aid and counſell in the matter.

The French king forthwith ſent his caruer John Hauart, and John Coſinet one of the maiſters of his requeſts to the king of England; and to the duke of Summerſet he diſpatched Peter de Fonteins the maiſter of his horſſe. To which meſſengers anſwer was made aſwell by the king as the duke, that the fact was doone without their knowledge. And for the truce to be kept, and not onelie reſtitution, but alſo amends to be made to the duke of Britaine, a daie of diet was appointed to be kept at Louuiers, where the commiſſioners on both parts being aſſembled, the Frenchmen demanded amends, with no ſmall recompenſe. The Engliſhmen anſwered, that without offenſe, nothing by iuſtice ought to be ſatiſfied; affirming the dooing of ſir Francis Sureinnes to be onelie his act, without conſent either of the king of England, or of the duke of Summerſet his lieutenant and regent.

Pōt de Larch taken by the Frēchmen by a ſubtill ſleight.

But whiles with long delaie they talked of this matter at Louuiers, certeine Frenchmen by aduertiſement of a wagoner of Louuiers, vnderſtanding that the towne of Pont de Larch was but ſlenderlie manned; the wagoner laded his wagon and paſſed forward, hauing in his companie two ſtrong varlets clad like carpentars, with great axes on their ſhoulders. And hereto le ſeigneur de Breſſe with a choſen companie of men of armes, lodged himſelfe in ambuſhment neere to the gate of S. Andrew, and capteine Floquet, accompanied with ſir James de Clermont, and another great companie priuilie lurked vnder a wood toward Louuiers. When all things were appointed for the purpoſe, earlie in a morning about the beginning of October, the wagoner came to the gate, and called the porter by name, praieng him to open the gate, that he might paſſe to Rone, and returne againe the ſame night.

The porter (which well knew the voice of his cuſtomer) tooke little heed to the other two companions, and ſo opened the one gate, and ſent another fellow of his to open the formoſt gate. When the chariot was on the draw-bridge betweene both the gates, the chariot-maiſter gaue the porter monie, and for the nonce let one peece fall on the ground: and while the porter ſtooped to take it vp, the wagoner with his dagger ſtroke him in at his throat, ſo that he cried for no helpe, and the two great lubbers ſlue the other porters, and with their axes cut the axeltree of the wagon, ſo that the draw-bridge could not be ſhortlie drawen vp. This doone they made a ſigne to capteine Floquet, which with all ſpeed entered the towne, ſlue and tooke all the Engliſhmen: and amongſt other, the lord Fauconbridge capteine of the ſaid towne was taken priſoner. The loſſe of this place was of no ſmall importance, being the verie keie and paſſage ouer the riuer of Seine, from France into Normandie, being diſtant from Rone onelie foure leagues.

When requeſt was made to haue it reſtored againe to the Engliſhmen, anſwer was made, that if they reſtored vnto the duke of Britaine, the towne of Fougiers, with condigne amends for the damages doone there, the towne of Pont Larch ſhould then be againe deliuered, or elſe not. And ſhortlie after, in hope of like ſucceſſe the French king aſſembled an armie, and diuiding the ſame in three parts, got by ſurrender (after ſundrie aſſaults, and loſſe of diuerſe of his men) the townes of Louuiers, & Gerborie, whereof William Harper was capteine. Alſo the towne, caſtell, and great tower of Verneueill in Perch were rendered into the French kings hands, after twentie daies of reſpit granted, to ſee if reſcues would haue come. The French writers affirme the towne to be taken by aſſault.

The warres renewed befor the end of the truce.

Thus was the warre renewed before the terme of truce fullie expired, & the Engliſh capteins brought to their wits end, what with appeaſing dailie rumors within the townes; and what with ſtudie how to recouer caſtels loſt and taken: for while they ſtudied how to keepe and defend one place, foure or fiue other turned to the French part. The chiefe cauſe of which reuolting was, for that it was blowen abroad thorough France, how the realme of England, after the death of the duke of Gloceſter by the ſeuerall factions of princes was diuided in two parts; and that William de la Poole latelie created duke of Suffolke, and diuerſe other, which were the occaſion of the ſaid duke of Gloceſters death, vexed and oppreſſed the poore people, ſo that mens minds were not intentiue to outward affaires: but all their ſtudie giuen to keepe off wrongs offered at home.

The king little regarding the matter, & the queene led by euill counſell, rather furthered ſuch miſchiefes as dailie began to grow by ciuill diſcord, than ſought to reforme them: ſo that the Normans and Gaſcoignes vnderſtanding in what ſtate things ſtood here, turned to the French part, as hereafter it may appeare. About the ſame time alſo, began a new rebellion in Ireland; but Richard duke of Yorke being ſent thither to appeaſe the ſame, ſo aſſwaged the furie of the wild and ſauage people there, that he wan him ſuch fauour amongſt them, as could neuer be ſeparated from him and his linage, which in the ſequele of this hiſtorie may more plainelie appeare.

A rebellion in Ireland.

The Engliſh loſe all in France.

The Frenchmen, hauing perfect vnderſtanding of the vnreadineſſe of the realme of England, diſplaied their banners, and ſet forth their armies, and in ſhort ſpace got (by yeelding) Conſtance, Giſors, caſtell Galliard, Ponteau de Mere, ſaint Lo, Feſtampe, Newcaſtell, Tonque, Mauleon, Argenton, Liſieux, and diuerſe other townes and places within the countrie of Normandie. Likewiſe in Guien was the towne of Mauliſſon rendered to the earle of Fois. Theſe townes were not yeelded voluntarilie by the Engliſh ſouldiers: but they were compelled thereto by the inhabitants of the townes, which hauing intelligence of the feeble eſtate of the realme of England, roſe againſt the capteins, opened the gates to the enimies, or conſtreined them to render vpon compoſition. By which inforcement was the rich citie of Rone deliuered: for ſuerlie the duke of Summerſet and the earle of Shreweſburie had well kept that citie, if they had beene no more vexed with the citizens, than they were with their enimies.

Rone yeelded to the Frenchmen.

For after that the French king had giuen summons to the citie, the inhabitants ſtreightwaies did not onelie deuiſe which waies they might betraie the citie, but alſo put on armor, and rebelled openlie againſt their capteins: who perceiuing the vntruth of them, and their owne danger, retired into the caſtell or palace, where (for a certeine ſpace) with arrowes & handguns they ſore moleſted the vntrue citizens. But at length, vnderſtanding the great puiſſance of the French king at hand, and deſpairing of all aid and ſuccour, they yeelded vpon condition; that with all their goods and armour they ſhould ſafelie depart to Caen, and that certeine townes ſhould be deliuered by a day. And till the ſame townes were rendred, the earle of Shrewſburie and the lord Butler, ſonns to the earle of Ormond, were left behind as pledges, which were ſent to the caſtell of Eureux, bicauſe they ſore feared the malice of the citizens of Rone.

Harflue beſieged.

Sir Thomas Curſon.

The Frenchmen, following the ſucceſſe in hand, came to Harflue, and fiercelie aſſaulted the walles: but by the high proweſſe and vndanted valiancie of the capteine, ſir Thomas Curſon, they were to their great loſſe manfullie by him repelled, and beaten. The Frenchmen learning wit by this great perill, left their ſcaling, and deuiſed dailie how to batter the walles, & make the breaches reaſonable for them to enter. This ſiege long continued to the great loſſe of both parties. When ſir Thomas Curſon ſaw no likelihood of gaine, but great appeerance of preſent loſſe, he fell at compoſition with the enimies, and ſo departed with all his goods. After which towne rendered, the fortreſſe of Hunflue was vpon like compoſition yeelded. And beſide theſe townes ſurrendred in Normandie, the duke of Britaine recouered againe Fougiers, ſaint James de Beuuron, and diuerſe other.

Harflue yeelded to the French.

Anno Reg. 28.

Sir Thomas Kiriell with a new band into France.

In the meane ſeaſon the king of England ſent into Normandie (with a new ſupplie of a thouſand fiue hundred men) a right valiant capteine called ſir Thomas Kiriell, who ioining himſelfe with other Engliſh capteins recouered the townes of Liſieux and Valongnes, and hauing with him power ſufficient (as he tooke it) to keepe the fields, he departed the twelfe of Aprill from Valongnes, meaning to paſſe towards Baieux, and after to Caen. But the eighteenth daie of the ſame moneth, he was incountred at a place called Formignie betwixt Carenten and Baieux, by the earle of Cleremont, & other Frenchmen with Scots. At the firſt onſet, the Engliſhmen receiued their enimies with ſuch manhood, that the Frenchmen were driuen backe, and the Engliſhmen tooke from them two culuerings.

The Engliſhmen ouerthrowne at Formignie.

*Or rather Goche.

But yet in the end, by the comming of the conſtable of France, Arthur de Britaine earle of Richmond, who brought with him two hundred or twelue ſcore men of armes, and an eight hundred archers or demilances, the Engliſhmen were diſcomfited, put to flight, and ſlaine, to the number of three thouſand, ſeauen hundred, three ſcore and thirteene, as Enguerant noteth, beſide priſoners, of whome there were diuerſe perſonages of accompt, as the ſaid ſir Thomas Kiriell himſelfe, ſir Henrie Norberie, ſir Thomas Drew, ſir Thomas Kirklie, Chriſtopher Auberton, Arpell, Helice, Alengour, Jennequin, Vacquier, Gobart, Caleuille, and ſundrie other. Sir Robert Veer, and ſir Matthew *Gough that valiant Welſhman, and manie other eſcaped ſo well as they might, ſome to Baieux, ſome to Caen, and other to other places as beſt they could.

Caen beſieged and yeelded to ẏ French.

After this ouerthrow obteined, the French king aſſembled an armie roiall, and comming before Caen, beſieged it on all ſides: and after making his approches, fiercelie aſſalted the walles. But the duke of Summerſet, and the other capteins within the towne, manfullie withſtood their enimies, ſhewing both force and great policie in defending and beating backe the aſſailants. The French king, perceiuing he could not preuaile that waie, ſent for all his great ordinance to Paris, which being brought, he dailie ſhot at the wals, and did ſome hurt: but to the caſtell which ſtood on a rocke, and in it a dungeon vnable to be beaten downe, he did no harme at all.

Though the duke of Summerſet was the kings lieutenant, yet ſir Dauid Hall, as capteine of this towne for his maiſter the duke of Yorke owner thereof, tooke vpon him the cheefe charge. Sir Robert Veer was capteine of the caſtell, and ſir Henrie Radford capteine of the dungeon. Dailie the ſhot was great, but more terrible than hurtfull: ſauing on a daie a ſtone ſhot into the towne, fell betweene the ducheſſe of Summerſet, and hir children, which being amazed with this chance, beſought hir huſband kneeling on hir knees, to haue mercie and compaſſion of his ſmall infants, and that they might be deliuered out of the towne in ſafegard. Which intretie made with teares and ſubmiſſion, what eare could but liſten to, what heart but yerne at; vnleſſe both eare and heart were made of flint or marble, or hewen out of a hard rocke, and ſo void of all paſſions, of all remorſe, of all affections belonging to humanitie?

The duke pitifull, mooued with the ſorrow of his wife, and loue of his children, rendered the towne againſt the mind of ſir Dauid Hall, whoſe counſell and faithfull diligence (in acquiting himſelfe to anſwer the truſt committed to him by his maiſter) if others had followed; the French had ſuſteined more trauell and loſſe, yer they ſhould haue ſo eaſilie atteined their purpoſe. The conditions of the ſurrender were, that the duke of Summerſet and his might depart in ſafegard with all their goods and ſubſtance. Sir Dauid Hall with diuerſe of his truſtie freends departed to Chierburgh, and from thence ſailed into Ireland to the duke of Yorke, making relation to him of all theſe doings, which thing kindled ſo great a rancor in the dukes heart and ſtomach, that he neuer left perſecuting the duke of Summerſet, vntill he had brought him to his fatall end & confuſion. Such is the nature of rancor and malice, of wrath and anger, which furthereth the hands euen of weaklings, on them to wreake their teene, with whome they are offended & pricked to reuengment, as the poet ſaith:

The irreconciliable hate betweene the two dukes.

Quaſlibet infirmas adiuuat ira manus.

After the obteining of Caen, the earle of Cleremont beſieged the citie of Liſieux, whereof was capteine Matthew *Gough with three hundred Engliſhmen, who in the end deliuered that towne, vpon condition, that he and his people might depart to Chierburgh. Then was Falais beſieged, whereof were capteins for the earle of Shrewſburie (that was the owner) Andrew Trollop, and Thomas Cotton eſquiers, who being in deſpaire of all ſuccors, agreed to deliuer it vpon two conditions. The one was, that the earle their maiſter, which remained in pledge for the performance of certeine appointments, concluded at the deliuerie of Rone (as ye haue hard) ſhould be ſet at libertie. The other, that if they were not reſcued within twelue daies, that then they and theirs ſhould depart with armor, and all their goods moueable, whither it pleaſed them.

*Goche.

At the daie appointed, the towne was rendered, and ſo likewiſe was the towne of Dampfront vpon the ſemblable agreement. Now reſted onelie Engliſh the towne of Chierburgh, whereof was capteine one Thomas Gonuille, which ſuerlie as long as vittels and munition ſerued, defended the towne right manfullie: but without hope of repaire, conſumed, and he els deſtitute of all comfort and aid, vpon a reaſonable compoſition, yeelded the towne, and went to Calis, where the duke of Summerſet and manie other Engliſhmen then ſoiorned. Thus was Normandie loſt cleerelie out of the Engliſhmens hands, after it had continued in their poſſeſſion the ſpace of thirtie yeares by the conqueſt of Henrie the fift.

All Normandie loſt.

The ſtate of it.

In this duchie were an hundred ſtrong townes and fortreſſes, able to be kept and holden, beſide them which were deſtroied by the warres; and in the ſame is one archbiſhoprike, and ſix biſhopriks. Some ſaie that the Engliſhmen were not of puiſſance either to man the townes, as they ſhould haue beene; or to inhabit the countrie, which was the cauſe they could not keepe it. Other ſaie, that the duke of Summerſet for his owne peculiar lucre, kept not halfe the number of ſouldiours for which he was appointed and allowed, but put the wages in his purſe. But the cheefe and onelie cauſe vndoubtedlie, was the diuiſion within the realme, euerie great man deſiring rather to be reuenged on his foe at home, than on the common enimie abroad, as by that which followeth you may plainelie perceiue.

The commõs exclame againſt ẏ duke of Suffolke.

Hérewith perceiuing how (through want of prouident wiſedome in the gouernour) all things went to wracke, as well within the realme as without; they began to make exclamation againſt the duke of Suffolke, charging him to be the onelie cauſe of the deliuerie of Aniou, and Maine, the chéefe procuror of the duke of Gloceſters death, the verie occaſion of the loſſe of Normandie, the ſwallower vp of the kings treaſure, the remoouer of good and vertuous councellours from about the prince, and the aduancer of vicious perſons, and of ſuch as by their dooings ſhewed themſelues apparant aduerſaries to the common-wealth.

Edw.Hall.

Articles proponed by the commons againſt the duke of Suffolke.

1 FIrſt they alleged that he had traitorouſlie excited, prouoked, and counſelled Iohn earle of Dunois baſtard of Orleance, Bertram lord Preſignie, William Coſinet, enimies to the king, and fréends and ambaſſadours to Charles, calling himſelfe French king, to enter into this realme; and to leauie warre againſt the king and his people, to the intent to deſtroie the king and his fréends, and to make Iohn his ſonne king of this realme, marieng him to Margaret, ſole heire to Iohn duke of Summerſet, pretending and declaring hir to be next heire inheritable to the crowne, for lacke of iſſue, of the kings bodie lawfullie begotten.

2 Item, the ſaid duke, being of the kings priuie and néere councell, allured by great rewards and faire promiſes, made by the ſaid earle of Dunois, cauſed the king to deliuer and ſet at libertie, Charles duke of Orleance, enimie to the king, and the kings noble father: which deliuerance was prohibited by expreſſe words, in the laſt will of the kings moſt victorious father.

3 Item, that before the departing of the ſaid duke of Orleance, the aforenamed duke of Suffolke traitorouſlie faſt cleauing to Charles called the French king, counſelled, prouoked, and intiſed the ſaid duke of Orleance, to mooue the ſame king to make warre againſt England, both in France and Normandie. According to which procurement & counſell, the ſaid French king hath recouered the whole realme of France, and all the duchie of Normandie, and taken priſoners the earle of Shrewesburie, the lord Fauconbrige, and manie other valiant capteins. ¶ Theſe thrée articles aforenamed he denied, either for fact or thought.]

4 Further it was alleged, that he being ambaſſadour for the king of England, to Charles calling himſelfe the French king, promiſed to Reiner king of Sicill, and to Charles d'Angiers his brother, enimies to the king, the releaſe of Aniou, with the deliuerance of the countie of Maine, and the citie of Maunt or Mans, without the knowledge of the other ambaſſadours with him accompanied. Which promiſe, after his returne, he cauſed to be performed, to the kings diſinheritance and loſſe irrecouerable, and to the ſtrength of his enimies, and féebliſhment of the duchie of Normandie. ¶ To this article he anſwered, that his commiſſion was to conclude, and doo all things according to his diſcretion, for the obteining of a peace: & bicauſe without deliuerie of thoſe countries, he perceiued that the truce could not be obteined, he agréed to the releaſe and deliuerance of them.]

5 Alſo they had great cauſe to iudge by the ſequele, that the ſaid duke being in France in the kings ſeruice, and one of the priuieſt of his councell there, traitorouſlie declared and opened to the capteins and conductors of warre, apperteining to the kings enimies, the kings counſell, purueiance of his armies, furniture of his townes, & all other ordinances, whereby the kings enimies (inſtructed aforehand by his traitorous information) haue gotten townes and fortreſſes, and the king by that meanes depriued of his inheritance.

6 Item, the ſaid duke declared to the earle of Dunois, to the lord Preſignie, and William Coſinet ambſſadours for the French king lieng in London, the priuities of the kings councell, both for the prouiſion of further warre, and alſo for the defenſe of the duchie of Normandie: by the diſcloſing thereof, the Frenchmen knowing the king ſecrets, defeated the kings appointments, and they obteined their purpoſe.

7 Item, that the ſaid duke, at ſuch time as the king ſent ambaſſadours to the French king, for the intreating of peace, traitorouſlie before their comming to the French court, certified king Charles of their commiſſion, authoritie, and inſtructions: by reaſon whereof, neither peace nor amitie ſucceeded, and the kings inheritance loſt, and by his enimies poſſeſſed.

8 Item, the ſame duke ſaid openlie in the Starchamber before the lords of the councell, that he had as high a place in the councell-houſe of the French king, as he had there: and was as well truſted there as here, and could remooue from the French king the priuieſt mãn of his councell, if he would.

9 Item, when armies haue béene prepared, and ſouldiers readie waged to paſſe ouer the ſea, to deale with the kings enimies: the ſaid duke, corrupted by rewards of the French king, hath reſtreined & ſtaid the ſaid armies to paſſe anie further.

10 Item, the ſaid duke being ambaſſadour for the king, compriſed not in the league (as the kings alies) neither the king of Aragon, neither the duke of Britaine: but ſuffered them to be compriſed on the contrarie part. By reaſon whereof, the old amitie of the K. of Aragon is eſtranged from this realme, and the duke of Britaine became enimie to the ſame: Giles his brother, the kings ſure fréend, caſt in ſtrong priſon, and there like to end his daies.]

All theſe obiections he vtterlie denied, or faintlie auoided: but none fullie excuſed. Diuerſe other crimes were laid to his charge, as inriching himſelfe with the kings goods and lands, gathering togither and making a monopolie of offices, fees, wards, and farmes, by reaſon whereof, the kings eſtate was greatlie diminiſhed and decaied, and he and his kin highlie exalted & inriched: with manie other points, which bicauſe they be not notable nor of great force or ſtrength, I omit and ouerpaſſe.

The duke of Suffolke cōmitted to the Tower.

The queene, which intierlie loued the duke, doubting ſome commotion and trouble to ariſe, if he were let go vnpuniſhed, cauſed him for a colour to be committed to the Tower: where he remained not paſt a moneth, but was againe deliuered and reſtored to the kings fauour, as much as euer he was before. This dooing ſo much diſpleaſed the people, that if politike prouiſion had not beene, great miſcheefe had immediatlie inſued. For the commons in ſundrie places of the realme aſſembled togither in great companies, and choſe to them a capteine, whome they called Blewbeard: but yer they had attempted anie enterpriſe, their leaders were apprehended; & ſo the matter pacified without anie hurt committed.

Blewbeard capteine of the rebels.

After this outrage thus aſſwaged, the parlement was adiourned to Leiceſter, whither came the king and queene in great eſtate, and with them the duke of Suffolke as cheefe councellour. The commons of the lower houſe, not forgetting their old grudge, beſought the king, that ſuch perſons as aſſented to the releaſe of Aniou, and deliuerance of Maine, might be dulie puniſhed. And to be priuie to that fact, they accuſed as principall, the duke of Suffolke, with Iohn biſhop of Saliſburie, and ſir Iames Fines, lord Saie, and diuerſe others. When the king perceiued that there was no remedie to appeaſe the peoples furie by anie colourable waies, ſhortlie to pacifie ſo long an hatred, he firſt ſequeſtred the lord Saie being treaſuror of England, and other the dukes adherents from their offices and roomes, and after baniſhed the duke of Suffolke, as the abhorred tode and common noiance of the whole realme, for tearme of fiue yeares, meaning by this exile to appeaſe the malice of the people for the time, and after (when the matter ſhould be forgotten) to reuoke him home againe.

But Gods iuſtice would not that ſo vngratious a perſon ſhould ſo eſcape: for when he ſhipped in Suffolke, intending to tranſport himſelfe ouer into France, he was incountered with a ſhip of warre, apperteining to the duke of Exceſter, conſtable of the Tower of London, called the Nicholas of the Tower. The capteine of that barke with ſmall fight entered into the dukes ſhip, and perceiuing his perſon preſent, brought him to Douer road, and there on the one ſide of a cocke bote cauſed his head to be ſtriken off, and left his bodie with the head lieng there on the ſands. Which corps being there found by a chapleine of his, was conueied to Wingfield college in Suffolke, and there buried. This end had William de la Poole duke of Suffolke, as men iudge by Gods prouidence; for that he had procured the death of that good duke of Gloceſter, as before is partlie touched.

The wretched death of the duke of Suffolke.

Soone after an other diſquiet befell here. Thoſe that fauoured the duke of Yorke, and wiſhed the crowne vpon his head for that (as they iudged) he had more right thereto than he that ware it, procured a commotion in Kent on this manner. A certeine yoong man of a goodlie ſtature and right pregnant of wit, was intiſed to take vpon him the name of Iohn Mortimer coſine to the duke of Yorke (although his name was Iohn Cade, or (of ſome) Iohn Mend-all) [an Iriſhman as Polychronicon ſaith] and not for a ſmall policie, thinking by that ſurname, that thoſe which fauoured the houſe of the earle of March would be aſſiſtant to him. And ſo in deed it came to paſſe (as in ſuch caſes there is no breeder of a broile but he ſhall find adherents enow, no leſſe forward to further his pernicious enterpriſe by their foolehardines, than himſelfe was in the plot of his deuiſe) though in fine (as it is the vnluckie lot of ſuch tumults) their attempts were withſtood, and their offenſe dulie rewarded, as in proceſſe of the ſtorie ſhall more at large appeare; according to the wiſemans ſentence:

Jacke Cades rebellion in Kent.

Sæpe in magiſtrum ſcelera redeunt ſua.

This capteine aſſembling a great companie of tall perſonages, aſſured them, that the enterpriſe which he tooke in hand, was both honourable to God and the king, and profitable to the whole realme. For if either by force or policie they might get the king and queene into their hands, he would cauſe them to be honourablie vſed, and take ſuch order for the puniſhing and reforming of the miſdemeanours of their bad councellours, that neither fifteens ſhould heerafter be demanded, nor once anie impoſitions or taxes be ſpoken of. The Kentiſh people mooued at theſe perſuaſions & other faire promiſes of reformation, in good order of battell (though not in great number) came with their capteine vnto the plaine of Blackeheath, betweene Eltham and Greenewich, and there kept the field more than a month, pilling the countrie about; to whome the citie of London at that time was verie fauourable. ¶ And the ſaid capteine (as I find recorded ſaith Iohn Stow) ſent for ſuch citizens of London as it pleaſed him to command to repaire vnto him, vnder letters of ſafe conduct, as followeth.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. 653.

The ſafegard and ſigne manuell of the capteine of Kent, ſent to Thomas Cocke draper of London, by the capteine of the great aſſemblie in Kent.

By this our writing inſealed, we grant & will permit trulie, that Thomas Cocke of London draper, ſhall come in good ſuertie and in ſafegard to our preſence, without anie hurt of his perſon, and ſo auoid from vs againe at his pleaſure, with all other perſons aſſigned at his denomination with him comming in likewiſe.

The commandement by the capteine of Kent, ſent vnto Thomas Cocke aboue ſaid.

For your inſtruction, firſt ye ſhall charge all Lumbards and ſtrangers, being merchants, Genowais, Venetians, Florentines, and others, this daie to draw them togither, and to ordeine for vs the capteine, twelue harneſſes complet of the beſt faſhion, foure & twentie brigandins, twelue battell axes, twelue glaues, ſix horſſes with ſadle and bridle completlie harneſſed, and a thouſand markes of readie monie. And if this our demand be not obſerued & doone, we ſhall haue the heads of as manie as we can get of them.

And to the intent the cauſe of this glorious capteins comming thither, might be ſhadowed vnder a cloke of good meaning (though his intent nothing ſo) he ſent vnto the king an humble ſupplication, affirming that his comming was not againſt his grace, but againſt ſuch of his councellours, as were louers of themſelues, and oppreſſors of the poore commonaltie; flatterers of the king, and enimies to his honor; ſuckers of his purſe, and robbers of his ſubiects; parciall to their fréends, and extreame to their enimies: thorough bribes corrupted, and for indifferencie dooing nothing. ¶ Here, bicauſe a full report of this inſurrection maie paſſe to the knowledge of the readers; it is neceſſarie to ſet downe the articles of the commons complaints touching the premiſſes, whereof a copie was ſent to the parlement then holden at Weſtminſter, with their bill of requeſts concerning abuſes to be reformed.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S.654,655, 656,657,&c.

The complaint of the commons of Kent, and cauſes of their aſſemblie on the Blackheath.

1 Inprimis, it is openlie noiſed that Kent ſhould be deſtroied with a roiall power, & made a wild forreſt, for the death of the duke of Suffolke, of which the commons of Kent thereof were neuer giltie.

2 Item, the king is ſtirred to liue onelie on his commons, and other men to haue the reuenues of the crowne, the which hath cauſed pouertie in his excellencie, and great paiments of the people, now late to the king granted in his parlement.

3 Item, that the lords of his roiall bloud béene put from his dailie preſence, and other meane perſons of lower nature exalted and made chéefe of his priuie councell, the which ſtoppeth matters of wrongs done in the realme from his excellent audience, and maie not be redreſſed as law will; but if bribes and gifts be meſſengers to the hands of the ſaid councell.

4 Item, the people of this realme be not paid of debts owing for ſtuffe and puruciance taken to the vſe of the kings houſhold, in vndooing of the ſaid people, and the poore commons of the realme.

5 Item, the kings meniall ſeruants of houſhold, and other perſons, aſken dailie goods and lands, of impeached or indicted of treaſon, the which the king granteth anon, yer they ſo indangered be conuicted. The which cauſeth the receiuers thereof to inforge labours and meanes applied to the death of ſuch people, ſo appeached or indicted, by ſubtill meanes, for couetiſe of the ſaid grants: and the people ſo impeached or indicted, though it be vntrue, maie not be committed to the law for their deliuerance, but held ſtill in priſon, to their vttermoſt vndooing & deſtruction, for couetiſe of goods.

6 Item, though diuerſe of the poore people and commons of the realme, haue neuer ſo great right, truth, and perfect title to their land: yet by vntrue claime of infeoffement made vnto diuerſe ſtates, gentles, and the kings meniall ſeruants in maintenances againſt the right, the true owners dare not hold, claime, nor purſue their right.

7 Item, it is noiſed by common voices, that the kings lands in France béene aliened and put awaie from the crowne, and his lords and people there deſtroied with vntrue meanes of treaſon; of which it is deſired, inquiries thorough all the realme to be made how and by whome; & if ſuch traitors maie be found giltie, them to haue execution of law without anie pardon, in example of others.

8 Item, coll[illegible]ors of the fiftéenth penie in Kent be greatlie vexed and hurt, in paieng great ſummes of monie in the excheker, to ſue out a writ called Quorum nomina, for the alowance of the barons of the ports, which now is deſired, that hereafter in the lieu of the collectors, the barons aforeſaid maie ſue it out for their eaſe at their owne coſts.

9 Item, the ſhiriffes and vnderſhiriffes let to farme their offices and bailiwickes, taking great ſuertie therefore, the which cauſeth extortions doone by them and by their bailiffes to the people.

10 Item, ſimple and poore people that vſe not hunting, be greatlie oppreſſed by indictements feined & doone by the ſaid ſhiriffes, vnderſhiriffes, bailiffes, and other of their aſſent, to cauſe their increaſe for paieng of their ſaid farme.

11 Item, they returne in names of inqueſts in writing into diuerſe courts of the king not ſummoned nor warned, where through the people dailie léeſe great ſummes of monie, well nigh to the vttermoſt of their vndooing: and make leuie of amercements called the gréene wax, more in ſummes of monie than can be found due of record in the kings books.

12 Item, the miniſters of the court of Douer in Kent vex and arreſt diuerſe people thorough all the ſhire out of Caſtle ward, paſſing their bounds and libertie vſed of old time, by diuerſe ſubtill and vntrue meanes and actions falſelie feined, taking great fées at their luſt in great hurt of the people on all the ſhire of Kent.

13 Item, the people of the ſaid ſhire of Kent, maie not haue their frée election in the chooſing of knights of the ſhire: but letters béene ſent from diuerſe eſtates to the great rulers of all the countrie, the which imbraceth their tenants and other people by force to chooſe other perſons than the cõmons will is.

14 Item, whereas knights of the ſhire ſhould chooſe the kings collectors indifferentlie without any bribe taking, they haue ſent now late to diuerſe perſons, notifieng them to be collectors: whervpon gifts and bribes be taken, & ſo the collectors office is bought and ſold extortiouſlie at the knights luſt.

15 Item, the people be ſore vexed in coſts and labour, called to the ſeſſions of peace in the ſaid ſhire, appearing from the furtheſt and vttermoſt part of the weſt vnto the eaſt; the which cauſeth to ſome men fiue daies iournie: wherevpon they deſire the ſaid appearance to be diuided into two parts; the which one part, to appeare in one place; an other part, in an other place; in reléeuing of the gréeuances and intollerable labours & vexations of the ſaid people.

Inprimis, deſireth the capteine of the commons, the welfare of our ſoueraigne lord the king, and all his true lords ſpirituall and temporall, deſiring of our ſaid ſoueraigne lord, and of all the true lords of his councell, he to take in all his demaines, that he maie reigne like a king roiall, according as he is borne our true and chriſtian king annointed: and who ſo will ſaie the contrarie, we all will liue and die in the quarell as his true liege men.

Item, deſireth the ſaid capteine, that he will auoid all the falſe progenie and affinitie of the duke of Suffolke, the which béene openlie knowne, and they to be puniſhed after the cuſtome and law of this land, and to take about his noble perſon the true lords of his roiall bloud of this his realme, that is to ſaie, the high and mightie prince the duke of Yorke, late exiled from our ſaid ſoueraigne lords preſence (by the motion and ſtirring of the traitorous and falſe diſpoſed the duke of Suffolke and his affinitie) and the mightie princes & dukes of Exceſter, Buckingham, and Norffolke, and all the earles and barons of this land: and then ſhall he be the richeſt king chriſtian.

Item, deſireth the ſaid capteine and commons puniſhment vnto the falſe traitors, the which contriued ued and imagined the death of the high, mightfull and excellent prince the duke of Gloceſter, the which is too much to rehearſe; the which duke was proclamed as traitor. Upon the which quarell, we purpoſe all to liue and die vpon that that it is falſe.

Item, the duke of Exceſter, our holie father the cardinall, the noble prince the duke of Warwike, and alſo the realme of France, the duchie of Normandie, Gaſcoigne, and Guion, Anion, and Maine, were deliuered and loſt by the meanes of the ſaid traitors; and our true lords, knights, and eſquiers, and manie a good yeoman loſt and ſold yer they went, the which is great pitie to heare, of the great and gréeuous loſſe to our ſoueraigne lord and his realme.

Item, deſireth the ſaid capteine and commons, that all extortions vſed dailie among the common people, might be laid downe, that is to ſaie, the gréene war; the which is falſelie vſed, to the perpetuall deſtruction of the kings true commons of Kent. Alſo the kings Bench, the which is too gréefefull to the ſhire of Kent, without prouiſion of our ſoueraigne lord and his true councell. And alſo in taking of wheat and other graines, béefe, mutton, & all other vittels, the which is importable to the ſaid commons, without the bréefe prouiſion of our ſaid ſoueraigne lord and his true councell, they maie no longer beare it. And alſo vnto the ſtatute of labourers, and the great extortioners, the which is to ſaie the falſe traitors, Sleg, Cromer, Iſle, and Robert Eſt.

These billes when the councell had well peruſed, they did not onelie diſalow and condemne them and the authors, as proud and preſumptuous; but alſo perſuaded the king rather to ſuppreſſe thoſe rebels by force, than by faire promiſes. Wherevpon the king remoued from Weſtminſter vnto Gréenewich, from whence he would haue ſent certeine lords with a power to haue diſtreſſed the Kentiſhmen, but the men ſaid to their lords they would not fight againſt them that laboured to amend the common-weale: wherefore the lords were driuen to leaue their purpoſe. And bicauſe the Kentiſhmen cried out againſt the lord Saie the kings chamberline, he was by the king committed to the Tower of London. Then went the king againe to London, & within two dais after went againſt the Kentiſhmen with fiftéene thouſand men well prepared for the war: but the ſaid Kentiſhmen fled the night before his comming into the wood countrie néere vnto Senocke. Wherevpon the king returned againe to London.

King Henrie went againſt the Kentiſhmen with a great power.

The quéene (that bare rule) being of his retrait aduertiſed, ſent ſir Humfreie Stafford knight, and William his brother, with manie other gentlemen, to follow the Kentiſhmen, thinking that they had fled: but they were deceiued, for at the firſt ſkirmiſh both the Staffords were ſlaine, & all their companie diſcomfited. The kings armie by this time comen to Blackheath, hearing of this diſcomfiture, began to murmur amongſt themſelues: ſome wiſhing the duke of Yorke at home to aid the capteine his couſine: ſome vndutifullie coueting the ouerthrow of the king and his councell: other openlie crieng out on the quéene and hir complices.

The Staffords ſlaine at Senocke by Iacke Cade.

This rumor publiſhed abroad, cauſed the king and certeine of his councell (for the appeaſing thereof) to commit the lord Saie treaſuror of England to the Tower of London; and if other (againſt whome like diſpleaſure was borne) had béene preſent, they had béene likewiſe committed. Iacke Cade vpon victorie againſt the Staffords, apparelled himſelfe in ſir Humfries brigandine ſet full of guilt nailes, and ſo in ſome glorie returned againe toward London; diuerſe idle and vagarant perſons out of Suſſex, Surreie and other places, ſtill increaſing his number.

Thus this glorious capteine, garded with a multitude of ruſticall people, came againe to the plaine of Blackheath, & there ſtronglie incamped himſelfe: to whome were ſent from the king, the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and Humfrie duke of Buckingham, to common with him of his gréefes and requeſts.

These lords found him ſober in talke, wiſe in reaſoning, arrogant in hart, and ſtiffe in opinion; as who that by no means would grant to diſſolue his armie, except the king in perſon would come to him, and aſſent to the things he would require. The K. vpon the preſumptuous anſwers & requeſts of this villanous rebell, begining aſmuch to doubt his owne meniall ſeruants, as his vnknowen ſubiects (which ſpared not to ſpeake, that the capteins cauſe was profitable for the common-wealth) departed in all haſt to the caſtell of Killingworth in Warwikeſhire, leauing onlie behind him the lord Scales to kéepe the Tower of London. The Kentiſh capteine being aduertiſed of the kings abſence, came firſt into Southwarke, and there lodged at the white hart, prohibiting to all his retinue, murder, rape, and robberie; by which colour of well meaning, he the more allured to him the harts of the common people.

After that, he entred into London, cut the ropes of the draw bridge, & ſtroke his ſword on London ſtone; ſaieng, Now is Mortimer lord of this citie. And after a gloſing declaration made to the maior touching the cauſe of his thither comming, he departed againe into Southwarke, and vpon the third daie of Iulie he cauſed ſir Iames Fines, lord Saie, and treaſuror of England, to be brought to the Guildhall, and there to be arreigned: who being before the kings iuſtices put to anſwer, deſired to be tried by his péeres, for the longer delaie of his life. The capteine perceiuing his dilatorie plée, by force tooke him from the officers, and brought him to the ſtandard in Cheape, and there (before his confeſſion ended) cauſed his head to be ſtriken off, and pitched it vpon an high pole, which was openlie borne before him thorough the ſtréets.

The lord Saie beheaded at the ſtandard in Cheap

And not content herewith, he went to Mile end, and there apprehended ſir Iames Cromer then ſhiriffe of Kent, and ſonne in law to the ſaid lord Saie, cauſing him likewiſe (without confeſſion or excuſe heard) to be beheaded, and his head to be fixed on a pole: and with theſe two heads this bloudie wretch entred into the citie againe, and as it were in a ſpite cauſed them in euerie ſtréet to kiſſe togither, to the great deteſtation of all the beholders. After this ſuccéeded open rapine, and manifeſt robberie in diuerſe houſes within the citie, and ſpeciallie in the houſe of Philip Malpas alderman of London, and diuerſe other; ouer and beſide ranſoming and fining of diuers notable merchants, for the ſuertie of their liues and goods; as Robert Horne alderman, which paid fiue hundred marks. He alſo put to execution in Southwarke diuerſe perſons, ſome for breaking his ordinance, and other being of his old acquaintance, leſt they ſhould bewraie his baſe linage, diſparaging him for his vſurped ſurname of Mortimer.

The maior and other the magiſtrates of London, perceiuing themſelues neither to be ſure of goods, nor of life well warranted, determined to repell and kéepe out of their citie ſuch a miſchieuous caitife and his wicked companie. And to be the better able ſo to doo, they made the lord Scales, and that renowmed capteine Matthew * Gough priuie both of their intent and enterpriſe, beſéeching them of their helpe and furtherance therein. The lord Scales promiſed them his aid, with ſhooting off the artillerie in the Tower; and Matthew Gough was by him appointed to aſſiſt the maior and Londoners in all that he might, and ſo he and other capteins, appointed for defenſe

* Or rather Goche.

ſenſe of the citie, tooke vpon them in the night to keepe the bridge, and would not ſuffer the Kentiſhmen once to approch. The rebels, who neuer ſoundlie ſlept for feare of ſudden aſſaults, hearing that the bridge was thus kept, ran with great haſt to open that paſſage, where betwéene both parties was a fierce and cruell fight.

* Or rather Gocbe.

The ſkirmiſh betwéene the citizens and the rebels vpon London bridge.

Matthew * Gough, perceiuing the rebels to ſtand to their tackling more manfullie than he thought they would haue doone, aduiſed his companie not to aduance anie further toward Southwarke, till the daie appeared; that they might ſée where the place of ieopardie reſted, and ſo to prouide for the ſame: but this little auailed. For the rebels with their multitude draue backe the citizens from the ſtoops at the bridge foot to the draw bridge, & began to ſet fire in diuerſe houſes. Great ruth it was to behold the miſerable ſtate, wherein ſome deſiring to eſchew the fire died vpon their enimies weapon; women with children in their armes lept for feare into the riuer, other in a deadlie care how to ſaue themſelues, betwéene fire water, and ſword, were in their houſes choked and ſmothered. Yet the capteins not ſparing, fought on the bridge all the night valiantlie: but in concluſion, the rebels gat the draw bridge, and drowned manie, and ſlue Iohn Sutton alderman, and Robert Heiſand, a hardie citizen, with manie other, beſide Matthew * Gough, a man of great wit and much experience in feats of chiualrie, the which in continuall warres had ſpent his time in ſeruice of the king and his father.

Matthew Gocbe famous for his acts abroad now ſlaine on Lōdō bridge.

This ſore conflict indured in doubtfull wiſe on the bridge, till nine of the clocke in the morning: for ſomtime, the Londoners were beaten backe to ſaint Magnus corner: and ſuddenlie againe, the rebels were repelled to the ſtoops in Southwarke, ſo that both parts being faint and wearie, agréed to leaue off from fighting till the next daie; vpon condition, that neither Londoners ſhould paſſe into Southwarke, nor Kentiſhmen into London. Upon this abſtinence, this rakehell capteine for making him more friends, brake vp the gailes of the kings Bench and Marſhalſie, and ſo were manie mates ſet at libertie verie méet for his matters in hand.

A ſtaie by aſſent.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie being chancellor of England, and as then for his ſuertie lieng within the Tower, called to him the biſhop of Wincheſter, who for ſome ſafegard laie then at Haliwell. Theſe two prelats, ſéeing the furie of the Kentiſh people, by their late repulſe, to be ſomewhat aſſwaged, paſſed by the riuer of Thames from the Tower into Southwarke, bringing with them vnder the kings great ſeale, a generall pardon vnto all the offendors, and cauſed the ſame to be openlie publiſhed. The poore people were ſo glad of this pardon, and ſo readie to receiue it, that without bidding farewell to their capteine, they withdrew themſelues the ſame night euerie man towards his home.

Proclamatiō of pardon diſperſed the rebels.

¶But Iacke Cade deſpairing of ſuccours, and fearing the reward of his lewd dealings, put all his pillage and goods that he had robbed, into a barge, and ſent it to Rocheſter by water, and himſelfe went by land, and would haue entred into the caſtle of Quinborow with a few men that were left about him; but he was there let of his purpoſe: wherefore he diſguiſed in ſtrange attire, priuilie fled into the wood countrie beſide Lewes in Suſſex, hoping ſo to ſcape. The capteine & his people being thus departed, not long after proclamations were made in diuerſe places of Kent, Suſſex, and Southerie, that whoſoeuer could take the foreſaid capteine aliue or dead, ſhould haue a thouſand markes for his trauell. A copie of which proclamation, touching the apprehenſion of the ſaid Cade and his complices, hereafter followeth.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 661, 662. in Quart.

A copie of the ſaid writ and proclamation by the king, for the taking of the ſaid Cade and his felowſhip.

Henricus Dei gratia rex Angliæ & Franciæ, & dominus Hiberniæ, vniuerſis & ſingulis cuſtodibus, &c. For ſo much as one Iohn Cade borne in Ireland, which calleth himſelfe Iohn Mortimer & in ſome writing calleth himſelfe capteine of Kent, the which Iohn Cade the laſt yeare tofore his dwelling in Suſſex with a knight, called ſir Thomas Dagre, ſlue there a woman with child, and for that cauſe tooke the gréeth of the church, and after for that cauſe forſware the kings land: the which Iohn Cade alſo after this, was ſworne to the French part, and dwelled with them; which hath now of late time (to the intent to inrich himſelfe by robbing and deſpoiling of the kings liegemen, as it is now openlie knowne, to bring himſelfe to great and high eſtate) falſlie and vntruelie deceiued manie of the kings people, and vnder colour of holie and good intents made them to aſſemble with him againſt the kings regalitie & his lawes, & nought ſetting by the kings grace and pardons, granted not onelie to him but to all the kings ſubiects, the which by his deceit haue aſſembled with him, the which he with great reuerence receiued on mondaie laſt paſſed, and ſo did all that were aſſembled with him. Notwithſtanding all this, he laboureth now of new to aſſemble the kings people againe, and to that intent beareth them on hand, that the kings letters of pardon granted to him and them, be not auaileable, nor of none effect, without authoritie of parlement: whereas the contrarie is true, as it is openlie knowne by that, that the king granteth from time to time his charters of pardon to ſuch as him liſt, of all manner of crimes and offenſes both generall and ſpeciall.

The king therefore willeth and commandeth, that none of his ſubiects giue faith nor credence to the ſaid falſe informations of the ſaid falſe traitor, nor accompanie with him in anie wiſe, nor comfort nor ſuſteine him nor his with vittels, nor with anie other things: but will, whoſoeuer of the kings ſubiects may take him, ſhall take him; and that who ſo euer taketh him, and bringeth him quicke or dead to the king or to his councell, ſhall haue a thouſand markes for his labour trulie paid him, without faile or delaie by the prouiſion of the kings councell. And who ſo euer taketh anie of thoſe that from this daie forth accompanie with him, ſhall haue fiue marks for his reward, trulie to be paid in maner and forme aboue ſaid. And ouer this, commanding all conſtables, miniſters, and officers of the ſaid ſhire, that none of them (on paine of death) take vpon them to execute anie commandement by word or writing ſent or made vnto them by the ſaid Cade, calling himſelfe Mortimer and capteine, be it to reare any people, or to any other intent: but to areſt and make ſo be areſted ſuch, as take vpon them to bring anie ſuch commandement by writing or by word. Et hoc nullatenus omittatis. Teſte me ipſo apud Weſtm. 10 die Iulij, anno regni 28.]

After which proclamation thus publiſhed, a gentleman of Kent named Alexander Eden awaited ſo his time, that he tooke the ſaid Cade in a garden in Suſſex: ſo that there he was ſlaine at Hothfield, and brought to London in a cart, where he was quartered; his head ſet on London bridge, and his quarters ſent to diuers places to be ſet vp in the ſhire of Kent. After this, the king himſelfe came into Kent, and there ſat in iudgement vpon the offendors: and if he had not mingled his iuſtice with mercie; more than fiue hundred by rigor of law had béene iuſtlie put to execution.

execution. Yet he puniſhing onelie the ſtubborne heads, & diſordered ringleaders, pardoned the ignorant and ſimple perſons, to the great reioiſing of all his ſubiects. ¶ But ſaith another, the king ſent his commiſſioners into Kent, and cauſed inquirie to be made of this riot in Canturburie, where for the ſame eight men were iudged and executed, and in other townes of Kent and Suſſex was doone the like execution.

This yeare the commons alſo in diuerſe parts of England, as in Suſſex, Saliſburie, Wiltſhire, and other places, did much harme to manie perſons, among the which, on the nine and twentith of Iune, William Aſcoth biſhop of Saliſburie (after he had ſaid maſſe at Edington) was by his owne tenants drawne from the altar, in his albe with his ſtole about his necke to the top of an hill, and there by them ſhamefullie murthered, and after ſpoiled to the naked ſkin: they renting his bloudie ſhirt, tooke euerie man a péece, and made boaſt of their wickedneſſe. The daie before, his chariot was robbed, to the value of ten thouſand markes. Soldiours made a fraie againſt the maior of London the ſame daie he tooke his charge at Weſtminſter, at night comming from ſaint Thomas of Acres, after he had béene at Paules.]

The biſhop of Saliſburie murthered.

A fray in Lõdon againſt the maior.

The French king vnderſtanding all the ciuill diſcord and rebellious ſturs in England, made thereof his foundation, hoping to get into his hands and poſſeſſion the duchie of Aquitaine: and therevpon ſent the earles of Ponthieuure and Perigort to laie ſiege to the towne of Bergerat, ſituate vpon the riuer of Dourdon, of which towne was capteine Iohn Gedding, who vpon reaſonable conditions rendred the towne. But yet the lord Camois, ſir George Seimor, and ſir Iohn Arundell, with diuers other valiant capteins, hauing gouernance of the countrie, manned townes, gathered people, and recomforted the fainting harts of the Gaſcoignes in all that they could, and withall ſent letters ouer into England, certifieng to the kings maieſtie, that without ſpéedie aid, and readie ſuccours, the whole countrie was like to be conquered and woone out of the Engliſhmens poſſeſſion.

Manie letters were ſent, and manie faire anſwers were brought; but reléefe neither appeared, nor one man of warre was thither ſhipped: by reaſon whereof, the Frenchmen purſuing the victorie, got the fortreſſes of Ianſacke, and S. Foie, with diuerſe other péeces of importance thereabouts. Alſo, about the ſame time, the lord Doruall, third ſonne to the lord de la Breth, with a great number of men, as well on horſſebacke as on foot, departed from Baſas, to conquer and deſtroie the Ile of Medoc. Wherevpon the maior of Burdeaux iſſuing out, and incountring with his enimies, was vanquiſhed, loſing ſix hundred Engliſhmen and Gaſcoignes: albeit the Frenchmen gained not this victorie with cléere hands, for there were ſlaine of them to the number of eight hundred perſons.

After this, the baſtard of Orleance, with his brother Iohn earle of Angoleſme, which had béene long priſoner in England, and manie other valiant capteins, beſieged the caſtell of Montguion, which to them was rendered. Afterwards, they beſieged the towne of Blaie, ſtanding on the riuer of Garonne, the which in concluſion by verie force was conquered and woone. The baſtard of Kendall, capteine of the caſtell, ſéeing the towne loſt, vpon certeine reaſonable conditions deliuered his fortreſſe to the baſtard of Orleance, the French kings lieutenant. After this, the townes of Burgh and Liborne, after fiue wéekes ſiege, were likewiſe yéelded to the Frenchmen. Then was the citie of Acques beſieged by the erle of Fois, and the vicount de Lawtrec his brother, and other noble men. So likewiſe was the ſtrong towne of Rion by the earle of Arminacke, extreame enimie to the realme of England, for breach of the mariage concluded betwéene king Henrie and his daughter. The earle of Ponthieuure laid ſiege to Chatillon in Perigort, and the earle of Dunois inuironned with great puiſſance the towne of Fronſacke.

The earle of Arminack an open enimie.

The Engliſhmen perceiuing in what ſtate they ſtood within the towne, couenanted with the ſaid earle, that if the towne were not ſuccoured, and the Frenchmen fought with before the feaſt of the natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt next inſuing; that then the towne of Fronſacke ſhould be yéelded to them, which was the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe in all that countrie, and the verie keie of Guien. Héereof were pledges deliuered, and writings made & ſealed. Which agréement once blowne through the countrie, the citie of Burdeaux, and all other townes (except Baion) made the like agréement. So did all the noble men and gentlemen which were ſubiects and vaſſals to the crowne of England. Euerie daie was looking for aid, but none came.

And why? Euen bicauſe the diueliſh diuiſion that reigned in England, ſo incombred the heads of the noble men there, that the honor of the realme was cléerelie forgotten, ſo that (to conclude) the daie appointed came, but ſuccour looked for came not. By reaſon whereof, all the townes of Aquitaine (except Baion) deliuered their keies, and became vaſſals to the French nation; yet the citizens of Burdeaux, in hope of reſcue, required a longer daie of battell, which was granted. But at the daie appointed, when no reléefe came, they rendred themſelues and the citie to their aduerſaries, their liues and goods ſaued, with licence and ſafe conduct to all perſons which would depart and ſaile into England. Then finallie was the citie of Baion beſieged, and with mines and batterie conſtreined to yéeld it ſelfe into the Frenchmens hands.

Through diſſention at home, all loſt abroad.

Beſide the agréements taken and made with the townes, diuerſe noble men made ſeuerall compoſitions, as Gaſton de Fois, & Capdaw de Bueſ, whome king Henrie the fift made earle of Longeuile, and knight of the garter; whoſe anceſtors were euer true to England. Which agréed, that he and his ſonne Iohn de Fois, whome king Henrie the ſixt made earle of Kendale, and alſo knight of the garter, ſhould enioy all their lands in Aquitaine, giuen to them by the kings of England, or by the dukes of Aquitaine. And ſith their intent was ſtill to ſerue the king of England, they agréed to deliuer into the cuſtodie of the earle of Fois, the ſonne and heire of the ſaid earle of Kendals, being of the age of thrée yeares; to the intent that if he at his full age denied to become ſubiect to the French king, or before that time deceaſſed; that then (after the death of his father and grandfather) all the ſaid lands ſhould wholie remaine to the next heire of their bloud, either male or female, being vnder the obeiſance of the French king or his heires.

Manie other noble men, whoſe hearts were good Engliſh, made like compoſitions, and ſome came into England, and others went to Calis, and bare great offices there: as the lord Duras, which was marſhall of that towne; and monſieur Vauclere, which was deputie there vnder the earle of Warwike. Thus were the Engliſhmen cléerelie diſplaced and loſt the poſſeſſion of all the countries, townes, caſtels, and places within the realme of France; ſo that onelie Calis, Hammes and Guines, with the marches thereof remained in their hands, of all thoſe their dominions and ſeigniories which they ſometime held in the parties beyond the ſeas. Whereby England ſuffered a partile but not a totall eclipſe of hir glorie, in continuall loſing & nothing gaining of the enimie. ¶ Which recouerie was of great facilitie to the French, for that where they came, they found litle or no reſiſtance, but rather a voluntarie ſubmiſſion & yéelding as it were with holding vp of hands, yer they came to handſtroks. So that in ſuch victories and conqueſts conſiſted ſmall renowme, ſith without ſlaughter & bloudſhed hardie enterpriſes are not atchiued. Notablie therefore ſpeaketh Anglorum prælia of theſe bloudleſſe and ſweatleſſe victories, ſaieng:

Anno Reg. 30. John Hooker, alias Vowell. The king receiued into Excester.

[This yeare the king made a generall progreſſe and came to the citie of Excester, on mondaie the ſixtéenth of Julie at after noone, being the feaſt daie of ſaint Kenelme; and was receiued from place to place verie honorablie through the whole countrie. Before he came to this citie, he was met by all the cleargie in their degrées, ſome thrée miles, ſome two miles, and ſome at the citie, all in their copes, cenſing all the waies as they went. As ſoone as he came to this citie, he was firſt conducted to the cathedrall church in all moſt honourable order. When he had doone his oblations, he was conueied and lodged in the biſhops houſe. During his abode here, there was a ſeſſions kept before the duke of Summerſet, and certeine men condemned to die for treaſon, and had iudgement to be executed to death.

The biſhop & his cleargie againſt the K. and the duke of Summerſet, &c. in defenſe of their eccleſiaſticall priuilege.

The biſhop and his clergie vnderſtanding hereof, with open mouth complained vnto the king, that he cauſed a ſeſſions to be kept within his ſanctuarie, contrarie to the priuilege of his church: and that all their dooings (being doone againſt law) were of no effect. And notwithſtanding the king and his councell had diſcourſed vnto them the iuſt and orderlie procéeding, the hainouſneſſe of the offendors, and the neceſſitie of their puniſhment: yet all could not auaile, for holie church nor the ſanctuarie might be prophaned (as they ſaid) with the deciding of temporall matters. Whervpon the king in the end yéelding to their exclaimes, releaſed a couple of arrant traitors, and reuerſed all his former lawfull procéedings, and ſo vpon the wedneſdaie he departed and returned towards London.]

The duke of Yorke maketh claime to the crowne.

The duke of Yorke pretending (as yée haue heard) a right to the crowne, as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence, came this yeare out of Ireland vnto London, in the parlement time, there to conſult with his ſpeciall fréends: as John duke of Northfolke, Richard earle of Saliſburie, and the lord Richard his ſonne, which after was earle of Warwike; Thomas Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, & Edward Brooke lord Cobham. After long deliberation and aduiſe taken, it was thought expedient, to kéepe their chéefe purpoſe ſecret; and that the duke ſhould raiſe an armie of men, vnder a pretext to remooue diuerſe councellors about the king, and to reuenge the manifeſt iniuries doone to the common-wealth by the ſame rulers. Of the which as principall, the duke of Summerſet was namelie accuſed, both for that he was greatlie hated of the commons for the loſſe of Normandie: and for that it was well knowne, that he would be altogither againſt the duke of Yorke in his chalenge to be made (when time ſerued) to the crowne; inſomuch that his goods by the commons were foulie deſpoiled and borne awaie from the Blacke friers. After which riot, on the next morrow, proclamation was made through the citie, that no man ſhould ſpoile or rob, on paine of death. But on the ſame daie at the ſtandard in Cheape was a man beheaded for dooing contrarie to the proclamation.

Whethãſted. The duke of Yorke raiſeth a power, for recouerie of his right to the crowne.

Therefore, when the duke of Yorke had thus, by aduiſe of his ſpeciall fréends, framed the foundation of his long intended enterpriſe, he aſſembled a great hoaſt, to the number of ten thouſand able men, in the marches of Wales; publiſhing openlie, that the cauſe of this his gathering of people, was for the publike wealth of the realme. The king much aſtonied at the matter, by aduiſe of his councell raiſed a great power, and marched forward toward the duke. But he being thereof aduertiſed, turned out of that way, which by eſpials he vnderſtood that the king held, and made ſtreight toward London: and hauing knowledge that he might not be ſuffered to paſſe through the citie, he croſſed ouer the Thames at Kingſton bridge, and ſo kept on towards Kent, where he knew that he had both fréends & well-willers, and there on Burnt heath, a mile from Dertford, and twelue miles from London, he imbatelled, and incamped himſelfe verie ſtronglie, inuironing his field with artillerie and trenches. The king hereof aduertiſed, brought his armie with all diligence vnto Blackeheath, and there pight his tents.

Whethamſted

Whileſt both theſe armies laie thus imbattelled, the king ſent the biſhop of Winchester, and Thomas Bourchier, biſhop of Elie, Richard Wooduile, lord Riuers, & Richard Andrew, the kéeper of his priuie ſeale, to the duke: both to know the cauſe of ſo great a commotion, and alſo to make a concord; if the requeſts of the duke and his companie ſéemed conſonant to reaſon. The duke hearing the meſſage of the biſhops, anſwered; that his comming was neither to damnifie the king in honour, nor in perſon, neither yet anie good man: but his intent was, to remooue from him certeine euill diſpoſed perſons of his councell, bloud-ſuccours of the nobilitie, pollers of the cleargie, and oppreſſours of the poore people.

The dukes anſwer to the kings meſage

Amongſt theſe, he chéeflie named Edmund duke of Summerſet, whome if the king would commit to ward, to anſwer ſuch articles as againſt him in open parlement ſhould be both proponed and proued, he promiſed not onelie to diſſolue his armie; but alſo offered himſelfe (like an obedient ſubiect) to come to the kings preſence, and to doo him true and faithfull ſeruice, according to his loiall and bounden dutie. ¶ But a further vnderſtanding of the dukes meaning by this his forceable entering of the realme (as himſelfe pretended) maie appeare by certeine letters by him written to the king, and alſo the kings anſwers vnto the ſame: both which I thinke good here to ſet downe, as I find them recorded.

Richard duke of Yorke his letter to king Henrie.

PLeaſe it your highneſſe to conceiue, that ſince my departing out of this your realme, by your commandement, and being in your ſeruice in your land of Ireland, I haue béene informed, that diuerſe language hath béene ſaid of me to your moſt excellent eſtate, which ſhould ſound to my diſhonour and reproch, and charge of my perſon: howbeit, that I haue béene, and euer will be, your true liegeman and ſeruant. And if there be anie man that will or dare ſaie the contrarie, or charge me otherwiſe; I beſéech your rightwiſeneſſe to call him before your high preſence, and I will declare me for my diſcharge as a true knight ought to doo. And if I doo not, as I doubt not but I ſhall, I beſéech you to puniſh me as the pooreſt man of your land. And if he be found vntrue in his ſuggeſtion and information, I beſéech you of your highneſſe that he be puniſhed after his deſert, in example of all other.

Pleaſe it your excellencie to know, that as well before my departing out of this your realme, for to go into your land of Ireland, in your full noble ſeruice, as ſince, certeine perſons haue lien in wait for to hearken vpon me, as ſir Iohn Talbot knight at the caſtell of Holt; ſir Thomas Standleie knight in Cheſhire; Pulford at Cheſter; Elton at Worceſter; Broke at Gloceſter; and Richard, grome of your chamber at Beaumaris: which had in charge (as I am informed) to take me and put me into your caſtell of Conwaie, and to ſtrike off the head of ſir William Oldhall knight, and to haue put in priſon ſir William Deuereux knight, & ſir Edmund Malſo knight, withouten inlarging, vntill the time that your highneſſe had appointed their deliuerance.

Item, at ſuch time as I was purpoſed for to haue arriued at your hauen of Beaumaris, for to haue come to your noble preſence to declare me your true man and ſubiect, as my dutie is, my landing was ſtopped and forebarred by Henrie Norice, Thomas Norice, William Buckleie, William Gruſt, and Bartholomew Bould, your officers in Northwales, that I ſhould not land there, nor haue vittels nor refreſhing for me & my fellowſhip, as I haue written to your excellencie here before. So farre forth that Henrie Norice, deputie to the chamberlaine of Northwales, ſaid vnto me, that he had in commandement that I ſhould in no wiſe haue landing, refreſhing, nor lodging, for men nor horſſe, nor other thing that might turne to my worſhip or eaſe: putting the blame vpon William Saie vſher of your chamber, ſaieng and affirming that I am againſt your intent, and as a traitor, as I am informed. And moreouer, certeine letters were made and deliuered vnto Cheſter, Shrewesburie, and to other places for to let mine entrie into the ſame.

Item, aboue all wrongs and iniuries aboue ſaid doone vnto me of malice, without anie cauſe, I being in your land of Ireland, in your honourable ſeruice, certeine commiſſions were made and directed vnto diuerſe perſons; which for the execution of the ſame, ſat in certeine places, and the iuries impanelled and charged. Vnto the which iuries certeine perſons laboured inſtantlie to haue me indicted of treaſon, to the intent for to haue vndoone me and mine iſſue, and corrupted my bloud, as it is openlie publiſhed. Beſéeching your maieſtie roiall, of your righteouſneſſe, to doo examine theſe matters, and therevpon to doo ſuch iuſtice in his behalfe as the cauſe requireth: for mine intent is fullie to purſue to your highneſſe for the concluſion of theſe matters.

COſine, we haue ſéene the bill that ye tooke vs late, and alſo vnderſtand the good humble obedience that ye in your ſelfe ſhew vnto vs, as well in word as in deed: wherefore our intent is, the more haſtilie to eaſe you of ſuch things as were in your ſaid bill. Howbeit, that at our more leaſure we might anſwer you to your ſaid bill, yet we let you wit, that for the cauſes aforeſaid, we will declare you now our intent in theſe matters: ſith it is that a long time among the people hath béene vpon you many ſtrange language, and in eſpeciall anon after your diſordinate and vnlawfull ſlaieng of the biſhop of Cheſter, diuerſe and manie of the vntrue ſhipmen and other ſaid (in their maner) words againſt our eſtate, making manace to our owne perſon by your ſaiengs, that ye ſhould be fetched with manie thouſands, and ye ſhould take vpon you that, which ye neither ought, nor as we doubt not, ye will not attempt: ſo farre forth that it was ſaid to our perſon by diuerſe, & eſpeciallie we remember of one Waſnes, which had like words to vs.

And alſo there were diuerſe of ſuch falſe people, that went on and had like language in diuerſe of our townes of our land, which by our ſubiects were taken and dulie executed. Wherefore we ſent to diuerſe of our courts and places, to hearken and to take héed if anie ſuch maner comming were; and if there had béene, for to reſiſt it: but comming into our land our true ſubiect as ye did, our intent was not that ye, nor leſſe of eſtate of our ſubiects, nor none of your ſeruants ſhould not haue béene letted nor warned, but in goodlie wiſe receiued: howbeit that peraduenture your ſudden comming, without certeine warning, cauſed our ſeruants to doo as they did, conſidering the cauſes aboue ſaid. And as to the indictement that ye ſpoke of, we thinke verelie, and hold for certeine warning, cauſed our ſeruants to doo as they did, conſidering the cauſes aboue ſaid. And as to the indictement that ye ſpoke of, we thinke verelie and hold for certeine, that there was none ſuch. And if ye may trulie proue that anie perſon was thereabouts, the matter ſhall be demeaned as the caſe ſhall require: ſo that he ſhall know it is to our great diſpleaſure. Vpon this, for the eaſing of your heart in all ſuch matters, we declare, repute, and admit you as our true and faithfull ſubiect, and as our faithfull coſine.

PLeaſe it your highneſſe tenderlie to conſider, that great murmur and grudging is vniuerſallie in this your realme, in that iuſtice is not dulie miniſtred to ſuch as treſpaſſe and offend againſt you lawes, and in eſpeciall of them that be indicted of treaſon, and other being openlie noiſed of the ſame; whereby great inconueniences haue fallen, and great is like to fall hereafter in your ſaid realme, which God defend: but if by your highneſſe prouiſion conuenable be made for due reformation and puniſhment in this behalfe. Wherefore I your humble ſubiect and true liegeman, Richard duke of Yorke, willing as effectuallie as I can, and deſiring the ſuertie and proſperitie of your moſt roiall perſon, and the welfare of this your noble realme, counſell and aduertiſe your excellencie, for the conſeruation of good tranquillitie and peaceable rule among all other ſubiects, for to ordeine and prouide, that true iuſtice be had, againſt all ſuch that ſo be indicted, or openlie named: wherein I offer my ſelfe, and will put my indeuour for to execute your commandement in the premiſſes, for the puniſhing of ſuch offendors, and redreſſe of the ſaid miſrules, to my might and power. And for the haſtie execution hereof, like it your highneſſe, to addreſſe theſe letters of priuie ſeale and writs to your officers and miniſters, to doo, take, and arreſt, all ſuch perſons ſo noiſed and indicted, of what eſtate, degrée, or condition ſoeuer they be, and them to commit to the Tower of London, and to other of your priſons, there to abide without baile or mainepriſe, vntill the time they be vtterlie tried, and determined after the courſe of your lawes.

The anſvver of king Henrie to the duke of Yorke.

COſine, as touching your bill laſt put vp to vs, we vnderſtand well that ye (of good heart) counſell and aduertiſe vs to the ſetting vp of iuſtice, and to the ſpeedie puniſhing of ſome perſons indicted or noiſed, offering your ſeruice to be readie at commandement in the ſame, ſith it is that for manie cauſes mouing vs to haue determined in our ſoule, to ſtabliſh a ſad, and a ſubſtantiall councell, giuing them more ample authoritie and power than euer we did before this, in the which we haue appointed you to be one. But ſith it is not accuſtomed, ſure, nor expedient, to take a concluſion & conduct by aduiſe or counſell of one perſon by himſelfe for the conſeruation, it is obſerued that the greateſt and the beſt, the rich and the poore, in libertie, vertue, and effect of your voices be equall. We haue therefore determined within our ſelfe to ſend for our chancellour of England, and for other lords of our councell, yea and all other, togither within ſhort time ripelie to common of theſe and other our great matters. In which communication, ſuch concluſion (by the grace of God) ſhall be taken, as ſhall ſound to his pleaſure, the weale of vs and our land, as well in theſe matters as in anie other.

Whethamſted

After all this adoo, it was ſo agreed vpon by aduiſe, for the auoiding of bloudſhed, and pacifieng of the duke and his people, that the duke of Summerſet was committed to ward, as ſome ſay, or elſe commanded to keepe himſelfe priuie in his owne houſe for a time. But it ſhould ſeeme by that which ſome haue written, that the duke of Yorke was deceiued of the hope which he had, to be aided of the Kentiſhmen; inſomuch that when he ſaw himſelfe ouermatched by the king in number of people, who had got togither thrice as manie men as the duke had there with him, the duke was the more eaſie to be dealt with. And ſo comming to the king, and ſubmitting himſelfe by mediation of certeine of the nobilitie, he obteined pardon of that his former preſumptuous enterpriſe. And within a few daies after his comming to London with the king, he openlie in the church of S. Paule (the king being preſent) receiued a ſolemne oth, that from thenceforth, he ſhould no more commit any ſuch offenſe, nor attempt anie thing, either againſt the king, or any other of his liege people, contrarie to the order of law and iuſtice.

The duke of Yorks reconciliation to the king.

Howſoeuer the matter went, truth it is, that the duke of Yorke, the firſt of March, diſſolued his armie, brake vp his campe, & came to the kings tent, where contrarie to his expectation, & againſt promiſe made by the king (as other write) he found the duke of Summerſet going at large and ſet at libertie, whome the duke of Yorke boldlie accuſed of treaſon, briberie, oppreſſion, and manie other crimes. The duke of Summerſet not onelie made anſwer to the dukes obiections, but alſo accuſed him of high treaſon, affirming, that he with his fautors and complices had conſulted togither, how to come by the ſcepter and regall crowne of this realme. By meanes of which words the king remoued ſtreight to London, and the duke of Yorke (as priſoner) rode before him, and ſo was kept a while.

The duke of Yorke accuſeth the duke of Summerſet.

A mutuall charge betweene ỹ two dukes, Yorke & Summerſet of hie treaſon.

The king aſſembled togither a great councell at Weminſter, to heare the accuſations of the two dukes, the one obiecting to the other manie heinous and greeuous crimes. But the duke of Summerſet, which now conceiued in his mind the thing that ſhortlie followed, inceſſantlie exhorted the councell, that the duke of Yorke, by compulſion or otherwiſe, might be driuen to confeſſe his offenſe, that ſo being attainted of treaſon, he might ſuffer execution, and his children to be taken as aduerſaries to their natiue countrie; to the intent that by the extinction of him and his ſequele, all ciuill warre and inward diuiſion might ceaſſe and be repreſſed: beſeeching almightie God, that ſo great an enimie to the king and his bloud, might neuer eſcape puniſhment, nor continue long in life.

The duke of Summerſet ſet forth this matter the more vehementlie, bicauſe he knew perfectlie, that the duke of Yorke dailie imagined with himſelfe, how to get the crowne, and to depoſe and deſtroie both the king and him. But deſtinie cannot by anie mans deuiſe be letted, and manie things (to appearance) declared the duke of Yorkes innocencie in this caſe. Firſt, his free and voluntarie comming to the king, without conſtreint, when he was partlie of puiſſance able to haue incountred with the kings whole power. Secondlie, his humble ſubmiſſion, and reaſonable requeſts, as well on his owne behalfe, as for the poore commons: which might argue that he ſought for no ſoueraigntie.

Deſtinie cannot be auoided

Whileſt the councell treated of ſauing or diſpatching of this duke of Yorke, a rumor ſprang through London, that Edward earle of March, ſonne and heire apparant to the ſaid duke, with a great armie of Marchmen, was comming toward London: which tidings ſore appalled the queene and the whole councell. Beſide this, the verie ſame daie came ambaſſadours from the cheefe citizens and magiſtrats of the citie of Burdeaux; whereof the cheefe were, the earle of Kendale, and the lord de Leſparre; which ſignified to the councell, that if they would ſend an armie into Gaſcoigne, the people of the countrie would reuolt from the French part, and eftſoones become Engliſh. Theſe two things ſore troubled the heads of the councell, which, leaſt inward ſedition might hinder outward conqueſts, ſet the duke of Yorke at libertie, and permitted him to go to his caſtell of Wigmore, in the marches of Wales, by whoſe abſence the duke of Summerſet roſe in ſuch high fauour, both with the king and queene, that his word onelie ruled, and his voice alone was heard.

Occaſion that ſet the duke of Yorke free.

¶ Neuertheleſſe the ſaid duke of Yorke had firſt made his ſubmiſſion, and tooke his oth to be true, faithfull, and obedient ſubiect to king Henrie the ſixt king of England, in ſaint Pauls church at London, there being preſent the king, and moſt of his nobilitie, that is to ſaie, the dukes of Buckingham, Northampton, and Summerſet: the earls of Warwike, Arundell, Saliſburie, Shropſhire, Deuonſhire, Wiltſhire, Northumberland, Stafford and Dorſet, vicounts of Beaumount and Welles: barons, Fitz Warren, Sainmound, Cobham, Dowglas, and others: biſhops, the cardinall, archbiſhop of Yorke and Canturburie, Wincheſter, Elie, and London, in theſe words following.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 671, 672. in Quart.

I Richard duke of Yorke confeſſe and beknow, that I am & ought to be humble ſubiect and liegeman to you my ſoueraigne lord king Henrie the ſixt, and owe therefore to beare you faith and truth, as to my ſoueraigne liege lord, and ſhall doo all daies vnto my liues end; and ſhall not at anie time will or aſſent, that any thing attempted or doone againſt your moſt noble perſon: but where ſo euer I ſhall haue knowledge of anie ſuch thing imagined or purpoſed, I ſhall with all ſpeed and diligence poſſible to me, make that your highneſſe ſhall haue knowledge thereof: and ouer that, doo all that ſhall be poſſible to me, to the withſtanding and let thereof, to the vttermoſt of my life. I ſhall not anie thing take vpon me againſt your roiall eſtate or obeiſance that is due thereto, nor ſuffer anie other man to doo, as farre foorth as it ſhall be in my power to let it: and alſo ſhall come at your commandement when ſo euer I ſhall be called by the ſame, in humble and obeiſant wiſe: but if I be letted by anie ſickeneſſe or impotence of my perſon, or by ſuch other cauſe as ſhall be thought by you my ſouereigne lord reaſonable. I ſhall neuer hereafter take vpon me to gather anie rout, nor to make anie aſſemblie of your people, without your commandement or licence, or in my lawfull defenſe. In interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defenſe, I ſhall report me at all times to your highneſſe, and if the caſe require, to my peeres; nor any thing attempt againſt anie of your ſubiects, of what eſtate, degree, or condition that they be. But when ſo euer I find my ſelfe wronged and agreeued, I ſhall ſue humblie for remedie to your highneſſe: and proceed after the courſe of your lawes, and in none otherwiſe: ſauing in mine owne lawfull defenſe in maner aboue ſaid, and otherwiſe haue to your highneſſe as an humble and true ſubiect ought to haue him to his ſouereigne lord.

All theſe things aboue ſaid I promiſe you trulie to obſerue and keepe, by the holie euangeliſts conteined in the booke that I laie my hand herevpon, and by the holie croſſe I here touch, and by the bleſſed ſacrament of our Lords bodie, that I ſhall now with his mercie receiue. And ouer I agree me and will, that if I anie time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer ſhall, anie thing attempt by waie of feat or otherwiſe againſt your roiall maieſtie, and obeiſance that I owe therto, or anie thing take vpon me otherwiſe than is aboue expreſſed, I from that time foorth be vnabled, held, and taken as an vntrue and openlie forſworne man, and vnable to all maner of worſhip, eſtate, and degree, be it ſuch as I now occupie, or anie other that might in anie wiſe grow vnto me hereafter. And this I haue here promiſed and ſworne, proceedeth of mine owne deſire and free voluntee, and by no conſtraining or coaction. In witneſſe of all the which things aboue written, I Richard duke of Yorke (aboue named) ſubſcribe with mine owne hand and ſeale.

Anno Reg. 31.

The councell not forgetting the offer of the Gaſcoignes, and that they might now haue the citie of Burdeaux, with the countrie round about, by requeſt of the inhabitants, appointed the valiant capteine Iohn lord Talbot earle of Shrewſburie, to go thither with an armie: who arriuing in the Ile of Madre, paſſed foorth with his power, being ſcant three thouſand men, and tooke the ſtrong towne of Fronſacke, and diuerſe other townes & fortreſſes. The inhabitants of Burdeaux, hearing of the earles arriuall, ſent to him meſſengers in the darke night, requiring him with all ſpeed to come and receiue the citie. The earle loſt not one houre, but haſted foorth, & came before that citie, yer the Frenchmen within vnderſtood anie thing of the citizens purpoſe. When they were aduertiſed that there was a gate ſet open for the Engliſhmen to enter, they thought to haue eſcaped ſecretlie by a poſterne: but they were purſued, ſlaine, and taken by the lord de Leſpar, and other of the Engliſh armie.

After the regaining of Burdeaux, there arriued at Blaie the baſtard of Summerſet, ſir Iohn Talbot, lord Liſle by his wife, ſonne to the ſaid erle of Shrewesburie, the lord Molins, the lord Harington, the lord Camois, ſir Iohn Howard, ſir Iohn Montgomerie, ſir Iohn Vernon, with two & twentie hundred men, with vittels and munitions. When the earle was thus (according to his intent) of all things furniſhed, firſt he fortified Burdeaux with Engliſhmen, and ſtore of vittels; and after that he rode into the countrie abroad, where he obteined cities, and got townes without ſtroke or dint of ſword, for the people alreadie wearied of the French ſeruitude, and longing ſore to returne to the Engliſh libertie, ſeemed to deſire nothing more than to haue the earle to receiue them into the Engliſh obeiſance. Amongſt other townes, the towne and caſtell of Chaſtillon in Perigort was to him deliuered, the which he fortified with men and ordinance verie ſtronglie.

The French people ſore wearie of the French gouernment.

In the meane time, the French king, being aduertiſed of all theſe doings, raiſed an armie to reſiſt this inuaſion made by the erle of Shrewesburie. And firſt he appointed his capteins to beſiege the towne of Chaſtillon, to the reſcue whereof the earle haſted forward, hauing in his companie eight hundred horſſemen, vnder the leading of his ſonne the lord Liſle, the lord Molins, the lord Camois, ſir Edward Hull, ſir Iohn Howard, and ſir Iohn Vernon. He appointed alſo fiue thouſand footmen, vnder the conduct of the earle of Kendall, and the lord de Leſpar, to follow him with all ſpeed. In his waie, he tooke by fine force a tower which the Frenchmen had taken, and ſlue all that he found within it. And after by the waie, he met fiue hundred Frenchmen going a foraging, of whome he ſlue the more part, and chaſed the other to the campe.

The Frenchmen that laie at the ſiege, perceiuing by thoſe good runners away that the earle approched, left the ſiege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched, diched, and fortified with ordinance. The earle aduertiſed how the ſiege was remoued, haſted forward towards his enimies, doubting moſt, leaſt they would haue beene quite fled and gone before his comming. But they fearing the diſpleaſure of the French king (who was not far off) if they ſhould haue fled, abode the earles comming, and ſo receiued him: who though he firſt with manfull courage, and ſore fighting wan the entrie of their campe; yet at length they compaſſed him about, and ſhooting him through the thigh with an handgun, ſlue his horſſe, and finallie killed him lieng on the ground, whome they durſt neuer looke in the face, while he ſtood on his feet.

The valiant earle of Shrewſburie and his ſon manfullie ſlaine.

It was ſaid, that after he perceiued there was no remedie, but preſent loſſe of the battell, he counſelled his ſonne the lord Liſle, to ſaue himſelfe by flight, ſith the ſame could not redound to anie great reproch in him, this being the firſt iournie in which he had beene preſent. Manie words he vſed to perſuade him to haue ſaued his life: but nature ſo wrought in the ſon, that neither deſire of life, nor feare of death, could either cauſe him to ſhrinke, or conueie himſelfe out of the danger, and ſo there manfullie ended his life with his ſaid father. There died alſo the earles baſtard ſonne Henrie Talbot, and ſir Edward Hull elect to the order of the garter, and thirtie other men of name and right valiant perſonages of the Engliſh nation.

The lord Molins was taken priſoner with thréeſcore others. The reſidue of the Engliſh people fled to Burdeaux and other places, of whome in the flight were ſlaine aboue a thouſand perſons.

Thus at this battell of Chatillon, fought the thirtéenth daie of Julie in this yeare, ended his life John lord Talbot, and of his progenie the firſt earle of Shrewesburie: after that he with much fame and moſt victorie, had valiantlie made warre, and ſerued his prince and countrie by the ſpace of foure and twentie yeares, in the parties of beyond the ſeas, whoſe corps was left on ground, and after was found by his fréends, and conueied to Whitchurch in Shropſhire where it was interred. After this diſcomfiture diuerſe lords fled to Burdeaux, but the earle of Candall, the lords of Montferrant, of Roſaine, & of Dangladas entered into the caſtell of Chatillon, which by the ſpace of ten daies they defended: but in the end deſpairing of all ſuccours, they rendred the fortreſſe, and came ſafe to Burdeaux.

After this, the townes of ſaint Million, Liborne, and all other, which the erle of Shrewesburie had conquered, rendred themſelues to the Frenchmen, Burdeaux onelie excepted. Which citie, being the laſt refuge of the Engliſh people, the French king in perſon beſieged with all his puiſſance; and in concluſion conſtreined both the garriſons and inhabitants to yéeld, ſo that the Engliſhmen & Gaſcoignes might ſafelie depart into England or into Calis, with all their ſubſtance; and that the lords de Leſparre, Duras, and thirtie others, ſhould neuer (vpon paine of death) be found within anie of the French kings dominions, which lord de Leſparre being after taken in Gaſcoigne diſguiſed, was made ſhorter by the head. When this compoſition was agréed and ſealed, the Engliſhmen were ſhortlie tranſported ouer into England, in the moneth of October this preſent yeare.

Burdeaux yéelded againe to ÿ French.

Aquitaine loſt.

Thus was the duchie of Aquitaine, which had continued in the Engliſh poſſeſſion, from the yeare of our Lord 1155, vnto this preſent yeare, which is néere hand thrée hundred yeares, by the mariage of Elenor daughter and heire to William duke of Aquitaine, wife to king Henrie the ſecond, finallie reduced and brought againe to the French obedience and ſeruitude. Within that onlie duchie be foure archbiſhops, foure and twentie biſhops, fiftéene earledomes, two hundred and two baronies, and aboue a thouſand capteinſhips and baliffewikes: whereby ye may conſider, what a loſſe this was to the realme of England. On the thirtéenth daie of October this yeare, was the quéene deliuered at Weſtminſter of a faire ſonne, who was chriſtened, and named Edward.

The dignitie and ſtate of that dukedome.

The quéene deliuered of hir ſon prince Edward.

His mother ſuſteined not a little ſlander and obloquie of the common people, who had an opinion that the king was not able to get a child; and therefore ſticked not to ſaie, that this was not his ſonne, with manie ſlanderous words, greatlie ſounding to the quéenes diſhonour; much part perchance vntrulie. After the birth of this child, he highlie aduanced his brethren on his mothers ſide: for Edmund he made earle of Richmond, which was father to king Henrie the ſeuenth, and Jaſper he created erle of Penbroke, which died without iſſue. ¶This yeare, John Stafford archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, and John Kempe archbiſhop of Yorke was remoued from that ſée, to ſuccéed in place of the ſaid Stafford, being the thrée ſcore and ſecond archbiſhop there, & John Booth biſhop of Couentrie and Lichfield was tranſlated to Yorke, being the one and fiftith archbiſhop of that church.

Abr.Fl. ex I.St pag.673.

¶On Bartholomew daie at the wreſtling néere vnto Clerkenwell, a gentleman belonging to the prior of ſaint Johns, made a rumor or tumult, for the which (by the commandement of the maior) he was areſted by Richard Allie one of the ſhiriffes, and deliuered to Paris a ſergeant. But ſuch reſiſtance was made by parts taking, that the ſhiriffe was faine to craue helpe of the maior, who with his brethren the aldermen aroſe from the game, and ſtrengthened the ſhiriffes. And for the reſcue of the ſaid gentleman, one named Calis, came out of ſaint Johns with a great ſtrength of archers, to reſiſt the maior, in the which fraie a yeoman of ſaint Johns was ſlaine, and manie other ſore hurt. The maior himſelfe eſcaped hardlie, for his cap was ſmitten from his head with an arrow: but the maior with his citizens put the other to flight, ſent the principall of them to Newgate, and then tooke his place againe till the games were ended: by which time the citizens had gathered themſelues in great number, and fetched him home, neuer maior ſo ſtronglie nor ſo honorablie.]

Anno Reg.32.

✱ This yeare was Thomas Bourchier biſhop of Elie (ſonne to the counteſſe of Stafford, and brother to Henrie Bourchier earle of Eſſex) remooued to the ſée of Canturburie; who in the yeare after the word became fleſh and appeared in humane ſhape 1443, firſt obteined the ſée of Elie (although once before he was by the king put backe from thence after his election of the couent thereunto, and confirmation of the pope) being tranſlated from Worceſter to the ſaid ſée of Elie, the twelfth daie of March in the ſaid yeare 1443. This man (after that he had remained at Elie ten yeares, thrée and twentie wéekes, and fiue daies) was (as is before ſaid) in this yeare 1454 remooued to Canturburie by Nicholas the fift then biſhop of Rome. After this he was made chancellor, which office he obteined the ſeauenth of March, in the yeare 1455, being the thrée and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the ſixts reigne. Laſtlie he was aduanced to the dignitie of cardinall by pope Paule the ſecond, in the yeare of our Lord 1465, of whome is made a more liberall diſcourſe in a *tretiſe of the liues of the chancellors of England: a place of no ſmall authoritie and reputation.]

*In a tretiſe hereafter following.

After the warres foulie ended in forren parties, ciuill diſſention began againe at home, diuided ſpeciallie into two factions. As K. Henrie deſcended of the houſe of Lancaſter poſſeſſed the crowne from his grandfather king Henrie the fourth (firſt author of that title) ſo Richard duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionell duke of Clarence, third ſonne to king Edward the third, inforced. By reaſon whereof, the nobles as well as the common people were into parts diuided, to the vtter deſtruction of manie a man, and to the great ruine and decaie of this region: for while the one partie ſought to deſtroie the other, all care of the common-wealth was ſet aſide, and iuſtice and equitie clearelie exiled.

The duke of Yorke ſéeks the deſtructiō of the duke of Summerſet.

The duke of Yorke (aboue all things) firſt ſought means how to ſtir vp the malice of the people againſt the duke of Summerſet, imagining that he being made awaie, his purpoſe ſhould the ſooner take effect. He alſo practiſed to bring the king into the hatred of the people, as that he ſhould not be a man apt to the gouernment of a realme, wanting both wit and ſtomach ſufficient to ſupplie ſuch a roome. Manie of the high eſtates, not liking the world, and diſalowing the doings both of the king and his councell, were faine inough of ſome alteration. Which thing the duke well vnderſtanding, chiefelie ſought the fauour of the two Neuils, both named Richard, one earle of Saliſburie, the other earle of Warwike, the firſt being the father, and the ſecond the ſonne.

He banded himſelfe with the Neuils.

This earle of Saliſburie was ſecond ſon to Rafe Neuill earle of Weſtmerland, whoſe daughter the duke of Yorke had maried, and the ſaid Richard was eſpouſed to ladie Alice, the onelie child and ſole heire of Thomas Montacute earle of Saliſburie, ſlaine at the ſiege of Orleance (as before is declared) of which woman he begat Richard, Iohn, and George: Richard the eldeſt ſonne eſpouſed Anne, the ſiſter and heire of the entire blood to lord Henrie Beauchamp earle and after duke of Warwike, in whoſe right and title he was created and named earle of Warwike. [Full fraught was this noble man with good qualities right excellent and manie, all which a certeine naturall grace did vnto all eſtates ſo farforth recommend, that with high and low he was in ſingular fauour and good liking, ſo as (vnſought for) it ſéemed, in authoritie among them, he grew able to command all alone.]

Anno Reg. 33.

The duke of Summerſet arreſted.

1455

The king ſicke.

Whethamſted.

When the duke of Yorke had faſtened his chaine betwéene theſe two ſtrong pillers, he with his frends wrought ſo effectuouſlie, and handled his buſineſſe ſo politikelie, that the duke of Summerſet was areſted in the quéenes great chamber, and ſent to the Tower of London, where he kept his Chriſtmaſſe without great ſolemnitie. Againſt whom, ſoone after in open parlement were laid diuerſe and heinous articles of high treaſon, as well for the loſſe of Normandie, as for the late miſchance which happened in Guien. The king at that time was ſicke at Clarendon, and conueied to London, by reaſon whereof no finall determination procéeded in this weightie cauſe; but all was put in ſuſpenſe, till the next aſſemblie of the high court of parlement. Some doo write, that whileſt the king was ſicke, the duke of Yorke bare all the rule, and gouerned as regent or viceroie, by authoritie committed to him by the lords of the realme, then aſſembled in councell; he to ſée to the preſeruation and good gouernement of the common-wealth, during the kings ſickneſſe, which was ſo gréeuous (as it was ſaid) that he laie ſenſeleſſe, and was not able for a time either to go or ſtand.

The duke of Summerſet ſet at libertie.

Made deputie of Calis.

The duke of Yorke hauing aforehand obteined an abſolution of the pope, in diſcharge of his oth before taken, did now diſcouer his ſtomach againſt the duke of Summerſet. But when the king was amended againe, and reſumed to him his former gouernement, either of his owne mind, or by the quéenes procurement, the duke of Summerſet was ſet at libertie; by which doing, great enuie and diſpleaſure grew. That notwithſtanding, the quéene (which then bare the chiefe rule) cauſed the duke of Summerſet to be preferred to the capteineſhip of Calis, wherwith not onlie the commons, but alſo manie of the nobilitie were greatlie gréeued and offended, ſaieng, that he had loſt Normandie, and ſo would he doo Calis.

The duke of Yorke aſſembled an armie.

Whethamſted.

The king with two thouſand.

The duke of Yorke and his adherents, perceiuing that neither exhortation nor charging him with his crimes preuailed againſt the duke of Summerſet, they meant to mend the matter by open war: & ſoone after he being in the marches of Wales, accompanied with his ſpeciall friends, the earles of Saliſburie, and Warwike, the lord Cobham, and others, aſſembled a power, and in warlike maner marched toward London. The king informed hereof, aſſembled likewiſe a great hoſt, and meaning to méet with the duke, rather in the north parts than about London, where it was thought he had too manie friends, he accompanied with the dukes of Summerſet and Buckingham, the earles of Penbroke, Stafford, Northumberland, Deuonſhire, Dorſet, and Wilſhire, the lords Clifford, Sudlie, Berneis, Roos, and others, being in all aboue two thouſand men of warre, departed from Weſtminſter the twentith, or (as ſome haue) the one and twentith of Maie, and laie the firſt night at Wadford.

The duke with thrée thouſand.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 675, 676, 677. in Quart.

Of whoſe doings the duke of Yorke by eſpials hauing ſtill aduertiſement, with all his power, being not paſt thrée thouſand men (as ſome write) coaſted the countrie, and came to ſaint Albons the third daie next inſuing. The king there had pight his ſtandard in a place called Goſelow, otherwiſe Sandiford, in ſaint Peters ſtréet: the lord Clifford kept the barriers of the towne, to ſtop, that the duke being aſſembled in Keie field, ſhould not enter the towne. ¶ The duke of Yorke (ſaith one moderne chronographer) knowing the ſtrength made againſt him, abiding in the field aforeſaid, from ſeuen of the clocke in the morning vntill it was almoſt ten of the clocke without anie ſtroke ſmitten on either part, by the aduiſe of his councell ſent vnto the king vnder theſe words following.

Words in writing by the duke of Yorke to the king.

PLeaſe it vnto your excellent grace, Richard duke of Yorke, to take him as your true liege man and humble ſubiect; and to conſider and tender at the reuerence of God, and in the waie of charitie, the true intent of my comming, and to be good and gratious ſouereigne vnto me, & all other your true liege men, which, that with all their power and might will be readie to liue and die with you in your right, and to doo all things as ſhall like your maieſtie roiall to command vs, if it be to the worſhip of the crowne of England, and the welfare of this your noble realme. Moreouer, gratious lord, pleaſe it vnto your maieſtie roiall, of your great goodneſſe and rightwiſeneſſe, to incline your will to heare & féele the rightwiſe part of vs your true ſubiects and liege men. Firſt, praieng and beſéeching to our ſouereigne, Chriſt Ieſus, of his high and mightie power, to giue you vertue of prudence, and that through the praier of the glorious martyr S. Albon giue you verie knowledge of our truths, and to know the intent of our aſſembling at this time: for God that is in heauen knoweth, our intent is rightfull and true. And therefore we praie vnto that mightie Lord in theſe words: Domine ſis clypeus defenſionis noſtræ. Wherfore gratious lord, pleaſe it your maieſtie roiall, to deliuer ſuch as we will accuſe, and they to haue like as they haue deſerued: and this doone, you to be honorablie worſhipped as moſt rightfull king and our true gouernour. And if we ſhould now at this time be promiſed, as afore this time (is not vnknowen) haue béene promiſes broken which haue béene full faithfullie promiſed, and therevpon great othes ſworne, we will not now ceaſſe for no ſuch promiſes, nor oth, till we haue them which haue deſerued death, or elſe we to die therefore.

The anſwer by the king to the duke of Yorke.

I King Henrie charge and command, that no manner perſon, of what degrée, eſtate or what condition ſoeuer he be, abide not; but that they auoid the field, and not be ſo hardie to make reſiſtance againſt me in my owne realme. For I ſhall know what traitour dare be ſo bold to raiſe anie people in mine owne land, wherethrough I am in great diſeaſe and heauines. By the faith I owe vnto S. Edward, and vnto the crowne of England, I ſhall deſtroie them euerie mothers ſonne, and eke they to be hanged, drawne, and quartered, that may be taken afterward of them, in example to make all ſuch traitors to beware for to make anie riſing of people within mine owne land, and ſo traitorouſlie to abide their king and gouernour. And for a concluſion, rather than they ſhall haue anie lord, that here is with me at this time, I ſhall this day for their ſake in this quarell my ſelfe liue and die.

The

The words of the duke of Yorke to all gentlemen and other aſſembled with him.

SIrs, the king our ſoueraigne lord will not be reformed at our beſeeching ne praier, nor will not in no wiſe vnderſtand the intent wherfore we be here aſſembled and gathered at this time, but onelie is in full purpoſe to deſtroie vs all. And therupon a great oth hath made, that there is none other waie, but that he with all his power will purſue vs; and if we be taken, to giue vs a ſhamefull death, leeſing our liuelod and goods, and alſo our heires ſhamed for euer. Therefore ſirs, now ſith it will none otherwiſe be, but that we ſhall vtterlie die; better it is for vs to die in the field, than cowardlie to be put to an vtter rebuke and ſhamefull death, for the right of England ſtandeth in vs. Conſidering alſo in what perill it ſtandeth at this time, and for to redreſſe the miſcheefe thereof, let euerie man helpe to his power this daie, and in that quarell to quite vs like men, to the crowne of England; praieng and beſeeching vnto that Lord, the which is eternall, that reigneth in the glorious kingdome celeſtiall, to keepe and ſaue vs this daie in our right, and through the gifts of his holie grace we may be made ſtrong to withſtand the great, abhominable, and horrible malice of them that purpoſe to deſtroie vs and the realme of England, and put vs to a ſhamefull death. Praie we therefore to the Lord to be our comfort and our defendour, ſaieng theſe words, Domine ſis clypeus defenſionis noſtræ.]

Whethamſted

The duke of Buckingham ſent to yͤ duke of Yorke.

But another hiſtorie-writer ſaith, that the king, when firſt he heard of the duke of Yorks approch, ſent to him meſſengers, the duke of Buckingham, and others, to vnderſtand what he meant by his comming thus in maner of warre. The duke of Buckingham to his meſſage was anſwered by the duke of Yorke and his complices, that they were all of them the kings faithfull liege ſubiects, and intended no harme to him at all: but the cauſe of our comming (ſaie they) is not in meaning anie hurt to his perſon. But let that wicked and naughtie man the duke of Summerſet be deliuered vnto vs, who hath loſt Normandie, and taken no regard to the preſeruation of Gaſcoigne; and furthermore, hath brought the realme vnto this miſerable eſtate; that where it was the floure of nations, and the princeſſe of prouinces [now is it haled into deſolation & ſpoile, not ſo dreadfull by malice of forren enimie, that indeed vtterlie (as yee know) ſeeketh our ruine, as by the intollerable outrages of him that ſo long ago & euen ſtill appeares to haue ſworne the confuſion of our king and realme.] If it therefore pleaſe the king to deliuer that bad man into our hands, we are readie without trouble or breach of peace, to returne into our countrie. But if the king be not minded ſo to do, bicauſe he cannot miſſe him; let him vnderſtand, that we will rather die in the field, than ſuffer ſuch a miſcheefe vnredreſſed.

The duke of Summerſet burdned with all things that had happened amiſſe.

W. P.

The king aduertiſed of this anſwer, more wilfull than tollerable, appointed him rather to trie battell, than deliuer the duke of Summerſet to his enimies. Whereof they aſcerteined made no longer ſtaie, but ſtreightwaie ſounded the trumpet to battell: or rather (as Hall ſaith) while king Henrie ſent forth his ambaſſadours to treat of peace at the one end of the towne, the earle of Warwike with his Marchmen entred at the other end, and fiercelie ſetting on the kings fore-ward, within a ſmall time diſcomfited the ſame. The place where they firſt brake into the towne, was about the middle of ſaint Peters ſtreet. The fight for a time was right ſharpe and cruell, for the duke of Summerſet, with the other lords, comming to the ſuccours of their companions that were put to the worſe, did what they could to beat backe the enimies: but the duke of Yorke ſent euer freſh men to ſuccour the wearie, and to ſupplie the places of them that were hurt, whereby the kings armie was finallie brought low, and all the cheefteins of the field ſlaine and beaten downe.

The firſt battell of ſaint Albons.

Edw. Hall.

For there died vnder the ſigne of the caſtell, Edmund duke of Summerſet, who (as hath beene reported) was warned long before to auoid all caſtels: and beſide him laie Henrie the ſecond of that name earle of Northumberland, Humfrie earle of Stafford ſonne to the duke of Buckingham, John lord Clifford, ſir Barthram Antwiſell knight, a Norman borne (who forſaking his natiue countrie to continue in his loiall obedience to king Henrie, came ouer to dwell here in England when Normandie was loſt) William Zouch, John Boutreux, Rafe Bapthorp, with his ſonne William Corwin, William Cotton, Gilbert Faldinger, Reginald Griffon, John Dawes, Elice Wood, John Eith, Rafe Woodward, Gilbert Skarlock, and Rafe Willoughbie eſquiers, with manie other, in all to the number of eight thouſand, as Edward Hall ſaith in his chronicle: if there eſcaped not a fault in the impreſſion, as 8000 for 800, ſith hundreds in verie deed would better agree with the number of the kings whole power, which he brought with him to that battell, being not manie aboue two thouſand, as by writers appeareth.

The duke of Summerſet ſlaine.

Thomas lord Clifford, ſaith Whethamſted.

Humfreie duke of Buckingham, being wounded, and James Butler earle of Ormond and Wilſhire, and Thomas Thorp lord cheefe baron of the eſcheker, ſeeing fortune thus againſt them, left the king alone, and with a number fled awaie. Thoſe that thus fled, made the beſt ſhift they could to get awaie through gardens and backeſides, through ſhrubs, hedges and woods, ſeeking places where to hide themſelues, vntill that dangerous tempeſt of the battell were ouerblowne. Diuerſe of the kings houſe alſo that could better ſkill to plaie the courtiers than warriors, fled with the firſt; and thoſe of the eaſt parts of the realme were likewiſe noted of too much lacke of courage, for their ſpeedie withdrawing themſelues, and leauing the king in danger of his aduerſaries: who perceiuing his men thus fled from him, withdrew into a poore mans houſe to ſaue himſelfe from the ſhot of arrowes, that flue about him as thicke as ſnow.

The kings part vanquiſhed.

¶ This doone, ſaith one hiſtorien, the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwike, and Saliſburie, came vnto the king where he was, and beſought him on their knees of grace and forgiueneſſe for that they had doone in his preſence, and beſought him of his highneſſe to take them to grace, and as his true liege men. The king deſiring them to ceaſe their people, that there ſhould be no more hurt doone, and to obeie his commandement, did cauſe to be proclamed in the kings name, that all manner of people ſhould ceaſe off their malice, and not to ſmite one ſtroke more, and ſo ceaſed the battell. And vpon the day next after, the king and the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwike & Saliſburie, came all to London; and were lodged in the biſhops palace of London, where they kept their Whitſuntide with great ioy and ſolemnitie, concluding there to hold a parlement, the ſame to begin on the ninth daie of Julie next following.]

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 678, 679. in Quart.

Another hiſtorien ſaith, that the duke of Yorke, aduertiſed of the place into the which the king was withdrawne for the ſafetie of himſelfe, and taking him into his power, comforted him in the beſt wiſe he could; aſſuring him, that now that the common enimie of the realme was diſpatched, to wit, the duke of Summerſet, he had cauſe rather to reioiſe, than to be ſorie, ſith his deſtruction was the kings preſeruation. And for himſelfe and all his adherents he vndertooke, that they were and would remaine, during life, his moſt faithfull liege people, readie in all points to ſerue him, as his truſtie and obedient ſubiects. After he had vſed ſuch words, as wherewith beſt to comfort him, he brought the king foorth of that ſimple houſe with all due reuerence ſhewed toward him firſt to the ſhrine, and after to his chamber.

Whileſt the duke of Yorke was about thus to comfort the king, the ſoldiers that had the victorie now in their hands, applied the ſpoile, namelie, the Northerne men, ſtripping not onelie thoſe that had borne armor againſt them, but alſo the townſmen and other, with whom they might meet. So that it was thought, if the king had taken vp his lodging at his firſt comming thither, within the abbeie, as he did not (but in the middeſt of the towne, to prouide the better to reſiſt his enimies) the abbeie had beene ſpoiled alſo. This was the end of the firſt battell at ſaint Albons, which was fought vpon the thurſdaie next before the feaſt of Penthecoſt, being the three and twentith day of Maie, in this three and thirtith yeare of the kings reigne. The bodies of the noble men were buried in the monaſterie in our ladies chappell, and the meane people in other places. This Edmund duke of Summerſet left behind him three ſonnes, Henrie, Edmund and Iohn, which to the extremitie of death tooke part with the line of king Henrie.

Battell of S. Albons on thurſday the 23 of Maie. Anno Reg. 33.

Foure of thẽ to wit, the duke of Sũmerſet, the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, were buried in our ladie chapell. Whethamſted

[There was this yeare a great fight ⁊ fraie vpon Cliſt heath, diſtant about two miles from Exceſter, betweene Thomas Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, againſt William lord Bonuile of Shut, and ſundrie men of both parts were ſlaine. But yet the lord Bonuile preuailed ⁊ had the victorie, who foorthwith came to this citie, and the gates before being ſhut, were opened and he receiued; which thing ſo greeued the earle, that he continuallie ſought thencefoorth to be reuenged. But not long after in the quarell betweene king Henrie the ſixt, and king Edward the fourth, he ended his daies, and was beheaded at Yorke, and was the laſt of that line.]

Iohn Hooker, alias Vowell.

The duke of Yorke, hauing gotten the victorie, remembred well, that he had publiſhed abroad how the onelie cauſe of this warre was, for the aduancement of the common-wealth, and therefore vſing all courteſie, would not touch the kings perſon after anie violent ſort; but with all honour and due reuerence conueied him to London, and ſo to Weſtminſter. To which place was ſummoned a parlement, which began the ninth daie of Iulie, in the which ſeſſion, the late duke of Gloceſter was openlie declared a true ſubiect, both to the king and to the realme. Beſide this, it was enacted, that no perſon ſhould either iudge or report anie point of vntruth of the duke of Yorke, the earles of Saliſburie and Warwike, or of anie knight, eſquier, archer, or other, for comming in warlike araie againſt the king, at ſaint Albons; conſidering their enterpriſe was onelie to ſee the kings perſon in ſafegard.

A parlement.

But all the blame was put vpon the duke of Summerſet, Thomas Thorp, baron of the eſcheker, and William Ioſep eſquier, the kings collaterall companion; bicauſe that they, vpon malicious purpoſe, kept a certeine letter from the kings knowledge, and would in no wiſe ſuffer it to be deliuered vnto him, notwithſtanding the ſame made to the aduancement of ſome good peace, had it beene throughlie and aduiſedlie read, weied ⁊ conſidered. In which letter they declared, that as faithfull and humble ſubiects, they required onelie, that it would pleaſe the king (whoſe honor, health, ſuertie, and preſeruation, they cheefelie wiſhed) not to giue credence to their aduerſaries malicious ſuggeſtions, till their comming to his preſence, vnto the which they humblie beſought him that they might be admitted as his faithfull liege people, to ſhew the intent and purpoſe of their commings; which was to none other end, than to declare their fidelitie and allegiance towards his moſt roiall perſon, intending to put themſelues with as much diligence and trauell in all things that might aduance his honour, health, and ſafegard, as any ſubiect he had liuing.

Whethamſted Collaterall. A letter kept from the king of purpoſe.

The keeping backe of this letter from the kings ſight and knowledge, did miniſter matter ſufficient vnto the parlement, to colour and iuſtifie for well doone all tranſgreſſions committed in the late battell and chaſe at ſaint Albons. In this parlement alſo, the duke of Yorke was made protector of the realme, and the earle of Saliſburie was appointed to be lord chancellour, and had the great ſeale to him deliuered, and the earle of Warwike was elected to the office of the capteineſhip of Calis, and the territories of the ſame; and thus the rule of the realme reſted in the orders of the duke and chancellour, and all warlike affaires remained principallie in the earle of Warwike. And ſo amongeſt them it was agreed, that king Henrie ſhould reigne ſtill in name and dignitie, but neither in deed nor in authoritie; not minding to deſtroie him, leaſt they might ſuddenlie prouoke the furie of the common people againſt them, bicauſe that of the ſimple ſort of people he was for his holineſſe of life, and abundant clemencie, much fauoured and highlie eſteemed.

The duke of Yorkes comming againſt the king iuſtified.

The duke of Yorke made protector of the realme.

The king to reigne in name but not in authoritie.

In this parlement alſo it was enacted, that the king ſhould reſume, take into his hands againe, haue and reteine into his poſſeſſion, all honours, caſtels, lordſhips, townes, villages, manours, lands, tenements, waſts, foreſts, chaſes, rents, reuerſions, fees, farmes, ſeruices, iſſues, profits, counties, aduouſons of priories, churches, hoſpitals, and free chapels, and all other reuenues with their appurtenances, the which had paſſed from him ſince the firſt daie of his reigne vnto that preſent; either by his letters patents, or authoritie of parlement, and manie other meanes, whether by grant, confirmation, or releaſe from him made in fee ſimple, or fee taile, for tearme of life or yeares, to anie maner of perſon and perſons in England, Wales, Scotland, or the marches; in Ireland, or in the townes of Calis, ⁊ Guiſnes, ⁊ the marches there. And likewiſe all grants made of ſuch things as are aboue mentioned, being parcell of the duchie of Lancaſter; and further all grants of offices, roomes, fees, wages, or commodities, not accuſtomed to belong to anie office or charge before the ſaid firſt daie of the kings reigne, were likewiſe reuoked.

Whethamſted. An act for the K. to reuoke certeine grants.

Diuerſe other things were alſo conteined within this reuocation and generall reſumption; with certeine exceptions yet and prouiſoes had, as were thought conuenient, and as by the ſame act it dooth appeare. Moreouer, now that the duke of Yorke and his adherents had wreſted the whole rule ⁊ gouernement into their hands; all ſuch perſons as the king either loued, or the queene fauoured, were put beſide the priuie councell; and ſuch put in their places, as were knowne to fauour the houſe of Yorke. Alſo the officers were changed thoroughout the realme, at the will and diſpoſition of the protector, chancellour, and capteine of Calis; ſo that they conſtituted as it were a triumuirat, ruling all things at diſcretion of theſe three. And yet in all their rule I find not that anie mention is made of their deferring of iuſtice, or of anie polling or briberie: as was openlie proued by ſuch as gouerned before their time. Onlie they were noted of diuerſe ſpirituall perſons, and namelie of the abbat of Weſtminſter and his moonks, for a great offenſe: bicauſe they tooke out of the ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter, Iohn Holland duke of Exceſter, all againſt the order taken in the laſt parlement, and ſent him to the caſtell of Pomfret.

Henrie duke of Summerſet.

But now the lord Henrie Beauford, newlie duke of Summerſet by the death of duke Edmund his father, ſlaine at the battell of ſaint Albons (as aboue is rehearſed) and Humfrie duke of Buckingham (who then ⁊ there loſt his ſonne and heire) and other of eſtate taking the part of king Henrie, whoſe caſe they did much bewaile ⁊ doubt, as perceiuing whereto the courteſie of the duke of Yorke did draw: they therefore thinking it neceſſarie to purueie for a remedie yer the miſcheefe happened, conſulted with the queene. By whoſe aduiſe was a great councell called at Greenewich, where the duke of Yorke was diſcharged of his protectorſhip, ⁊ the earle of Saliſburie depriued alſo of his office. ¶ This ſudden change amongſt the nobilitie cauſed alterations, and ſeditions attempts in the commonaltie, and in eſpeciall within London: whereof this was one. A yoong merchant, which before time had beene in diuerſe cities of Italie, and there forbidden by the magiſtrats (as the law and maner is) to weare anie weapon, now challenged an Italian in Cheapſide for wearing a dagger, telling him it was againſt his owne countrie lawes: whereto bicauſe the Italian anſwered ſomewhat diſdainefullie, the merchant not onelie tooke by force from him his dagger, but alſo with the ſame brake his pate.

The duke of Yorke diſcharged of his office.

This Italian in great haſt complained to the maior, ſo that at the next court holden at the Guildhall, the merchant was ſent for, and vpon charge of his offenſe, he was commanded to ward. Wherevpon diuerſe other light perſons within the citie, aſſembled togither in great plumps, by force conſtreined the maior to deliuer the priſoner out of Newgate: and not ſo ſatiſfied, like mad men ran to the ſeuerall houſes of diuerſe Venetians, Lucaſes, and Florentins, and them ſpoiled, robbed, and rifled without reaſon or meaſure. The maior, perceiuing this enormious dooing, aſſembled a number of ſubſtantiall and graue citizens; who (not without bloudſhed and maiming of ſundrie) appeaſed the rage, and cauſed the miſruled people to depart to their houſes. The beginner of this vprore got him to Weſtminſter, and there regiſtred himſelfe for a ſanctuarie man.

An vprore in the citie of London.

A foule diſorder.

The queene, which now againe ruled all, being aduertiſed of this vnlawfull miſdemeanour, ſent the dukes of Exceſter and Buckingham, with other noble men to London, with a commiſſion oier and terminer, for the inquirie and puniſhment of ſo ſeditious an offenſe. But when the maior, the two dukes, and the two cheefe iuſtices were ſet in the Guildhall vpon their commiſſion, intelligence was giuen, that a number of light perſons were approching in armor to reſcue the priſoners apprehended for the late robberie and riot, as they were caried to their arraignement. The two dukes and the other commiſſioners quickelie thenſe departed, and left their inquirie for that daie, though in deed in no ſuch danger as they doubted: for certeine diſcreet and ſage citizens ſo handled the matter, that no miſorder followed of that furie.

A common councell called.

The maior on the next daie called a common councell, whereof the number was an hundred foureſcore and od, who ordeined that all wardens of myſteries ſhuld aſſemble their companies in their halles, where exhortation ſhould be to the obſeruation of peace; and if they ſpied any man either readie to ſtirre a rumor, or make to the deliuerance of ſuch as were in priſon, their names ſhould be ſecretlie written, and ſo deliuered to the maior: which policie well appeaſed this outrage. Wherevpon after the commiſſioners ſat in Guildhall, where manie of the robbers were attainted ⁊ put to execution, beſide diuers great fines ſet on the heads of diuerſe merchants, ⁊ paid, for winking at the matter. ¶ This yeare Iohn Kempe archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, ⁊ Thomas Burſtlier biſhop of Elie remooued to his place, being the threeſcore and third archbiſhop of that ſee.

Fabian.

¶ In the moneth of Nouember, in the Ile of Portland not farre from the towne of Weimouth, was ſeene a cocke comming out of the ſea, hauing a great creſt vpon his head, and a great red beard, and legs of halfe a yard long: he ſtood on the water ⁊ crowed foure times, and euerie time turned him about, and beckened with his head, toward the north, the ſouth, and the weſt, and was of colour like a feſant, ⁊ when he had crowed three times, he vaniſhed awaie. And ſhortlie after were taken at Erith within twelue miles of London, foure great and woonderfull fiſhes whereof one was called Mors marina, the ſecond a ſword fiſh, the other two were whales.]

Anno Reg. 35.

The French nation, hearing of the ciuall diſſention within the realme here, and for an old grudge ſeeking our annoie, two nauies appointed they to inuade the townes ſtanding vpon the riuage of the ſea. The capteins of the one fleet was William lord Pomiers, and of the other ſir Peter Breſſie, a great ruler in Normandie. Theſe two capteins, taking their courſe out of the mouth of Saine, ſeuered themſelues, the one weſtward; and the other eaſtward, which was ſir Peter Breſſie, who ſailing alongſt the coaſts of Suſſex and Kent, durſt not yet take land, but ſtaid in the Downes: and there hauing by eſpiall perfect notice that Sandwich was neither peopled nor fortified (becauſe that a little before, the rulers of the towne were from thenſe departed, for to auoid the plague, which ſore there afflicted and ſlue the people) he entered the hauen, ſpoiled the towne, and after ſuch poore ſtuffe as he there found rifled and taken, he fearing an aſſemblie of the countrie, ſhortlie gat him awaie.

Sandwich ſpoiled by the French.

Fulnaie.

The Scots inuade England.

The lord Pomiers likewiſe tooke his courſe weſtward, ⁊ by night burning certeine houſes in Fulnaie with a little pillage retired into Britaine. The Scots alſo (buſie like flies where no flap to fraie them) entered into Northumberland (king Iames the ſecond being there in perſon) ⁊ burned certeine poore houſes, and little cottages: but in the verie middeſt of their great enterpriſe, they hearing of the duke of Yorkes marching toward them with a great hoſt, with much paine and no gaine in all haſt returned to their countrie. But now to paſſe ouer outward inuaſions, ⁊ to intreat of the dailie diſorder amongeſt the nobles at home. So was it, that a great conflict fell betweene the lord Egremond, ⁊ the ſonnes of the erle of Saliſburie; in which manie perſons were ſlaine, ⁊ a great number hurt. The lord Egremond, ſeeking to get awaie but could not, by force was taken ⁊ brought before the councell: where the king and the queene, to ſhew themſelues indifferent, adiudged him to paie to the earle of Saliſburie a great ſumme of monie; and for his heinous offenſe againſt the lawes, was committed to Newgate in London, out of which he eſcaped, to the great trouble of the ſhiriffes.

The lord Egremond committed to Newgate.

He made an eſcape.

The queene nothing more ſeeking than the ouerthrow of the duke of Yorke and his friends, and perceiuing ſhe could attempt nothing againſt him neere to London, becauſe the duke was in more eſtimation there, than either the king hir huſband, or hir ſelfe: therefore ſhe cauſed the king to make a progreſſe into Warwikeſhire for his health and recreation. And ſo in ſemblance of hawking and hunting, came to Couentree, where diuerſe waies were ſtudied to fulfill the queenes deſire: for the accompliſhing whereof, the duke of Yorke, the earles of Sa-liſburie, and Warwike (whoſe deſtructions was chieflie ſought) were ſent for to Couentrée by the kings letters, vnder his priuie ſeale, to which place the ſaid lords without ſuſpicion of danger obedientlie reſorted.

But being admoniſhed by ſecret friends, what was intended againſt them, they by flight auoided that danger, where otherwiſe their liues had béene loſt without all remedie. And ſo without bidding anie farewell, they departed from the court; the duke vnto Wigmore in the marches of Wales, the earle of Saliſburie to his caſtell of Middleham in the north, and the earle of Warwike ſailed to Calis. The bodies of which thrée noble perſonages though thus ſeparated, yet their hearts knit in one, and ſtill went meſſengers & letters betwixt them, to communicat their deuiſes, and giue ſignification of their minds and purpoſes.

The biſhop abiured for mouing againſt the popes extortion.

In this yéere Reginald Peacoke biſhop of Chicheſter, abiured at Paules croſſe, all his bookes burnt, and he himſelfe commanded to kéepe his owne houſe during his naturall life: becauſe that he (verie well learned, and better ſtomached) began to moue queſtions, not priuilie but openlie, in the vniuerſities, concerning the annates, Peter pence, and other iuriſdictions & authorities, which the pope vſurped; and not onelie put forth ſuch queſtions, but declared his mind and opinion in the ſame. Some ſaie he held that ſpirituall perſons by Gods law ought to haue no temporall poſſeſſions, nor that perſonall tithes by Gods law were due [nor that chriſtian men were to beléeue in the catholike church, nor in the communion of ſaints, but to beléeue that a catholike church and a communion of ſaints there is] and that he held how the vniuerſall church might erre in matters of faith; and that it is not of neceſſitie to beléeue all that which is ordeined by generall councels, nor all that which they call the vniuerſall church ought to be allowed and holden of all chriſtian people.

W. P.

Moreouer, that it was méet to euerie man to vnderſtand the ſcriptures in the true and plaine ſenſe, & none bound to gloſſes of anie other ſenſe, vpon anie neceſſitie of ſaluation. ¶ But becauſe I find a larger report héereof elſewhere, and as more methodicall, ſo alſo (as it ſéemeth) in ſuch forme as it was Res geſta, a déed doone, it ſhall not be amiſſe to inſert the ſame. This biſhop was a ſecular doctor of diuinitie, that had labored manie yéeres to tranſlate the holie ſcripture into Engliſh, & was accuſed to haue paſſed the bounds of diuinitie and chriſtian beléefe in certeine articles, of the which he was conuict before the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other biſhops and clearks, and after vtterlie abiured, reuoked, and renounced thoſe articles openlie at Paules croſſe in his mother toong on the fourth day of December, as followeth.

Abr.Fl.ex I.S. pag.682,683, 684,685,686. in Quart.

The forme of his abiuration.

IN the name of the trinitie, father, ſonne, and holie-ghoſt, I Reinold Pecocke biſhop of Chicheſter vnworthie, of mine owne power and will without anie maner coaction or dread, confeſſe and knowledge that I here, before this time, preſuming of my naturall wit, and preferring my iudgement and naturall reaſon before the new and the old teſtament, and the authoritie & determination of our mother holie church, haue held, written and taught otherwiſe than the holie Romane and vniuerſall church teacheth, preacheth, or obſerueth. And one is againſt the true catholike and apoſtles faith, I haue written, taught, and publiſhed manie & diuerſe perilous doctrines, books, works, and writings, conteining hereſies and errors, contrarie to the faith catholike, and determination of holie church: and ſpeciallie theſe hereſies and errours following, that is to ſaie in particular.

In primis, quòd non eſt de neceſſitate fidei credere, quòd dominus noſter Ieſus Chriſtus poſt mortem deſcendit ad inferos.

Item, quòd non eſt de neceſſitate ſalutis credere in ſanctorum communionem.

Item, quòd eccleſia vniuerſalis poteſt errare in hijs quæ ſunt fidei.

Item, quòd non eſt de neceſſitate ſalutis credere & tenere illud, quod conſilium generale & vniuerſalis eccleſia ſtatuit, approbat, ſeu determinat, in fauorem fidei, & ad ſalutem animarum, eſt ab vniuerſis Chriſti fidelibus approbandum & tenendum.

Wherefore I miſerable ſinner, which here before long time haue walked in darkeneſſe, and now by the mercie and infinit goodneſſe of God reduced into the right waie, and light of truth, and conſidering my ſelfe gréeuouſlie haue ſinned and wickedlie haue informed and infected the people of God, returne and come againe to the vnitie of our mother holie church, and all hereſies and errors written and conteined in my ſaid books, works and writings, here ſolemnelie and openlie reuoke & renounce. Which hereſies and errors, and all other ſpices of hereſies I haue before this time before the moſt reuerend father in God, and my good lord of Canturburie, in diuerſe and lawfull forme iudiciallie abiured, ſubmitting my ſelfe, being then and alſo now at this time verie contrite and penitent ſinner, to the correction of the church and of my ſaid lord of Canturburie.

And ouer this, exhorting & requiring in the name & vertue of almightie God, in the ſaluation of your ſoules and mind, that no man hereafter giue faith and credence to my ſaid pernicious doctrines, hereſies and errors; neither my ſaid books kéepe, hold, or read in anie wiſe; but that they all ſuch books, works, and writings ſuſpect of hereſies, deliuer in all goodlie haſt vnto my ſaid lord of Canturburie, or to his commiſſioners and deputies, in eſchewing of manie inconueniences and great perils of ſoules, the which elſe might be cauſe of the contrarie. And ouer this declaration of my conuerſion and repentance, I here openlie aſſent, that my ſaid books, works, and writings, for declaration and cauſe aboue rehearſed, be deputed vnto the fire, and openlie burnt in example and terror of all other, &c.

After this, he was depriued of his biſhoprike, hauing a certeine penſion aſſigned vnto him for to liue on in an abbeie, and ſoone after died. His books were intituled: 1 Of chriſtian religion, and a booke perteining therevnto. 2 Of matrimonie. 3 Iuſt expreſſing of holie ſcripture, diuided into three parts. 4 The donet of chriſtian religion. 5 The follower of the donet. 6 The booke of faith. 7 The booke filling the foure tables. 8 The booke of worſhipping. 9 The prouoker of chriſtian men. 10 The booke of counſell.

The quéenes atturnie ſlain.

In the moneth of Ianuarie died the earle of Deuonſhire in the abbeie of Abindon, poiſoned (as men ſaid) being there at that time with quéene Margaret, to appeaſe the malice betwéene the yoong lords, whoſe fathers were ſlaine at ſaint Albons, and they that held with the duke of Yorke. The thirtéenth of Aprill there was a great fraie in Fléetſtréet, betwéene men of court and the inhabitants of the ſame ſtréet, in which fraie the quéenes atturnie was ſlaine. For this fact the king committed the principall gouernours of Furniuals, Cliffords, and Barnards In to priſon in the caſtell of Hertford; and William Tailor alderman of that ward, with manie other were ſent to Windſore caſtell the ſeuenth of Maie. On thurſdaie in Whitſunwéeke, the duke of Summerſet with Anthonie Riuers and other foure kept iuſtes before the quéene in the Tower of London, againſt thrée eſquiers of the quéenes. And in like maner at Gréene-with the ſundaie following.]

King Henrie and his councell, perceiuing the duke of Yorke laie ſtill and ſtirred not, returned to London, and there called a great councell, openlie declaring how the French and Scots (imboldened by the ciuill diſcord within this realme) attempted to annoie the ſame, as of late they had ſhewed apparant tokens, and likelie not ceaſſe vpon occaſions to doo further diſpleaſures, till a perfect concord were concluded betwéene him and his fréends, and thoſe of the contrarie part and confederacie. And to the intent that he would be the chéefe author of peace, he promiſed of his dignitie ſo to interteine the duke of Yorke and his fréends, that all old grudges ſhould be not onelie inwardlie forgotten, but alſo outwardlie forgiuen, which ſhould be cauſe of perpetuall loue and aſſured amitie.

This deuiſe was of all men iudged for the beſt. Whervpon diuerſe graue perſons were ſent to the duke of Yorke, and all other the great eſtates of the realme, who ſince the battell of ſaint Albons neuer met nor communed togither, commanding them for great cauſes to repaire to the kings court without delaie. At his commandement came to London Richard duke of Yorke, with foure hundred men, and was lodged at Bainards caſtell being his owne houſe; and after him came the earle of Saliſburie with fiue hundred men, and was likewiſe lodged at his owne houſe called the Herbour. Then came the dukes of Exceſter and Summerſet with eight hundred men, and were lodged without Temple barre; and the earle of Northumberland, the lord Egremond, and the lord Clifford came with fiftéene hundred men, and lodged without the citie. The earle of Warwike alſo came from Calis with ſix hundred men in red iackets, imbrodered with white ragged ſtaues behind and before, and was lodged at the grate friers.

The péeres of the realme called to a treatie.

Thus were all thoſe of the one part lodged within the citie, and thoſe of the other without, in Holborne towards Weſtminſter, and in other places of the ſuburbs, all vpon wiſe conſideration: for that the Yorke faction and the Lancaſtrians could not well haue béene mingled without danger of diſcord. After that theſe lords were thus come vnto London, the king and the quéene ſhortlie followed, comming thither the ſeuentéenth daie of March, and lodged in the biſhops palace. Bicauſe no riotous attempt or bickering ſhould be begun betwéene anie of the parties or their retinues, the maior and aldermen of the citie kept great watch, as well by daie as by night, riding about the citie by Holborne, and Fléetſtréet, with fiue thouſand men well armed and arraied, to ſée good order and peace on all ſides kept.

The prouidence of the citie for ſafegard of peace.

The lords which lodged within the citie held a dailie councell at blacke friers: the other part ſoiourning without the walles, aſſembled likewiſe in the chapiter houſe at Weſtminſter. At length by the diligent trauell and good exhortation of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other prelats; both parties were perſuaded to come to communication, and ſo did. Where, after long debating of grieuances on both ſides, they promiſing to forget all old rancors, and to be fréends each to other, & both obedient to the king, were accorded by award, whereof writings were ſealed, ſigned, and deliuered to effect as followeth.

The lords are brought to agree.

The award made at Weſtminſter on the three and twentith of March,

Anno regni regis 36.

FIrſt, that at the coſts, charges, and expenſes of the duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwike, and Saliſburie, fourtie & fiue pounds of yearelie rent ſhould be aſſured by waie of a mortiſement for euer, vnto the monaſterie of S. Albons, for ſuffrages and obits to be kept, and almes to be imploied for the ſoules of Edmund late duke of Summerſet, Henrie late erle of Northumberland, and Thomas late lord Clifford late ſlaine in the battell of ſaint Albons, and buried in the abbeie church, and alſo for the ſoules of all other ſlaine in the ſame battell. The ſaid duke of Summerſet, the earle of Northumberland, and lord Clifford, by vertue of the ſame award, were declared for true and faithfull liegemen to the king, and ſo to be holden and reputed in the daie of their deaths, aſwell as the ſaid duke of Yorke, the earles of Warwike and Saliſburie.

The clergie were ſure in thoſe daies to loſe nothing by theſe contentions how ſoeuer the world went.

Moreouer it was decréed, that the duke of Yorke ſhould giue to Elenor ducheſſe of Summerſet, and to Henrie duke of Summerſet hir ſonne, the ſumme of fiue thouſand markes of good aſſignements of debts, which the king owght him for his wages, due during the time of his ſeruice in Ireland, to be diuided as the king ſhould thinke conuenient, betwixt the brethren & ſiſters of the ſaid duke of Summerſet. Alſo that the earle of Warwike ſhould giue vnto the lord Clifford, the ſumme of a thouſand markes, in good and ſufficient aſſignements of debts, which the king owght him, to be diſtributed betwixt the ſaid lord Clifford his brethren and ſiſters.

Alſo where Thomas Perſie knight, lord Egremond, and Richard Perſie his brother, ſonnes of the ladie Elenor counteſſe of Northumberland, had béen in a ſeſſions holden within the countie of Yorke before Richard Bingham, and Rafe Pole the kings iuſtices and other commiſſioners, condemned vnto the earle of Saliſburie in the ſumme of eight thouſand markes; and to the ſame earle, and to his wife Alice in the ſumme of fiue thouſand marks; and to Thomas Neuill knight, ſon to the ſaid earle of Saliſburie, in the ſumme of a thouſand marks; and to the ſaid Thomas and Mawd his wife, in the ſumme of two thouſand marks; and to John Neuill knight, ſonne to the ſaid earle of Saliſburie, in the ſumme of eight hundred marks: for tranſgreſſions and treſpaſſes there found to be doone by the ſaid lord Egremond, and Richard his brother, vnto the ſaid earle of Saliſburie, Alice, Thomas Neuill, Mawd and John Neuill, as by the record appéered.

The lord Egremond.

It was ordeined, that the ſaid earle and his ſonnes ſhould releaſe all the ſaid ſummes of monie, and the executions thereof, and likewiſe releaſe vnto Rafe Werneie, and John Steward late ſhiriffes of London, vnto whoſe cuſtodie the ſaid lord Egremond had béene for the ſame condemnations committed, and from them eſcaped, all actions which they or anie of them might haue againſt the ſaid Werneie and Steward for the ſame eſcape. Yet it was decréed by this award, that the ſaid lord Egremond ſhould be bound by recogniſance in the Chancerie, to kéepe the peace toward the ſaid erle and his wife, children, ſeruants, and tenants.

They were ſhiriffes, an. 1456.

Alſo where diuerſe knights, eſquiers, and other ſeruants and tenants to the ſaid earle of Northumberland, and to the ſaid lord Egremond, were by their ſeuerall obligations bound, by occaſion of the ſaid debates, vnto the ſaid duke of Yorke, earle of Saliſburie, or anie of their children, to ſtand to their order and gouernement; it was ordeined that the ſame obligations ſhould be deliuered to them that ſo ſtood bound, before the feaſt of ſaint Peter ad vincula next inſuing at the citie of Yorke; or elſe that the parties ſo bound, ſhould haue ſufficient acquitances in diſcharge of the ſame obligations.

It was further awarded, that all variances, diſcords, debates, controuerſies, appeales, and actions perſonals, that were or had béene betwixt any of the ſaid perſons,or any of their ſeruants,or tenants, ſhould be for euer determined & ended,ſauing to euerie one his title,action and right, which he had by any euidence of arrerages of rents or ſeruices,accounts, detinues,or debts due by reaſon of anie lawfull contract or déed, had and made for anie reaſonable conſiderations,other than the variance before ſaid.

And for the more aſſurance of both parties,it was ordeined that either ſhould releaſe to other all maner of actions,that were méere perſonals and appeales, which anie of them might haue againſt the other, by reaſon of the variances and diſcords before mentioned.

Alſo it was decréed,that if anie action,ſute or quarell chanced betwixt anie of the ſeruants or tenants of anie of the parties,for matter or title ſuppoſed to be had, occaſioned or mooued before this time; that from thenceforth, none of the ſaid parties ſhould mainteine,ſupport,or aid any of them that will ſo ſue and mooue ſtrife and debate: but ſhould rather ſo deale, as the matter may be brought to peace and quietneſſe.

It was further awarded, that if anie man complained,pretended,or ſurmiſed, that this award was not kept,but in ſome point broken by anie of the parties,for the which breach he would haue a Scire facias, or ſome other action proſecuted in the kings name vpon anie recogniſance made to the king for the performance of this award: yet ſhould not the ſame Scire facias or action be proſecuted, till the kings councell might be throughlie certified of the matter by the complainant, and vpon conſideration ſée iuſt cauſe whie the ſame Scire facias,or action ought to be had and proſecuted in the kings name.

And if anie variance roſe betwixt the councell of both the parties in making of the recogniſances, releaſes,acquittances,or other writings; the ſame variance ſhould be determined by the two lords chéefe iuſtices, that ſhould be fullie inſtructed of the kings intention in this behalfe.

And beſides this, it was notified and declared by the ſame award, that the parties being ſeuerallie bound in the Chancerie in great ſums to obeie and performe this award,ordinance & iudgement made by the king;it was the kings will and pleaſure, that the ſame recogniſances ſhould ſtand in force, and no parcels of the ſummes therein conteined to be pardoned in anie wiſe,without the agréement and conſent of the partie,for whoſe aſſurance the ſame recogniſance was taken.

And if anie of the ſaid ſummes, or anie parcell thereof ſhould be recouered by action or execution taken and proſecuted in the kings name, vpon anie of the ſaid recogniſances;the partie to whoſe hinderance the award was broken, ſhould haue the one halfe of the monie ſo recouered; and the other moitie ſhould be aſſigned to the treaſuror of the kings houſe. ¶This ordinance,award and agréement, was giuen vp vnder the kings great ſeale, at the kings palace of Weſtminſter,the foure and twentith daie of March in the ſix and thirtith yeare of his reigne.

For the open publiſhing of this ioifull agréement, there was (vpon our ladie daie in March) a ſolemne proceſſion celebrated within the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule in London, at the which the king was preſent in habit roiall, with his crowne on his head. Before him went hand in hand the duke of Summerſet,the earle of Saliſburie,the duke of Exceſter, and the earle of Warwike; and ſo one of the one faction,and another of the other: and behind the king the duke of Yorke,and the quéene with great familiaritie in appéerance leading hand in hand. [But what ſhall be ſaid? As goodlie apples corrupted at core, (how faire coated ſo euer they ſéeme) can neuer be made to become ſound againe: nor rotten walles new plaſtered without,can euer the more ſtaie their mooldering inward, till the putrified matter fret through the cruſt laie all in the mire: ſo fared it on all parts in this diſſembled and counterfet concord.] For after this apparant peace (but inward diſcord) diuerſe of the nobles ſmallie regarding their honors, forgot their oth,and brake their promiſe boldlie.

Anno Reg. 37.
W. P.

Not long after this,of pretenſed purpoſe (as it was thought) a fraie was made vpon a yeoman of the earle of Warwiks,by one of the kings ſeruants,in the which the aſſailant was ſore hurt, but the earles man fled. Héerevpon the kings meniall ſeruants, ſéeing their fellow hurt, and the offendor eſcaped, aſſembled togither and watched the earle, when he returned from the councell chamber toward his barge, and ſuddenlie ſet on him, the yeomen with ſwords, the blacke gard with ſpits and fier-forks. After long fight,and manie of the earls men maimed and hurt, by helpe of his fréends he gat a wherrie, and ſo eſcaped to London. The quéene aduertiſed héerof,incontinentlie commanded that he ſhould be apprehended and committed to the tower, where (if he had béene taken)he had ſhortlie ended his daies.

The earle of Warwike aſſaulted.

The quéenes purpoſe.

By this vnhappie fraie,there aroſe anon after ſuch trouble and terrible warre, that the whole realme was thereby diſquieted. For after this diſpleaſure doone to the earle,and the quéens good mind towards him by his ſecret fréends reuealed; he with all diligence tooke his iournie to Warwike,and after into Yorkeſhire, where he found the duke of Yorke, and the earle of Saliſburie, declaring vnto them the aſſault made vpon him by the kings ſeruants, and the pretenſed euill purpoſe of the quéene. After which complaint made,he fearing to be diſpoſſeſſed of his roome at Calis,with great ſpéed imbarked himſelfe and ſailed thither. He was not onelie deputie or lieutenant of Calis, but alſo high admerall of the ſeas, which office was to him confirmed for the ſpace of fiue yeares. Where vpon,whether before his arriuall now at Calis,or ſhortlie after,I cannot ſay;but this yeare about the middeſt of ſummer,the ſaid earle,hauing with him a fouretéene well appointed ſhips, ſailed abroad to ſcowre the ſeas, and by chance met with fiue great ſhips, whereof thrée were caraks of Genoa,and the other two were of Spaine, bigger in heigth and length than the caraks.

The earle of Warwike high admerall.

The earle; though he was ſcarſe able to deale againſt them, yet he valiantlie incountred them. There was a verie ſore and long continued battell fought betwixt them,for it laſted almoſt the ſpace of two daies. Yet in the end the victorie fell to the Engliſh, ſo that two of thoſe ſhips being forced to ſaue themſelues by flight,the other thrée were taken,which the earle brought vnto Calis, with all the merchandize abord the ſame; the value whereof in wine,oile, wax,iron,cloth of gold, and other riches, was eſtéemed to the ſumme of ten thouſand pounds & aboue. By reaſon whereof, that was ſold now for twelue penſe, which would not haue béene bought before for two ſhillings. There were taken a great number of priſoners, beſides a thouſand of the enimies ſlaine in fight. Of the earles part there were fiftie ſlaine. The earles fame thereby increaſed not a little; and manie a bleſſing he had for this péece of ſeruice.

A rich priſe.

But now to the former purpoſe. After that the earle was gone ouer to Calis, the duke of Yorke and the earle of Saliſburie, falling in conſultation togither, it was at length agréed betwixt them, with aduiſe of their fréends, that the ſaid earle of Saliſburie with a warlike companie ſhould march toward the king; and ſignifie to him by waie of complaint, both the manifeſt iniurie doone to his ſonne, and alſo the vncourteous breach of the ſwoorne amitie and late agréement. In which ſute if he preuailed, he ſhould not then let paſſe the occaſion giuen for reuenge of diſpleaſures to him doone, both by the quéene and hir ſiniſter councellors. After concluſion of this deuiſe, the earle of Saliſburie remooued from Middleham caſtell, accompanied with foure or fiue thouſand men, and tooke his waie through Lancaſhire, to paſſe that waie towards London.

The earle of Saliſburie gathereth a power.

Thrée thouſand ſaith Whethamſted

In the meane ſeaſon, the quéene, aſſiſted and ruled by the dukes of Summerſet and Buckingham, hauing a vigilant eie to all hir buſineſſe, imagined that the earle of Warwike had kindled this fier, to the intent to ſet the crowne on the duke of Yorks head. Wherefore ſhe appointed Iames Twichet lord Audelie (bicauſe his power laie in thoſe parties by the which the earle of Saliſburie muſt paſſe) to raiſe an hoaſt of men with all ſpéed, and to giue battell to the ſame earle, if he ſaw cauſe and place conuenient. She had deuiſed a cogniſance of the white ſwan, which ſhe willed all ſuch (as ſhe knew to beare fauor vnto hir ſonne) to weare, for a ſignification of their good minds and hartie loue towards him: which cogniſance ſhe had giuen to manie gentlemen of Cheſhire, and other countries thereabout.

The lord Audelie.

Ex vetuſto codice.

The quéene hir ſelfe laie the ſame time at Eccleſale in Staffordſhire, but the K. remained at Coleſhill in Warwikeſhire, whither the earle of Saliſburie meant to come, in pretenſe to haue communed with him for a reformation of matters depending in controuerſie betwixt himſelfe, the duke of Yorke, and others. But the quéene conſtruing that they ment no good, neither to hir nor hir huſband, requeſted the lord Audelie to apprehend him, if by anie means he might. The lord Audelie (according to his commiſſion) aſſembled aboue ten thouſand men of Cheſhire and Salopſhire, and knowing by his eſpials which waie the earle kept, approached néere to him vpon a faire plaine called Bloreheath, within a mile of a towne called Draiton in Shropſhire. The earle, perceiuing in what ieopardie he ſtood, determined to abide the aduenture with fame and honour, rather than to flie with ſhame and reproach; and ſo incamped himſelfe all the night on the ſide of a little brooke, not verie brode, but ſomewhat déepe.

Bloreheath.

The 23 of September.

In the morning earlie, being the daie of ſaint Tecle, he cauſed his ſouldiers to ſhoot their flights towards the lord Audelies companie, which laie on the other ſide of the ſaid water, and then he and all his people made a ſigne of retreit. The lord Audelie, ſuppoſing his aduerſaries had fled in déed, cauſed his trumpets quicklie to blow vp, and ſetting foorth his voward, ſpéedilie paſſed the water. The earle of Saliſburie, which knew the ſleights of warlike policie, ſuddenlie returned, and ſet vpon the lord Audelie and his chéefe capteins, yer the reſidue of his armie could paſſe the water. The fight was ſore and dreadfull. The earle deſiring the ſauing of his life, and his aduerſaries coueting his deſtruction, fought ſore for the obteining of their purpoſe; but in concluſion, the earles armie, as men not looking for other ſuccours nor meane to eſcape, but by their owne manhood, ſo egerlie aſſaulted their foes, that they ſlue the lord Audelie and all his capteins, and diſcomfited all the remnant of his people.

Policie oft times paſſeth force.

The lord Audelie ſlaine.

The number ſlaine in the battell of Bloreheath.

In this battell were ſlaine foure and twentie hundred perſons, but the greateſt loſſe fell vpon the Cheſhire men, bicauſe one halfe of the ſhire was on the one part, and the other halfe on the other: of which number were ſir Thomas Dutton, ſir Iohn Doune and ſir Hugh Venables, ſir Richard Molineur, ſir William Trowtbecke, ſir Iohn Legh of the Both, and ſir Iohn Egerton, knights; Iohn Done, and Iohn Dutton eſquiers. But the earles two ſonnes, the one called ſir Iohn Neuill, and the other ſir Thomas Neuill, were ſore wounded, the which ſoberlie iornieng into the north countrie, were apprehended by the quéenes fréends, and togither with ſir Thomas Harington that was likewiſe taken, were conueied to Cheſter; but their kéepers deliuered them ſhortlie after, or elſe had the Marchmen deſtroied the goales. Such fauour bare the commons of Wales to the duke of Yorks band, that they could not ſuffer anie wrong to be offered, or euill word to be ſpoken againſt him or his fréends.

The earle of Saliſburies ſonne apprehended.

After this battell at Bloreheath, the ſaid duke of Yorke, perceiuing the deſtruction of him and his fréends was intended, and that his deuiſes were alreadie diſcloſed to the king and the quéene, he thought now no longer to linger his buſineſſe, but with all diligence to ſet forward the ſame. And therfore ſending for his chéefe fréend the earle of Saliſburie, after long conference of their weightie affaires, they determined to raiſe an armie, and by fine force either to win their purpoſe, or end their liues in the ſame. Héerevpon were men foorthwith aſſembled, fréends ſent for, and a puiſſant armie gathered, both of Northerne and Welſhmen, who in good order came into the marches of Wales adioining to Shropſhire, determining there to abide their enimies, or to méet them; if occaſion ſerued.

The duke of Yorke aſſembleth an armie

There came to him from Calis the earle of Warwike, bringing with him from that towne a great number of expert men in martiall feates, whereof two were capteins knowne for men of great experience and approoued policie, as they had well declared the ſame in the warres of Normandie and Guien, the one called Andrew Trollop, and the other Iohn Blunt. The king, hauing aduertiſement of the dukes dooings, ſent foorth commiſſioners to leuie a power in all parts of the realme, where he thought to haue any faithfull fréends or fauourers: by reaſon whereof a great number of men of warre was aſſembled. Manie for the loue they bare to the king reſorted to his ſide, but more for feare of the quéenes diſpleſure, whoſe frowning countenance was their vndooing, and hir indignation their death.

Andrew Trollop, Iohn Blunt.

The king raiſeth an armie.

To be bréefe, the king accompanied with the dukes of Summerſet and Exceſter, and other of the line of Lancaſter, determined either by force or by policie to bring the duke of Yorke to confuſion; and therevpon marching forward they came vnto Worceſter, where as well to refreſh his people, as to take further aduiſe what was beſt to be doone, he ſtaied for a time. And at length it was determined, that the K. ſhould firſt ſend vnto the aduerſaries, a meſſenger of good account, as the biſhop of Saliſburie Richard Beauchampe, to offer vnto them a cléere and frée generall pardon of all treſpaſſes, offenſes, and tranſgreſſions whatſoeuer, if they would giue ouer their enterpriſe, and become true and obedient ſubiects.

Whethamſted

The biſhop of Saliſburie ſent to yͤ duke of Yorke and others.

When the biſhop was come vnto them, and had declared his meſſage, they firſt withdrew themſelues apart, and fell togither in councell: and after they gaue anſwer by the mouth of the erle of Warwike, which conſiſted in thrée points. Firſt, that as concerning the pardon, they durſt not truſt vnto it, conſidering they had diuerſe pardons before, and the ſame confirmed by parlement, and yet nothing auaileable to their aſſurance. Secondlie, that notwithſtanding ſuch pardons, thoſe that were about the king, were preſumptuous and vnrulie, that they cared not at all to breake the kings commandements, nor were any thing abaſhed to be noted for the breach thereof.

Thirdlie, although by law of the land, and right of the ſtatute, euerie lord by vertue of the kings writ, being called to the parlement, ought ſafelie to come, ſafelie there to remaine, and ſafelie to depart and returne home: this notwithſtanding, the ſaid earle of Warwike himſelfe, at a certeine councell holden at Weſtminſter, by vertue of the kings writ of priuie ſeale, being there in perſon, & labouring to his knowledge to giue good aduiſe and counſell for the profit of the common-wealth, was yet in danger of death, if the Lord aboue had not the better prouided for his eſcape, more than anie humane power or force of the “kings pardon. For the which cauſe (quoth he) ſith the kings pardon maie be likened in theſe daies to a “buckler of glaſſe, or to a ſtaffe of réed, in which is no truſt, we dare not commit our ſelues vnto the de“fenſe of anie ſuch pardons. But if anie other waie might be deuiſed for their ſuerties, whereunto they might ſafelie truſt (he ſaid) they were readie to come to his grace, and to ſue for his fauour.

A letter from the lords to the king.

The king receiuing ſuch anſwer in theſe words, or other to the like effect, was nothing contented therewith, and ſo commanded his ſtandards eftſoones to aduance. But yet before he came néere to the place where they were incamped, the ſaid lords wrote to him a letter in their owne excuſe, proteſting they meant no harme in the world againſt his perſon, as by their demeanors and procéedings it might well appeare, who had euer fled & withdrawne themſelues from place to place, from towne to towne, from village to village, and from countie to countie. Which might ſerue for an euident token, that they ſought for nothing but onelie their owne ſafegards & quietneſſe of the realme, with ſo much fauour, as in good and ſafe ſuertie they might come to his preſence, to declare certeine things which in their opinions might turne to the wealth of the realme: and further to make anſwer to all things that had béene obiected againſt them. And now (ſaid they) we are here remaining in the vttermoſt parts of the land (that is) in the marches towards Wales, not farre from Ludlow, not vpon anie preſumptuous meaning, but rather in all humble lowlineſſe of mind and bodie to abide his graces comming: which they beſought of God might be in ſome peaceable maner and fauourable in their behalfes.

A proclamation.

The king hauing receiued this letter, and coniecturing that ſome bitter meaning laie vnder ſo ſwéet a ſpéech, cōmanded his armie againe to march forth; and comming within halfe a mile of the aduerſaries campe, pitched downe his field, and forthwith cauſed proclamation to be made, that who ſo euer of his aduerſaries would giue ouer his lewd begun enterpriſe, and repaire to his preſence to ſue for mercie, he would pardon him of all offenſes. This proclamation, comming to the vnderſtanding of them in the duke of Yorks hoaſt, cauſed a great number that were there with him againſt the king, to get awaie & come to the kings ſide. Moreouer, there roſe among the reſidue great murmuring: ſo as they ſéemed verie like to grow to a gréeuous mutinie.

Andrew Trollop forſaketh the lords.

Amongſt other of thoſe that came to the kings campe, Andrew Trollop was chéefe, who with the other Caliſians, which had long ſerued the king, and liued a long time by his wages, perceiuing now that they ſhould fight againſt their ſoueraigne lord himſelfe (whoſe true ſubiect they eſtéemed before that time the earle of Warwike euer to haue béene, and in no wiſe his enimie) in the dead of the night before the daie of the battell ſecretlie departed from the dukes campe, and ſubmitted themſelues to the king, admoniſhing him of all things deuiſed againſt him. Whereof part was, that the duke of Yorke by his expert capteins appointed vpon a waie how to ſet vpon his enimies, & eaſilie to diſcomfit them; ſo as on the next morning he meant to haue aſſailed the king and his people, yer they could haue béene readie or warie of his comming.

Whethamſted

But now by the going awaie thus of his capteins and people, that purpoſe was diſappointed. And Andrew Trollop thus departed, he was now as much diſcomforted, as before by truſt in him he was incouraged: for all his counſell and purpoſe by Andrew diſcloſed, he thought it better for him & his to depart in ſuertie, than to abide the imminent danger. Whervpon he with his yonger ſonne Edmund earle of Rutland, ſecretlie fled into Wales, and ſo paſſed into Ireland, where he was with all ioy and honour gladlie receiued, all the Iriſh offering to liue and die with him; as if they had béene his liege ſubiects, and he their lord and prince naturallie borne.

The eſtimation of Andrew Trollop.

The duke of Yorke and his complices fle

The earle of March ſonne and heire apparant to the ſaid duke, accompanied with the earles of Saliſburie and Warwike, and ſir Iohn Wenlocke, got awaie the ſame night, and came into Deuonſhire: where, by the meanes of Iohn Dinham eſquier (which after was high treaſuror of England, in the daies of king Henrie the ſeauenth) they bought a ſhip which coſt a hundred and ten marks at Exmouth, and ſailed into Gerneſeie, after came to Calis, where being let in at the poſterne, they were ioifullie welcomed of their fréends, namelie of ſir William Neuill lord Fauconbridge, that was the earle of Warwikes vncle, and brother to the earle of Saliſburie, who had the towne and caſtell in kéeping. All theſe being aſſembled caſt their heads togither, and euerie one ſeuerallie had his deuiſe for the perfecting of their purpoſe, whereto there wanted in them neither will nor hardineſſe.

But now to returne to the king. When in the morning he was aduertiſed that the duke of Yorke and his partakers were fled and gone, he cauſed all his horſſemen to follow them; although in vaine: for they were got farre enough out of danger (as before ye haue heard.) The king pardoned all the poore souldiers, sauing certeine ringleaders; of the which ſome he puniſhed and fined, and ſome he hanged and quartered. After this he remooued to Ludlow, and there brake vp his hoſt, and ſpoiling the towne and caſtell, he ſent the ducheſſe of Yorke with hir two yoong ſonnes to be kept in ward with the ducheſſe of Buckingham hir ſiſter. This doone, he proclamed theſe lords, traitors to him, enimies to their countrie, and rebels to the crowne, confiſcating their lands, goods, and offices: and committed the gouernance of the north parts to the earle of Northumberland, and to the lord Clifford, as to his truſtie and moſt faithfull fréends, & of his towne of Calis he made capteine Henrie the new duke of Summerſet.

The lords proclamed traitors.

The duke of Summerſet made capteine of Calis.

This duke reioiſing much in his new office, choſe forth diuerſe valiant and hardie ſouldiers, and with great pompe ſhortlie after tooke the ſeas, and ſailed towards Calis. But when he thought to haue entered the hauen, the artillerie ſhot ſo hotlie, both out of the towne, and from Riſebanke, that he ſuffering there a ſore repulſe, was faine to land at Whitſand baie; and ſent word to the capteins of the towne to receiue him as the kings lieutenant, ſhewing to them his letters patents. But neither he nor his writing was once regarded: and ſo of neceſſitie he reſorted to the caſtell of Guiſnes, dailie ſkirmiſhing with the garriſon of Calis, more to his loſſe than gaine. Diuerſe of the mariners of thoſe ſhips that went ouer with him, after his arriuall, owing more good will to the earle of Warwike than to this yoong duke, conueied their ſhips into the hauen of Calis, and in them diuerſe of the earle of Warwikes enimies, as Iamin Findill, Iohn Felow, and diuerſe others, the which being preſented vnto the earle of Warwike, he cauſed their heads forthwith to be ſtriken off.

Shortlie after, Richard lord Riuers, and ſir Anthonie Woduile his valiant ſonne that was after lord Scales, accompanied with foure hundred warlike perſons, were appointed to paſſe ouer to Guiſnes, to aid the duke of Summerſet againſt his aduerſaries, which laie in Calis. But as they ſoiourned at Sandwich abiding for wind and weather to tranſport them ouer, the earles of March and Warwike had knowledge thereof, and ſent Iohn Dinham with a ſmall number of men (but a multitude of valiant hearts) vnto the towne of Sandwich, which ſuddenlie entered the ſame, and tooke the lord Riuers and his ſonne alſo in their beds, robbing houſes, and ſpoiling ſhips. And beſide this, they tooke the principall ſhips of the kings nauie, and had them awaie with them to Calis [one excepted called Grace de Dieu which might not be had awaie bicauſe ſhe was broken in the bottome] and there preſented them to the earle of March, of whome he was ioifullie receiued. For though in the fight he was ſore hurt & maimed in the leg, ſo as he halted euer after, yet he bare himſelfe ſo worthilie in that enterpriſe, that his praiſe was great amongſt all men.

Sir Baldwine Fulford his enterpriſe.

¶ Sir Baldwine Fulford vndertooke on paine of looſing his head, that he would deſtroie the earle of Warwike: but when he had ſpent the king a thouſand marks in monie, he returned againe.] After this good fortune thus chanced to the lords, diuerſe of the beſt ſhips taken in the hauen of Sandwich, were well vittelled and manned, and with them the earle of Warwike ſailed into Ireland, to common with the duke of Yorke of their great affaires and buſineſſe. The weather and wind were ſo fauourable to the earles purpoſe, that within leſſe than thirtie daies he paſſed and repaſſed from Calis to Dublin, and backe againe.

The duke of Exceſter, being cheefe admerall of the ſea, laie in the weſt countrie, and durſt not once meddle with the earle of Warwikes nauie, as he came by; by reaſon of the miſtruſt which he had in the capteins and mariners of his owne nauie: who by their murmuring well ſhewed that they wiſhed the earle of Warwikes good ſucceſſe. ¶ But here is to be remembred, that after the great diſcomfiture of the lords (as before you haue heard) and proclamation made againſt them as traitors, the duke of Yorke and the earles of Saliſburie and Warwike had conference; and therevpon concluded with one aſſent, to write a letter excuſatorie (ſuppoſing thereby to ſalue vp the ſore) in all their names to the king: and ſo did, as followeth.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 688, 689, 690, 691.

A copie of the ſaid letter excuſa*torie written by the ſaid duke* and earles.

MOſt chriſtian king, right high and mightie prince, and our moſt dread ſoueraigne lord, after as humble recommendations to your high excellencie as will ſuffice. Our true intent to the proſperitie and augmentation of your high eſtate, and to the common-weale of this realme, hath beene ſhewed vnto your highneſſe in ſuch writing as we make thereof. And ouer that, an indenture ſigned by our hands in the church cathedrall of Worceſter, comprehending the proofe of the truth and dutie that (God knoweth) we beare to your ſaid eſtate, and to the preheminence and prerogatiue thereof, we ſent vnto your good grace by the prior of the ſaid church, and diuerſe other doctors, and among other, by maiſter William Linwood doctor of diuinitie, which miniſtred vnto vs ſeuerallie the bleſſed ſacrament of the bodie of Ieſus, wherevpon we and euerie of vs depoſed for our ſaid truth and dutie, according to the tenor of the ſaid indenture.

And ſince that time we haue certified at large in writing and by mouth, by Garter king of armes, not onelie to your ſaid highneſſe, but alſo to the good and worthie lords being about your moſt noble preſence, the largeneſſe of our ſaid truth and dutie, and our intent and diſpoſition, to ſearch all the motions that might ſerue conuenientlie to the affirmation thereof, and to our perfect ſuerties from ſuch inconuenient and vnreuerent ieopardies as we haue beene put in diuerſe times here before. Whereof we haue cauſe to make, and ought to make ſuch exclamation and complaint; not without reaſon, as is not vnknowen to all the ſaid worthie lords, and to all this land; and will offer vs to your high preſence, to the ſame intent, if we might ſo doo, with our ſaid ſuertie, which onelie cauſeth vs to keepe ſuch fellowſhip as we doo in our leefull manner.

And hereto we haue forborne, and auoided all things that might ſerue to the effuſion of chriſtian bloud, of the dread that we haue of God, and of your roiall maieſtie: and haue alſo eſchued to approch your ſaid moſt noble preſence, for the humble obeiſance and reuerence wherein we haue, and (during our life) will haue the ſame. And yet neuertheleſſe we heare, that we be proclamed and defamed in our name vnrightlie, vnlawfullie, and (ſauing your high reuerence) vntrulie, and otherwiſe (as God knoweth) than we haue giuen cauſe; knowing certeinelie, that the bleſſed and noble intent of your ſaid good grace, and the righteouſneſſe thereof is, to take, repute, and accept your true and lawfull ſubiects; and that it accordeth neither with your ſaid intent, nor with your will or pleaſure, that we ſhould be otherwiſe taken or reputed. And ouer that, our lordſhips and tenants beene of high violence robbed and ſpoiled, againſt your peace and lawes, and all righteouſneſſe.

We therfore, as we ſuffice, beſeech your ſaid good grace, to take, repute, and receiue thereunto our ſaid truth and intent, which to God is knowne, as we ſhew it by the ſaid tenor of the ſame indenture. And not applie your ſaid bleſſedneſſe, ne the great righteouſneſſe and equitie wherewith God hath euer indued your high nobilitie, to the importune impatience and violence of ſuch perſons, as intend of extreame malice to proceed (vnder the ſhadow of your high might and preſence) to our deſtruction, for ſuch inordinate couetiſe (whereof God is not pleaſed) as they haue to our lands, offices, and goods, not letting or ſparing therefore, to put ſuch things in all lamentable and too ſorowfull ieopardie, as might in all wiſe take effect, by the myſterie of Gods will and power.

Not hauing regard to the effuſion of chriſtian bloud, ne anie tenderneſſe to the noble bloud of this land, ſuch as ſerue to the tuition and defenſe thereof, ne not waieng the loſſe of your true liege men of your ſaid realme, that God defend, which knoweth our intent, and that we haue auoided there-from as farre as we may with our ſuerties; not of anie dread that we haue of the ſaid perſons, but onelie of the dread of God and of your ſaid highneſſe, and will not vſe our ſaid defenſe vntill the time that we be prouoked of neceſſitie, whereof we call heauen and earth vnto witneſſe and record, and therein beſéech God to be our iudge, and to deliuer vs according to our ſaid intent, and our ſaid truth & dutie to your ſaid highneſſe, and to the ſaid common-weale.

Moſt chriſtian king, right high and mightie prince, and moſt dread ſoueréigne lord, we beſéech our bleſſed Lord to preſerue your honour and eſtate in ioy and felicitie. Written at Ludlow the tenth daie of October: R. Yorke, R. Warwike, R. Saliſburie.

A parlement at Couentrie.

Duke of Yorke and others attainted.

During this time the king called a parlement in the citie of Couentrie, which began the twentith of September, in the which were attainted of high treaſon, Richard duke of Yorke, Edward erle of March his ſonne and heire, Richard earle of Warwike, Edmund earle of Rutland, Richard earle of Saliſburie, John lord Clifford, lord Clinton, ſir Thomas Harington, ſir John Wenlock, Thomas Neuill & John Neuill ſons of the earle of Saliſburie, James Pickering, John Coniers, Thomas Par, William Oldhall, and Henrie Ratford knights; John Bowſer, Thomas Cooke, John Claie, Richard Giton, Robert Browne, Edward Bowſer, Thomas Vaughan, John Roger, Richard Greie, Walter Deuoreux, Walter Hopton, Roger Kinderton, Will. Bowes, Foulke Stafford, the lord Powis, and Alice counteſſe of Saliſburie, their goods and poſſeſſions eſcheted, and their heires diſherited vnto the ninth degrée, their tenants ſpoiled of their goods, maimed and ſlaine; the towne of Ludlow, belonging to the duke of Yorke, was robbed to the bare wals, & the dutches of Yorke ſpoiled of hir goods.]

The kings inclination to mercie.

But (ſaith another) when the king ſhould come to giue his conſent vnto the acts paſſed in the ſame parlement, and that the clerke of the parlement had read that ſtatute of the attaindor of thoſe lords; ſuch was the kings modeſtie and great zeale vnto mercie, that he cauſed a prouiſo to be put in, and added vnto the ſame ſtatute, that it might be lawfull vnto him at all times fullie without authoritie of anie other parlement, to pardon the ſame noble men, and reſtore them againe to their former eſtats, degrées, and dignities in all things, ſo they would come in vnto him, and in the ſpirit of humbleneſſe beſéech him of grace and fauour. ¶ Wherin the king gaue euident teſtimonie, that he was indued with thoſe qualities of mind which the poet aſcribed vnto Ceſar (namelie ſlow to puniſh, & ſad when he was conſtreined to be ſeuere: ſith the one commended his lenitie, the other ſauoured of tyrannie) in this diſtichon of like termination:

Herewith alſo order was taken for the defenſe of the hauens & landing places alongſt the ſea coaſts. Sir Simon Montford, with a great crew of men, was appointed to kéepe the downes, and the fiue ports; and all men paſſing into Flanders were vpon paine of death prohibited to paſſe by Calis, leaſt the lords there ſhould borrow of them anie preſt monie, as they did latelie before of the merchants of the ſtaple the ſumme of eightéene thouſand pounds. The lords were not ignorant of all the kings prouiſions made againſt them, but were aſcerteined dailie what was doone euen in the kings priuie chamber: wherefore firſt they ſent a companie to Sandwich vnder the gouernance of the lord Fauconbridge, who tooke the towne, & ſir Simon or Oſbert Montford within it, and ſent him with all his mates to Calis, where incontinentlie he with twelue of his chiefe fellowes loſt their heads on the ſand before Riſebanke.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S. pag. 692, 693,

¶ The earles at Calis ſent to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and to the commons of England at large certeine articles in writing, beginning thus: Worſhipfull ſirs, we the duke of Yorke, the earles of March, Warwike, and Saliſburie, ſued and offered to haue come to the king our ſoueréigne lords moſt noble preſence, to haue declared there afore him for our dutie to God and to his highneſſe, and to the proſperitie and welfare of his noble eſtate, and to the common-weale of all his land as true liege men, the matters following.

694, 695, 696, 697, in Quar.

Articles ſent from the duke of Yorke, and the earles, to the archbiſhop of Canturburie and the commons.

In primis, the great oppreſſion, extortion, robberie, murther, and other violences doone to Gods church, and to his miniſters thereof, againſt Gods and mans law.

2 Item, the pouertie and miſerie that to our great heauineſſe our ſoueréigne lord ſtandeth in, not hauing anie liuelod of the crowne of England whereof he may kéepe his honorable houſhold, which cauſeth the ſpoiling of his ſaid liege men by the takers of his ſaid houſhold, which liuelod is in their hands that haue béene deſtroiers of his ſaid eſtate, and of the ſaid common-weale.

3 Item, how his lawes be parciallie and vnrightfullie guided, and that by them that ſhould moſt loue and tender his ſaid lawes, the ſaid oppreſſion and extortion is moſt fauoured and ſupported; and generallie, that all righteouſneſſe and iuſtice is exiled out of the ſaid land, and that no man dreadeth to offend againſt the ſaid lawes.

4 Item, that it will pleaſe his ſaid good grace to liue vpon his owne liuelod, wherevpon his noble progenitors haue in daies heretofore liued as honorablie and as worthilie as anie chriſtian princes, and not to ſuffer the deſtroiers of the ſaid land, and of his true ſubiects, to liue therevpon, and therfore to lacke the ſuſtenances that ſhould be belonging to his ſaid eſtate, and find his ſaid houſhold vpon his poore commons, without paiement, which neither accordeth with Gods nor mans law.

5 Item, how oft the ſaid commons haue béene greatlie and marueilouſlie charged with taxes and tallages to their great impoueriſhing, whereof little good hath either growne to the king or to the ſaid land, and of the moſt ſubſtance thereof the king hath left to his part not halfe ſo much; and other lords and perſons, enimies to the ſaid common-weale, haue to their owne vſe, ſuffering all the old poſſeſſions that the king had in France and Normandie, Aniou and Maine, Gaſcoine and Guien, woone and gotten by his father of moſt noble memorie, and other his noble progenitors, to be ſhamefullie loſt or ſold.

6 Item, how they can not ceaſſe therewith, but now begin a new charge of impoſition and tallages vpon the ſaid people, which neuer afore was ſéene; that is to ſaie, euerie towneſhip to find men for the kings gard, taking example therein of our enimies and aduerſaries of France. Which impoſition & tallage, if it be continued to heire, heires, and ſucceſſors, will be the heanieſt charge and worſt example that euer grew in England; and the foreſaid ſubiects, and the ſaid heires and ſucceſſors in ſuch bondage, as their anceſtors were neuer charged with.

7 Item, where the king hath now no more liuelod out of his realme of England, but onelie the land of Ireland, and the towne of Calis, and that no king chriſtened hath ſuch a land and a towne without his realme; diuerſe lords haue cauſed his highneſſe to write letters vnder his priuie ſeale, vnto his Iriſh enimies, which neuer king of England did heretofore, fore, wherby they may haue comfort to enter into the conqueſt of the ſaid land, which letters the ſame Iriſh enimies ſent vnto me the ſaid duke of Yorke, and maruelled greatlie that anie ſuch letters ſhould be to them ſent, ſpeaking therin great ſhame and villanie of the ſaid realme.

8 Item, in like wiſe the king by excitation and labour of the ſame lords, wrote other letters to his enimies and aduerſaries in other lands, that in no wiſe they ſhould ſhew anie fauour or good will to the towne of Calis, whereby they had comfort inough to procéed to the winning thereof. Conſidered alſo, that it is ordeined by the labour of the ſaid lords, that no where vittels nor other thing of refreſhing or defenſe ſhould come out of England, to the ſuccour or reliefe of the ſaid towne, to the intent that they would haue it loſt, as it may openlie appeare.

9 Item, it is déemed and ought greatlie to be déemed, that after the ſame lords would put the ſame rule of England, if they might haue their purpoſe and intent, into the hands and gouernance of the ſaid enimies.

10 Item, how continuallie ſince the pitious, ſhamefull, and ſorrowfull murther to all England, of that noble, worthie, and chriſtian prince Humfreie duke of Gloceſter the kings true vncle, at Burie, it hath béene laboured, ſtudied, and conſpired, to haue deſtroied and murthered the ſaid duke of Yorke, and the iſſue that it pleaſed God to ſend me of the roiall bloud, and alſo of vs the ſaid earles of Warwike and Saliſburie, for none other cauſe but for the true hart that (God knoweth) we euer haue borne, and beare to the profit of the kings eſtate, to the common-weale of the ſame realme, and defenſe thereof.

11 Item, how the earles of Shreweſburie and Wilſhire, and the lord Beaumont, our mortall and extreme enimies now, and of long time paſt, hauing the guiding about the moſt noble perſon of our ſaid ſoueraigne lord, whoſe highneſſe they haue reſtreined & kept from the libertie & fréedome that belongeth to his ſaid eſtate, & the ſupporters & fauourers of all the premiſſes, would not ſuffer the kings ſaid good grace to receiue and accept vs, as he would haue doone, if he might haue had his owne will, into his ſaid preſence, dreading the charge that would haue béene laid vpon them, of the miſerie, deſtruction, and wretchedneſſe of the ſaid realme, whereof they be cauſes, and not the king, which is himſelfe as noble, as vertuous, as righteous and bleſſed of diſpoſition, as anie prince earthlie.

12 Item, the earles of Wilſhire and Shreweſburie, and the lord Beaumont, not ſatiſfied nor content with the kings poſſeſſions and his goods, ſtirred and excited his ſaid highneſſe to hold his parlement at Couentrie, where an act is made by their prouocation and labour, againſt vs the ſaid duke of Yorke, my ſonnes March and Rutland, and the earles of Warwike and Saliſburie, and the ſonnes of the ſaid earle of Saliſburie, & manie other knights and eſquiers of diuerſe matters falſelie and vntrulie imagined, as they will anſwer afore almightie God in the daie of doome; the which the ſaid earles of Shreweſburie & Wilſhire, and the lord Beaumont prouoked to be made, to the intent of our deſtruction and of our iſſue; and that they might haue our liuelod and goods, as they haue openlie robbed and deſpoiled all our places and our tenements, and manie other true men, and now procéed to hanging and drawing of men by tyrannie, and will therin ſhew the largeneſſe of their violence and malice as vengeablie as they can, if no remedie be prouided at the kings highnes, whoſe bleſſednes is neither aſſenting nor knowing thereof.

We therefore, ſéeing all the ſaid michiefes, hearing alſo that the French king maketh in his land great aſſemblie of his people, which is greatlie to be dread for manie cauſes, purpoſe yet againe with Gods grace to offer vs to come againe to the ſaid preſence of our ſaid ſoueraigne lord, to open and declare vnto him there, the miſchiefes aboue declared; and in the name of the land to ſue, in as reuerent and lowlie wiſe as we can, to his ſaid good grace, to haue pittie and compaſſion vpon his ſaid true ſubiects, and not to ſuffer the ſame miſchiefs to reigne vpon them. Requiring you in Gods behalfe, and praieng you in our owne, therein to aſſiſt vs, dooing alwaie the duetie of liege men in our perſons to our ſoueraigne lord, to his eſtate, prerogatiue, and preheminence, and to the ſuertie of his moſt noble perſon, whereunto we haue euer béene and will be as true as anie of his ſubiects aliue, whereof we call God, our ladie ſaint Marie, and all the ſaints in heauen to witneſſe.

The earle of Wilſhire and other ſpoiled Newberie.

In the meane time, the earle of Wilſhire treaſuror of England, the lord Scales & the lord Hungerford went to Newberie, which belonged to the duke of Yorke, and there made inquiſition of all them that in anie wiſe had fauoured the ſaid duke; whereof ſome were found guiltie, and were drawen, hanged, and quartered, and all the inhabitants of the towne were ſpoiled of their goods. From thenſe the earle of Wilſhire went to Southampton; where, vnder colour to take the earle of Warwike, he armed fiue great caracks of Iene with ſouldiers, taking vittels of the kings price without paiment, and put a great part of his treaſure into the ſaid caracks, and after ſailed about in the ſea, and at laſt ſtale into Dutchland, ſending backe againe his ſouldiers into England. Then were the kings priuie ſeales directed to all biſhops, abbats, priors, and other ſtates, to lend the king monie, therewith to wage ſouldiers to kéepe the ſea-coaſts.]

The earle of Wilſhire ſtale ouer the ſeas.

Priuie ſeales for monie.

After the kings nauie was gained, and his capteins (as before yée haue heard) on the ſea taken; the lords lieng at Calis, being aduertiſed from the lord Fauconbridge (who after the taking of Montford laie ſtill in Kent) that the people of that countrie and other parts were altogither bent in their fauor [and no leſſe addicted to doo them ſeruice both with bodie and goods, than the Iriſhmen ſéemed to be at their receiuing of the ſaid duke of Yorke, and his yoonger ſonne Edmund earle of Rutland, whom they ſo highlie honoured, that they offered to liue and die in their quarell] they conceiued therevpon ſo great hope in their fréends within the realme, that they determined to paſſe the ſea, and therewith entring their ſhips with fiftéene hundred men landed all at Sandwich.

Abr. Flem.

[But it is to be read in a late writer, that the commons of Kent dreading the like vengeance towards them, as fell vpon them of Newberie, ſent priuilie meſſengers to Calis to the foreſaid erles, beſéeching them in all haſt poſſible to come to their ſuccour. Wherevpon the ſaid earles ſent ouer into Kent the lord Fauconbridge, to know if their déeds would accord with their woods: ſo that anon the people of Kent and the other ſhires adioining, reſorted to the ſaid lord Fauconbridge in great number. Wherefore when the earles knew the willing harts of thoſe people, they prepared to come into this land. Againſt whoſe comming, a long ballet was fixed vpon the gates of Canturburie, made in fauour of the duke of Yorke and the ſaid earles, beginning thus: In the daie of faſt and ſpirituall affliction, the celeſtiall influence of bodies tranſitorie, &c.]

The men of Kent ſent to Calis for the earles.

Now as they paſſed through Kent, there came to them the lord Cobham, Iohn Gilford, William Pech, Robert Horne, and manie other gentlemen; ſo that before they approched to London, their number was eſtéemed aboue fourtie thouſand fighting men, for the fame of their landing being once knowen, gentlemen and yeomen reſorted to them out of all the ſouth parts of the relme. Vpon which rumor, Thomas lord Scales, a man in great fauour with the king & quéene, accompanied with the earle of Kendall a Gaſcoigne, and the lord Louell, reſorted to London with a great companie of armed men, declaring to the maior, that their repaire onelie was to defend and kéepe the citie from ſpoile of ſuch traitors as the king was crediblie informed were thither comming. To whom the maior anſwered, that he néeded no fellow helper, either to defend or gouerne the citie to him committed in charge. With which anſwer the lord Scales and his aſſociats nothing contented, entred into the Tower, dailie deuiſing waies how to grieue the citizens, whom he perceiued to fauour rather the duke of Yorks part, than the kings.

But ſhortlie after the earles of March and Warwike, and other of their affinitie, came to London, and were of the maior and citizens ioiouſlie receiued, to whome reſorted Thomas archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhops of London, Lincolne, Saliſburie, Elie, and Exceſter, with manie other prelats and religious perſons: amongſt whome alſo was the popes legat to treat of peace, if néed ſo required. Vpon good deliberation and aduiſe had and taken amongſt theſe lords how to go forward with their weightie enterpriſe, the earles of March and Warwike, William lord Fauconbridge, Henrie lord Bourchier, called earle of Eu, with a great number of men which came out of Kent, Eſſex, Surrie, and Suſſex, to the number (as ſome writers affirme) of fiue and twentie thouſand perſons, departed from London toward the king lieng at Couentrie, then called the quéenes ſecret harbour, leauing behind them to kéepe the Londoners in their promiſed fréendſhip, the earle of Saliſburie, the lord Cobham, and ſir Iohn Wenlocke, which tooke ſuch order, and watched the gates and entries on ech ſide ſo diligentlie, that no ſuccours might come to the lord Scales lodging in the tower; who tooke therewith ſuch diſpleaſure, that he ſhot out his great ordinance againſt them within the citie, and they likewiſe ſhot at him againe, to the hurt and no pleaſure of both parts.

Couentrie the quéenes ſecret harbour.

The king hauing knowledge of all theſe doings, aſſembled a great armie, and accompanied with the duke of Summerſet (latelie come from Guiſnes) and the duke of Buckingham, and diuerſe other great lords that tooke his part, came to Northampton; where the quéene perceiuing hir puiſſance to be able to match in fight with the aduerſaries, tooke vpon hir to incourage hir fréends and well-willers: for the king ſtudied of nothing but of peace, quietneſſe, and ſolitarie life. When the whole hoaſt of the kings part was aſſembled, the ſame iſſued forth of the towne, and paſſing ouer the riuer of Tine, lodged in the new field betwéene Harſington and Sandifford, ſtronglie fenſing themſelues about with high banks, and déepe trenches. On the other part, the lords being herewith aduanced verie néere the place where the kings people laie without Northampton; the biſhops that were there with them, by the aduiſe and conſent of the ſaid lords, ſent vnto the king the biſhop of Saliſburie, to vnderſtand his mind, and to moue him vnto ſome treatie of peace, and to admit the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the other biſhops there preſent, to be mediatours in the matter, that ſome good accord might be concluded betwixt the parties, ſo as an vniuerſall peace might be reſtored in all parts through the whole realme.

The quéene the better capteine.

Whethamſted

The biſhop of Saliſburie dooing this meſſage not ſo circumſpectlie as had béene conuenient, returned without bringing anie towardlie anſwer; but rather words of high deſpite and vtter defiance. For the lords that were about the king, truſting in their warlike engines and ſtrength of place, in which they were incamped, though otherwiſe inferior in number of men, purpoſed to abide the brunt of battell; and ſo led with the ſpirit of raſhneſſe, ſent none other anſwer backe againe by the biſhop, but contumelious words ſounding greatlie to the reproch of their aduerſaries; who being ſore offended therewith, determined to ſéeke reuenge with dint of ſword. The earle of March as then being in the floure of his luſtie and moſt couragious youth, lieng betwéene Toucetor and Northampton, determined to ſet on the kings armie without longer delaie: and therevpon in the night ſeaſon remooued his campe toward Northampton, and in marching forward ſet his men in order of battell: wherof the vant-ward was led by the earle of Warwike, which either by ſtrength or ſtealth wan a ſtreict which the lord Beaumont kept, going toward the kings campe; and herewith entring freſhlie with his people, began the battell about ſeauen of the clocke the ninth daie of Iulie. After him followed the earle of March with the banner of his father. ¶ Others write, that the earle of March led the fore-ward, the erle of Warwike the middle-ward, and the lord Fauconbridge the rere-ward.

Moreouer, that Edmund lord Greie of Ruthen, who was on the kings ſide, failed in the truſt committed to him: for where the enimies could not (without great danger) enter vpon the kings campe, by reaſon of a mightie trench and rampire pight full of piles and ſharpe ſtakes, wherewith the campe was compaſſed about: the ſaid lord Graie came with his men, and with helping hands pulled the enimies vp, and receiued them into the field, where the battell was begun with great force & violence. For being now entred the field, they ſet vpon the kings people ſo fiercelie, that it ſéemed they ment either to obteine the victorie, or to die for it, euen all the whole number of them. The fight continued right fierſe and cruell, with vncerteine victorie, till the houre of nine: at which time the kings armie was diſcomfited, and of the ſame ſlaine and drowned in the riuer, few leſſe than ten thouſand; and the king himſelfe left comfortleſſe alone was taken by the aduerſaries, as a man in great miſerie.

At this battell fought at Northampton, were ſlaine Humfreie duke of Buckingham, Iohn Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, a valiant perſon, and not degenerating from his noble parents, Thomas lord Egremond, Iohn viſcont Beaumont, and ſir William Lucie, which made great haſt to come to part of the fight, and at his firſt approch was ſtriken in the head with an ax. Beſides theſe that were ſlaine, manie were taken priſoners, bicauſe they left their horſſes, alighting to fight on foot. The duke of Summerſet, and other, which narrowlie eſcaped, fled with the quéene and prince into the biſhoprike of Durham. The earles, hauing got the victorie in this bloudie battell, conueied the king to London, and lodged him in the biſhops palace. After whoſe comming to the citie, the Tower was deliuered to the erle of March, vpon a certeine compoſition; but the lord Scales ſuſpecting the ſequele of the deliuerie thereof, tooke a wherrie priuilie, intending to haue fled to the quéene; but he was eſpied by diuerſe watermen belonging to the earle of Warwike (which waited for his forth comming on the Thames) and ſuddenlie taken, was ſhortlie ſlaine with manie darts & daggers, and his bodie left naked and all bloudie at the gate of the clinke, and after was buried in the church adioining.

The Tower deliuered to the earle of March.

The lord Scales ſlaine.

Then were diuerſe perſons apprehended, and indicted of treaſon, wherof ſome were pardoned, and ſome executed. Thomas Thorpe ſecond baron of the eſcheker, ker, was committed to the Tower, where he remained long after, for that he was knowne to be great fréend to the houſe of Lancaſter. ¶ When quéene Margaret heard that the K. was taken, ſhe with hir ſonne, and eight perſons fled to the caſtell of Hardlagh in Wales, and was robbed by the waie in Lancaſhire of all hir goods, to the value of ten thouſand markes: from thence ſhe went into Scotland. Thus you ſée what fruits the trée of ciuill diſcord dooth bring foorth; that euill trée, which whileſt ſome haue taken paine to plant, and ſome to proine and nouriſh, for others confuſion (to whome they haue giuen a taſte of thoſe apples which it bare, far more bitter than coloquintida) themſelues haue béene forced to take ſuch ſhare as befell them by lot. For as it is not poſſible that a cõmon fier, whoſe heat & flame is vniuerſallie ſpred, ſhould ſpare any particular place (for ſo ſhould it not be generall) no more is it likelie that in ciuill commotions, rebellions, inſurrections, and partakings in conflicts and pitched féelds (ſpeciallie vnder ringleaders of great countenance and perſonage, ſuch as be the péeres and ſtates of kingdoms) anie one ſhould, though perhaps his life, yet (a thouſand to one) not ſaue his bloud vnſpilt, nor his goods vnſpoiled.] During this trouble, a parlement was ſummoned to begin at Weſtminſter, in the moneth of October next following.

Thomas Thorpe.

Anno Reg. 39.

Whethamſted

The duke of Yorke commeth foorth of Ireland.

In the meane time the duke of Yorke, aduertiſed of all theſe things, ſailed from Dubline towards England, and landed at the red banke néere to the citie of Cheſter, with no ſmall companie: and from Cheſter by long iournies he came to the citie of London, which he entred the fridaie before the feaſt of S. Edward the Confeſſor, with a ſword borne naked before him, with trumpets alſo ſounding, and accompanied with a great traine of men of armes, and other of his fréends and ſeruants. At his comming to Weſtminſter he entred the palace, and paſſing foorth directlie through the great hall, ſtaied not till he came to the chamber, where the king and lords vſed to ſit in the parlement time, cõmonlie called the vpper houſe, or chamber of the péeres, and being there entred, ſtept vp vnto the throne roiall, and there laieng his hand vpon the cloth of eſtate, ſéemed as if he meant to take poſſeſſion of that which was his right (for he held his hand ſo vpon that cloth a good pretie while) and after withdrawing his hand, turned his face towards the people, beholding their preaſſing togither, and marking what countenance they made.

Whethamſted

A ſtrange demeanor of the duke of Yorke.

Whileſt he thus ſtood and beheld the people, ſuppoſing they reioiſed to ſée his preſence, the archbiſhop of Canturburie (Thomas Bourcher) came to him, & after due ſalutations, aſked him if he would come and ſée the king. With which demand he ſéeming to take diſdaine, anſwered bréefelie, and in few words thus: I remember not that I know anie within this realme, but that it beſéemeth him rather to come and ſée my perſon, than I to go and ſée his. The archbiſhop hearing his anſwer, went backe to the king, and declared what anſwer he had receiued of the dukes owne mouth. After the archbiſhop was departed to the king that laie in the quéenes lodging, the duke alſo departed, and went to the moſt principall lodging that the king had within all his palace, breaking vp the lockes and doores, and ſo lodged himſelfe therein, more like to a king than a duke, continuing in the ſame lodging for a time to the great indignation of manie, that could not in anie wiſe like of ſuch preſumptuous attempts made by the duke, to thruſt himſelfe in poſſeſſion of the crowne, and to depoſe king Henrie, who had reigned ouer them ſo long a time.

His bold ſpeech.

Maiſter Edward Hall in his chronicle maketh mention of an oration, which the duke of Yorke vttered, ſitting in the regall ſeat there in the chamber of the péeres, either at this his firſt comming in amongſt them, or elſe at ſome one time after, the which we haue thought good alſo to ſet downe: though Iohn Whethamſted the abbat of ſaint Albons, who liued in thoſe daies, and by all likelihood was there preſent at the parlement, maketh no further recitall of anie words, which the duke ſhould vtter at that time in that his booke of records, where he intreateth of this matter. But for the oration (as maiſter Hall hath written thereof) we find as followeth. ¶ During the time (ſaith he) of this parlement, the duke of Yorke with a bold countenance entered into the chamber of the péeres, and ſat downe in the throne roiall, vnder the cloth of eſtate (which is the kings peculiar ſeat) and in the preſence of the nobilitie, as well ſpirituall as temporall (after a pauſe made) he began to declare his title to the crowne, in this forme and order as inſueth.

Edw. Hall. in Hen. 6. fol. clxxvij, &c.

The duke of Yorks oration made to the lords of the parlement.

My ſingular good lords, maruell not that I approch vnto this throne: for I ſit here as in the place to me by verie iuſtice lawfullie belonging; & here I reſt, as to whom this chaire of right apperteineth, not as he which requireth of you fauour, parcialitie, or bearing, but equall right, friendlie indifferencie, and true adminiſtration of iuſtice. For I béeing the partie gréeued, and complainant, can not miniſter to my ſelfe the medicine that ſhould helpe me (as expert léeches & cunning ſurgians maie) except you be to me both faithfull aiders & alſo true councellors. Nor yet this noble realme and our naturall countrie ſhall neuer be vnbuckled from hir dailie feuer, except I (as the principall phyſician, and you as the true and truſtie apothecaries) conſult togither in making of the potion, and trie out the cleane and pure ſtuffe from the corrupt and putrified drugs.

For vndoubtedlie, the root and bottome of this long feſtured canker is not yet extirpate, nor the féeble foundation of this fallible building is not yet eſpied, which hath béene and is the dailie deſtruction of the nobilitie, and the continuall confuſion of the poore communaltie of this realme and kingdome. For all you know (or ſhould know) that the high and mightie prince king Richard the ſecond, was the true and vndoubted heire to the valiant conqueror and renowmed prince king Edward the third, as ſonne & heire to the hardie knight and couragious capteine Edward prince of Wales, duke of Aquitaine and Cornewall, eldeſt ſonne to the ſaid king Edward the third: which king was not onelie in déed, but alſo of all men reputed and taken for the true and infallible heire to the wiſe and politike prince king Henrie the third, as ſonne and heire to king Edward the ſecond, ſonne and heire to king Edward the firſt, the very heire and firſt begotten ſonne of the ſaid noble and vertuous prince king Henrie the third.

Which king Richard of that name the ſecond, was lawfullie & iuſtlie poſſeſſed of the crowne and diadem of this realme and region, till Henrie of Derbie duke of Lancaſter and Hereford, ſonne to Iohn of Gant duke of Lancaſter, the fourth begotten ſonne to the ſaid king Edward the third, and yoonger brother to my noble anceſtor Lionell duke of Clarence, the third begotten ſonne of the ſaid king Edward, by force and violence, contrarie both to the dutie of his allegiance, and alſo to his homage to him both doone and ſworne, raiſed warre and battell at the caſtle of Flint in Northwales, againſt the ſaid king Richard, and him apprehended, and impriſoned within the Tower of London: during whoſe life and captiuitie, he wrongfullie vſurped and intruded vpon the roiall power, and high eſtate of this realme and region, taking vpon him the name, ſtile, and authoritie of king and gouernour of the ſame.

And not therewith ſatiſfied, and contented, compaſſed and accompliſhed the death and deſtruction of his naturall prince, and moſt worthie ſoueraigne lord, not as a common homicide and butcherlie murtherer, but as a regicide, and deſtroier of his king. After whoſe pitious death, and execrable murther, the right and title of the crowne, and ſuperioritie of this realme was lawfullie reuerted & returned to Roger Mortimer earle of March, ſonne and heire to ladie Philip the onelie child of the aboue rehearſed Lionell duke of Clarence, vnto which Rogers daughter called Anne, my moſt deereſt and welbeloued mother, I am the verie true and lineall heire, which deſcent all you can not iuſtlie gaineſay, nor yet trulie denie. Then remember this, if the title be mine, why am I put from it? If I be true heire to the crowne (as I am in deed) why is my right withholden? If my claime be good, why haue I not iuſtice? For ſuerlie, learned men of great ſcience and knowledge ſay and affirme, that lineall deſcent, nor vſurped poſſeſſion can nothing preuaile, if continuall claime be lawfullie made, or openlie publiſhed.

For the auoiding of which ſcruple and ambiguitie: Edmund earle of March my moſt welbeloued vncle, in the time of the firſt vſurper, in deed but not by right called king Henrie the fourth, by his coſines the earle of Northumberland, & the lord Perſie, he being then in captiuitie with Owen Glendouer the rebell in Wales, made his title & righteous claime to the deſtruction of both the noble perſons. Likewiſe my moſt deereſt lord and father, ſo farre ſet forth that right and title, that he loſt his life & worldlie ioy at the towne of Southhampton, more by power than indifferent iuſtice. Since whoſe death, I comming to my full age, haue neuer deſiſted to purſue my title, and require my right, which by meanes of ſiniſter counſell and vniuſt detention, I can neither obteine nor recouer. So that of fine force I am compelled to vſe power in ſteed of praier, and force in ſteed of requeſt; not (as I ſaid before) for my priuat emolument and peculiar profit: but to reſtore peace, loue, and quietneſſe to this our naturall region, which euer ſince the firſt vngodlie vſurpation of the aforenamed Henrie, vntrulie called king Henrie the fourth, hath beene cleerelie baniſhed, and out of the ſame vniuſtlie exiled.

What murthers and manſlaughters haue beene perpetrated and committed within this countrie, ſince the beginning of that vngratious vſurpation? What number of noble men haue beene ſlaine, deſtroied, & executed ſince that infortunate date? It is too lamentable and manifeſt. For although Henrie of Lancaſter earle of Derbie tooke vpon him the ſcepter and the crowne, and wrongfullie bare the name and ſtile of a king; and was not much tickled with mine vncle the earle of March, at that time being within age: yet was he neuer in ſuertie of himſelfe, nor had or inioied any profit & quietneſſe either in mind or in bodie. For ſuerlie, a corrupt conſcience neuer feeleth reſt, but looketh when the ſword of vengeance will deſcend and ſtrike. His ſonne alſo called king Henrie the fift, obteined notable victories, and immortall praiſes for his noble acts doone in the realme of France: yet God (for the offenſe of his vntrue parent) ſuddenlie touched him, vnbodieng his ſoule in the flower of his youth, and in the glorie of his conqueſt.

And although he had a faire ſonne and a yoong heire apparant: yet was this orphan ſuch a one (as preachers ſay) that God threatned to ſend for a puniſhment to his vntrulie and vngratious people, ſaieng by his prophet Eſaie; I ſhall giue you children to be your princes, and infants without wiſedome ſhall haue the gouernance of you. The prophet lied not, if you note all things in an order: for after this Henrie the fift (whoſe fame no man can iuſtlie reproue or deface) ſucceeded his ſonne, whom all we haue called our naturall prince, and obeied as his heire. In whoſe time and wrongfull reigne, I require you diligentlie to conſider, with what great torments and afflictions God hath whipped & ſcourged this miſerable Ile: yea with ſuch and ſo manie ſcourges and plagues, as no nation (the Aegyptians onelie excepted) were euer tormented or afflicted withall. I will not ſpeake of rebellious murthers and oppreſſions, which of late haue beene doone and exerciſed heere among vs. But I will declare & manifeſt to you, how the crowne and glorie of this realme is by the negligence of this ſillie man, and his vnwiſe councell miniſhed, defaced, and alſo diſhonoured.

Is not Normandie, which his father gat, regained & conquered againe, by the inſolencie of him & his couetous councell? Is not the whole duchie of Aquitaine, by two hundred and od yeares peaceable poſſeſſed by the kings of this realme, in one yeare and a little more, gotten out of our hands & ſeigniorie: What ſhould I ſpeake of Aniou & Maine, or the loſſe of the Ile of France, with the rich citie of Paris. Alas it is too apparant. Neither will I moleſt you with the recitall of all the particulars thereof. But now in the middeſt of this affliction, and to make an end of the ſame: God of his ineffable goodneſſe, looking on this countrie with his eies of pitie & mercie, hath ſent me in the truth, to reſtore againe this decaid kingdome to his ancient fame and old renowme whereof heere in open parlement, according to my iuſt & true title, I haue and doo take poſſeſſion of this roiall throne: not putting diffidence, but firme hope in Gods grace, that by his diuine aid, and aſſiſtance of you the peeres of this realme, I ſhall beautifie & mainteine the ſame to the glorie of him, honour of my bloud, and to the publike wealth as well of you all heere preſent, as of all the poore commons and ſubiects of this kingdome and regiment.

When the duke had made an end of his oration, the lords ſat ſtill as men ſtriken into a certeine amazedneſſe, neither whiſpering nor ſpeaking foorth a word, as though their mouthes had béene ſowed vp. The duke not verie well content with their ſilence, aduiſed them to conſider throughlie, and ponder the whole effect of his words and ſaiengs: and ſo neither fullie diſpleaſed, nor yet altogither content, departed to his lodging in the kings palace. While he was declaring thus his title in the higher houſe among the peeres, there happened a ſtrange chance in the verie ſame, inſtant amongeſt the commons in the nether houſe. A crowne which did hang in the middle of the ſame, to garniſh a branch to ſet lights vpon, without touch of man, or blaſt of wind, ſuddenlie fell downe. About the ſame time alſo fell downe the crowne which ſtood on the top of Douer caſtell. Which chances were conſtrued to be ſignes, that the crowne of the realme ſhould ſome waie haue a fall.

Prodigious tokens.

The lords forgot not the dukes demand, and to take ſome direction therein, diuerſe of them, as ſpirituall and temporall, with manie graue and ſage perſons of the commonaltie dailie aſſembled at the Blackefriers, and other places, to treat of this matter, being of ſo great importance. During which time the duke of Yorke, although he and the king were both lodged in the palace of Weſtminſter; yet would he not for anie praiers or requeſts once viſit the king, till ſome concluſion were taken in this matter: ſaieng, that he was ſubiect to no man, but only to God, vnder whoſe mercie none here ſuperiour but he. ¶ The king of Scots, partlie incouraged thorough the ciuill diſcord here in England, and partlie for the diſpleaſure which he had conceiued for the death of Edmund duke of Summerſet his moothers brother, this yeare beſieged the caſtell of Roxburgh: and by the breaking of a bombard, as the ſame was ſhot off againſt the caſtell, he chanced to be ſlaine. Yet the Scots left not off their enterpriſe, aſſaulting the caſtell till they gat it, and then defended it a long time after, till Richard duke of Gloceſter wan it againe, and raced it.

The caſtell of Roxburgh beſieged.

The king of Scots thorough miſfortune ſlaine.

After long debating of the matter, and deliberate conſultation amongeſt the peeres, prelats, and commons, vpon the vigill of All ſaints, it was condeſcended: for ſo much as king Henrie had béene taken as king by the ſpace of thirtie and eight yeares and more, that he ſhould inioy the name and title of king, and haue poſſeſſion of the realme during his naturall life. And if he either died, or reſigned, or forfeited the ſame, by breaking or going againſt anie point of this concord, then the ſaid crowne & authoritie roiall ſhould immediatlie be deuoluted and come to the duke of Yorke, if he then liued; or elſe to the next heire of his linage. And that the duke of Yorke from thenſe foorth ſhould be protector and regent of the land. ¶ This was the determination of the parlement to & fro, tending to peace betwéene the king & the duke (which was ratified accordinglie) as by the articles inſuing dooth appeare.

The determination of the parlement concerning the intailing of crowne.

Abr.Fl.ex I.S. pag.700,701, &c.in Quart.

The articles betvvixt king Henrie and the duke of Yorke.

BLeſſed be Ieſu, in whoſe hands and bountie reſteth and is the peace and vnitie betwixt princes, and the weale of euerie realme: by whoſe direction (I know) agreed it is, appointed, and accorded as followeth, betwixt the moſt high and moſt mightie prince king Henrie the ſixt, king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, on the one partie, and the right high & mightie prince Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke on the other partie: vpon certeine matters of variance mooued betwixt them, and eſpeciallie vpon the claime and title vnto the crownes of England and of France, and roiall power, eſtate, and dignitie apperteining to the ſame, and lordſhip of Ireland, opened, ſhewed, and declared by the ſaid duke, before all the lords ſpirituall and temporall, being in this preſent parlement.

Firſt, where the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke hath declared and opened (as is aboue ſaid) title & claime in maner as followeth.

That the right noble and worthie prince, Henrie king of England the third had iſſue, and lawfullie got Edward the firſt begotten ſonne, borne at Weſtminſter, the fiftéenth kalends of Iulie, in the yeare of our Lord 1239, & Edmund his ſecond ſonne which was borne on S. Marcels daie, the yere 1200, the which Edward, after the death of king Henrie his father, intituled & called king Edward the firſt, had iſſue, Edward his firſt begotten ſonne, called (after the deceaſſe of his father) king Edward the ſecond, the which had iſſue, Edward the third; which Edward the third had iſſue, Edward prince of Wales; William of Hatfield his ſecond ſonne; Lionell the third, duke of Clarence; Iohn of Gant fourth, duke of Lancaſter; Edmund of Langleie fift, duke of Yorke; Thomas of Woodſtoke ſixt, duke of Gloceſter; and William of Windſor ſeauenth.

The ſaid Edward prince of Wales, which died in the life time of his father, had iſſue Richard, which ſucéeded Edward the third his grandſire; Richard died without iſſue; William of Hatfield the ſecond ſonne of Edward the third, died without iſſue; Lionell the third ſonne of Edward the third, duke of Clarence, had iſſue Philip his daughter and heire, which was coupled in matrimonie vnto Edmund Mortimer earle of March, and had iſſue Roger Mortimer earle of March hir ſonne and heire; which Roger had iſſue of Edmund erle of March, Roger Mortimer, Anne, Elianor; which Edmund, Roger, and Elianor died without iſſue.

And the ſaid Anne coupled in matrimonie to Richard earle of Cambridge, the ſonne of Edmund of Langleie, the fift ſonne of Henrie the third, and had iſſue Richard Plantagenet, commonlie called duke of Yorke; Iohn of Gant, the fourth ſonne of Edward, and the yoonger brother of the ſaid Lionell, had iſſue Henrie earle of Derbie, who incontinentlie after that king Richard reſigned the crownes of the realmes and lordſhip of Ireland, vnrighteouſlie entered vpon the ſame, then being aliue Edmund Mortimer earle of March, ſonne to Roger Mortimer earle of March, ſonne and heire of the ſaid Philip, daughter and heire of the ſaid Lionell, the third ſonne of the ſaid king Edward the third, to the which Edmund the right and title of the ſaid crownes and lordſhip by law and cuſtome belonged. To the which Richard duke of Yorke, as ſonne to Anne daughter to Roger Mortimer earle of March, ſonne and heire of the ſaid Philip, daughter and heire of the ſaid Lionell, the third ſonne of king Edward the third, the right, title, dignitie roiall, and eſtate of the crownes of the realmes of England and France, and the lordſhip of Ireland perteineth and belongeth afore anie iſſue of the ſaid Iohn of Gant, the fourth ſonne of the ſame king Edward.

The ſaid title notwithſtanding, and without preiudice of the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, tenderlie deſiring the wealth, reſt, and proſperitie of this land, and to ſet apart all that might be trouble to the ſame, and conſidering the poſſeſſion of the ſaid king Henrie the ſixt, and that he hath for his time béene named, taken, and reputed for king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, is contented, agréed, and conſenteth, that he be had, reputed, and taken for king of England and France, with the roiall eſtate, dignitie, and preheminence belonging therevnto, and lord of Ireland during his naturall life. And for that time, the ſaid duke, without hurt or preiudice of his ſaid right, and title, ſhall take, worſhip, and honour him for his ſoueraigne lord.

Item, the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, ſhall promit and bind him by his ſolemne oth, in maner and forme as followeth.

The oth of Richard duke of Yorke.

In the name of God Amen: I Richard duke of Yorke, promiſe and ſweare by the faith and truth that I owe to almightie God, that I ſhall neuer conſent, procure, or ſtirre, directlie or indirectlie, in priuie or apert, neither (as much as in me is) ſhall ſuffer to be doone, conſented, procured, or ſtirred, anie thing that may ſound to the abridgement of the naturall life of king Henrie the ſixt, or to the hurt or diminiſhing of his reigne or dignitie roiall, by violence, or anie other waie, againſt his fréedome or libertie: but if any perſon or perſons would doo or preſume anie thing to the contrarie, I ſhall with all my might and power withſtand it, and make it to be withſtood, as far as my power will ſtretch therevnto, ſo helpe me God and his holie euangeliſts.

Item, Edward earle of March, and Edmund earle of Rutland, ſonnes of the ſaid duke of Yorke, ſhall make like oth.

Item, it is accorded, appointed, and agréed, that the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, ſhall be called and reputed from henceforth, verie and rightfull heire to the crownes, roiall eſtate, dignitie and lordſhip aboue ſaid; and after the deceaſſe of the ſaid king Henrie, or when he will laie from him the ſaid crownes, eſtate, dignitie, and lordſhip, the ſaid duke and his heires ſhall immediatlie ſuccéed to the ſaid crownes, roiall eſtate, dignitie and lordſhip.

Item, the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, ſhall haue by authoritie of this preſent parlement, caſtels, manors, lands, and tenements, with the wards, marriages, reliefes, ſeruices, fines, amercements, offices, aduouſons, fées, and other appurtenances to them belonging, what ſoeuer they be, to the yearelie value of ten thouſand marks, ouer all charges and repriſes; whereof fiue thouſand marks ſhall be to his owne eſtate, thrée thouſand fiue hundred marks to Edward his firſt begotten ſonne earle of March for his eſtate, and one thouſand pounds to Edmund earle of Rutland his ſecond ſonne for his yearelie ſuſtentation, in ſuch conſideration and ſuch intent as ſhall be declared by the lords of the kings councell.

Item, if anie perſon or perſons imagine or compaſſe the death of the ſaid duke, and thereof probablie be atteinted of open déed doone by folkes of other condition, that it be déemed & adiudged high treaſon.

Item, for the more eſtabliſhing of the ſaid accord, it is appointed and conſented, that the lords ſpirituall and temporall, being in this preſent parlement, ſhall make oths, to accept, take, worſhip, and repute the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke and his heires, as aboue is rehearſed, and kéepe, obſerue, and ſtrengthen (in as much as apperteineth vnto them) all the things aboueſaid, and reſiſt to their power, all them that would preſume the contrarie, according to their eſtates and degrées.

Item, the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, earles of March, and Rutland, ſhall permit and make other to helpe, aid, and defend the ſaid lords, and euerie of them, againſt all thoſe that will quarell, or anie thing attempt againſt the ſaid lords, or anie of them, by occaſion of agréement or conſenting to the ſaid accord, or aſſiſtance giuing to the duke and earles, or anie of them.

Item, it is agréed and appointed, that this accord, and euerie article thereof, be opened and notified by the kings letters patents, or otherwiſe, at ſuch times and places, and in maner as it ſhall be thought expedient to the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, with the aduiſe of the lords of the kings councell. The king vnderſtandeth certeinelie the ſaid title of the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, iuſt, lawfull, and ſufficient, by the aduiſe and aſſent of the lords ſpirituall and temporall, and the commons in this parlement aſſembled; and by authoritie of the ſame parlement declareth, approoueth, ratifieth, confirmeth, and accepteth the ſaid title, iuſt, good, lawfull, and true, and therevnto giueth his aſſent and agréement of his frée will and libertie.

And ouer that, by the ſaid aduiſe and authoritie declareth, intituleth, calleth, eſtabliſheth, affirmeth, & reputeth the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke, verie true and rightfull heire to the crownes, roiall eſtate, and dignitie of the realmes of England and of France, and of the lordſhip of Ireland aforeſaid; and that according to the worſhip and reuerence that thereto belongeth, he be taken, accepted and reputed, in worſhip & reuerence, by all the ſtates of the ſaid realme of England, and of all his ſubiects thereof; ſauing and ordeining by the ſame authoritie, the king to haue the ſaid crownes, realme, roiall eſtate, dignitie, and preheminence of the ſame, and the ſaid lordſhip of Ireland during his life naturall.

And furthermore, by the ſame aduiſe and authoritie willeth, conſenteth and agréeth, that after his deceaſſe, or when it ſhall pleaſe his highneſſe to laie from him the ſaid crownes, eſtate, dignitie, and lordſhip, the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke and his heires ſhall immediatlie ſuccéed him in the ſaid crownes, roiall eſtate, dignitie, and worſhip, and them then haue and inioie: anie act of parlement, ſtatute, or ordinance, or other thing to the contrarie made, or interruption, or diſcontinuance of poſſeſſion notwithſtanding.

And moreouer, by the ſaid aduiſe and authoritie, eſtabliſheth, granteth, confirmeth, approoueth, ratifieth, and accepteth the ſaid accord, and all things therein conteined, and therevnto fréelie and abſolutelie aſſenteth, agréeth; and by the ſame aduiſe and authoritie ordeineth and eſtabliſheth, that if anie perſon or perſons imagine or compaſſe the death of the ſaid duke, & probablie be atteinted of open déed doone by folks of that condition, that it be déemed and adiudged high treaſon.

And furthermore ordeineth and eſtabliſheth by the ſaid aduiſe and authoritie, that all ſtatutes, ordinances, and acts of parlement, made in the time of the ſaid king Henrie the fourth, by the which he and the heires of his bodie, comming of Henrie late king of England the fift, the ſonne and heire of the ſaid king Henrie the fourth, and the heires of king Henrie the fift, were or be inheritable to the ſaid crownes and realmes, or to the heritage of the ſame, be annulled, repealed, damned, cancelled, void, and of none effect.

And ouer this, the king by the ſaid aduiſe, aſſent and authoritie, ordeineth and eſtabliſheth, that all other acts and ſtatutes made afore this time by act of parlement, not repealed or annulled by like authoritie, or otherwiſe void, be in ſuch force, effect, and vertue, as they were afore the making of theſe ordinances; and that no letters patents, roialx of record, nor acts iudiciall, made or doone afore this time not repealed, reuerſed, ne otherwiſe void by law, be preiudiced or hurt by this preſent act.]

This agreement put in articles, was ingroſſed, ſealed, and ſworne vnto by the two parties, and alſo enacted in the parlement. For ioy whereof the king, hauing in his companie the duke of Yorke, road to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule in London, and there on the day of All ſaints with the crowne on his head went ſolemnelie in proceſſion, and was lodged a good ſpace after in the biſhops palace, neere to the ſaid church. And vpon the ſaturdaie next inſuing, Richard duke of Yorke was by ſound of trumpet ſolemnelie proclamed heire apparant to the crowne of England, and protectour of the realme. After this, the parlement kept at Couentrie the laſt yeare, was declared to be a diueliſh councell, and onelie had for deſtruction of the nobilitie, and was indeed no lawfull parlement: bicauſe they which were returned, were neuer elected according to the due order of the law, but ſecretlie named by them which deſired rather the deſtruction than the aduancement of the common-wealth. When theſe agreements were enacted, the king diſſolued his parlement, which was the laſt parlement that euer he ended.

The duke of Yorke proclamed heire apparant ⁊ protectour of the realme.

The parlemēt at Couentrie made fruſtrat.

The duke of Yorke, well knowing that the queene would ſpurne againſt all this, cauſed both hir and hir ſonne to be ſent for by the king. But ſhe as woont rather to rule, than to be ruled, and thereto counſelled by the dukes of Exceſter and Summerſet, not onelie denied to come, but alſo aſſembled a great armie, intending to take the king by fine force out of the lords hands. The protector in London, hauing knowledge of all theſe doings, aſſigned the duke of Norffolke, and erle of Warwike his truſtie freends to be about the king, while he with the earles of Saliſburie and Rutland, and a conuenient number departed out of London the ſecond daie of December northward, and appointed the earle of March his eldeſt ſonne to follow him with all his power. The duke came to his caſtell of Sandall beſide Wakefield on Chriſtmaſſe euen, ⁊ there began to make muſter of his tenants and freends. The queene thereof aſcerteined, determined to cope with him yer his ſuccour were come.

Now ſhe, hauing in hir companie the prince hir ſonne, the dukes of Exceſter and Summerſet, the earle of Deuonſhire, the lord Clifford, the lord Ros, and in effect all the lords of the north parts, with eighteene thouſand men, or (as ſome write) two and twentie thouſand, marched from Yorke to Wakefield, and bad baſe to the duke, euen before his caſtell gates. He hauing with him not fullie fiue thouſand perſons, contrarie to the minds of his faithfull councellors, would needs iſſue foorth to fight with his enimies. The duke of Summerſet and the queenes part, caſting vpon their moſt aduantage, appointed the lord Clifford to lie in one ſtale, and the earle of Wilſhire in another, and the duke with other to keepe the maine battell. The duke of Yorke with his people deſcended downe the hill in good order and arraie, and was ſuffered to paſſe on towards the maine battell.

But when he was in the plaine field betweene his caſtell and the towne of Wakefield, he was inuironed on euerie ſide, like fiſh in a net, ſo that though he fought manfullie, yet was he within halfe an houre ſlaine and dead, and his whole armie diſcomfited: with him died of his truſtie freends, his two baſtard vncles, ſir Iohn and ſir Hugh Mortimers, ſir Dauie Hall, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir Thomas Neuill, William and Thomas Aparre, both brethren; and two thouſand and eight hundred others, whereof manie were yoong gentlemen, and heires of great parentage in the ſouth parts, whoſe kin reuenged their deaths within foure moneths next, as after ſhall appeare.

Onelie ſeauen hundred ſoutherne men ſaith Whethamſted.

In this conflict was wounded and taken priſoner, Richard earle of Saliſburie, ſir Richard Limbricke, Raſe Stanleie, Iohn Harow, capteine Hanſon, and diuerſe others. The lord Clifford, perceiuing where the earle of Rutland was conueied out of the field (by one of his fathers chapleins, and ſcholemaſter to the ſame earle) and ouertaking him, ſtabbed him to the heart with a dagger as he kneeled afore him. This earle was but a child at that time of twelue yeares of age, whome neither his tender yeares, nor dolorous countenance, with holding vp both his hands for mercie (for his ſpeach was gone for feare) could mooue the cruell heart of the lord Clifford to take pitie vpon him, ſo that he was noted of great infamie for that his vnmercifull murther vpon that yoong gentleman.

The cruell murther of the yoong earle of Rutland.

But the ſame lord Clifford not ſatiſfied herewith, came to the place where the dead corpſe of the duke of Yorke laie, cauſed his head to be ſtriken off, and ſet on it a crowne of paper, fixed it on a pole, and preſented it to the queene, not lieng farre from the field, in great deſpite, at which great reioiſing was ſhewed: but they laughed then that ſhortlie after lamented, and were glad then of other mens deaths that knew not their owne to be ſo neere at hand. ¶ Some write that the duke was taken aliue, and in deriſion cauſed to ſtand vpon a molehill, on whoſe head they put a garland in ſteed of a crowne, which they had faſhioned and made of ſedges or bulruſhes; and hauing ſo crowned him with that garland, they kneeled downe afore him (as the Iewes did vnto Chriſt) in ſcorne, ſaieng to him; Haile king without rule, haile king without heritage, haile duke and prince without people or poſſeſſions. And at length hauing thus ſcorned him with theſe and diuerſe other the like deſpitefull words, they ſtroke off his head, which (as yee haue heard) they preſented to the queene.

Whethamſted.

Manie deemed that this miſerable end chanced to the duke of Yorke, as a due puniſhment for breaking his oth of allegiance vnto his ſouereigne lord king Henrie: but others held him diſcharged thereof, bicauſe he obteined a diſpenſation from the pope, by ſuch ſuggeſtion as his procurators made vnto him, whereby the ſame oth was adiudged void, as that which was receiued vnaduiſedlie, to the preiudice of himſelfe, and diſheriting of all his poſteritie. After this victorie by the queene, the earle of Saliſburie and all the priſoners were ſent to Pomfret, and there beheaded, whoſe heads (togither with the duke of Yorkes head) were conueied to Yorke, and there ſet on poles ouer the gate of the citie, in deſpite of them and their linage. The earle of March, now after the death of his father, verie duke of Yorke, lieng at Gloceſter, was wonderfullie amazed, when the ſorrowfull newes of theſe miſhaps came vnto him: but after comfort giuen to him by his faithfull louers and aſſured alies, he remooued to Shreweſburie, declaring to the inhabitants of that towne, and to them of the other townes in thoſe parties the murther of his father, the ieopardie of himſelfe, and the preſent ruine of the common-wealth.

The people on the marches of Wales, for the fauour which they bare to the Mortimers linage, more gladlie offered him their aid and aſſiſtance than he could deſire the ſame; ſo that he had incontinentlie a puiſſant armie, to the number of thrée and twentie thouſand, readie to go againſt the quéene, and the murtherers of his father. But when he was ſetting forward, newes was brought to him, that Iaſper earle of Penbroke halfe brother to king Henrie, and Iames Butler earle of Ormund and Wilſhire, had aſſembled a great number of Welſh and Iriſh people to take him: he herewith quickned, retired backe and met with his enimies in a faire plaine, néere to Mortimers croſſe, not far from Hereford eaſt, on Candlemaſſe daie in the morning. At which time the ſunne (as ſome write) appeared to the earle of March like thrée ſunnes, and ſuddenlie ioined altogither in one. Upon which ſight he tooke ſuch courage, that he fiercelie ſetting on his enimies, put them to flight: and for this cauſe men imagined, that he gaue the ſunne in his full brightneſſe for his badge or cogniſance. Of his enimies were left dead on the ground thrée thouſand and eight hundred.

The earles of Penbroke and Wilſhire fled, but ſir Owen Teuther father to the ſaid earle of Penbroke (which Owen had married king Henries mother, as yee haue heard before) with Dauid Floid, Morgan ap Reuther, and diuerſe other were taken, and beheaded at Hereford. The quéene neuertheleſſe incouraged by hir late victorie, with a multitude of northerne people, marched toward London, intending to vndoo all that had béene ordeined in the laſt parlement. Theſe northerne people, after they were once paſſed ouer the riuer of Trent, ſpoiled and waſted the countrie afore them, in maner as if they had béene in the land of forren enimies. At length, they approched to ſaint Albons, hearing that the duke of Northfolke, and the earle of Warwike, with other whome the duke of Yorke had left to gouerne the king in his abſence, had (by the kings aſſent) aſſembled a great hoaſt, and were incamped néere to that towne.

Owen Teuther and other taken and beheaded.

Whethamſted.

Thoſe northerne lords and other that were with the quéene, made forward, and entring into S. Albons, meant to paſſe through the towne, and ſo to coape with their enimies; but finding a ſort of archers ranged néere to the great croſſe in the market place, to defend their paſſage, they were receiued with ſuch a ſtorme of arrowes, which came flieng about their eares as thicke as haile, that they were quicklie repelled backe, and with loſſe driuen to retire in haſt vnto the weſt end of the towne; where, by a lane that leadeth northwards vp to ſaint Peters ſtréet, they made their entrie, and had there alſo a ſharpe incounter againſt certeine bands of the kings people. But after great ſlaughter on both parts, they got through, and vpon the heath that lieth at the north end of the towne, called Barnard heath, they had a farre greater conflict with foure or fiue thouſand of the kings armie, that ſéemed as they had béene auant courrers.

The northern men enter into S. Albons.

They paſſe through it.

Theſe gaue the onſet ſo fiercelie at the beginning, that the victorie reſted doubtfull a certeine time, ſo that if the eaſterne and ſoutherne men had continued as they began, the field had béene theirs; but after they had ſtood to it a pretie while, and perceiued none of their fellowes from the great armie to come and aſſiſt them, they began to faint, and turning their backes, fled amaine ouer hedge and ditch, through thicke and thin, woods and buſhes, ſéeking ſo to eſcape the hands of their cruell enimies that followed them with eger minds, to make ſlaughter vpon them, namelie, the northern prickers, now in the chaſe purſued moſt hotlie, and bare downe manie, and more had doone, if the night comming vpon, had not ſtaied them.

The ſecond battell at S. Albons.

The kings part fleth.

When the daie was cloſed, thoſe that were about the king (in number a twentie thouſand) hearing how euill their fellowes had ſped, began vtterlie to deſpaire of the victorie, and ſo fell without anie long tarriance to running awaie. By reaſon whereof, the nobles that were about the king, perceiuing how the game went, and withall ſaw no comfort in the king, but rather a good will and affection towards the contrarie part, they withdrew alſo, leauing the king accompanied with the lord Bonneuille, & ſir Thomas Kiriell of Kent; which vpon aſſurance of the kings promiſe, tarried ſtill with him, and fled not. But their truſt deceiued them, for at the quéenes departing from ſaint Albons, they were both beheaded; though contrarie to the mind and promiſe of hir huſband. Sir Thomas Thorp, baron of the eſcheker, was alſo beheaded the ſame daie, at Highgate, by the commons of Kent.

Such was the ſucceſſe of this ſecond battell fought at S. Albons, vpon Shrouetueſdaie, the ſeuentéenth of Februarie, in which were ſlaine thrée and twentie hundred men, of whom no noble man is remembred, ſaue ſir Iohn Graie, which the ſame daie was made knight, with twelue other, at the village of Colneie. Now after that the noble men and other were fled, and the king left in maner alone without anie power of men to gard his perſon, he was counſelled by an eſquier called Thomas Hoo, a man well languaged, and well ſéene in the lawes, to ſend ſome conuenient meſſenger to the northerne lords, aduertiſing them, that he would now gladlie come vnto them (whome he knew to be his verie fréends, and had aſſembled themſelues togither for his ſeruice) to the end he might remaine with them, as before he had remained vnder the gouernement of the ſoutherne lords.

1916, as Iohn Stow noteth.

Sir Iohn Graie ſlaine.

According to the aduiſe and counſell of this eſquier, the king thought it good to ſend vnto them, and withall appointed the ſame eſquier to beare the meſſage, who firſt went and declared the ſame vnto the earle of Northumberland, and returning backe to the king, brought certeine lords with him, who conueied the king firſt vnto the lord Cliffords tent, that ſtood next to the place where the kings people had incamped. This doone, they went and brought the quéene and hir ſonne prince Edward vnto his preſence, whome he ioifullie receiued, imbracing and kiſſing them in moſt louing wiſe, and yéelding hartie thanks to almightie God, whome it had pleaſed thus to ſtrengthen the forces of the northerne men, to reſtore his déerelie beloued and onelie ſonne againe into his poſſeſſion. Thus was the quéene fortunate in hir two battels, but vnfortunate was the king in all his enterpriſes: for where his perſon was preſent, the victorie ſtill fled from him to the contrarie part. The quéene cauſed the king to dub hir ſonne prince Edward knight, with thirtie other perſons, which the day before fought on hir ſide againſt his part.

Prince Edward made knight.

This doone, they went to the abbeie, where, of the abbat and moonks they were receiued with hymnes and ſongs, and ſo brought to the high altar, and after to the ſhrine, and ſo to the chamber in which the king was woont to lodge. The abbat made ſute that order might be taken to reſtreine the northerne men from ſpoiling the towne: and proclamation indéed was made to that effect, but it auailed not; for they maintеined, that the ſpoile of things was granted them by couenant, after they were once paſſed ouer the riuer of Trent: and ſo not regarding anie proclamation or other commandement, they ſpared nothing that they could laie hands vpon, if the ſame were meet for them to carie awaie. The queene, hauing thus got the victorie, ſent to the maior of London, commanding him without delaie to ſend certeine carts, laden with Lenton vittels, for the refreſhing of hir and hir armie. The maior incontinentlie cauſed carts to be laden, and would haue ſent them forward; but the commons of the citie would not ſuffer them to paſſe, but ſtaied them at Criplegate, notwithſtanding the maior did what he could by gentle perſuaſions to quiet them.

During which controuerſie, diuerſe of the northerne horſſemen, came and robbed in the ſuburbs of the citie, and would haue entred at Criplegate; but they were repelled by the commoners, and thrée of them ſlaine. Wherevpon, the maior ſent the recorder to Barnet to the kings councell there, to excuſe the matter; and the duches of Bedford, the ladie Scales, with diuerſe fathers of the ſpiritualtie, went to the queene, to aſſwage hir diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the citie. The queene at this humble requeſt, by aduiſe of hir councell, appointed certeine lords and knights, with foure hundred tall perſons, to ride to the citie, and there to view and ſee the demeanor and diſpoſition of the people: and diuerſe aldermen were appointed to meet them at Barnet, and to conueie them to London. But what man purpoſeth, God diſpoſeth. All theſe deuiſes were ſhortlie altered to another forme, bicauſe true report came not onelie to the queene, but alſo to the citie; that the earle of March, hauing vanquiſhed the earles of Penbroke and Wilſhire, had met with the earle of Warwike (after this laſt battell at ſaint Albons) at Chipping Norton by Cotſold; and that they with both their powers were cōming toward London. The queene hauing little truſt in Eſſex, and leſſe in Kent, but leaſt of all in London, with hir huſband and ſonne, departed from ſaint Albons, into the north countrie, where the foundation of hir aid and refuge onelie reſted.

The quéene returneth northward.

The duches of Yorke, ſéeing hir huſband and ſonne ſlaine, and not knowing what ſhould ſuccéed of hir eldeſt ſonnes chance, ſent hir two yonger ſonnes, George and Richard, ouer the ſea; to the citie of Vtrecht in Almaine, where they were of Philip duke of Burgognie well receiued; and ſo remained there, till their brother Edward had got the crowne and gouernement of the realme. The earles of March and Warwike, hauing perfect knowlege that the king & queene, with their adherents, were departed from S. Albons, rode ſtraight to London, entring there with a great number of men of warre, the firſt weeke of Lent. Whoſe cōming thither was no ſooner knowne, but that the people reſorted out of Kent, Eſſex, and other the counties adioining, in great numbers, to ſee, aid, and comfort this luſtie prince and flower of chiualrie, in whome the hope of their ioy and truſt of their quietneſſe onelie conſiſted.

The great hope of the people conceiued of the erle of March.

This prudent yoong prince, minding to take time when time ſerued, called a great councell, both of the lords ſpirituall and temporall, and to them repeated the title and right that he had to the crowne, rehearſing alſo the articles concluded betwéene king Henrie and his father, by their writings ſigned and ſealed, and alſo confirmed by act of parlement; the breaches whereof he neither forgat, nor left vndeclared. After the lords had conſidered of this matter, they determined by authoritie of the ſaid councell, that becauſe king Henrie had doone contrarie to the ordinances in the laſt parlement concluded, and was inſufficient of himſelfe to rule the realme, he was therfore to be depriued of all kinglie eſtate: and incontinentlie was Edward earle of March, ſonne and heire to Richard duke of Yorke, by the lords in the ſaid councell aſſembled, named, elected, and admitted for king and gouernour of the realme.

The earle of March elected king.

On which daie, the people of the earles part, being in their muſter in S. Johns field, and a great number of the ſubſtantiall citizens there aſſembled, to behold their order; the lord Fauconbridge, who tooke the muſters, wiſelie anon declared to the people the offenſes and breaches of the late agréement, committed by king Henrie the ſixt; and demanded of the people, whether they would haue him to rule and reigne anie longer ouer them? To whome they with whole voice anſwered; Naie, naie. Then he aſked them, if they would ſerue, loue, honour, and obeie the erle of March, as their onlie king and ſoueraigne lord? To which queſtion they anſwered; Yea, yea; crieng (King Edward) with manie great ſhowts & clapping of hands in aſſent and gladneſſe of the ſame.

The lord Fauconbridge.

The lords were ſhortlie aduertiſed of the louing conſent which the commons frankelie and fréelie had giuen. Wherupon incontinentlie, they all with a conuenient number of the moſt ſubſtantiall commons repaired to the erle at Bainards caſtell, making iuſt and true report of their election and admiſſion, and the louing aſſent of the commons. The earle, after long pauſing, firſt thanked God of his great grace and benefit towards him ſhewed; then the lords and commons for their fauour and fidelitie: notwithſtanding, like a wiſe prince, he alleged his inſufficiencie for ſo great a roome and weightie burthen, as lacke of knowledge, want of experience, and diuerſe other qualities to a gouernour apperteining. But yet in concluſion, being perſuaded by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhop of Exceſter, and other lords then preſent, he agréed to their petition, and tooke vpon him the charge of the kingdome, as forfeited to him by breach of the couenants eſtabliſhed in parlement.

The earle of March taketh vpon him as king.

Abr.Flem.

¶Thus farre touching the tragicall ſtate of this land vnder the rent regiment of king Henrie, who (beſides the bare title of roialtie and naked name of king) had little apperteining to the port of a prince. For whereas the dignitie of princedome ſtandeth in ſoueraigntie; there were of his nobles that imbecilled his prerogatiue by ſundrie practiſes, ſpeciallie by maine force; as ſeeking either to ſuppreſſe, or to exile, or to obſcure, or to make him awaie: otherwiſe what ſhould be the meaning of all thoſe foughten fields from time to time, moſt miſerablie falling out both to prince, péere, and people? As at ſaint Albons, at Bloreheath, at Northampton, at Banberie, at Barnet, & at Wakefield; to the effuſion of much bloud, and pulling on of manie a plage, which otherwiſe might haue béene auoided. All which battels, togither with thoſe that were tried betweene Edward the fourth, after his inthronization; and Henrie the ſixt after his extermination (as at Exham, Doncaſter, and Teukeſburie) are remembred by Anglorum prælia in good order of pithie poetrie, as followeth;

But now before we procéed anie further, ſith the reigne of king Henrie maie ſéeme here to take end, we will ſpecifie ſome ſuch learned men as liued in his time. John Leland, ſurnamed the elder (in reſpect of the other John Leland, that painefull antiquarie of our time) wrote diuerſe treatiſes, for the inſtruction of grammarians; John Hainton, a Carmelit or white frier (as they called them) of Lincolne; Robert Colman, a Franciſcane frier of Norwich, and chancellor of the vniuerſitie of Oxenford; William White a prieſt of Kent, profeſſing the doctrine of Wickliffe, and forſaking the order of the Romane church, married a wife, but continued his office of preaching, till at length, in the yeare 1428, he was apprehended, and by William biſhop of Norwich, and the doctors of the friers mendicants, charged with thirtie articles, which he mainteined, contrarie to the doctrine of the Romane church, and in September the ſame yeare ſuffered death by fire.

Peter Baſſet wrote king Henrie the fift his life.

Alexander Carpentar, a learned man, ſet forth a booke called Deſtructorium vitiorum, wherein he inueieth againſt the prelats of the church of that time, for their crueltie vſed, in perſecuting the poore and godlie chriſtians; Richard Kendall, an excellent grammarian; John Bate, warden of the white friers in Yorke, but borne in the borders of Wales, an excellent philoſopher, and a diuine, he was alſo ſéene in the Gréeke toong, a thing rare in thoſe daies; Peter Baſſet, eſquier of the priuie chamber to king Henrie the fift, whoſe life he wrote; John Pole a prieſt, that wrote the life of ſaint Walburgh, daughter to one Richard, a noble man of this realme of England, which Walburgh (as he affirmeth) builded our ladie church in Antwerpe; Thomas Iſmaelit, a monke of Sion; Walter Hilton, a Chartreaux monke alſo of Shiene, either of thoſe wrote certeine treatiſes full of ſuperſtition, as John Bale noteth.

Thomas Walden ſo called of the towne where he was borne, but his fathers ſurname was Netter, a white frier of London, and the thrée and twentith prouinciall gouernour of his order, a man vndoubtedlie learned, and thoroughlie furniſhed with cunning of the ſchooles, but a ſore enimie to them that profeſſed the doctrine of Wickliffe, writing ſundrie great volumes and treatiſes againſt them, he died at Rone in Normandie, the ſecond of Nouember, in the yeare one thouſand foure hundred and thirtie; Richard Vllerſton, borne in Lancaſhire, wrote diuerſe treatiſes of diuinitie; Peter Clearke, a ſtudent in Oxenford, and a defendor of Wickliffes doctrine, wherevpon when he feared perſecution here in England, he fled into Boheme, but yet at length he was apprehended by the imperialiſts, and died for it, as ſome write, but in what order, is not expreſſed.

Fabian and Caxton.

Robert Hounſlow, a religious man of an houſe in Hounſlow beſide London, whereof he tooke his ſurname; Thomas Walſingham, borne in Norfolke, in a towne there of the ſame name, but profeſſed a monke in the abbeie of ſaint Albons, a diligent hiſtoriographer; John Tilneie, a white frier of Yermouth, but a ſtudent in Cambridge, and prooued an excellent diuine; Richard Fleming, a doctor of diuinitie in Oxenford, of whome more at large before, pag. 604. John Low borne in Worceſtershire, an Auguſtine frier, a doctor of diuinitie, and prouinciall in England of his order, and by king Henrie the ſixt, made firſt biſhop of ſaint Aſaph, and after remooued from thenſe to Rocheſter; Thomas Kingſted the yonger, not the ſame that was biſhop, but a doctor of the law, and vicar of Mildenhall in Suffolke, a notable preacher, and wrote diuerſe treatiſes.

John Felton, a doctor of diuinitie of Magdalen college in Oxenford; Nicholas Botleſham, a Carmelit frier borne in Cambridgeſhire, and ſtudent firſt in the vniuerſitie of Cambridge, and after in Paris, where he procéeded doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Rudburne, a monke of Wincheſter, and an hiſtoriographer; John Holbrooke, borne in Surrie, a great philoſopher, and well ſéene in the mathematiks; Peter Paine, an earneſt profeſſor of Wickliffes doctrine, and fearing perſecution here in England, fled into Boheme, where he remained in great eſtimation for his great learning & no leſſe wiſedome; Nicholas Vpton, a ciuilian, wrote of heraldrie, of colours in armorie, and of the dutie of chiualrie; William Beckeleie, a Carmelit frier of Sandwich, & warden of the houſe there, a diuine, and profeſſed degrée of ſchoole in Cambridge; John Torpe, a Carmelit frier of Norwich.

John Capgraue borne in Kent, an Auguſtine frier, procéeded doctor of diuinitie in Oxenford, was admitted prouinciall of his order, and prooued (without controuerſie) the beſt learned of anie of that order of friers here in England, as John Bale affirmeth, he wrote manie notable volumes, and finallie departed this life at Lin in Norffolke, the twelfth of Auguſt, in the yere 1464, which was in the fourth yeare of king Edward the fourth; Humfrie duke of Gloceſter, earle of Penbroke, and lord chamberlaine of England, alſo protector of the realme, during the minoritie of his nephue king Henrie the ſixt, was both a great fauourer of learned men, and alſo verie well learned himſelfe, namelie in aſtrologie, whereof (beſide other things) he wrote a ſpeciall treatiſe intituled, Tabula directionum.

John Whethamſted, otherwiſe called Frumentarius, was abbat of ſaint Albons, and highlie in fauor with the good duke of Gloceſter laſt remembred, he wrote diuerſe treatiſes, and among others, a booke as it were of the records of things, chancing whileſt he was abbat, which booke I haue ſéene, and partlie in ſome parcell of this kings time haue alſo followed; Roger Onleie, borne in the weſt countrie (as Bale thinketh) was accuſed of treaſon, for practiſing with the ladie Eleanor Cobham, by ſorcerie to make the king awaie, and was thereof condemned, and died for it, though he were innocent thereof, as ſome haue thought, he wrote a treatiſe intituled, Contra vulgi ſuperſtitiones, alſo another De ſua innocentia; Nicholas Cantlow, a Welſhman borne, deſcended of an ancient familie in Southwales, as by Bale it ſhould appeare, he became a frier Carmelit in Briſtow; Henrie Wichingham, a Carmelit frier of Norwich, a notable diuine, a great preacher, and wrote alſo ſundrie treatiſes of diuinitie.

John Lidgate, a monke of Burie, an excellent poet, and chiefe in his time in that facultie, of all other that practiſed the ſame within this land, he trauelled thorough France and Italie to learne the languages and ſciences, how greatlie he profited in atteining to knowledge, the workes which he wrote doo ſufficientlie teſtifie; Nicholas Hoſtreſham, an excellent phyſician; John Blackeneie, a religious man, of the order of the Trinitie intituled, De redemptione captiuorum, and prior of an houſe of the ſame order, at Ingham in Norffolke, he was ſurnamed Blackeneie, of the towne where he was borne; Thomas Beckington, biſhop of Bath, wrote againſt the law Salique, by which law the Frenchmen would ſeclude the princes of this realme from their title vnto the crowne of France; John Baringham, a Carmelite frier of Gipſwich in Suffolke; Dauid Bois, borne in Wales, and a frier Carmelit, profeſſed in Glouceſter, a doctor of diuinitie.

John Brome, an Auguſtine frier; Michaell Triguríe, a Corniſhman borne, whome for his excellencie and learning, king Henrie the fift appointed to be gouernour of that ſchoole or vniuerſitie, which he inſtituted in the citie of Caen in Normandie, after he had brought it vnder his ſubiection; John Amundiſham, a monke of ſaint Albons; Oſwald Anglicus, a monke of the Chartreux order; John Keningale, a Carmelit frier of Norwich; Peter De ſancta fide, a Carmelit alſo of Norwich; Reginald Pecocke, biſhop of Chicheſter, of whome ye haue heard before, he was borne in Wales, and ſtudent in Oriall college in Oxenford, where he procéeded doctor of diuinitie, he wrote manie treatiſes touching the chriſtian religion; John ſurnamed Burie of the towne where he was borne, an Auguſtine frier in the towne of Clare in Suffolke.

Robert Fleming, a man perfect in the Gréeke and Latine tong [among whoſe works ſome haue béene ſéene vnder theſe titles: namelie, Lucubrationum Tiburtinarm lib. 1. a dictionarie in Gréeke and Latine, and a worke in verſe of ſundrie kinds, this man was of moſt fame in the yeare of our Lord 1470, which was in the tenth yeare of Edward the fourth, though he were not obſcure alſo in the daies of this Henrie the ſixt;] Thomas Gaſcoigne, borne at Hunfléete in Yorkeſhire, of that worſhipfull familie of the Gaſcoignes there, a doctor of diuinitie, and chancellor of the vniuerſitie of Oxenford; William Stapilhart, borne in Kent, but by profeſſion a white frier in London; Robert Fimingham borne in Norffolke a Franciſcan frier in Norwich; Nicholas Montacute, an hiſtoriographer; John Chandler, chancellor of Welles; William Botoner, deſcended of a good houſe, a knight by degrée, and borne in Briſtow, verie ſtudious in antiquities, and other ſciences.

John Stow, a monke of Norwich, but ſtudent in Oxenford, where he procéeded doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Langleie, a monke of Hulme; Nicholas Bungeie, borne in a towne of Norffolke of that name, wrote an hiſtorie, called Adunationes chronicorum; Henrie Beauford biſhop of Wincheſter, baſe ſonne to John duke of Lancaſter, of whome before we haue made ſufficient mention, made cardinall by pope Martine the fourth, in the yeare 1426; Adam Homlington, a Carmelit frier; William Coppinger, maiſter of the vniuerſitie of Oxenford; Thomas Stacie, an expert mathematician, and no leſſe ſkilfull in aſtronomie; John Talaugerne, a monke of Worceſter; William Sutton, an aſtrologian; Robert Balſacke, wrote a booke intituled De re militari, that is to ſaie, of warre or chiualrie, ſo that (as is thought) he was both a good ſouldier, and a painefull ſtudent of good letters.

Thomas Dando, a Carmelit frier of Marleburgh, he wrote the life of Alphred king of weſt Saxons; William Graie, borne of the noble houſe of the Graies of Codnor, he went to atteine to ſome excellencie of learning in Italie, where he heard that noble clearke Guarinus Veronenſis read in Ferrara, he was preferred to the biſhoprike of Elie, in the yéere 1454, by pope Nicholas the fift, when Thomas Bourchier was tranſlated from thenſe to Canturburie; John Kempe, archbiſhop of Yorke, and after remooued from thenſe to Canturburie (as before ye haue heard) he was made cardinall of S. Albin, by pope Eugenie the fourth; Adam Molins (as Bale calleth him) kéeper of the kings priuie ſeale, excellentlie learned, in time of the ciuill warre betwixt king Henrie, and the duke of Yorke, in which he loſt his head.

Thomas Chillenden, a doctor both of the law ciuill and canon, became at length a monke in Canturburie; Robert Bale, ſurnamed the elder, excellentlie learned in the lawes of the realme, recorder of London, gathered as it were a chronicle of the cuſtomes, lawes, foundations, changes, reſtoring magiſtrats, offices, orders, and publike aſſemblies of the citie of London, with other matters, touching the perfect deſcription of the ſame citie; he wrote other works alſo touching the ſtate of the ſame citie, and the acts of king Edward the third; he departed this life in the yeare of our Lord 1461, euen about the beginning of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, vnto whome we will now againe returne.

Thus farre the tragicall hiſtorie of Henrie the ſixt depriued of his roialtie.

Edward the fourth earle of March, ſonne and heire to Richard duke of Yorke.

Anno Reg. 1.

The earle of March taketh vpon him as king.

AFter that this prince Edward earle of March had taken vpon him the gouernement of this realme of England (as before ye haue heard) the morow next inſuing, being the fourth of March, he rode to the church of ſaint Paule, and there offered; and after Te Deum ſong, with great ſolemnitie he was conueied to Weſtminſter, and there ſet in the hall with the ſcepter roiall in his hand, whereto people in great numbers aſſembled. His claime to the crowne was declared to be by two maner of waies, the firſt, as ſonne and heire to duke Richard his father, right inheritor to the ſame; the ſecond, by authoritie of parlement, and forfeiture committed by king Henrie. Wherevpon it was againe demanded of the commons, if they would admit and take the ſaid erle as their prince and ſoueraigne lord, which all with one voice cried, Yea, yea.

His title declared.

This

He is proclamed king.

This part thus plaied, he entered into Weſtminſter church vnder a canopie with ſolemne proceſſion, and there as king offered; and herewith taking the homages of all the nobles there preſent, he returned by water to London, and was lodged in the biſhops palace; and on the morrow after, he was proclamed king by the name of Edward the fourth, throughout the citie. This was in the yeare of the world 5427, and after the birth of our Sauiour 1461 after our accompt, beginning the yeare at Chriſtmaſſe; but after the vſuall accompt of the church of England 1460, the twentith of emperour Frederike the third; the nine and thirtith and laſt of Charles the ſeuenth French king; and firſt yeare of the reigne of Iames the third king of Scots.

Whileſt theſe things were adoing in the ſouthparts, king Henrie being in the north countrie, aſſembled a great armie, truſting (for all this) to ſubdue his enimies; namelie, ſith their chiefe ringleader the duke of Yorke was diſpatched out of the waie. But he was deceiued: for out of the ded ſtocke ſprang a branch more mightie than the ſtem; this Edward the fourth, a prince ſo highlie fauoured of the people, for his great liberalitie, clemencie, vpright dealing, and courage, that aboue all other, he with them ſtood in grace alone: by reaſon whereof, men of all ages and degrees to him dailie repaired, ſome offering themſelues and their men to ieopard their liues with him, and other plentiouſlie gaue monie to ſupport his charges, and to mainteine his right.

By which meanes, he gathered togither a puiſſant armie, to the intent by battell (ſithens none other waies would ſerue) at once to make an end of all. So, his armie and all things prepared, he departed out of London the twelfe daie of March, and by eaſie iournies came to the caſtell of Pomfret, where he reſted, appointing the lord Fitz Walter to kéepe the paſſage at Ferribridge with a good number of tall men. King Henrie on the other part, hauing his armie in readineſſe, committed the gouernance thereof ts the duke of Summerſet, the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, as men deſiring to reuenge the death of their parents, ſlaine at the firſt battell at ſaint Albons. Theſe capteins leauing king Henrie, his wife, and ſonne, for the moſt ſafegard within the citie of Yorke, paſſed the riuer of Wharfe with all their power, intending to ſtop king Edward of his paſſage ouer the riuer of Aire.

The lord Fitz water ſlaine.

And the better to bring that to paſſe, the lord Clifford determined to make a charge vpon them that kept the paſſage of Ferribridge; and ſo he departed with his light horſſemen from the great armie on the ſaturdaie before Palmeſundaie; and earelie yer his enimies were aware, ſlue the kéepers and wan the bridge. The lord Fitz Walter hearing the noiſe, ſuddenlie roſe out of his bed, and vnarmed with a pollar in his hand, thinking that it had béene but a fraie amongſt his men, came downe to appeaſe the ſame; but yer he knew what the matter meant was ſlaine, and with him the baſtard of Saliſburie brother to the earle of Warwike, a valiant yoong gentleman, and of great audacitie.

The earle of Warwike.

A proclamation.

When the earle of Warwike was informed hereof, like a man deſperat, he mounted on his hacknie, and haſted puffing and blowing to king Edward, ſaieng; Sir, I praie God haue mercie of their ſoules, which in the beginning of your enterpriſe haue loſt their liues. And bicauſe I ſée no ſuccors of the world but in God, I remit the vengeance to him our creator and redéemer. With that he alighted downe, and ſlue his horſe with his ſword, ſaieng; Let him flée that will, for ſuerlie I will tarrie with him that will tarrie with me: and kiſſed the croſſe of his ſword as it were for a vow to the promiſe. King Edward, perceiuing the courage of his truſtie friend the earle of Warwike, made proclamation, that all men which were afraid to fight, ſhould depart: and to all thoſe that tarried the battell, he promiſed great rewards, with addition, that anie ſouldier which voluntarilie would abide, and afterwards, either in or before the fight ſhould ſéeme to flée or turne his backe, then he that could kill him, ſhould haue a great reward and double wages.

The lord Clifford ſlaine.

Dintingdale.

Crueltie paid with ſudden miſchiefe.

After this proclamation ended, the lord Fauconbridge, ſir Walter Blunt, Robert Horne with the fore-ward, paſſed the riuer at Caſtelford, thrée miles from Ferribridge, intending to haue inuironed the lord Clifford and his companie. But they being thereof aduertiſed, departed in great haſt toward king Henries armie; yet they met with ſome that they looked not for, & were ſo trapt yer they were aware. For the lord Clifford, either for heat or paine, putting off his gorget, ſuddenlie with an arrow (as ſome ſaie) without an head, was ſtriken into the throte, and immediatlie rendred his ſpirit; and the earle of Weſtmerlands brother, and all his companie almoſt were there ſlaine, at a place called Dintingdale, not far from Towton. This end had the lord Clifford, which ſlue the earle of Rutland kneeling on his knees, whoſe yoong ſonne Thomas Clifford was brought vp with a ſhéepheard in poore habit, euer in feare to be knowne, till king Henrie the ſeuenth obteined the crowne, by whom he was reſtored to his name and poſſeſſions.

The lord Fauconbridge.

Sarton.

Whethamſted ſaith, that K. Henries power exceeded in number king Edwards by twentie thouſand men.

An heauie proclamation.

Palmeſundaie field.

When this conflict was ended at Ferribridge, the lord Fauconbridge, hauing the fore-ward, bicauſe the duke of Norffolke was fallen ſicke, valiantlie vpon Palmeſundaie in the twilight ſet foorth his armie and came to Sarton, where he might apparantlie behold the hoſt of his aduerſaries, which were accompted thréeſcore thouſand men, and thereof aduertiſed king Edward, whoſe whole armie amounted to eight and fortie thouſand ſix hundred and thréeſcore perſons: which incontinentlie with the earle of Warwike ſet forward, leauing the rere-ward vnder the gouernance of ſir Iohn Wenlocke, ſir Iohn Dinham, and other. And firſt of all, he made proclamation, that no priſoner ſhould be taken. So the ſame daie about nine of the clocke, which was the nine and twentith daie of March, being Palmeſundaie, both the hoſtes approched in a faire plaine field, betwéene Towton and Sarton.

When ech part perceiued other, they made a great ſhout; and at the ſame inſtant there fell a ſmall ſléete or ſnow, which by violenee of the wind that blew againſt them, was driuen into the faces of king Henries armies, ſo that their ſight was ſomewhat dimmed. The lord Fauconbridge, leading K. Edwards fore-ward, cauſed euerie archer vnder his ſtandard to ſhoot one flight (which before he cauſed them to prouide) and then made them to ſtand ſtill. The northerne men féeling the ſhot, but by reaſon of the ſléet, not well viewing the diſtance betwéene them and their enimies, like forward men ſhot their ſheafe arrowes as faſt as they might: but all to loſſe, for they came ſhort of the ſoutherne men by thréeſcore yards.

The earle of Northumberland.

So their ſhot almoſt ſpent, the lord Fauconbridge marched forward with his archers, which not onelie ſhot their whole ſheafes, but alſo gathered the arrowes of their enimies, and let a great part flie againſt their firſt owners, and ſuffered a great ſort of them to ſtand, which ſore troubled the legs of the northerne men, when the battell ioined. The earle of Northumberland and Andrew Trollop, chiefe capteins of king Henries vawward, ſéeing their ſhot not to preuaile, haſted to ioine with their enimies, and the other part ſlacked not their paſe. This battell was ſore foughten, for hope of life was ſet aſide on either part, & taking of priſoners proclamed a great offenſe, ſo euerie man determined to vanquiſh or die in the field.

The obſtinate minds of both parts.

This deadlie conflict continued ten houres in doubtfull ſtate of victorie, vncerteinlie heauing and ſetting on both ſides; but in the end, king Edward ſo couragiouſlie comforted his men, that the other part was diſcomfited and ouercome, who like men amazed, fled toward Tadcaſter bridge to ſaue themſelues, where in the mid waie is a little brooke called Cocke, not verie broad, but of a great déepeneſſe, in which, what for haſt to eſcape, and what for feare of their followers, a great number was drowned there. It was reported, that men aliue paſſed the riuer vpon dead carcaſſes, and that the great riuer of Wharfe whereinto that brooke dooth run, and of all the water comming from Cowton, was coloured with bloud.

King Henries part diſcomfited.

Cocke or riuer.

The chaſe continued all night, and the moſt part of the next daie, and euer the northerne men (as they ſaw anie aduantage) returned againe, and fought with their enimies, to the great loſſe of both parts. For in theſe two daies were ſlaine (as they that knew it wrote) on both parts ſix and thirtie thouſand ſeuen hundred thréeſcore & ſixtéene perſons, all Engliſhmen and of one nation, whereof the chiefe were the earles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, the lord Dacres, and the lord Welles, ſir Iohn Neuill, Andrew Trollop, Robert Horne, and manie other knights and eſquiers, and the earle of Deuonſhire was taken priſoner, but the dukes of Summerſet and Exceſter fled from the field and ſaued themſelues.

The number ſlaine in battell of Saxtõ, otherwiſe called Palmeſundaie field.

After this great victorie, king Edward rode to Yorke, where he was with all ſolemnitie receiued; and firſt he cauſed the heads of his father, the earle of Saliſburie, and other his fréends, to be taken from the gates, and to be buried with their bodies: and there he cauſed the earle of Deuonſhire, and thrée other to be beheaded, and ſet their heads in the ſame place. King Henrie, after he heard of the irrecouerable loſſe of his armie, departed incontinentlie with his wife and ſonne to the towne of Berwike, and leauing the duke of Summerſet there, went into Scotland, and comming to the king of Scots, required of him and his councell, aid, and comfort.

King Henrie withdraweth to Berwike, & from thence into Scotland.

The yoong king of Scots, lamenting the miſerable ſtate of king Henrie, comforted him with faire words and friendlie promiſes, and aſſigned to him a competent penſion to liue on, during his abode in Scotland. King Henrie, in recompenſe of this courteſie and friendſhip, deliuered to the king of Scots the towne of Berwike, whereof he had got poſſeſſion. He faithfullie ſupported the part of king Henrie, and concluded a mariage betwixt his ſiſter, and the yoong prince of Wales, but the ſame was neuer conſummate, as after ye ſhall heare. When king Henrie was ſomwhat ſetled in the relme of Scotland, he ſent his wife and his ſonne into France to king Reiner hir father, truſting by his aid and ſuccour to aſſemble an armie, and once againe to recouer his right and dignitie: but he in the meane time made his aboad in Scotland, to ſée what waie his friends in England would ſtudie for his reſtitution.

Quéene Margaret with hir ſonne goeth into France.

The quéene being in France, did obteine of the yoong French king then Lewes the eleuenth, that all hir huſbands friends, and thoſe of the Lancaſtriall band, might ſafelie and ſuerlie haue reſort into anie part of the realme of France, prohibiting all other of the contrarie faction anie acceſſe, or repaire into that countrie. ¶ Thus ye haue heard, how king Henrie the ſixt, after he had reigned eight and thirtie yeares & od moneths, was driuen out of this realme. But now leauing him with the princes of his part, conſulting togither in Scotland, and quéene Margaret his wife gathering of men in France, I will returne where I left, to procéed with the dooings of king Edward.

This yoong prince, hauing with proſperous ſucceſſe obteined ſo glorious a victorie in the mortall battell at Cowton, and chaſed all his aduerſaries out of the realme, or at the leaſt waies put them to ſilence, returned after the maner and faſhion of a triumphant conquerour, with great pompe vnto London; where according to the old cuſtome of the realme, he called a great aſſemblie of perſons of all degrées, and the nine & twentith daie of Iune was at Weſtminſter with ſolemnitie crowned and annointed king. ¶ In which yeare, this king Edward called his high court of parlement at Weſtminſter, in the which, the ſtate of the realme was greatlie reformed, and all the ſtatutes made in Henrie the ſixt his time (which touched either his title or profit) were reuoked.

In the ſame parlement, the earle of Oxford far ſtriken in age, and his ſonne and heire the lord Awbreie Véer, either through malice of their enimies, or for that they had offended the king, were both, with diuerſe of their councellors, attainted, and put to execution; which cauſed Iohn earle of Oxford euer after to rebell. There were alſo beheaded the ſame time, ſir Thomas Tudenham knight, William Tirell, and Iohn Montgomerie eſquiers, and after them diuerſe others. Alſo after this, he created his two yoonger brethren dukes, that is to ſaie, lord George duke of Clarence, lord Richard duke of Gloceſter; and the lord Iohn Neuill, brother to Richard earle of Warwike, he firſt made lord Montacute, and afterwards created him marques Montacute.

Beſide this, Henrie Bourchier brother to Thomas archbiſhop of Canturburie, was created earle of Eſſex; and William lord Fauconbridge was made earle of Kent. To this Henrie lord Bourchier, a man highlie renowmed in martiall feats, Richard duke of Yorke long before this time, had giuen his ſiſter Elizabeth in mariage, of whome he begat foure ſonnes, William, Thomas, Iohn, and Henrie: the which William being a man of great induſtrie, wit, and prouidence in graue and weightie matters, maried the ladie Anne Wooduile, deſcended of high parentage, whoſe mother Iaquet was daughter to Peter of Lutzenburgh earle of ſaint Paule, by the which Anne he had lord Henrie earle of Eſſex, one daughter named Cicile, maried to Water lord Ferrers of Chartleie and an other called Iſabell, which died vnmaried.

Iohn Stow.

The earle of Kent was appointed about this time to kéepe the ſeas, being accompanied with the lord Audeleie, the lord Clinton, ſir Iohn Howard, ſir Richard Walgraue, and others, to the number of ten thouſand, who landing in Britaine, wan the towne of Conquet, and the Iſle of Reth, and after returned. When all things were brought in order, and framed as king Edward in maner could wiſh, Henrie duke of Summerſet, ſir Rafe Perſie, and diuerſe other, being in deſpaire of all good chance to happen vnto king Henrie, came humblie, & ſubmitted themſelues vnto king Edward, whome he gentlie receiued. Which clemencie notwithſtanding, both the one and the other (when time ſerued) reuolted from king Edward, and betooke themſelues to take part with Henrie, vnto whom they had béene adherents before: bicauſe they grew in hope that in the end the confederats, to whom they ſo cloſelie did cleaue both in affection and ſeriouſneſſe of labour (though they pretended a temporall renunciation of all dutie and ſeruice for their ſecuritie ſake) ſhould haue the honor of victorie againſt their gainſtanders. But as commonlie the euents of enterpriſes fall out flat contrarie to where (in deſpite of the earle of Northumberland, who then kept himſelfe in the realme of Scotland) he created ſir Iohn Neuill, lord Montacute earle of Northumberland; and in reproofe of Iaſper earle of Penbroke, he created William lord Herbert earle of the ſame place. But after, when by mediation of friends, the earle of Northumberland was reconciled to his fauour, he reſtored him to his poſſeſſions, name, and dignitie; and preferred the lord Montacute to the title of marques Montacute: ſo that in degree, he was aboue his elder brother the earle of Warwike; but in power, policie, & poſſeſſions, far meaner.

King Edward, though all things might ſeeme now to reſt in good caſe, yet he was not negligent, in making neceſſarie prouiſion againſt all attempts of his aduerſarie king Henrie, and his partakers; and therefore raiſed bulworks, and builded fortreſſes on ech ſide of his realme, where anie danger was ſuſpected for the landing of anie armie. He cauſed alſo eſpials to be laid vpon the marches, fore againſt Scotland, that no perſon ſhould go out of the realme to king Henrie and his companie, which then ſoiourned in Scotland. But all the doubts of trouble that might inſue by the means of king Henries being at libertie, were ſhortlie taken away and ended: for he himſelfe, whether he was paſt all feare; or that hee was not well eſtabliſhed in his wits and perfect mind; or for that he could not long keepe himſelfe ſecret, in diſguiſed atire boldlie entred into England.

King Henrie taken.

He was no ſooner entred, but he was knowne and taken of one Cantlow, and brought toward the king, whom the earle of Warwike met on the way by the kings commandement, and brought him through London to the Tower, & there he was laid in ſure hold. ¶ But it is worthie the noting, which I haue obſerued in a late chronographers report touching this matter; namelie, that king Henrie was taken in Cletherwood, beſide Bungerleie Hippingſtons in Lancaſhire, by Thomas Talbot ſonne and heire to ſir Edward Talbot of Baſhall, and Iohn Talbot his coſin of Colebrie, which deceiued him being at his dinner at Wadington hall, and brought him toward London, with his legs bound to the ſtirrups, where he was met by the earle of Warwike, and areſted at Eſildon; doctor Manning deane of Windſor, doctor Bedle, and yoong Ellerton being in his companie, with their feet bound vnder the horſſe bellies were brought alſo to the Tower of London.]

Queene Margaret, hearing of the captiuitie of hir husband, miſtruſting the chance of hir ſonne, all deſolate and comfortleſſe departed out of Scotland, and paſſed into France, where ſhe remained with hir father duke Reiner, till ſhe returned into England to hir harme, as after ye ſhall heare. The new duke of Summerſet, and his brother Iohn, ſailed into France, where they alſo liued in great miſerie; till duke Charles, bicauſe he was of their kin, as deſcended of the houſe of Lancaſter by his mother, ſuccoured them with a ſmall penſion, which was to them a great comfort. The earle of Penbroke went from countrie to countrie, not alwaies at his hearts eaſe, nor in ſafetie of life. [As for his dignitie and reputation, it was the more obſcured, for that he had loſt the title of his honor, and left at his wits end, doubtfull and vncerteine in contrarie factions (as manie more) what to ſay or doo for his beſt ſecuritie. Neuertheleſſe he concealed his inward diſcontentment, and as opportunitie of time miniſtred matter, ſo he grew in courage, and fell to practiſes of force (with other complices) therby to accompliſh the cloudie conceits of his troubled mind, being perſuaded, that temporall miſfortunes are, if not vtterlie auoidable, yet manfullie to be withſtood, or at leaſt with audacitie & courage to be ſuffered, as the poet properlie ſaith:

King Edward being thus in more ſuertie of his life than before, diſtributed the poſſeſſions of ſuch as tooke part with king Henrie the ſixt, to his ſouldiers and capteins, which he thought had well deſerued: and beſides this, he left no other point of liberalitie vnſhewed, whereby he might allure to him the beneuolent minds and louing hearts of his people. And moreouer, to haue the loue of all men, he ſhewed himſelfe more familiar both with the nobilitie and communaltie, than (as ſome men thought) was conuenient, either for his eſtate, or for his honor: notwithſtanding the ſame liberalitie he euer after vſed. The lawes of the realme, in part he reformed, and in part he newlie augmented. The coine both of gold and ſiluer (which yet at this day is) he newlie deuiſed, and diuided; for the gold he named rotals and nobles, and the ſiluer he called grotes and halfe grotes.

Sergeants feaſt.
Regiſter of maiors.

¶ In Michaelmaſſe terme were made ſergeants at law, Thomas Yoong, Nicholas Geneie, Richard Neale, Thomas Brian, Richard Pigot, Iohn Greenfield, Iohn Cateſbie, and Gwie Fairfar, which held their feaſt in the biſhop of Elies place in Holborne. To the which feaſt the maior of London, with the aldermen, ſhiriffes, and commons of diuerſe crafts being bidden, repaired. But when the maior looked to be ſet to keepe the ſtate in the hall, as it had beene vſed in all places of the citie and liberties, out of the kings preſence (vnknowne to the ſergeants and againſt their wils, as they ſaid) the lord Graie of Ruthen then treaſuror of England was there placed. Whervpon the maior, aldermen, and commons departed home, and the maior made all the aldermen to dine with him. Howbeit he and all the citizens were greatlie diſpleaſed that he was ſo dealt with, and the new ſergeants and others were right ſorie therefore, and had rather than much good it had not ſo happened. This was then (as my record reporteth more at large) regiſtred to be a preſident in time to come.]

The maior of London departeth from the ſergeants feaſt.

After that king Edward had reduced the ſtate of the publike affaires vnto his liking; to purchaſe himſelfe a good opinion and fauourable iudgement among the commons, he made proclamations, that all perſons, which were adherents to his aduerſaries part, & would leaue their armour, and ſubmit themſelues wholie to his grace and mercie, ſhould be cleerelie pardoned and forgiuen. By this kind of courteous dealing he wan him ſuch fauour of the people, that euer after, in all his warres, he was (thorough their aid and ſupport) a victor and conquerour. When his realme was thus brought into a good & quiet eſtate, it was thought meet by him and thoſe of his councell, that a marriage were prouided for him in ſome conuenient place; and therefore was the earle of Warwike ſent ouer into France, to demand the ladie Bona, daughter to Lewes duke of Sauoie, and ſiſter to the ladie Carlot, then queene of France; which Bona was at that time in the French court.

The earle of Warwike, comming to the French king, then lieng at Tours, was of him honourablie receiued, and right courteouſlie interteined. His meſſage was ſo well liked, and his requeſt thought ſo honourable for the aduancement of the ladie Bona, that hir ſiſter queene Carlot obteined both the good will of the king hir husband, and alſo of hir ſiſter the foreſaid ladie: ſo that the matrimonie on that ſide was cleerelie aſſented to, and the erle of Dampmartine appointed (with others) to ſaile into England, for the full finiſhing of the ſame. But here conſider the old prouerbe to be true, which ſaith, that marriage goeth by deſtinie. For, during the time that the earle of Warwike was thus in France, and (according to his inſtructions) brought the effect of his comcommiſſion to paſſe, the king being on hunting in the forreſt of Wichwood beſides Stoniſtratford, came for his recreation to the manor of Grafton, where the ducheſſe of Bedford then ſoiourned, wife to ſir Richard Wooduile lord Riuers, on whome was then attendant a daughter of hirs, called the ladie Elizabeth Graie, widow of ſir John Graie knight, ſlaine at the laſt battell of ſaint Albons, as before ye haue heard.

This widow, hauing a ſute to the king for ſuch lands as hir huſband had giuen hir in iointure, ſo kindled the kings affection towards hir, that he not onelie fauoured hir ſute, but more hir perſon; for ſhe was a woman of a more formall countenance than of excellent beautie; and yet both of ſuch beautie and fauour, that with hir ſober demeanour, ſwéete looks, and comelie ſmiling (neither too wanton, nor too baſhfull) beſides hir pleaſant toong and trim wit, ſhe ſo allured and made ſubiect vnto hir the heart of that great prince, that after ſhe had denied him to be his paramour, with ſo good maner, and words ſo well ſet as better could not be deuiſed; he finallie reſolued with himſelfe to marrie hir, not aſking counſell of anie man, till they might perceiue it was no bootie to aduiſe him to the contrarie of that his concluded purpoſe; ſith he was ſo farre gone that he was not reuocable, and therefore had fixed his heart vpon the laſt reſolution: namelie, to applie an holeſome, honeſt, and honourable remedie to his affections fiered with the flames of loue, and not to permit his heart to the thraldome of vnlawfull luſt: which purpoſe was both princelie and profitable; as the poet ſaith:

Ouid. de rem. am. lib. 1.

Anno Reg. 5.

But yet the ducheſſe of Yorke his mother letted this match as much as in hir laie: & when all would not ſerue, ſhe cauſed a precontract to be alleged, made by him with the ladie Elizabeth Lucie. But all doubts reſolued, all things made cléere, and all cauillations auoided, priuilie in a morning he married the ſaid ladie Elizabeth Graie at Grafton beforeſaid, where he firſt began to fanſie hir. And in the next yere after ſhe was with great ſolemnitie crowned quéene at Weſtminſter. Hir father alſo was created earle Riuers, and made high conſtable of England: hir brother lord Anthonie was married to the ſole heire of Thomas lord Scales: ſir Thomas Graie ſonne to ſir John Graie the quéenes firſt huſband, was created marques Dorſet, and married to Cicelie heire to the lord Bonuille. The French king was not well pleaſed to be thus dallied with; but he ſhortlie (to appeaſe the gréefe of his wife and hir ſiſter the ladie Bona) married the ſaid ladie Bona to the duke of Millan.

The earle of Warwike offended with the kings mariage.

Now when the earle of Warwike had knowledge by letters ſent to him out of England from his truſtie friends, that king Edward had gotten him a new wife, he was not a little troubled in his mind, for that he tooke it his credence thereby was greatlie miniſhed, and his honour much ſtained, namelie in the court of France: for that it might be iudged he came rather like an eſpiall, to moue a thing neuer minded, and to treat a marriage determined before not to take effect. Suerlie he thought himſelfe euill vſed, that when he had brought the matter to his purpoſed intent and wiſhed concluſion, then to haue it quaile on his part; ſo as all men might thinke at the leaſt wiſe, that his prince made ſmall account of him, to ſend him on ſuch a ſléeueleſſe errand.

All men for the moſt part agrée, that this marriage was the onlie cauſe, why the earle of Warwike conceiued an hatred againſt king Edward, whome he ſo much before fauoured. Other affirme other cauſes; and one ſpeciallie, for that king Edward did attempt a thing once in the earles houſe, which was much againſt the earles honeſtie (whether he would haue defloured his daughter or his néece, the certeintie was not for both their honours openlie reuealed) for ſuerlie, ſuch a thing was attempted by king Edward; which loued well both to behold and alſo to féele faire damſels. But whether the iniurie that the earle thought he receiued at the kings hands, or the diſdaine of authoritie that the earle had vnder the king, was the cauſe of the breach of amitie betwixt them: truth it is, that the priuie intentions of their harts brake into ſo manie ſmall péeces, that England, France, and Flanders, could neuer ioine them againe, during their naturall liues.

The earle of Warwike kéepeth his gréefe ſecret.

But though the earle of Warwike was earneſtlie inflamed againſt the king, for that he had thus married himſelfe without his knowledge, hauing regard onelie to the ſatiſfieng of his wanton appetite, more than to his honour or ſuertie of his eſtate; yet did he ſo much diſſemble the matter at his returne into England, as though he had not vnderſtood anie thing thereof: but onelie declared what he had doone, with ſuch reuerence, and ſhew of fréendlie countenance, as he had béene accuſtomed. And when he had taried in the court a certeine ſpace, he obteined licence of the king to depart to his caſtell of Warwike, meaning (when time ſerued) to vtter to the world, that which he then kept ſecret, that is to ſaie, his inward grudge, which he bare towards the king, with deſire of reuenge, to the vttermoſt of his power. Neuertheleſſe, at that time he departed (to the outward ſhew) ſo farre in the kings fauour, that manie gentlemen of the court for honours ſake gladlie accompanied him into his countrie.

Long piked ſhooes forbidden.

¶ This yéere it was proclamed in England, that the beakes or pikes of ſhooes and boots ſhould not paſſe two inches, vpon paine of curſing by the cleargie, and forfeiting twentie ſhillings, to be paid one noble to the king, an other to the cordwainers of London, and the third to the chamber of London; and for other cities and townes the like order was taken. Before this time, and ſince the yeare of our Lord 1382, the pikes of ſhooes and boots were of ſuch length, that they were faine to be tied vp vnto the knees with chaines of ſiluer and gilt, or at the leaſt with ſilken laces.]

Cotteſhold ſhéepe tranſported into Spaine.

Truce with Scots.

In this yeare alſo, the kings daughter, the ladie Elizabeth, after wife to king Henrie the ſeauenth, was borne; king Edward concluded an amitie and league with Henrie king of Caſtile, and John king of Aragon; at the concluding whereof, he granted licence for certeine Cotteſhold ſhéepe, to be tranſported into the countrie of Spaine (as people report) which haue there ſo multiplied and increaſed, that it hath turned the commoditie of England much to the Spaniſh profit. Beſide this, to haue an amitie with his next neighbour the king of Scots, he winked at the loſſe of Berwike, and was contented to take a truce for fiftéene yeares. Thus king Edward, though for refuſall of the French kings ſiſter in law he wan him enimies in France; yet in other places he procured him fréends: but thoſe fréends had ſtood him in ſmall ſtéed, if fortune had not holpe him to an other, euen at his elbow.

Anno Reg. 7.

This was Charles earle of Charolois, the ſonne and heire apparant vnto Philip duke of Burgognie, which Charles being then a widower, was counſelled to be ſuter vnto king Edward, for to haue in mariage the ladie Margaret, ſiſter to the ſaid king, a ladie of excellent beautie, and indued with ſo manie worthie gifts of nature, grace, and fortune, that ſhe was thought not vnworthie to match with the greateſt prince of the world. The lord Anthonie baſtard brother to the ſaid earle Charolois, commonlie called the baſtard of Burgognie, a man of great wit, courage, and valiantneſſe, was appointed by his father duke Philip, to go into England in ambaſſage, about this ſute; who being furniſhed of plate and apparell, neceſſarie for his eſtate, hauing in his companie gentlemen, and other expert in all feats of chiualrie and martiall proweſſe, to the number of foure hundred horſſes, tooke his ſhip, and arriued in England, where he was of the king & nobles honourablie receiued.

The baſtard of Burgognie ambaſſadour into England.

This meſſage being declared, ye may be ſure the ſame was ioifullie heard of the king and his councell; the which by that affinitie, ſaw how they might be aſſured of a buckler againſt France. But yet the earle of Warwike, bearing his heartie fauour vnto the French king, did as much as in him laie by euill reports to hinder this marriage: but this notwithſtanding, at length, the king granted to the baſtards requeſt; and the ſaid baſtard openlie in the kings great chamber contracted the ſaid ladie Margaret, for, and in the name of his brother the ſaid earle of Charolois. After this marriage thus concluded, the baſtard challenged the lord Scales, brother to the queene, a man both equall in hart and valiantneſſe with the baſtard, to fight with him both on horſſebacke, and on foot: which demand the lord Scales gladlie accepted.

Iuſts betwixt the baſtard of Burgognie & the lord Scales.

The king cauſing liſts to be prepared in Weſtſmithfield for theſe champions, and verie faire and coſtlie galleries for the ladies, was preſent at this martiall enterpriſe himſelfe. The firſt daie they ran togither diuerſe courſes with ſharpe ſpeares, and departed with equall honor. The next day they turnoied on horſſebacke. The lord Scales horſſe had on his chafron a long ſharpe pike of ſteele, and as the two champions coped togither, the ſame horſſe (whether thorough cuſtome or by chance) thruſt his pike into the noſethrils of the baſtards horſſe; ſo that for verie paine he mounted ſo high, that he fell on the one ſide with his maiſter, and the lord Scales rode round about him with his ſword in his hand, vntill the king commanded the marſhall to helpe vp the baſtard, which openlie ſaid; I can not hold me by the clouds, for though my horſſe faileth me, ſuerlie I will not faile my contercompanion. The king would not ſuffer them to doo anie more that daie.

The morow after, the two noblemen came into the field on foot, with two polares, and fought valiantlie: but at the laſt, the point of the polar of the lord Scales happened to enter into the ſight of the baſtards helme, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knees: the king ſuddenlie caſt downe his warder, and then the marſhals them ſeuered. The baſtard not content with this chance, and truſting on the cunning which he had at the polar, required the king of iuſtice, that he might performe his enterpriſe. The lord Scales refuſed it not, but the king ſaid, he would aſke counſell: and ſo calling to him the conſtable, and the marſhall, with the officers of armes, after conſultation had, and the lawes of armes rehearſed, it was declared for a ſentence definitiue, by the duke of Clarence, then conſtable of England, and the duke of Norffolke, then marſhall; that if he would go forward with his attempted challenge, he muſt by the law of armes be deliuered to his aduerſarie, in the ſame ſtate and like condition as he ſtood when he was taken from him.

The law of armes.

The baſtard hearing this iudgement, doubted the ſequele of the matter; and ſo relinquiſhed his challenge. Other challenges were doone, and valiantlie atchiued by the Engliſhmen, which I paſſe ouer. Shortlie after came ſorowfull tidings to the baſtard, that his father duke Philip was dead, who therevpon taking his leaue of king Edward, and of his ſiſter the new ducheſſe of Burgognie, liberallie rewarded with plate and iewels, with all ſpeed returned to his brother the new duke, who was not a little glad of the contract made for him with the ſaid ladie, as after well appeared. In this ſame yeare, king Edward, more for the loue of the marques Montacute, than for anie fauour he bare to the earle of Warwike, promoted George Neuill their brother to the archbiſhoprike of Yorke.

Anno Reg. 8.

Charles duke of Burgognie, reioiſing that he had ſo well ſped, for concluſion of marriage with king Edwards ſiſter, was verie deſirous to ſee hir, of whome he had heard ſo great praiſe, & wrote to king Edward, requiring him to ſend his ſiſter ouer vnto him, according to the couenants paſſed betwixt them. King Edward being not ſlacke in this matter, appointed the dukes of Exceſter and Suffolke, with their wiues, being both ſiſters to the ladie Margaret, to attend hir, till ſhe came to hir huſband. And ſo after that ſhips, and all other neceſſarie prouiſions were readie, they being accompanied with a great ſort of lords and ladies, and others, to the number of fiue hundred horſſe, in the beginning of Iune departed out of London to Douer, and ſo ſailed to Sluis, and from thenſe was conueied to Bruges, where the marriage was ſolemnized betwixt the duke and hir, with great triumphs, & princelie feaſtings. Touching the pompe had and vſed at the ſetting forward of this ladie on hir voiage it is a note worth the reading; and therefore neceſſarilie here interlaced for honours ſake.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S. pag.719,720. in Quart.

¶ On the eighteenth of Iune, Margaret ſiſter to K. Edward the fourth began hir iornie from the Wardrobe in London, toward hir marriage with Charles duke of Burgognie: firſt ſhe offered in the church of ſaint Paule, and then rode thorough the citie, the earle of Warwike riding before hir, with earles and barons a great number; the ducheſſe of Norffolke, with other ladies and gentlewomen in great number. And at hir entrie into Cheape, the maior of London and his brethren the aldermen preſented hir with a paire of rich baſons, & in them an hundred pounds of gold, and that night ſhe lodged at the abbeie of Stratford, where the king then laie: from thenſe ſhe tooke hir iournie to Canturburie.

The king riding after to ſee hir ſhipping, on the firſt of Iulie, ſhe tooke the ſea at Margate, and there tooke leaue of the king hir brother, and departed. There returned backe againe with the king, the duke of Clarence, the duke of Gloceſter, the earles of Warwike, Shrewesburie, and Northumberland. And there abode with hir in the ſhip, the lord Scales, the lord Dacres hir chamberlaine, ſir Iohn Woduile, ſir Iohn Howard, and manie other famous knights and eſquiers. She was ſhipped in the new Ellen of London, and in hir nauie the Iohn of Newcaſtell, the Marie of Saliſburie, and manie other roiall ſhips, and on the morrow landed at Sluis in Flanders. Now as ſoone as hir ſhip & companie of ſhips were entered into the hauen, there receiued hir ſir Simon de Lelein and the water bailiffe, in diuerſe boats and barks apparelled readie for hir landing.

The firſt eſtate that receiued hir was the biſhop of Vtright well accompanied, and the counteſſe of Shorne baſtard daughter to duke Philip of Burgognie, and with hir manie ladies and gentlewomen; and ſo proceeding in at the gate of the towne, the ſame towne was preſented to hir, ſhe to be ſoueraigne ladie thereof: alſo they gaue to hir twelue marks of gold Troie weight, the which was two hundred pounds of Engliſh monie: and ſo proceeded thorough the towne to hir lodging, euerie houſholder ſtanding in the ſtreet with a torch in his hand burning. On the morow the old ducheſſe of Burgognie came to hir, accompanied with manie great eſtates. On the third of Iulie came the duke of Burgognie to Sluis, with twentie perſons ſecretlie, and was there openlie affianced to the ladie Margaret, by the biſhop of Saliſburie and the lord Scales, in preſence of the lord Dacres, the ducheſſe of Norffolke, the ladie Scales, and all the knights ⁊ eſquiers; gentlewomen inuironing the chamber.

On the 8 of Iulie (being ſaturdaie) by the duke of Burgognies appointment, the lady Margaret remoued by water to the Dame. And on the ſunday in the morning betwixt fiue and ſix of the clocke, the mariage was ſolemnized betwixt them, by the biſhops of Saliſburie and of Turneie; there being preſent the old duches of Burgognie, the lord Scales, the lord Dacres, with the knights, eſquiers, ladies ⁊ gentlewomen that came out of England. The great triumphs, feaſtings, ſhewes of pageants, with other ſtrange deuiſes, and iuſtings, were ſuch as I haue not read the like, and would be ouer long in this place to ſet downe.

Which declaration is ſo ſet forth in this booke, as the ſame in the ſeuen and twentith yeare of hir maieſties reigne was publiſhed: vnto which yeare I remit the reader (for the further ſearch thereof) for that it conteineth much memorable matter, touching the manifeſt cauſes of concord to be continued betweene them of the low countries and vs Engliſh.]

Fabian. 497.
Sir Thomas Cooke.

Sir Thomas Cooke late maior of London, was by one named Hawkins appeached of treaſon, for the which he was ſent to the Tower, and his place within London ſeized by the lord Riuers, and his wife and ſeruants cleerelie put out therof. The cauſe was this. The forenamed Hawkins came vpon a ſeaſon vnto the ſaid ſir Thomas, requeſting him to lend a thouſand markes vpon good ſuertie, whereunto he anſwered, that firſt he would know for whome it ſhould be and for what intent.

At length, vnderſtanding it ſhould be for the vſe of queene Margaret, he anſwered he had no currant wares whereof anie ſhifts might be made without too much loſſe: and therefore required Hawkins to mooue him no further in that matter, for he intended not to deale withall: yet the ſaid Hawkins exhorted him to remember, what benefits he had receiued by hir when ſhe was in proſperitie, as by making him hir wardrober, and cuſtomer of Hampton, ⁊c.

But by no meanes the ſaid Cooke would grant goods nor monie, although at laſt the ſaid Hawkins required but an hundred pounds, he was faine to depart without the value of a penie, and neuer came againe to mooue him, which ſo reſted two or three years after, till the ſaid Hawkins was caſt in the Tower, and at length brought to the brake, called the duke of Exceſters daughter, by meanes of which paine he ſhewed manie things, amongſt the which the motion was one that he had made to ſir Thomas Cooke, and accuſed himſelfe ſo farre, that he was put to death.

By meane of which confeſſion, the ſaid ſir Thomas was troubled (as before is ſhewed) when the ſaid ſir Thomas had laine in the Tower from Whitſuntide till about Michaelmas, in the which ſeaſon manie inquiries were made to find him guiltie, and euer quit, till one iurie (by meanes of ſir Iohn Fog) indicted him of treaſon, after which an oier and terminer was kept at the Guildhall, in which ſat with the maior the duke of Clarence, the earle of Warwike, the lord Riuers, ſir Iohn Fog, with other of the kings councell.

To the which place the ſaid Thomas was brought, and there arreigned vpon life and death, where he was acquited of the ſaid indictement, and had to the counter in Breadſtreet, and from thence to the kings bench. After a certeine time that he was thus acquited, his wife got againe the poſſeſſion of hir houſe, the which ſhe found in an euill plight; for ſuch ſeruants of the lord Riuers and ſir Iohn Fog, as were aſſigned to keepe it, made hauocke of what they liſted.

Alſo at his place in Eſſex named Giddihall, were ſet an other ſort to keepe that place, the which deſtroied his deere in his parke, his conies, and his fiſh, without reaſon, and ſpared not braſſe, pewter, bedding, ⁊ all that they might carie, for the which might neuer one penie be gotten in recompenſe, yet could not ſir Thomas Cooke be deliuered, till he had paied eight thouſand pounds to the king, and eight hundred pounds to the queene.]

In this meane time, the earle of Warwike bearing a continuall grudge in his hart toward king Edward, ſince his laſt returne out of France, perſuaded ſo with his two brethren, the archbiſhop, and the marques, that they agreed to ioine with him in anie attempt which he ſhould take in hand againſt the ſaid king. The archbiſhop was eaſilie allured to the earles purpoſe, but the marques could by no meanes be reduced to take anie part againſt king Edward of a long time, till the earle had both promiſed him great rewards and promotions, and alſo aſſured him of the aid and power of the greateſt princes of the realme. And euen as the marques was loth to conſent to his vnhappie conſpiracie, ſo with a faint hart he ſhewed himſelfe an enimie vnto king Edward, which double diſſimulation was both the deſtruction of him and his brethren. ¶ And that they were perſuaſions of no ſmall force, which the earle of Warwike vſed to the archbiſhop and marques, I haue thought good here to interlace, as I find remembred by Edward Hall in forme following.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. in Edw. 4. fol. cxcviij, &c.

The perſuaſions of the earle of Warwike vnto his two brethren againſt king Edward the fourth.

My deere and welbeloued brethren, the incredible faithfulneſſe, the ſecret ſoberneſſe, and the politike prudence that I haue euer by long continuance of time experimented in you both, dooth not onelie incourage my heart, yea and ſetteth me in great hope of obteining my purpoſe, but alſo putteth me out of all dread and miſtruſt, firmelie beleeuing, and ſuerlie iudging, that you both will with tooth and naile endeuour your ſelues, to the vttermoſt of your power, to bring to effect and purpoſe the thing that I now ſhall declare vnto you. Suerlie, I would in no wiſe that you ſhould thinke, that that which I ſhall ſpeake to you of king Edward and king Henrie, ſhould riſe of any lightneſſe or phantaſie of my mind, or anie trifeling toie latelie fallen into my imagination; but the true experience and iuſt iudgement that I haue of them both, their qualities and conditions, in manner compell and conſtraine me to ſaie as I ſay, and to doo as I doo.

For ſuerlie, king Henrie is a godlie, good, and a vertuous perſon, neither forgetting his freends, nor putting in obliuion anie benefit by him of a meane perſon receiued, nor yet anie paine for his cauſes ſuſteined hath he left vnrewarded: to whome God hath ſent a ſonne, called prince Edward, borne to be of great worthineſſe & praiſe, of much bountifulneſſe and liberalitie, of whome men may manie laudable things coniecture, conſidering the paine, labour, and trauell, that he taketh to helpe his father out of captiuitie and thraldome. King Edward on the contrarie ſide, is a man contumelious, opprobrious, and an iniurious perſon; to them that deſerue kindneſſe he ſheweth vnkindneſſe, and them that loue him he deadlie hateth, now deteſting to take anie paine for the preferment or maintenance of the publike wealth of this realme, but all giuen to paſtime, pleaſure, and daliance; ſooner preferring to high eſtate men deſcended of low bloud and baſe degree, than men of old and vndefiled houſes, which haue both ſupported him and the commonwealth of his realme.

So that I now perceiue, that it is euen come to this point, that he will deſtroie all the nobilitie; or elſe the nobilitie muſt ſhortlie of verie neceſſitie deſtroie and confound him. But reaſon would, that we that were firſt hurt, ſhould firſt reuenge our cauſe: for it is not vnknowen to you both, how that he, immediatlie after he had obteined the crowne, began firſt ſecretlie, & then openlie to enuie, diſdaine, and impugne the fame, glorie, and renowme of our houſe and familie; as who ſaid, that all the honor, preferment, and authoritie that we haue, we had onelie receiued at his hands, and that we had neither obteined dignitie nor rule by our great labour, aid and trauell. Which to all men may ſeeme vntrue, that conſider that our name, chiefe title, and principall authoritie, was to vs giuen by king Henrie the ſixt, and not by him. But if euerie man will remember, who firſt toke part with his father, when hee claimed the crowne (who at that time, for that cauſe was in great ieopardie, and almoſt ſlaine by the kings meniall ſeruants, and who neuer left this man in proſperitie nor aduerſitie, till he had the garland, and the realme in quietneſſe) ſhall manifeſtlie perceiue, that we and our bloud haue ſhewed our ſelues more like fathers to him, than he like a freend to vs.

If we haue receiued any benefits of him, ſuerlie they be not ſo much as we haue deſerued, nor ſo much as we looked for; and yet they be much more than he would we ſhuld inioy, as ye both well perceiue and know. Let theſe things ouerpaſſe, and ſpeake of the vngentle, vntrue, and vnprincelie handling of me in the laſt ambaſſage, being ſent to the French king for to treat a mariage for him, hauing full authoritie to bind and to loſe, to contract and conclude. Which thing when I had finiſhed & accompliſhed: how lightlie his mind changed, how priuilie he vowed, and how ſecretlie he maried, both you know better than I. So that by this meanes, I was almoſt out of all credence in the court of France, both with the king and queene, as though I had come thither like an eſpiall, to moue a thing neuer minded; or to treat of a mariage determined before neuer to take effect. Whereby the fame of all our eſtimation, which all kings and princes haue conceiued in vs (partlie obteined by the vertue & proweſſe of our noble anceſtors, and partlie atchiued by our owne paines & forward acts) ſhall now be obfuſcate, vtterlie extinguiſhed, and nothing ſet by.

What worme is touched, and will not once turne againe? What beaſt is ſtriken, that will not rore or ſound? What innocent child is hurt that will not crie? If the poore and vnreaſonable beaſts, if the ſelie babes that doo lacke diſcretion, grone againſt harme to them proffered; how ought an honeſt man to be angrie, when things that touch his honeſtie be dailie againſt him attempted? But if a meane perſon in that caſe be angrie: how much more ought a noble man to fume & ſtirre coales, when the high type of his honour is touched, his fame in maner brought to infamie, and his honour almoſt blemiſhed & appalled, without his offenſe or deſert? All this brethren you know to be true, the diſhonor of one is the diſhonor of vs all, and the hurt of one is the hurt of all: wherefore, rather than I will liue vnreuenged; or ſuffer him to reigne, which hath ſought my decaie and diſhonor, I will ſuerlie ſpend my life, lands, and goods, in ſetting vp that iuſt and good man king Henrie the ſixt: and in depoſing this vntrue, vnfaithfull, and vnkind prince (by our onelie means) called king Edward the fourth.

Beſide all this, the earle of Warwike, being a far caſting prince, perceiued ſomewhat in the duke of Clarence, whereby he iudged that he bare no great good will towards the king his brother; and therevpon, feeling his mind by ſuch talke as he of purpoſe miniſtred, vnderſtood how he was bent, and ſo wan him to his purpoſe: and for better aſſurance of his faithfull friendſhip, he offered him his eldeſt daughter in mariage, with the whole halfe deale of his wiues inheritance. And herevpon, after conſultation had of their weightie buſineſſe and dangerous affaires, they ſailed ouer to Calis, of the which towne the earle was capteine, where his wife & two daughters then ſoiourned, whome the duke (being in loue with hir perſon) had great deſire to viſit.

But the earle, hauing in continuall remembrance his purpoſed enterpriſe, appointed his brethren, the archbiſhop and the marqueſſe, that they ſhould by ſome meanes in his abſence ſtir vp ſome new rebellion in the countie of Yorke, and other places adioining, ſo that this ciuill warre ſhould ſeeme to all men to haue beene begun without his aſſent or knowlege, being on the further ſide of the ſeas. The duke of Clarence being come to Calis with the earle of Warwike, after he had ſworne on the ſacrament to keepe his promiſe and pact made with the ſaid earle whole and inuiolate, he married the ladie Iſabell, eldeſt daughdaughter to the earle, in our ladies church there. Shortlie after, according as had beene aforehand deuiſed, a commotion was begun in Yorkeſhire, to the great diſquieting of that countrie. The ſame chanced by this meanes.

A commotion in Yorkeſhire.

Saint Leonards hoſpitall in Yorke.

There was in the citie of Yorke an old and rich hoſpitall, dedicated to ſaint Leonard, for the harbourough and releeuing of poore people. Certeine euill diſpoſed perſons of the earle of Warwikes faction, intending to ſet a broile in the countrie, perſuaded the husbandmen to refuſe to giue anie thing to the ſaid hoſpitall, affirming that the corne giuen to that good intent, came not to the vſe of the poore; but was conuerted to the behoofe of the maiſter of the hoſpitall, and the preeſts, whereby they grew to be rich, and the poore people wanted their due ſuccour and releefe. And not content with theſe ſaiengs, they fell to doings: for when the proctors of the hoſpitall, according to their vſage, went about the countrie to gather the accuſtomed corne, they were ſore beaten, wounded, and euill intreated.

A rebellion.

Shortlie after, the conſpiracie of the euill diſpoſed people grew to an open rebellion, ſo that there aſſembled to the number of fifteene thouſand men, euen readie bent to ſet on the citie of Yorke. But the lord marqueſſe Montacute, gouernour and preſident of that countrie for the king, taking ſpeedie counſell in the matter, with a ſmall number of men, but well choſen, incountred the rebels before the gates of Yorke: where (after a long conflict) he tooke Robert Huldorne their capteine, and before them commanded his head to be ſtriken off, and then (bicauſe it was a darke euening) he cauſed his ſouldiers to enter into Yorke, and there to refreſh them. Heere manie men haue maruelled, whie the marqueſſe thus put to death the capteine of thoſe people, which had procured this their rebellious enterpriſe.

Robert Huldorne capteine of the rebels taken and beheaded.

Some ſaie he did it, to the intent to ſeeme innocent and faultleſſe of his brothers doings. But other iudge, that he did it, for that contrarie to his promiſe made to his brother, he was determined to take part with king Edward, with whome (as it ſhall after appeare) he in ſmall ſpace entered into grace and fauour. The rebels being nothing diſmaied with the death of their capteine, but rather the more bent on miſcheefe, by faire meanes and craftie perſuaſions got to them Henrie, ſonne to the lord Fitz Hugh, and ſir Henrie Neuill ſonne and heire to the lord Latimer, the one being nephue and the other couſine germane to the erle of Warwike. Although theſe yoong gentlemen bare the names of capteins, yet they had a gouernour that was ſir John Coniers, a man of ſuch courage & valiantneſſe, as few were to be found in his daies within the north parts.

Sir John Coniers.

After they ſaw that they could not get Yorke, bicauſe they wanted ordinance, they determined with all ſpeed to march toward London, intending to raiſe ſuch a toie in the peoples minds, that they ſhould thinke king Edward neither to be a lawfull prince, nor yet profitable to the common-wealth. King Edward hauing perfect knowledge of all the doings of the earle of Warwike, and of his brother the duke of Clarence, was by diuerſe letters certified of the great armie of the northerne men, with all ſpeed comming toward London; and therefore in great haſt he ſent to William lord Herbert, whom (as yee haue heard) he had created earle of Penbroke; requiring him without delaie to raiſe his power, and incounter with the northerne men.

The earle of Penbroke.

The earle of Penbroke, commonlie called the lord Herbert, both readie to obeie the kings commandement, according to his dutie, and alſo deſirous to reuenge the malice which he bare to the earle of Warwike, for that he knew how he had beene the onelie let whie he obteined not the wardſhip of the lord Bonneuilles daughter and heire for his eldeſt ſonne; accompanied with his brother ſir Richard Herbert, a valiant knight, and aboue ſix or ſeauen thouſand Welſhmen, well furniſhed, marched forward to incounter with the northerne men. And to aſſiſt him with archers, was appointed Humfrie lord Stafford of Southwike, named but not created earle of Deuonſhire by the king, in hope that he would ſerue valiantlie in that iournie: he had with him eight hundred archers.

The lord Stafford.

When theſe two lords were met at Cotteſhold, they heard how the northerne men were going toward Northampton: whervpon the lord Stafford, and ſir Richard Herbert, with two thouſand well horſed Welſhmen, rode forth afore the maine armie, to ſee the demeanour of the northerne men: and at length, vnder a woods ſide, they couertlie eſpied them paſſing forward, and ſuddenlie ſet on the rere-ward: but the northerne men with ſuch nimbleneſſe turned about, that in a moment the Welſhmen were diſcomfited, and manie taken, the remnant returned to the armie with ſmall gaine. The northerne men well cooled with this ſmall victorie, went no further ſouthwards, but tooke their waie toward Warwike, looking for aid of the earle, which was latelie come from Calis, with his ſonne in law the duke of Clarence, and was raiſing men to aid his freends and kinſfolke.

The welſhmen diſcomfited.

The king likewiſe aſſembled people to aid the erle of Penbroke, but before either part receiued ſuccour from his freend or partaker, both the armies met by chance in a faire plaine, neere to a towne called Hedgecote, foure miles diſtant from Banberie, where there are three hilles, not in equall quantitie, but lieng in maner (although not fullie) triangle. The Welſhmen got firſt the weſt hill, hoping to haue recouered the eaſt hill alſo, which if they might haue obteined, the victorie had beene theirs, as their fooliſh propheſiers told them before. Theſe northerne men incamped on the ſouth hill; the earle of Penbroke and the lord Stafford of Southwike were lodged in Banberie, the daie before the field, which was ſaint James daie, and there the earle of Penbroke put the lord Stafford out of an Inne, wherein he delighted much to be, for the loue of a damoſell that dwelled in the houſe: and yet it was agreed betwixt them, that which of them ſoeuer obteined firſt a lodging, ſhould not be diſplaced.

Diſcord what it breweth.

The lord Stafford in great deſpite departed with his whole band of archers, leauing the earle of Penbroke almoſt deſolate in the towne, who with all diligence returned to his hoſt, lieng in the field vnpurueied of archers. Sir Henrie Neuill, ſonne to the lord Latimer, tooke with him certeine light horſſemen, and ſkirmiſhed with the Welſhmen in the euening, iuſt before their campe, where dooing right valiantlie, but a little too hardilie aduenturing himſelfe, was taken and yeelded, and yet cruellie ſlaine. Which vnmercifull act the Welſhmen ſore rued the next day yer night: for the northerne men ſore diſpleaſed for the death of this noble man, in the next morning valiantlie ſet on the Welſhmen, and by force of archers cauſed them quicklie to deſcend the hill, into the vallie, where both the hoaſts fought.

The earle of Penbroke did right valiantlie, and ſo likewiſe did his brother ſir Richard Herbert, in ſo much that with his polax in his hand, he twiſe by fine force paſſed thorough the battell of his aduerſaries, and without anie hurt or mortall wound returned. But ſee the hap, euen as the Welſhmen were at point to haue obteined the victorie, John Clappam eſquier, ſeruant to the earle of Warwike, mounted vp the ſide of the eaſt hill, accompanied

The welſhmen ſlaine.

The Welſhmen, thinking that the earle of Warwike had come on them with all his puiſſance, ſuddenlie as men amazed, fled: the northerne men them purſued, and ſlue without mercie, ſo that there died of the Welſhmen that daie, aboue fiue thouſand, beſides them that fled and were taken. The earle of Penbroke, and his brother ſir Richard Herbert, with diuerſe gentlemen, were taken and brought to Banberie, where the earle with his brother, and other gentlemen, to the number of ten, that were likewiſe taken, loſt their heads. But great mone was made for that noble and hardie gentleman, ſir Richard Herbert, being able for his goodlie perſonage and high valiancie, to haue ſerued the greateſt prince in chriſtendome. [But what policie or puiſſance can either preuent or impugne the force of fate, whoſe law as it ſtandeth vpon an ineuitable neceſſitie; ſo was it not to be diſpenſed withall; and therfore deſtinie hauing preordeined the maner of his deth, it was patientlie to be ſuffered, ſith puiſſantlie it could not be auoided, nor politikelie preuented, nor violentlie reſiſted: for Robin of Reddeſdale. The erle Riuers and his ſonne beheaded.

The Northamptonſhire men, with diuerſe of the northerne men by them procured, in this furie made them a capteine, called Robert Hilliard, but they named him Robin of Reddeſdale, and ſuddenlie came to Grafton, where they tooke the earle Riuers, father to the queene, and his ſon ſir John Wooduile, whome they brought to Northampton, and there beheaded them both without iudgement. The king aduertiſed of theſe miſchances, wrote to the ſhiriffes of Summerſetſhire, and Deuonſhire, that if they might by anie meanes take the lord Stafford of Southwike, they ſhould without delaie put him to death. Herevpon ſearch was made for him, till at length he was found in a village within Brentmarch, and after brought to Bridgewater where he was beheaded.

The lord Stafford of Southwike beheaded.

After the battell was thus fought at Hedgecote commonlie called Banberie field, the northerne men reſorted toward Warwike, where the earle had gathered a great multitude of people, which earle receiued the northerne men with great gladnes, thanking ſir John Coniers, and other their capteins for their paines taken in his cauſe. The king in this meane time had aſſembled his power, and was comming toward the earle, who being aduertiſed thereof, ſent to the duke of Clarence, requiring him to come and ioine with him. The duke being not farre off, with all ſpeed repaired to the earle, and ſo they ioined their powers togither, and vpon ſecret knowledge had, that the king (bicauſe they were entered into termes by waie of communication to haue a peace) tooke ſmall heed to himſelfe, nothing doubting anie outward attempt of his enimies.

The earle of Warwike, intending not to leeſe ſuch opportunitie of aduantage, in the dead of the night, with an elect companie of men of warre (as ſecretlie as was poſſible) ſet on the kings field, killing them that kept the watch, and yer the king was ware (for he thought of nothing leſſe than of that which then hapned) at a place called Wolnie, foure miles from Warwike, he was taken priſoner and brought to the caſtell of Warwike. And to the intent his friends ſhould not know what was become of him, the earle cauſed him by ſecert iournies in the night to be conueied to Middleham caſtell in Yorkeſhire, and there to be kept vnder the cuſtodie of the archbiſhop of Yorke, and other his freends in thoſe parties. King Edward being thus in captiuitie, ſpake euer faire to the archbiſhop, and to his other keepers, ſo that he had leaue diuerſe daies to go hunt. [Which exerciſe he vſed, as it ſhould ſeeme, not ſo much for regard of his recreation, as for the recouerie of his libertie: which men eſteeme better than gold, and being counted a diuine thing, doth paſſe all the wealth, pleaſure, and treaſure of the world; according to the old ſaieng:

Non bene pro fuluo libertas venditur auro,

Now on a daie vpon a plaine when he was thus abrode, there met with him ſir William Stanleie, ſir Thomas a Borough, and diuers other of his friends, with ſuch a great band of men, that neither his keepers would, nor once durſt moue him to returne vnto priſon againe. Some haue thought that his keepers were corrupted with monie, or faire promiſes, and therfore ſuffred him thus to ſcape out of danger. After that he was once at libertie, he came to Yorke, where he was ioifullie receiued, and taried there two daies: but when he perceiued he could get no armie togither in that countrie to attend him to London, he turned from Yorke to Lancaſter, where he found his chamberleine the lord Haſtings well accompanied, by whoſe aid and ſuch others as drew to him, being well furniſhed, he came ſafelie to the citie of London.

Sir william Stanleie. K. Edward is deliuered out of captiuitie.

He commeth to London.

When the earle of Warwike, and the duke of Clarence had knowledge how king Edward by the treaſon or negligence of them (whome they had put in truſt) was eſcaped their hands, they were in a wonderfull chafe: but ſith the chance was paſt, they began eftſoones to prouide for the warre, which they ſaw was like to inſue; and found much comfort, in that a great number of men, deliting more in diſcord than in concord, offered themſelues to aid their ſide. But other good men deſirous of common quiet, and lamenting the miſerable ſtate of the realme, to redreſſe ſuch miſchiefe as appeared to be at hand by theſe tumults, tooke paine, and road betweene the king, the earle, and the duke, to reconcile them ech to other.

Their charitable motion and cauſes alledged, bicauſe they were of the chiefeſt of the nobilitie, and therfore caried both credit and authoritie with them, ſo aſſwaged the moods both of the king, the duke, and the earle, that ech gaue faith to other to came and go ſafelie without ieopardie. In which promiſe both the duke and earle putting perfect confidence, came both to London. At Weſtminſter, the king, the duke, and the earle, had long communication togither for to haue come to an agreement: but they fell at ſuch great words vpon reherſall of old matters, that in great furie without any concluſion they departed; the king to Canturburie, and the duke and the earle to Warwike, where the earle procured a new armie to be raiſed in Lincolneſhire, and made capteine thereof ſir Robert Welles, ſonne to Richard lord Welles, a man of great experience in warre.

The king aduertiſed hereof, without delaie prepared an armie, and out of hand he ſent to Richard lord Welles, willing him vpon the ſight of his letters, to repaire vnto him: which to doo he had oftentimes refuſed, excuſing himſelfe by ſickeneſſe and feebleneſſe of bodie. But when that excuſe ſerued not, he thinking to purge himſelfe ſufficientlie of all offenſe and blame before the kings preſence, tooke with him ſir Thomas Dimmocke, who had maried his ſiſter, and ſo came to London. And when he was come vp, being admoniſhed by his freends that the king was greatlie with him diſpleaſed, he with his brother in law tooke the ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter.

Sir Thomas Dimmocke.

But king Edward, truſting to pacifie all this buſie tumult without anie further bloudſhed, promiſed both thoſe perſons their pardons, cauſing them vpon his promiſe to come out of ſanctuarie to his pre-ſence,

Anno Reg. 10.

ſence, and calling to him the lord Welles, willed him to write to his ſonne to leaue off the warre, and in the meane ſeaſon he with his armie went forward, hauing with him the lord Welles, and ſir Thomas Dimmocke. And being not paſt two daies iournie from Stamford, where his enimies had ptiched their field, and hearing that ſir Robert Welles, not regarding his fathers letters, kept his campe ſtill, he cauſed the lord Welles, father to the ſaid ſir Robert, and ſir Thomas Dimmocke to be beheaded, contrarie to his promiſe.

The lord Welles and Thomas Dimmocke beheaded.

Sir Robert Welles, hearing that the king approched, and that his father and ſir Thomas Dimmocke were beheaded, though he was ſomewhat doubtfull to fight, before the earle of Warwike were with his power aſſembled, yet hauing a yong and luſtie courage, manfullie ſet on his enimies. The battell was ſore fought on both ſides, and manie a man ſlaine; till ſir Robert, perceiuing his people at point to flie, was buſilie in hand to exhort them to tarie, and in the meane time compaſſed about with enimies was there taken, & with him ſir Thomas de Land knight, and manie more. After the taking of their capteine, the Lincolneſhire men amazed, threw awaie their coats the lighter to run awaie, and fled amaine, and therefore this battell is called there yet vnto this daie, Loſecote field.

Loſecote field

The king reioiſing at this victorie, cauſed ſir Robert Welles, and diuerſe other to be put to execution in the ſame place. The fame went that at this battell were ſlaine ten thouſand men at the leaſt. The earle of Warwike laie at the ſame time at his caſtell of Warwike, and meant to haue ſet forward the next daie toward his armie in Lincolnſhire. But when he heard that the ſame was ouerthrowne, he tooke new counſell, and with all diligence imagined how to compaſſe Thomas lord Stanleie, which had maried his ſiſter, that he might be one of the conſpiracie. Which thing when he could not bring to paſſe (for the lord Stanleie had anſwered him, that he would neuer make warre againſt king Edward) he thought no longer to ſpend time in waſt; and miſtruſting he was not able to méet with his enimies, he with his ſonne in law the duke of Clarence departed to Exceſter, and there carieng a few daies, determined to ſaile into France, to purchaſe aid of king Lewes.

The faithfulneſſe of the lord Stanlie.

The duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike take the ſea.

Now reſting vpon this point, he hired ſhips at Dartmouth: and when the ſame were readie trimmed and decked, the duke and the earle with their wiues, and a great number of ſeruants imbarked themſelues, and firſt tooke their courſe towards Calis, whereof the earle was capteine, thinking there to haue left his wife and daughters, till he had returned out of France. But when they were come before the towne of Calis, they could not be ſuffered to enter: for the lord Vauclere a Gaſcoigne, being the earles deputie in that towne, whether he did it by diſſimulation, or bearing good will to king Edward (as by the ſequele it may be doubted whether he did or no) in ſteed of receiuing his maſter with triumph, he bent and diſcharged againſt him diuerſe péeces of ordinance, ſending him word he ſhould not there take land.

The earle of Warwike kept out of Calis.

This nauie lieng thus before Calis at anchor, the ducheſſe of Clarence was there deliuered of a faire ſonne, which child the earles deputie would ſcarſe ſuffer to be chriſtened within the towne; nor without great intreatie would permit two flagons of wine to be conueied abord to the ladies lieng in the hauen. The king of England aduertiſed of the refuſall made by monſieur de Vauclere to the earle of Warwike, was ſo much pleaſed therewith, that incontinentlie he made him chiefe capteine of the towne of Calis by his letters patents, which he ſent to him out of hand, and thereof diſcharged the earle as a traitor and rebell. Thus was the one in reſpect of his accepted ſeruice honorablie aduanced; and the other, in regard of his diſloialtie ſhamefullie diſgraced: whereof as the one tooke occaſion of inward delight; ſo the other could not be void of grudging conceipts.

Monſieur de Vauclere made deputie of Calis.

The duke of Burgognie (vnto whome king Edward had written, that in no wiſe he ſhould receiue the earle of Warwike, nor anie of his friends within his countries) was ſo well pleaſed with the doings of monſieur de Vauclere, that he ſent to him his ſeruant Philip de Cumins, and gaue him yéerelie a thouſand crownes in penſion, praieng and requiring him to continue in truth and fidelitie toward king Edward, as he had ſhewed and begun. But although monſieur de Vauclere ſware in the ſaid Philips préſence, trulie to take king Edwards part; yet he ſent priuilie to the earle of Warwike lieng at Whitſanbaie, that if he landed, hée ſhould be taken and loſt: for all England (as he ſaid) tooke part againſt him; the duke of Burgognie, and all the inhabitants of the towne, with the lord Duras the kings marſhall, and all the retinue of the garriſon were his enimies.

The double dealing of monſieur de Vauclere. The lord Duras was a Gaſcoigne alſo.

The earle, hauing this aduertiſement from his feigned enimie, with his nauie ſailed toward Normandie, and by the waie ſpoiled and tooke manie ſhips of the duke of Burgognies ſubiects, and at the laſt (with all his nauie and ſpoiles) he tooke land at Diepe in Normandie, where the gouernor of the countrie friendlie welcomed him, and aduertiſed king Lewes of his arriuall. The French king, deſirous of nothing more than to haue occaſion to pleaſure the erle of Warwike, of whom the hie renowme cauſed all men to haue him in admiration, ſent vnto him, requiring both him and his ſonne in law the duke of Clarence, to come vnto his caſtell of Ambois, where he then ſoiourned. The duke of Burgognie, hearing that the duke and earle were thus receiued in France, ſent a poſt with letters vnto king Lewes, partlie by waie of requeſt, and partlie by way of menacing, to diſſuade him from aiding of his aduerſaries, the ſaid duke and earle.

The earle of Warwike landed at Diepe.

Ambois.

But the French king little regarded this ſute of the duke of Burgognie, and therefore anſwered, that he might and would ſuccour his friends, and yet breake no leage with him at all. In the meane time, K. Edward made inquirie for ſuch as were knowne to be aiders of the earle of Warwike within his realme, of whom ſome he apprehended as guiltie, and ſome (doubting themſelues) fled to ſanctuarie, and other truſting to the kings pardon, ſubmitted themſelues, as Iohn marques Montacute, whom he courteouſlie receiued. When quéene Margaret that ſoiourned with duke Reiner hir father, heard tell that the earle of Warwike was come to the French court, with all diligence ſhée came to Ambois to ſée him, with hir onelie ſonne prince Edward.

Iohn marques Montacute.

With hir alſo came Iaſper earle of Penbroke, and Iohn earle of Oxford, which after diuerſe impriſonments latelie eſcaped, fled out of England into France, and came by fortune to this aſſemblie. Theſe perſons, after intreatie had of their affaires, determined by meanes of the French king to conclude a league and amitie betwéene them. And firſt to begin withall, for the ſure foundation of their new intreatie, Edward prince of Wales wedded Anne ſecond daughter to the earle of Warwike, which ladie came with hir mother into France. After which mariage, the duke and the earles tooke a ſolemne oth, that they ſhould neuer leaue the warre, till either king Henrie the ſixt, or his ſonne prince Edward, were reſtored to the crowne; and that the quéene and the prince ſhould ſhuld depute and appoint the duke and the earle to be gouernors & conſeruators of the common wealth, till time the prince were come to eſtate. Manie other conditions were agréed, as both reaſon & the weightineſſe of ſo great buſineſſe required.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in dooing in the French court, there landed a damſell, belonging to the ducheſſe of Clarence; as ſhe ſaid: which made monſieur de Vauclére beleeue, that ſhe was ſent from king Edward to the duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike with a plaine ouerture and declaration of peace. Of the which tidings Vauclére was verie glad for the earles ſake. But this damſell comming to the duke, perſuaded him ſo much to leaue off the purſute of his conceiued diſpleaſure towards his brother king Edward, that he promiſed at his returne into England, not to be ſo extreme enimie againſt his brother as he was taken to be: and this promiſe afterward he did képe. With this anſwer the damſell returned into England, the earle of Warwike being thereof clearelie ignorant.

The promiſe of the duke of Clarence.

The French king lent both ſhips, men, and monie vnto quéene Margaret, and to hir partakers, and appointed the baſtard of Burbon, admerall of France, with a great nauie to defend them againſt the nauie of the duke of Burgognie, which he laid at the mouth of the riuer Saine, readie to incounter them, being of greater force than both the French nauie and the Engliſh fléet. And yet king Reiner did alſo helpe his daughter with men and munition of warre. When their ſhips and men were come togither to Harflue, the erle of Warwike thought not to linger time: bicauſe he was certified by letters from his friends out of England, that aſſoone as he had taken land, there would be readie manie thouſands to doo him what ſeruice and pleaſure they could or might. And beſide this, diuerſe noble men wrote that they would helpe him with men, armor, monie, and all things neceſſarie for the warre, and further to aduenture their owne bodies in his quarell.

The loue which the people bare to the earle of Warwike.

Suerlie his preſence was ſo much deſired of all the people, that almoſt all men were readie in armour, looking for his arriuall: for they iudged that the verie ſunne was taken from the world when hée was abſent. When he had receiued ſuch letters of comfort, he determined with the duke, and the earles of Oxford and Penbroke (bicauſe quéene Margaret and hir ſonne were not yet fullie furniſhed for the iournie) to go before with part of the nauie, and part of the armie. And euen as fortune would, the nauie of the duke of Burgognie at the ſame time by a tempeſt was ſcattered, & driuen beſide the coaſt of Normandie: ſo that the earle of Warwike in hope of a bonne voiage, cauſed ſailes to be halſed vp, and with good ſpéed landed at Darmouth in Deuonſhire, from whence almoſt ſix moneths paſſed he tooke his iournie toward France (as before ye haue heard.) When the earle had taken land, he made proclamation in the name of king Henrie the ſixt, vpon high paines commanding and charging all men able to beare armor, to prepare themſelues to fight againſt Edward duke of Yorke, which contrarie to right had vſurped the crowne. It is almoſt not to be beléeued, how manie thouſands men of warre at the firſt tidings of the earles landing reſorted vnto him.

A proclamation.

King Edward wakened with the newes of the earles landing, and the great repaire of people that came flocking in vnto him, ſent forth letters into all parts of his realme to raiſe an armie: but of them that were ſent for, few came, and yet of thoſe few the more part came with no great good willes. Which when he perceiued, he began to doubt the matter, and therefore being accompanied with the duke of Gloceſter his brother, the lord Haſtings his chamberlaine, which had maried the earles ſiſter, and yet was euer true to the king his maiſter, and the lord Scales brother to the quéene, he departed into Lincolneſhire. And bicauſe he vnderſtood that all the realme was vp againſt him, and ſome part of the earle of Warwiks power was within halfe a daies iournie of him, following the aduiſe of his counſell, with all haſt poſſible he paſſed the Waſhes in great ieopardie, & comming to Lin found there an Engliſh ſhip, and two hulkes of Holland readie (as fortune would) to make ſaile.

King Edward cōmeth to Lin and taketh ſhip to paſſe ouer ſeas.

Whervpon he with his brother the duke of Gloceſter, the lord Scales, and diuerſe other his truſtie friends, entered into the ſhip. The lord Haſtings taried a while after, exhorting all his acquaintance, that of neceſſitie ſhould tarie behind, to ſhew themſelues openlie as friends to king Henrie for their owne ſafegard, but hartilie required them in ſecret to continue faithfull to king Edward. This perſuaſion declared, he entered the ſhip with the other, and ſo they departed, being in number in that one ſhip and two hulkes, about ſeuen or eight hundred perſons, hauing no furniture of apparell or other neceſſarie things with them, ſauing apparell for warre. [For it was no taking of leaſure to prouide their corporall neceſſaries (though the want of them could hardlie be borne) in a caſe of preſent danger; conſidering that they were made againſt by the contrarie faction with ſuch ſwift purſute. And it had bene a point of extreme follie, to be carefull for the accidents, permitmitting in the meane time the ſubſtance vnto the ſpoile.]

Abr. Fl.

As king Edward with ſaile and ore was thus making courſe towards the duke of Burgognies countrie (whither he determined at the firſt to go) it chanced that ſeuen or eight gallant ſhips of Eaſterlings, open enimies both to England and France, were abrode on thoſe ſeas, and eſpieng the kings veſſels, began to chaſe him. The kings ſhip was good of ſaile, and ſo much gat of the Eaſterlings, that he came on the coaſt of Holland, and ſo deſcended lower before a towne in the countrie called Alquemare, and there caſt anchor as néere the towne as was poſſible, bicauſe they could not enter the hauen at an ebbing water. The Eaſterlings alſo approched the Engliſh ſhip, as néere as their great ſhips ſhould come at the low water, intending at the floud to haue their preie: as they were verie like to haue atteined it in déed, if the lord Gronture, gouernor of that countrie for the duke of Burgognie, had not by chance béene at the ſame time in that towne.

King Edward arriued at Alquemare.

The lord Gronture.

This lord (vpon knowledge had of king Edwards arriuall there in the hauen, and in what danger he ſtood by reaſon of the Eaſterlings) commanded them not to be ſo hardie as once to meddle with anie Engliſhmen, being both the dukes fréends and alies. Then did king Edward & all his companie come on land. Who after they had béene well refreſhed & gentlie comforted by the lord Gronture, they were by him brought to the Hagh, a rich towne in Holland, where they remained a while, hauing all things neceſſarie miniſtred to them by order of the duke of Burgognie, ſent vnto the lord Gronture, immediatlie vpon certificat from the ſaid lord Gronture of king Edwards arriuall. [Héere we ſée in what perplexities king Edward and his retinue were, partlie by enimies at home in his owne countrie, whoſe hands he was conſtreined to flée from by the helpe of the ſea; partlie alſo by aduerſaries abroad, ſeeking opportunitie to offer him not the incounter onelie, but the ouerthrow. And ſuerly, had not good fortune fauoured him, in preparing readie meanes for him to auoid thoſe imminent dangers; he had doubtleſſe fallen among the weapons of his owne countrimen, and ſo neuer haue feared forren force: but in eſcaping both the one and the other, euen with ſhift of ſo ſpéedie expedition, it is a note (if it be well looked into) of happineſſe, if anie happineſſe may be in preſeruation from ruine and reproch.]

Edw. Hall. fol.ccix.

Now let all Engliſhmen (ſaith Edward Hall) conſider (as before is rehearſed) what profit, what commoditie, and what helpe in diſtreſſe, the mariage of the ladie Margaret, king Edwards ſiſter to the duke Charles, did to him in his extreame neceſſitie; and but by that meane vncurable extremitie: for his alies and confederats in Caſtile and Arragon were too far from him, either ſpéedilie to flie to, or ſhortlie to come fro with anie aid or armie. The French king was his extreme enimie, and fréend to king Henrie, for whoſe cauſe in the king of Scots (for all the leage betwéene them) he did put little confidence and leſſe truſt. The ſtates and all Eaſtland were with him at open war, and yet by this marriage, God prouided him a place to flie to, both for refuge and reléefe.

Abr. Flem.

[But for the further and cléerer explanation of theſe ſtratagems, or rather ciuill tumults, it ſhall not be amiſſe to inſert in this place (ſith I cannot hit vpon one more conuenient) a verie good note or addition receiued from the hands of maiſter Iohn Hooker chamberlaine of Exceſter; the contents whereof are of ſuch qualitie, that they cannot ſtand in concurrence with anie matter introduced within the compaſſe of the ninth yeare of this kings reigne (as he had quoted it) and therfore I thought it méet to tranſfer the ſame to this tenth yeare; conſidering that ſome part of the matter by him largelie touched, is briefelie in the premiſſes alreadie remembred.]

Iohn Hooker, alias Vowell.

¶ This yeare (ſaith he) was verie troubleſome, and full of ciuill wars and great diſcords. For after that king Edward the fourth was eſcaped out of priſon, at Wolneie beſides Warwike, he muſtered and prepared a new armie. Wherevpon the earle of Warwike and the duke of Clarence, miſtruſting themſelues, prepared to paſſe the ſeas ouer to Calis, and firſt of all ſent awaie the duches of Clarence daughter to the ſaid earle, who was then great with child, and ſhe being accompanied with the lord Fitz Warren, the lord Dinham, and the baron of Carew, and a thouſand fighting men came to this citie of Exceſter the eightéenth daie of March, and was lodged in the biſhops palace. Sir Hugh, or (as ſome ſaie) ſir William Courtneie, who then fauoured the partie of king Edward the fourth, aſſembled a great troope and armie of all the fréends he could make, and inuironing the citie, beſieged the ſame; he pulled downe all the bridges, rampered vp all the waies, and ſtopped all the paſſages, ſo that no vittels at all could be brought to this citie for twelue daies togither, which being doone vpon a ſudden and vnlooked for, vittels waxed ſhort and ſcant within the citie, and by reaſon of ſo great a multitude within the ſame, the people for want of food began to murmur and mutter.

Lord Dinhã, and baron Carew, with their power come to Exceſter.

The duches and the lords of hir companie, miſtruſting what might and would be the ſequele hereof, began to deale with the maior, and required to haue the keies of the gates to be deliuered into their hands and that they would vndertake the ſafe cuſtodie of the citie. Likewiſe ſir William Courtneie did ſend his meſſenger to the maior, and required the gates to be opened and to giue him entrance: or els he would with ſword and fier deſtroie the ſame. The maior and his brethren being in great perplexities, and hauing to anſwer not onelie the lords within and the knight without, but moſt of all doubting the common people within, who being impatient of penurie, were deafe to all perſuaſions and liſten to any counſels: did ſo order and handle the matter, as that by good ſpéeches and courteous vſages, euerie partie was ſtopped and ſtaied, vntill by means and mediations of certeine good and godlie men, an intreatie was made, the matter was compounded and the ſiege raiſed, and euerie man ſet at libertie.

The duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike ſoiorne at Exceſter, and the purſue of the king.

The next daie after which concluſion, the gates being opened, to wit, the third of Aprill 1470, the earle of Warwike and the duke of Clarence came to this citie, and here reſted, and ſoiorned themſelues vntill ſufficient ſhipping was prouided for their paſſage ouer the ſeas, and then they all imbarked themſelues, and paſſed ouer to Calis. The king in this meane time muſtered his armie, and prepared with all ſpéed all things neceſſarie to follow and purſue his ſaid aduerſaries, and came to this citie, thinking to find them here the fouretéenth of Aprill being ſaturdaie 1470, with fortie thouſand fighting men: but the birds were fled awaie before his comming. Neuertheleſſe the king came and entred into the citie, being accompanied with ſundrie noble men; namelie, the biſhop of Elie then lord treaſuror, the duke of Norffolke earle marſhall, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wilſhire ſonne to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Worceſter conſtable of England, the earle of Shreweſburie, the earle Riuers, the lord Haſtings, the lord Graie of Codnor, the lord Audelie, the lord Saie, the lord Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Montioie, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, and the baron of Dudleie.

The king is receiued verie honorablie into the citie of Exceſter.

Before whoſe comming, the maior being aduertiſed thereof, tooke order, and gaue commandement to euerie citizen and inhabitant, being of abilitie, to prouide and prepare for himſelfe a gowne of the cities liuerie, which was then red colour, and to be in a readineſſe for receiuing of the king, which was accordinglie doone. And when the king was come néere to the citie, the maior being verie well attended with foure hundred perſons well and séemelie apparelled in the cities liuerie, went to the ſouth gate, and without the ſame attended the kings comming. Who when he was come, the maior did his moſt humble obeiſance, and therewith Thomas Dowriſh then recorder of the citie made vnto his grace an humble oration, congratulating his comming to the citie: which ended, the maior deliuered vnto the king the keies of the gates and the maces of his office, and therewith a purſſe of one hundred nobles in gold, which his grace tooke verie thankfullie. The monie he kept, but the keies and the maces he deliuered backe to the maior; and then the maior tooke the mace and did beare it through the citie bare-headed before the king, vntill he came to his lodging.

The citizens beneuolence to the king.

The next daie following, being Palmeſundaie, the king in moſt princelie and roiall maner came to the cathedrall church of ſaint Peters, to heare the diuine ſeruice, where he followed and went in proceſſion after the maner as was then vſed, round about the churchyard, to the great ioy and comfort of all the people: he continued in the citie thrée daies vntill the tueſdaie then following; who when he had dined tooke his horſſe and departed backe towards London, and gaue to the maior great good thanks for his interteinement. About foure moneths after this, in Auguſt, the duke of Clarence and the erle of Warwike returned againe from Calis, with all their retinue, & landed ſome at Plimmouth, ſome at Dartmouth, and ſome at Exmouth: but all met in this citie, and from hence they all paſſed towards London, and at euerie place they proclamed king Henrie the ſixt, Which when king Edward heard, he was very much troubled therewith: and not able then to withſtand their force, he paſſed the ſeas to his brother in law the duke of Burgognie.

How long the king continued in the citie.

The duke of Clarence and the earle of Warwike arriue on the Engliſh coaſts.

This yeare alſo, being verie troubleſome, and the gouerne-gouernement vncerteine, men were in great perplexities, & wiſt not what to doo. And among manie there was one ſpeciallie to be remembred, who to rid himſelfe out of theſe troubles, did deuiſe this practiſe: his name was ſir William Haukeſford knight, a man verie well learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe iuſtices at the law: he dwelled at Annorie in Deuonſhire, a gentleman of great poſſeſſions, and hauing neuer a ſonne, the lord Fitz Warren, ſir Iohn Sentleger, & ſir William Bulleine, who maried his daughters, were his heires. This man being one of the chiefeſt lawiers in the land, was dailie ſought to and his counſell aſked: and he conſidering that when the ſword ruled, law had a ſmall courſe, and finding by experience what fruits inſue ſuch counſell as dooth not beſt like the parties, was verie heauie, ſorrowfull, and in great agonies.

In vniuſt or ſurmiſed charge of the knight againſt the kéeper of his parke.

Herevpon ſuddenlie he called vnto him the kéeper of his parke, with whom he fell out and quareled, bicauſe (as he ſaid) he was ſlouthfull and careles, and did not walke in the nights about the parke, but ſuffered his game to be ſpoiled and his déere to be ſtolen, therefore he willed him to be more vigilant and carefull of his charge: and alſo commanded him that if he met anie man in his circuit and walke in the night time, and would not ſtand nor ſpeake vnto him, he ſhould not ſpare to kill him what ſo euer he were. This knight, hauing laid this foundation, and minding to performe what he had purpoſed for the ending of his dolefull daies, did in a certeine darke night ſecretlie conueie himſelfe out of his houſe, and walked alone in his parke. Then the kéeper in his night walke hearing one ſtirring and comming towards him, aſked who was there? but no anſwer was made at all.

The kéeper killeth his maiſter the knight with an arrow.

Then the kéeper willed him to ſtand, which when he would not doo, the kéeper nocked his arrow and ſhot vnto him, and killed him; who when he perceiued that it was his maiſter, then he called to remembrance his maiſters former commandement. And ſo this knight, otherwiſe learned and wiſe, being affraid to diſpleaſe man, did diſpleaſe God, and verie diſorderlie ended his life. It is inrolled amongſt the records of this citie, of a commiſſion directed to Iohn earle of Deuonſhire, & from him ſent to the maior of the citie of Exceſter to be proclamed. The words be theſe: Decimoquarto die Aprilis, vz. in vigilia Paſchæ, An, 49. Hen. 6. commiſsio domini regis directa Iohanni comiti Deuon. miſſa eſt maiori vt proclamaretur. And likewiſe in an other place: Quatuor marcæ ſunt ſolutæ Iohanni comiti Deuon. ex aſſenſu maioris. Howbeit, certeine it is there was no ſuch earle of that name, onelie there was Iohn Holland then liuing duke of Exceſter, wherefore ſomething is miſtaken herein.

Abr. Flem.

But was this a practiſe (thinke you) beſéeming a man of worſhip, learning, and iudgement, to make awaie himſelfe, bicauſe he ſaw a temporall interruption of his proſperitie? Suerlie how much learning ſo euer he had in the lawes of the land, litle at all or none (as appeareth) had he in ſuffering the forces of aduerſitie, whom the feare of it did ſo terrifie, that it droue him to his end. Wiſe therefore is the counſell of the comedie-writer, and worthie of imitation, that a man, when he is in beſt caſe and higheſt degrée of welfare, ſhould euen then meditate with himſelfe how to awaie with hardneſſe, with penurie, perils, loſſe, baniſhment, and other afflictions: for ſo ſhall he prepare himſelfe to beare them with patience when they happen: as ſouldiers trained vp in militarie exerciſes at home, are ſo much the forwarder for the field, & fitter to incounter their foes (with leſſe dread of danger) when they come abroad to be tried: and therefore it is wiſelie (& to the purpoſe) ſaid of Virgil:

Aeneid. 5.

But to returne to the princes affaires. When the fame was once ſpred abroad that K. Edward was fled the relme, an innumerable number of people reſorted to the earle of Warwike to take his part, but all K. Edwards truſtie fréends went to diuerſe ſanctuaries, and amongſt other his wife quéene Elizabeth tooke ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter, and there in great penurie forſaken of all hir friends, was deliuered of a faire ſon called Edward, which was with ſmall pompe like a poore mans child chriſtened, the godfathers being the abbat and prior of Weſtminſter, and the godmother the ladie Scroope. [But what might be the heauineſſe of this ladies hart (thinke we) vpon conſideration of ſo manie counterblaſts of vnhappineſſe inwardlie conceiued? Hir husband had taken flight, his adherents and hir fréends ſought to ſhroud themſelues vnder the couert of a new protector, ſhe driuen in diſtreſſe forſooke not that ſimple refuge which hir hard hap forced vpon hir; and (a kings wife) wanted in hir neceſſitie ſuch things as meane mens wiues had in ſuperfluitie, & (a coroſiue to a noble mind) a prince of renowmed parentage was (by conſtreint of vnkind fortune) not vouchſafed the ſolemnitie of chriſtendome due and decent for ſo honorable a perſonage.]

The Kentiſhmen make an hurlie burlie.

The Kentiſhmen in this ſeſon (whoſe minds be euer moueable at the change of princes) came to the ſuburbs of London, ſpoiled manſions, robbed béerehouſes, and by the counſell of ſir Geffrie Gates and other ſanctuarie men, they brake vp the kings Bench and deliuered priſoners, and fell at Ratcliffe, Limehouſe, & S. Katharins, to burning of houſes, ſlaughter of people, and rauiſhing of women. Which ſmall ſparkle had growne to a greater flame, if the earle of Warwike with a great power had not ſuddenlie quenched it, and puniſhed the offendors: which benefit by him doone, cauſed him much more to be eſtéemed and liked amongſt the commons than he was before. When he had ſettled all things at his pleaſure, vpon the twelfe daie of October he rode to the Tower of London, and there deliuered king Henrie out of the ward, where he before was kept, and brought him to the kings lodging, where he was ſerued according to his degrée.

King Henrie fetched out of the Tower & reſtored to his kinglie gouernement.

On the fiue and twentith day of the ſaid moneth, the duke of Clarence accompanied with the earles of Warwike and Shreweſburie, the lord Strange, and other lords and gentlemen, ſome for feare, and ſome for loue, and ſome onelie to gaze at the wauering world, went to the Tower, and from thenſe brought king Henrie apparelled in a long gowne of blew veluet, through London to the church of ſaint Paule, the people on euerie ſide the ſtréets reioiſing and crieng; God ſaue the king: as though ech thing had ſucceeded as they would haue had it: and when he had offered (as kings vſe to doo) he was conueied to the biſhops palace, where he kept his houſhold like a king. [Thus was the principalitie poſted ouer ſomtimes to Henrie, ſometimes to Edward; according to the ſwaie of the partie preuailing: ambition and diſdaine ſtill caſting fagots on the fire, whereby the heat of hatred gathered the greater force to the conſumption of the péeres and the deſtruction of the people. In the meane time, neither part could ſecurelie poſſeſſe the regalitie, when they obteined it; which highmindedneſſe was in the end the ouerthrow of both principals and acceſſaries, according to the nature thereof noted in this diſtichon by the poet:

Faſtus habet lites, offenſis faſtus abundat,
Faſtus ad interitum præcipitare ſolet.]

A parlement.

When king Henrie had thus readepted and effſoones gotten his regall power and authoritie, he called his high court of parlement to begin the ſix and twentith day of Nouember, at Weſtminſter; in the K. Edward adiudged an vſurper.

which king Edward was adiudged a traitor to the countrie, and an vſurper of the realme. His goods were confiſcat and forfeited. The like ſentence was giuen againſt all his partakers and freends. And beſides this it was inacted, that ſuch as for his ſake were apprehended, and were either in captiuitie or at large vpon ſuerties, ſhould be extremelie puniſhed according to their demerits, amongſt whome was the lord Tiptoft earle of Worceſter lieutenant for king Edward in Ireland, exerciſing there more extreme crueltie than princelie pietie, and namelie on two infants being ſonnes to the earle of Deſmond.

Abr.Fl. ex I.S. pag.725. The earle Tiptoft beheaded.

[This earle of Worceſter, being found in the top of an high three, in the forreſt of Waibridge, in the countie of Huntington, was brought to London, and either for treaſon to him laid, or malice againſt him conceiued, was atteinted, and beheaded at the Tower hill, and after buried at the Blacke friers.] Moreouer, all ſtatutes made by king Edward were clearlie reuoked, and the crownes of the realmes of England and France were by authoritie of the ſame parlement intailed to king Henrie the ſixt, and to his heires male; and for default of ſuch heires, to remaine to George duke of Clarence, & to his heires male: and further, the ſaid duke was inabled to be next heire to his father Richard duke of Yorke, and to take from him all his landes and dignities, as though he had beene his eldeſt ſonne at the time of his death. Iaſper earle of Penbroke, and Iohn earle of Oxford, with diuerſe other by king Edward atteinted, were reſtored to their old names, poſſeſſions, and ancient dignities.

The crowne intailed.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 722, 723. The earle of Warwike his houſekeeping. Fabian.

Beſide this, the earle of Warwike, as one to whom the common-wealth was much bounden [and euer had in great fauour of the commons of this land, by reaſon of the exceeding houſhold which he dailie kept in all countries where euer he ſoiourned or laie: and when he came to London, he held ſuch an houſe, that ſix oxen were eaten at a breakefaſt, and euerie tauerne was full of his meat, for who that had anie acquaintance in that houſe, he ſhould haue had as much ſod and roſt as he might carrie vpon a long dagger] he (I ſaie) was made gouernour of the realme, with whom as fellow was aſſociat George duke of Clarence. And thus was the ſtate of the realme quite altered. To this parlement came the marqueſſe Montacute, excuſing himſelfe, that for feare of death he declined to take king Edwards part, which excuſe was accepted. When queene Margaret vnderſtood by hir huſbands letters, that the victorie was gotten by their freends, ſhe with hir ſonne prince Edward and hir traine entered their ſhips, to take their voiage into England: but the winter was ſo ſharpe, the weather ſo ſtormie, and the wind ſo contrarie, that ſhe was faine to take land againe, and to deferre hir iournie till another ſeaſon.

The earle of Warwike inſtituted gouernour of the realme.

Iaſper earle of Penbroke.

About the ſame ſeaſon, Iaſper earle of Penbroke went into Wales, to viſit his lands in Penbrokeſhire, where he found lord Henrie ſonne to his brother Edmund earle of Richmond, hauing not full ten yeares of age; he being kept in maner like a captiue, but honorablie brought vp by the ladie Herbert, late wife to William earle of Penbroke, beheaded at Banburie (as ye before haue heard.) This Henrie was borne of Margaret the onelie daughter and heire of Iohn the firſt duke of Summerſet, then not being full ten yeares of age, the which ladie though ſhe were after ioined in mariage with lord Henrie ſonne to Humfreie duke of Buckingham, and after to Thomas Stanleie earle of Derbie, both being yoong and apt for generation, yet ſhe had neuer anie more children, as though ſhe had doone hir part to bring foorth a man child, and the ſame to be a king (as he after was indeed) intituled by the name of Henrie the ſeuenth (as after ye ſhall heare.)

Margaret counteſſe of Richmond and Derbie.

The earle of Penbroke tooke this child, being his nephue, out of the cuſtodie of the ladie Herbert, and at his returne brought the child with him to London to king Henrie the ſixt, whome when the king had a good while beheld, he ſaid to ſuch princes as were with him: Lo, ſuerlie this is he, to whom both we and our aduerſaries leauing the poſſeſſion of all things ſhall hereafter giue roome and place. So this holie man ſhewed before the chance that ſhould happen, that this earle Henrie ſo ordeined by God, ſhould in time to come (as he did indeed) haue and inioy the kingdome and whole rule of this realme of England. ¶ So that it might ſeeme probable by the coherence of holie Henries predictions with the iſſue falling out in truth with the ſame; that for the time he was indued with a propheticall ſpirit. And ſuerlie the epithet or title of holie is not for naught attributed vnto him, for it is to be read in writers, that he was by nature giuen to peaceableneſſe, abhorring bloud and ſlaughter, deteſting ciuill tumults, addicted to deuotion, verie frequent in praier, and not eſteeming ſo highlie of courtlie gallantneſſe as ſtood with the dignitie of a prince. In conſideration wherof, he procured againſt himſelfe an apoſtaſie of his people both natiue and forren; who reuolted and fell from fealtie. And whie? The reaſon is rendred by the ſame writer, namelie:

The ſaieng of king Henrie the ſixt, of Henrie of Richmond after king Henrie the ſeuenth.

The earle of Warwike, vnderſtanding that his enimie the duke of Burgognie had receiued king Edward, and meant to aid him for recouerie of the kingdome, he firſt ſent ouer to Calis foure hundred archers on horſſebacke to make warre on the dukes countries; and further, prepared foure thouſand valiant men to go ouer ſhortlie, that the duke might haue his hands euen full of trouble at home. And where ye haue heard that the erle of Warwike was kept out of Calis at his fleeing out of England into France, ye ſhall note that within a quarter of an houre after it was knowne that he was returned into England; and had chaſed king Edward out of the realme; not onelie monſieur de Vauclere, but alſo all other of the garriſon & towne ſhewed themſelues to be his freends; ſo that the ragged ſtaffe was taken vp and worne in euerie mans cap, ſome ware it of gold enameled, ſome of ſiluer; and he that could haue it neither of gold nor ſiluer, had it of whitiſh ſilke or cloth: ſuch wauering minds haue the common people, bending like a reed with euerie wind that bloweth.

The ragged ſtaffe.

The duke of Burgognie, hauing an armie readie at the ſame time to inuade the frontiers of France, to recouer the townes of ſaint Quintines and Amiens, latelie by the French king taken from him, doubted to be hindered greatlie by the Engliſhmen, if he ſhould be conſtreined to haue warre with them: for the duke of Burgognie held not onlie at that ſeaſon Flanders, but alſo Bulleine, and Bullennois, and all Artois, ſo that he was thereby in danger to receiue harme out of Calis on ech ſide. Therefore he ſent ambaſſadors thither, which did ſo much with the councell there, that the league was newlie confirmed betwixt the realme of England and the dukes countries; onelie the name of Henrie put in the writing in ſteed of Edward. This matter hindered ſore the ſute of king Edward, dailie ſuing to the duke for aid at his hands, the more earneſtlie indeed, bicauſe of ſuch promiſes as by letters were made vnto him out of England, from his aſſured freends there.

The duke of Burgognie ſendeth ambaſſadors to Calis.

He aideth K. Edward vnder hand.

But duke Charles would not conſent openlie to aid king Edward; but yet ſecretlie vnder hand by others he lent vnto him fiftie thouſand florens of the croſſe of S. Andrew, and further cauſed foure great ſhips to be appointed for him in the hauen of de Veere, otherwiſe called Camphire in Zeland, which in thoſe daies was frée for all men to come vnto, and the duke hired for him fouretéene ſhips of the Eaſterlings well appointed, & for the more ſuertie tooke a bond of them to ſerue him trulie, till he were landed in England, and fiftéene daies after. The Eaſterlings were glad of this iournie, truſting if he got againe the poſſeſſion of England, they ſhould the ſooner come to a peace, and obteine reſtitution of their liberties and franchiſes, which they claimed of former time to haue within this realme. The duke of Burgognie cared not much, on whoſe ſide the victorie fell, ſauing for paiment of his monie: for he would oft ſaie, that he was fréend to both parties, and either part was fréendlie to him.

In déed, as he was brother in law to the one, ſo was he of kin to the other, as by his grandmother being daughter to Iohn of Gant duke of Lancaſter. When therefore all king Edwards furniture and prouiſion for his iournie were once readie, hauing now with him about two thouſand able men of warre, beſide mariners, he entered into the ſhips with them, in the hauen before Fliſhing in Zeland, vpon the ſecond day of March: and bicauſe the wind fell not good for his purpoſe, he taried ſtill aboord for the ſpace of nine daies, before it turned méet for his iournie. But after that the wind once came about (as he wiſht) the ſails were hoiſſed vp on the 11 of March being mondaie, & forward they ſailed, directing their courſe ſtreight ouer towards the coaſt of Norffolke. On the next day being tueſday, & the twelfe of March, toward the euening, they road before Cromer, where the king ſent to land ſir Robert Chamberleine, with ſir Gilbert Debenham knights, and diuerſe other, to the end they might diſcouer the countrie, and vnderſtand how the people within the land were bent towards him, eſpeciallie thoſe countries there next adioining.

W. Fleetwood.

He arriueth on the coaſt of Norffolke.

Anno Reg. 11. The earle of Oxford.

Vpon their returne, he vnderſtood that there was no ſuertie for him to land in thoſe parties, by reaſon of the good order which the earle of Warwike, and the earle of Oxford eſpeciallie had taken in that countrie to reſiſt him: for not onelie the duke of Norffolke, but all other the gentlemen (whome the earle of Warwike had in anie ſuſpicion) were by letters of priuie ſeale ſent for, and either committed to ſafe kéeping about London, or elſe inforced to find ſuertie for their loiall demeanor towards king Henrie: yet thoſe knights and other that were thus ſent forth to make inquirie, were well receiued of their frends, and had good cheare. But after the king perceiued by their report, how things ſtood thereabouts, he cauſed his ſhips to make courſe towards the north parts.

The ſame night folowing, a great ſtorme of winds and weather roſe, ſore troubling the ſeas, and continued till the fourtéenth day of that moneth being thurſday, on the which day with great danger, by reaſon of the tempeſtuous rage and torment of the troubled ſeas, he arriued at the head of Humber, where the other ſhips were ſcattered from him, each one ſeuered from other; ſo that of neceſſitie they were driuen to land in ſunder where they beſt might, for doubt to be caſt awaie in that perillous tempeſt. The king with the lord Haſtings his chamberleine, and other to the number of fiue hundred men being in one ſhip, landed within Humber on Holderneſſe ſide, at a place called Rauenſpurgh, euen in the ſame place where Henrie erle of Derbie, after called king Henrie the fourth landed, when he came to depriue king Richard the ſecond of the crowne, and to vſurpe it to himſelfe.

He arriueth at the head of Humber.

He landeth at Rauenſpurgh

Richard duke of Gloceſter, and thrée hundred men in his companie, tooke land in another place foure miles diſtant from thence, where his brother king Edward did land. The earle Riuers, and with him two hundred men, landed at a place called Pole, fourtéene miles from the hauen where the king came on land. The reſidue of his people landed ſome here ſome there, in place where for their ſuerties they thought beſt. On the morrow, being the fiftéenth of March, now that the tempeſt ceaſed, and euerie man being got to land, they drew from euerie of their landing places towards the king, who for the firſt night was lodged in a poore village, two miles from the place where he firſt ſet foot on land. [As for his traine, though the ſeaſon of the yeere was naturallie cold, & therefore required competent refection by warmth, it is to be ſuppoſed, that all their lodgings were hard inough, ſith the principals prouiſion was ſorie inough. But what of that? Better (in caſes of extremitie) an hard ſhift than none at all.]

Touching the folks of the countrie, there came few or none to him. For by the incenſing of ſuch as had bin ſent into thoſe parts from the erle of Warwike, and other his aduerſaries, the people were ſhrewdlie induced to ſtand againſt him. But yet, in reſpect of the good will that manie of them had borne to his father, they could haue béene content, that he ſhould haue inioied his right to his due inheritance of the duchie of Yorke, but in no wiſe to the title of the crowne. And herevpon they ſuffered him to paſſe, not ſéeking to annoie him, till they might vnderſtand more of his purpoſed meaning. The king, perceiuing how the people were bent, noiſed abroad that hée came to make none other chalenge but to his inheritance of the duchie of Yorke: and withall ment to paſſe firſt into the citie of Yorke, and ſo forward towards London, to incounter with his aduerſaries that were in the ſouth parts.

For although his néereſt waie had béene through Lincolneſhire: yet bicauſe in taking that waie hée muſt haue gone againe to the water, in paſſing ouer Humber; he doubted leaſt it would haue bin thought that he had withdrawne himſelfe to the ſea for feare. And to auoid the rumors that might haue béene ſpred thereof, to the hinderance of his whole cauſe, he refuſed that waie, and tooke this other, ſtill bruting it (as before we ſaid) that his comming was not to chalenge the crowne, but onelie to be reſtored vnto his fathers right and inheritance of the duchie of Yorke, which was deſcended to him from his father. And here it ſéemed that the colour of iuſtice hath euer ſuch a force in it ſelfe amongſt all men, that where before few or none of the commons could be found that would offer themſelues to take his part: yet now that he did (as they thought) claime nothing but that which was his right, they began ſtreight to haue a liking of his cauſe.

And where there were gathered to the number of ſix or ſeuen thouſand men in diuerſe places, vnder the leading chiefie of a prieſt and of a gentleman called Martine de la Mare, in purpoſe to haue ſtopped his paſſage: now the ſame perſons tooke occaſion to aſſiſt him. And when he perceiued mens minds to bée well qualified with this feined deuiſe, he marched forth till he came to Beuerleie, which ſtood in his direct waie as he paſſed toward Yorke. He ſent alſo to Kingſton vpon Hull, diſtant from thence ſix miles, willing that he might be there receiued: but the inhabitants, who had bene laboured by his aduerſaries, refuſed in anie wiſe to grant therevnto.

Martine de la Mare or Martine of the ſea.

He paſſeth toward Yorke.

The earle of Warwike aduertiſed by meſſengers of king Edwards arriuall, and of his turning toward Yorke, with all haſt wrote to his brother the marqueſſe Montacute, who had laine at the caſtell of Pomfret all the laſt winter with a great number of ſouldiers, willing him to conſider in what caſe their affaires ſtood, and thervpon with all ſpéed to ſet vpon king Edward, or elſe to kéepe the paſſages, and to ſtaie him from comming anie further forward, till he himſelfe as then being in Warwikeſhire buſie to aſſemble an armie, might come to his aid with the ſame. [Thus laboured the earle of Warwike by policie and puiſſance, as well of his owne as others power, to further his owne purpoſe, hauing ſworne in heart a due performance of that, which he had ſolemnlie vowed and promiſed before.]

But this notwithſtanding, although there were great companies of people of the countries there abouts aſſembled, yet they came not in ſight of the king, but ſuffered him quietlie to paſſe; either bicauſe they were perſuaded that he ment (as he in outward words pretended) not to claime anie title to the crowne, but onelie his right to the duchie of Yorke; or elſe for that they doubted to ſet vpon him, although his number were farre vnequall to theirs; knowing that not onelie he himſelfe, but alſo his companie were minded to ſell their liues dearlie, before they would ſhrinke an inch from anie that was to incounter them. It maie be that diuerſe of the capteins alſo were corrupted: and although outwardlie they ſhewed to be againſt him, yet in heart they bare him right good will, and in no wiſe minded to hinder him. So forward he marched, till he came to Yorke, on a monday being the eightéenth day of March.

K. Edward without interruption paſſeth forward to Yorke.

Before he came to the citie by the ſpace of thrée miles, the recorder of Yorke, whoſe name was Thomas Coniers (one knowne in déed not to beare him anie faithfull good will) came vnto him; & gaue him to vnderſtand, that it ſtood in no wiſe with his ſuertie, to preſume to approch the citie: for either hée ſhould be kept out by force, or if he did enter, he ſhuld be in danger to be caſt away by his aduerſaries that were within. King Edward neuertheleſſe, ſith he was come thus farre forward, knew well inough there was no going backe for him, but manfullie to procéed forward with his begun iournie, and therefore kept on his way. And ſhortlie after there came to him out of the citie, Robert Clifford, and Richard Burgh, who aſſured him that in the quarell which he pretended to purſue, to wit, for the obteining of his right to the duchie of Yorke, he ſhould not faile but be receiued into the citie.

Thomas Coniers recorder of Yorke.

But immediatlie after came the ſaid Coniers againe, with the like tale and information as he had brought before. And thus king Edward one while put in comfort, and another while diſcouraged, marched forth till he came to the gates of the citie, where his people ſtaied; whileſt he and about ſixtéene or ſeuentéene other ſuch as he thought méeteſt, went forth and entred the citie with the ſaid Clifford & Burgh. And (as ſome write) there was a prieſt readie to ſaie maſſe, in which maſſe time the king receiued the ſacrament of the communion, & there ſolemnlie ſware to kéepe and obſerue two ſpeciall articles: although it was farre vnlike that he minded to obſerue either of them: the one was that he ſhould vſe the citizens after a gentle and courteous maner: and the other, that he ſhould be faithfull and obedient vnto king Henries commandements.

K. Edward commeth to Yorke.

He receiueth an oth.

For this wilfull periurie (as hath béene thought) the iſſue of this king ſuffered (for the fathers offenſe) the depriuation not onelie of lands and worldlie poſſeſſions, but alſo of their naturall liues, by their cruell vncle K. Richard the third. [And it may well be. For it is not likelie that God, in whoſe hands is the beſtowing of all ſoueraigntie, will ſuffer ſuch an indignitie to be doone to his ſacred maieſtie, and will ſuffer the ſame to paſſe with impunitie. And ſuerlie, if an oth among priuate men is religiouſlie to be kept, ſith in the ſame is an exact triall of faith and honeſtie; doubtleſſe of princes it is verie nicelie and preciſelie to be obſerued: yea they ſhould rather ſuſteine a blemiſh and diſgrace in their roialtie, than preſume to go againſt their oth and promiſe, ſpeciallie if the ſame ſtand vpon conditions of equitie: otherwiſe they proue themſelues to be impugners of fidelitie, which is a iewell ſurpaſſing gold in price and eſtimation, as the poet prudentlie ſaith:

Charior eſt auro non ſimulata fides.

When king Edward had thus gotten into the citie of Yorke, he made ſuch meanes among the citizens, that he got of them a certeine ſumme of monie; and leauing a gariſon within the citie contrarie to his oth, for feare leaſt the citizens after his departure, might happilie moue ſome rebellion againſt him, he ſet forward the next day toward Todcaſter, a towne ten miles from thence, belonging to the earle of Northumberland. The next day he tooke his waie toward Wakefield and Sendall, a caſtell and lordſhip belonging to the inheritance of the dukes of Yorke, leauing the caſtell of Pomfret vpon his left hand, where the marques Montacute with his armie laie, and did not once offer to ſtop him.

The marques Montacute ſuffereth king Edward to paſſe by him.

Whether the marques ſuffered him to paſſe by ſo, with his good will or no, diuerſe haue diuerſlie coniectured. Some thinke that it lay not in the power of the marques greatlie to annoie him, both for that the king was well beloued in thoſe parties; & againe, all the lords & commons there for the moſt part were towards the earle of Northumberland, and without him or his commandement they were not willing to ſtirre. And therefore the earle in ſitting ſtill and not mouing to and fro, was thought to doo king Edward as good ſeruice as if he had come to him, and raiſed people to aſſiſt him; for diuerſe happilie that ſhould haue come with him, remembring diſpleaſures paſt, would not haue béene ſo faithfull as the earle himſelfe, if it had come to the iumpe of anie hazard of battell.

About Wakefield and the parts there adioining, ſome companie of his freends came to him, whereby his power was increaſed; but nothing in ſuch numbers as he looked for. From Wakefield he croſſed on the left hand, ſo to come againe into the high waie, and came to Doncaſter, and from thence vnto Notingham. Here came to him ſir William Parre, and ſir Iames Harrington, with ſix hundred men well armed and appointed: alſo there came to him ſir Thomas Burgh, & ſir Thomas Montgomerie with their aids, which cauſed him at their firſt comming to make proclamation in his owne name, to wit, of K. Edward the fourth, boldlie affirming to him, that they would ſerue no man but a king.

K. Edward commeth to Northampt.

Edw. Hall.

Whileſt he remained at Notingham, and alſo before he came there, he ſent abroad diuerſe of his auant courrers to diſcouer the countrie, and to vnderſtand if there were anie power gathered againſt him. Some of them that were thus ſent, approached to Newarke, and vnderſtood that within the towne there, the duke of Exceſter, the earle of Oxenford, the lord Bardolfe, and other were lodged with a great power to the number of foure thouſand men, which they had aſſembled in Eſſex, Norffolke, Suffolke, and in the ſhires of Cambridge, Huntington, and Lincolne. The duke of Exceſter, and the earle of Oxenford, with other the chéefe capteins, aduertiſed that king Edwards forriders had béene afore the towne in the euening, ſuppoſed verelie that he and his whole armie were comming towards them.

The duke of Exceſter with a power at Newarke.

Héere vpon, they not thinking it good to abide longer there, determined with all ſpéed to diſlodge, and ſo about two of the clocke after midnight they departed from Newarke, leauing ſome of their people behind, which either ſtale awaie from them, and taried of purpoſe, or could not get awaie ſo ſoone as their fellowes. In déed the foreriders that ſo diſcouered them within the towne of Newarke, aduertiſed the king thereof in all poſt haſt, who incontinentlie aſſembled his people, and forthwith marched towards them: but before he came within thrée miles of the towne, he had knowledge that they were fled and gone from Newarke. Wherevpon he returned againe to Notingham, intending to kéepe on his néereſt waie towards the earle of Warwike, whome he vnderſtood to be departed from London, and to be come into Warwikeſhire, where & in the countries adioining he was buſied in leuieng an armie, with the which he purpoſed to diſtreſſe him.

K. Edward commeth to Leiceſter.

The king then from Notingham came to Leiceſter, where thrée thouſand able men, and well furniſhed for the warre came vnto him. Theſe were ſuch as he knew would liue and die in his quarrell, the moſt part of them belonging vnto the lord Haſtings the kings chamberlaine. And thus he, being more ſtronglie accompanied than before, departed from Leiceſter, and came before the wals of the citie of Couentrie, the nine and twentith daie of March. The earle of Warwike was withdrawne into this citie, kéeping himſelfe incloſed therein with his people, being in number ſix or ſeauen thouſand men. The king ſent to him, and willed him to come forth into the field, and there to make an end of the quarell in plaine battell: but the earle at that preſent refuſed ſo to doo.

The earle of Warwike in Couentrie.

K. Edward prouoketh the earle of Warwike to fight.

For although, vnder pretenſe of king Henries authoritie, he was reputed the kings generall lieutenant of the whole realme, whereby he had got ſuch power togither, as was thought able inough to match with the king for number; yet bicauſe he doubted how they were bent in his fauour, he durſt not commit the matter vnto the doubtfull chance of battell, till he had more of his truſtie fréends about him. The king therefore thrée daies togither prouoked him to come forth, but when he ſaw it would not be, he remooued to Warwike an eight miles from Couentrie, where he was receiued as king, and ſo made his proclamations from that time forth in all places where he came, vnder his accuſtomed name and title of king.

He cõmeth to Warwike.

He lodged héere at Warwike, the rather (as was thought) to prouoke the earle to iſſue forth of Couentrie to giue him battell, howbeit that deuiſe nothing auailed. But yet there came dailie diuerſe perſons on the earls behalfe to treat with the king about a peace, that ſome good compoſition might haue béene concluded; & the king for the aduancement of peace and tranquillitie within the realme, offered large conditions; as a frée pardon of life to the earle, and all his people, with manie other beneficiall articles on their behalfes, which to manie ſéemed verie reaſonable, conſidering their heinous offenſes. But the earle would not accept anie offers, except he might haue compounded ſo as it pleaſed himſelfe, & as was thought in no wiſe to ſtand with the kings honour, and ſuertie of his eſtate.

A treatie for peace.

The duke of Clarence.

In this meane while, the earle of Warwike ſtill looked for the duke of Clarence, who by the ſaid earls appointment had aſſembled a power of men of war about London: but when the earle perceiued that the duke lingered forth the time, and did not vſe ſuch diligence as was requiſit, as one that had béene in doubt of warre or peace, he began to ſuſpect that the duke was of his brother corrupted, and therein he was nothing deceiued. For true it is, that whileſt the king was as yet beyond the ſeas, in the dominion of the duke of Burgognie, the duke of Clarence began to weie with himſelfe the great inconuenience into the which as well his brother king Edward, as himſelfe and his yonger brother the duke of Gloceſter were fallen, through the diſſention betwixt them: (which had béene compaſſed and brought to paſſe by the politike working of the earle of Warwike and his complices.)

As firſt the diſheriting of them all from their rightfull title to the crowne; ſecondlie the mortall and deteſtable war that could not but inſue betwixt them, to ſuch miſchéefe, that to whether part the victorie inclined, the victor ſhould remaine in no more ſuertie of his owne perſon or eſtate after the vpper hand got, than before; and thirdlie he well perceiued alreadie, that he was had in great ſuſpicion, and not heartilie beloued of anie the lords and rulers that were aſſured partakers with king Henrie and the Lancaſtrian faction: inſomuch they ſticked not dailie to go about to breake and make void the appointments, articles, and couenants, made and promiſed to him, and of likelihood would dailie more and more intend thereto: for in truth he ſaw, that they purpoſed nothing ſo much as the deſtruction both of him and all his bloud.

All which things throughlie conſidered, with manie other as they were laid afore him by right wiſe and circumſpect perſons, which in this behalfe had conference with him, he conſented that by ſome ſecret waies and meanes a reconciliation might be had betwixt him and his brethren, the king and the duke of Gloceſter. The which to bring to ſome good and full effect, theſe honorable perſonages following became dealers therein. Firſt of all the duches of Yorke their mother, the duches of Exceſter, and the duches of Suffolke their ſiſters; the lord cardinall of Canturburie, the biſhop of Bath, the earle of Eſſex; but moſt ſpeciallie the duches of Burgognie their ſiſter alſo, and diuerſe other right wiſe and prudent perſonages, who wrought by mediation of certeine préeſts, and others, ſuch as they vſed for meſſengers betwixt them.

Préeſts vſed for priuie meſſengers.

Finallie, by the earneſt trauell and diligence ſhewed by the ſaid duches of Burgognie (who inceſſantlie ſent to and fro ſuch hir truſtie meſſengers now to the king being on that ſide the ſeas, and then to the duke remaining héere in England) at length they were made fréends, and a perfect agréement concluded and ratified, with aſſurance betwixt them ſo ſtronglie as might be. To the furthering whereof the kings chamberlaine the lord Haſtings failed not to doo his beſt, ſo as by his good diligence, it was thought the king was the ſooner induced to wiſh to ioine eftſoones in true fréendſhip with his ſaid brother of Clarence. And as it well appeared, the duke of Clarence acquitted himſelfe faithfullie therein.

K. Edward and his brother of Clarence reconciled vnwitting to the earle of Warwike.

The diſſimulation of the duke of Clarence.

For hearing now that his brother king Edward was landed and comming forward towards London, he gathered his people, outwardlie pretending to paſſe with them to the aid of the earle of Warwike againſt his brother: although inwardlie he meant the contrarie, and ſo accompanied with aboue foure thouſand men, he marched forth towards the place where he thought to find his brother. King Edward being then at Warwike, and vnderſtanding that his brother of Clarence approched, in an afternoone iſſued forth of that towne with all his forces, and paſſed on till he came into a faire large field thrée miles diſtant from Warwike towards Banburie, where he might behold his brother of Clarence in good arraie of battell, comming towards him.

When they were now within halfe a mile approched togither, the king placed his people in order of battell vnder their baners, and ſo left them ſtanding ſtill, and appointed them to kéepe their ground, whileſt he taking with him his brother of Gloceſter, the lord

Riuers, the lord Haſtings, & a few other, went forth to meet his brother of Clarence: and in like ſort the duke of Clarence tooke with him a few of the nobilitie that were about him, and leauing his armie in good order, departed from them to meet the king, and ſo they met betwixt both the hoaſts, with ſo ſweet ſalutations, louing demeanor, and good countenances, as better might not be deuiſed betwixt brethren of ſo high and noble eſtate. O what a hearts ioy was this to the people, to ſee ſuch an accord and mutuall attonement betweene theſe peeres! It was the onelie pleaſure in the world, to the which all other compared are but counterfet, and that doth the pſalmiſt teſtifie,

The brethren meet louinglie togither.

Buchan. in pſal. 133.

Nil charitate mutua fratrum, nihil
Iucundius concordia.

Beſides this, the like freendlie intertainment, and courteous demeanour appeared in the ſalutings of other noble men that were on them attendant; whereof all ſuch as ſaw it, and loued them, greatlie reioiſed; giuing God thanks for that ioifull meeting, vnitie, and concord, appearing thus manifeſtlie betwixt them: and herewith the trumpets and other inſtruments ſounded, & the king withall brought the duke vnto his armie, whom he ſaluting in moſt courteous wiſe, welcomed them into the land; and they humblie thanking him, did to him ſuch reuerence as apperteined to the honour of ſuch a worthie perſonage. This was a goodlie and a gratious reconcilement, beneficiall to the princes, profitable to the peeres, and pleaſurable to the people, whoſe part had beene deepeſt in dangers and loſſe, if diſcord had not beene diſcontinued.

This doone, the king leauing his hoaſt againe, keeping their ground with the ſame few perſons which he tooke with him before, went with his brother of Clarence vnto his armie, and ſaluting them with ſweete and courteous words, was ioifullie of them welcomed: and ſo after this, they all came togither ioining in one. And either part ſhewing themſelues glad thus to meet as freends with the other, they went louinglie togither vnto Warwike with the king, where and in the countrie thereabouts they lodged, as they thought ſtood moſt with their eaſe and ſafeties. Herewith the duke of Clarence deſired aboue all things to procure ſome good and perfect accord betwixt his brother the king, and the earle of Warwike.

In this was he the more ſtudious, bicauſe he ſaw that ſuch an accord ſhould bring great quietneſſe to the land, and deliuer the common-wealth of manie dangers that might inſue by reaſon of ſuch numbers of partakers, as well lords as other that were confederat with the earle. The ſaid duke treated with the king preſent, and ſent meſſengers vnto Couentrie to the earle, mouing as well the one as the other moſt inſtantlie to frame their minds vnto a pacification. The king at the inſtance of his brother was contented to offer large conditions, and verie beneficiall for the earle and his partakers, if they would haue accepted them.

The duke of Clarence ſeeketh to make peace betwixt the king and the earle of Warwike.

But the earle, whether vtterlie deſpairing of his owne ſafetie, if he ſhould agree to anie peace; or elſe happilie for that he thought it ſtood with his honour to ſtand vnto ſuch promiſes and couenants as he had made with the French king, and with the queene Margaret, and hir ſonne prince Edward (to whome he was bound by oth not to ſhrinke or ſwarue from the ſame) he refuſed all maner of ſuch conditions as were offered. Inſomuch that when the duke had ſent to him, both to excuſe himſelfe of the act which he had doone, and alſo to require him to take ſome good waie with king Edward, now while he might, the earle (after he had patientlie heard the dukes meſſage) he ſeemed greatlie to abhorre his vnfaithfull dealing, in turning thus from his confederats and alies, contrarie to his oth and fidelitie.

To the meſſengers (as ſome write) he gaue none other anſwer but this, that he had rather be like himſelfe, than like a falſe and periured duke; and that he was fullie determined neuer to leaue warre, till he had either loſt his owne life, or vtterlie ſubdued his enimies. As it was thought, the earle of Oxenfords perſuaſion wanted not, to make him the more ſtiffe to hold out; and rather to trie the vttermoſt hazard of warre, than to agree to acknowledge king Edward for his lawfull ſoureigne lord and king. Wherevpon no appointment nor anie agreement at all could be brought to paſſe; and ſo all that treatie, which the duke of Clarence had procured, brake off & tooke none effect. There came to the earle of Warwike, whileſt he laie thus at Couentrie (beſides the earle of Oxenford) the duke of Exceſter, and the lord marqueſſe Montacute, by whoſe comming that ſide was greatlie ſtrengthened, and the number much increaſed.

The earle of Warwiks anſwer to the duke of Clarence meſſage.

The king, vpon conſideration hereof, and perceiuing he could not get the earle to come forth of Couentrie, departed from Warwike, and eftſoones ſhewing himſelfe with his people before the citie of Couentrie, deſired the earle and his power to come forth into the fields, that they might end their quarrell by battell: which the earle and the other lords with him vtterlie refuſed as then to doo. This was the fift of Aprill being fridaie. The king herevpon was reſolued to march towards London, where his principall aduerſarie king Henrie remained, vſing his kinglie authoritie by diuerſe ſuch of the nobilitie as were about him, whereby king Edward was barred and diſappointed of manie aids and aſſiſtants, which he was ſure to haue, if he could once breake that force of the roiall authoritie, that was ſtill thus exerciſed againſt him in king Henries name.

K. Edward paſſeth London.

Wherefore (by the aduiſe of his brethren and others of his councell) accordinglie as it had beene ordeined before this his laſt ſetting forth from Warwike, he kept on his waie towards London, comming to Dantrie on the ſaturdaie at night: & on the morow being Palmeſundaie, he heard ſeruice in the church there, & after rode to Northhampton, where he was ioifullie receiued. From thenſe he tooke the next way towards London, leauing continuallie behind him (as he paſſed forth) a competent band of ſpeares and archers, to beat backe ſuch of the earle of Warwiks people, as peraduenture he might ſend abroad to trouble him and his armie by the waie. Which prouidence and foreſight he thought it not vnneceſſarie to vſe; for that he knew well enough, that the heart of an enimie, frieng in the fire of hatefull hoſtilitie, will pretermit no opportunitie either of time or place to laie in wait for his deſtruction, againſt whom he beareth an inward grudge, with a deſire of vengeance to the death.

In this meane while, that things paſſed in maner (as before ye haue hard) Edmund duke of Summerſet, & his brother Iohn marqueſſe Dorſet, Thomas Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, and others being at London, had knowledge by aduertiſements out of France, that queene Margaret with hir ſonne prince Edward, the counteſſe of Warwike, the prior of S. Iohns, the lord Wenlocke, and diuerſe others their adherents and partakers, with all that they might make, were readie at the ſea ſide, purpoſing with all ſpeed to ſaile ouer into England, and to arriue in the weſt countrie. Wherevpon they departed forth of London, and with all haſt poſſible drew weſtward, there to raiſe what forces they could, to ioine with thoſe their freends, immediatlie after they ſhould once come on land, and ſo to aſſiſt them againſt king Edward and his partakers.

True it is, that the queene with hir ſonne, and the other perſons before mentioned, tooke their ſhips, the foure and twentith daie of March, continuing on the ſeas before they could land (thorough tempeſts and contrarie winds) by the ſpace of twentie daies, that is, till the thirteenth of Aprill: on which daie, or rather on the fourteenth, they landed at Weimouth, as after ſhall appeare. But now touching king Edwards proceeding forward on his iournie toward London, ye haue to vnderſtand, that vpon the tueſdaie the ninth of Aprill he came to ſaint Albons, from whenſe he ſent comfortable aduertiſements to the queene his wife remaining within the ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter, and to others his faithfull freends in and about London, to vnderſtand by couert meanes how to deale to obteine the fauour of the citizens, ſo as he might be of them receiued.

The archbiſhop of Yorke.

The earle of Warwike, vnderſtanding all his doings and purpoſes, wrote to the Londoners, willing & charging them in anie wiſe to keepe king Edward out of their citie, and in no condition to permit him to enter: and withall he ſent to his brother the archbiſhop of Yorke, willing him by all meanes poſſible to perſuade the Londoners not to receiue him; but to defend the citie againſt him for the ſpace of two or three daies at the leaſt: promiſing not to faile but to come after him, and to be readie to aſſaile him on the backe, not doubting but wholie to diſtreſſe his power and to bring him to vtter confuſion. The archbiſhop herevpon, on the ninth of Aprill, called vnto him at Paules, all ſuch lords, knights, and gentlemen, with others that were partakers on that ſide, to the number in all of ſix or ſeauen thouſand men in armour.

King Henrie ſheweth himſelfe to the Londoners.

Herewith alſo he cauſed king Henrie to mount on horſſebacke, and to ride from Paules thorough Cheape downe to Walbroke, & ſo to fetch a compaſſe (as the cuſtome was when they made their generall proceſſions) returning backe againe to Paules vnto the biſhops palace, where at that time he was lodged. The archbiſhop ſuppoſed, that ſhewing the king thus riding thorough the ſtreets, he ſhould haue allured the citizens to aſſiſt his part. True it is, the maior & aldermen had cauſed the gates to be kept with watch and ward: but now they well perceiued that king Henries power was too weake, as by that ſhew it had well appeared, to make full reſiſtance againſt king Edward, and ſo not for them to truſt vnto, if king Edward came forward, and ſhould attempt to enter the citie by force: for it was not vnknowne vnto them, that manie of the worſhipfull citizens, and others of the commons in great numbers, were fullie bent to aid king Edward, in all that they might, as occaſion ſerued.

The Londoners reſolue to receiue king Edward.

The archbiſhop of Yorke.

Thus, what thorough loue that manie bare to king Edward, and what thorough feare that diuerſe ſtood in, leaſt the citie being taken by force might happilie haue beene put to the ſacke, with the loſſe of manie an innocent mans life; the maior, aldermen, and others the worſhipfull of the citie fell at a point among themſelues, to keepe the citie to K. Edwards vſe, ſo as he might haue free paſſage and entrie into the ſame at his pleaſure. The archbiſhop of Yorke, perceiuing the affections of the people, and how the moſt part of them were now bent in fauour of king Edward vpon the ſaid kings approch towards the citie, he ſent foorth ſecretlie a meſſenger to him, beſeeching him to receiue him againe into his fauour, promiſing to be faithfull to him in time to come, and to acquit this good turne hereafter with ſome ſingular benefit and pleaſure.

The Tower recouered to king Edwards vſe.

K. Edward entereth into London.

King Henrie is deliuered to him.

The king, vpon good cauſes and conſiderations therevnto him mouing, was contented to receiue him againe into his fauour. The archbiſhop hereof aſſured, reioiſed greatlie, well & trulie acquiting him concerning his promiſe made to the king in that behalfe. The ſame night following was the Tower of London recouered to king Edwards vſe. And on the morow being thurſdaie, and the eleuenth of Aprill, king Edward quietlie made his entrie into the citie with his power, hauing fiue hundred ſmokie gunners marching foremoſt, being ſtrangers, of ſuch as he had brought ouer with him. He firſt rode vnto Paules church, & from thenſe he went to the biſhops palace, where the archbiſhop of Yorke preſented himſelfe vnto him, and hauing king Henrie by the hand, deliuered him vnto king Edward, who being ſeized of his perſon, and diuerſe other his aduerſaries, he went from Paules to Weſtminſter, where he made his deuout praiers, giuing God moſt heartie thanks for his ſafe returne thither againe.

This doone, he went to the queene to comfort hir, who with great patience had abidden there a long time, as a ſanctuarie woman, for doubt of hir enimies; and in the meane ſeaſon was deliuered of a yoong prince, whome ſhe now preſented vnto him, to his great hearts reioiſing & comfort. From Weſtminſter the king returned that night vnto London againe, hauing the queene with him, and lodged in the houſe of the ducheſſe his moother. On the morow being good fridaie, he tooke aduiſe with the lords of his bloud, and other of his councell, for ſuch buſineſſe as he had in hand; namelie, how to ſubdue his enimies as ſought his deſtruction. Thus with conſultation preuenting his actions, he obteined fortunate ſucceſſe, wherwith his hart was the more aduanced to ioine iſſue with his aduerſaries, whome (rather than they ſhould triumph ouer him) he was reſolutelie minded to vanquiſh, if his proceedings might proue proſperous as his preſent good lucke.

The earle of Warwike followeth the king.

The earle of Warwike, calling himſelfe lieutenant of England, vnder the pretenſed authoritie of king Henrie, hoping that king Edward ſhould haue much a doo to enter into London, marched foorth from Couentrie with all his puiſſance, following the king by Northhampton, in hope to haue ſome great aduantage to aſſaile him, ſpeciallie if the Londoners kept him out of their citie, as he truſted they would; for then he accounted himſelfe ſure of the vpper hand: or if he were of them receiued, yet he hoped to find him vnprouided in celebrating the feaſt of Eaſter; and ſo by ſetting vpon him on the ſudden, he doubted not by that meanes to diſtreſſe him. But king Edward, hauing intelligence of the earles intention, prouided all things neceſſarie for battell; & hearing that the earle of Warwike was now come vnto S. Albons with his armie, he determined to march foorth to incounter him before he ſhould approch neere the citie.

Edw. Hall.

The earle of Warwike, accompanied with John duke of Exceter, Edmund duke of Summerſet, John earle of Oxford, and John Neuill marqueſſe Montacute his brother, vnderſtanding that king Edward was not onelie receiued into London, but alſo had got king Henrie into his hands, perceiued that the triall of the matter muſt needs be committed to the hazard of battell; and therefore being come to the towne of ſaint Albons, he reſted there a while, partlie to refreſh his ſouldiers, and partlie to take counſell how to proceed in his enterpriſe. At length, although he knew that his brother the marqueſſe Montacute was not fullie well perſuaded with himſelfe, to like of this quarell which they had in hand; yet the brotherlie affection betwixt them tooke awaie all ſuſpicion from the earle, and ſo he vtterlie reſolued to giue battell, meaning to trie whereto all this tumult would grow; and counting it a blemiſh to his honor, not to proſequute that with the ſword, which he had ſolemnelie vowed to doo on his word.]

Gladmore heath.

Hervpon remoued they towards Barnet, a towne ſtanding in the midwaie betwixt London and ſaint Albons aloft on a hill; at the end whereof towards ſaint Albons there is a faire plaine for two armies to meet vpon, named Gladmore heath. On the further ſide of which plaine towards ſaint Albons the earle pight his campe. King Edward on the other part, being furniſhed with a mightie armie (hauing ioined to that power which he brought with him certeine new ſupplies) vpon Eaſter euen the thirteenth of Aprill in the after noone marched forth, hauing his ſaid armie diuided into foure battels. He tooke with him king Henrie, and came that euening vnto Barnet, ten ſmall miles diſtant from London; in which towne his forериders finding certeine of the earle of Warwikes forериders, beat them out, & chaſed them ſomewhat further than halfe a mile from the towne, where, by an hedge ſide they found readie aſſembled a great number of the earle of Warwiks people.

The ordering of the kings armie.

K. Edward lodged before his enimies.

The king after this comming to Barnet, would not ſuffer a man to remaine in the towne (that were of his hoſt) but commanded them all to the field, and with them drew toward his enimies, and lodged with his armie more neere to them than he was aware of, by reaſon it was darke, ſo as he could not well diſcerne where they were incamped, fortifieng the field the beſt he could for feare of ſome ſudden inuaſion. He tooke his ground not ſo euen afore them as he would haue doone, if he might haue diſcouered the place where they had lien; and by reaſon thereof he incamped ſomewhat aſide ſlips of them, cauſing his people to keepe as much ſilence as was poſſible, [leaſt making anie noiſe with the buſſeling of their armour and weapons or otherwiſe with their tongs, the enimie might haue come to ſome knowledge of the kings priuie purpoſe, and ſo by preuention haue diſappointed his policie by ſome prouident deuiſe; which bicauſe they wanted for the preſent time, it turned to their diſaduantage; after the old prouerbe:

Neſcit prodeſſe qui neſcit prouidus eſſe.]

Artillerie.

A good policie.

They had great artillerie on both parts, but the earle was better furniſhed therewith than the king, and therefore in the night time they ſhot off from his campe in maner continuallie; but dooing little hurt to the kings people, ſtill ouerſhooting them, by reaſon they laie much neerer than the earle or anie of his men did eſteeme. And ſuch ſilence was kept in the kings campe, that no noiſe bewraied them where they laie. For to the end it ſhould not be knowne to the enimies, how neere the king with his armie was lodged vnto them, the king would not ſuffer anie of his gunnes in all that night to be ſhot off, leaſt thereby they might haue geſſed the ground, and ſo leuelled their artillerie to his annoiance.

Edw. Hall.

The order of the battell of both ſides.

Earlie on the next morning betwixt foure and fiue of the clocke, notwithſtanding there was a great miſt that letted the ſight of both parts to diſcouer the fields, the king aduanced his banners, and cauſed his trumpets to ſound to the battell. On the other part, the earle of Warwike, at the verie breake of the daie, had likewiſe ſet his men in order of battell in this maner. In the right wing he placed the marqueſſe Montacute, and the earle of Oxford with certeine horſſemen, and he with the duke of Exceſter tooke the left wing. And in the middeſt betweene both, he ſet archers, appointing the duke of Summerſet to guide them as their chiefteine. King Edward had ſet the duke of Glouceſter in the fore-ward. The middle-ward he himſelfe with the duke of Clarence, hauing with them king Henrie, did rule & gouerne. The lord Haſtings led the rere-ward, and beſide theſe three battels, he kept a companie of freſh men in ſtore, which did him great pleaſure before the end of the battell.

Here is to be remembred, that aſwell the king on his part, as the earle of Warwike on his, vſed manie comfortable words to incourage their people, not forgetting to ſet forth their quarels as iuſt and lawfull; the king naming his aduerſaries traitors and rebels, & the earle accounting him a tyrant, & an iniurious vſurper. But when the time came that they once got ſight either of other, the battell began verie ſharpe and cruell, firſt with ſhot, and after by ioining at hand blowes. Yet at the firſt they ioined not front to front, as they ſhould haue doone, by reaſon of the miſt that tooke awaie the ſight of either armie, and ſuffered the one not to diſcerne perfectlie the order of the other; inſomuch that the one end of the earle of Warwikes armie ouerraught the contrarie end of the kings battell which ſtood weſtward, and by reaſon thereof (through the valiancie of the earle of Oxford that led the earles voward) the kings people on that part were ouermatched, ſo that manie of them fled towards Barnet, and ſo to London, bringing newes that the erle of Warwike had woone the field.

The valiancie of the earle of Oxford.

Abr. Fl. ex I. S. pag. 727.

[Which report happilie might haue beene iuſtified and fallen out to be true, had not prepoſterous fortune happened to the earle of Oxford and his men, who had a ſtarre with ſtreames on their liueries; as king Edwards men had the ſunne with ſtreames on their liueries: wherevpon the earle of Warwiks men, by reaſon of the miſt not well diſcerning the badges ſo like, ſhot at the earle of Oxfords men that were on their owne part, and then the earle of Oxford and his men cried treaſon, and fled with eight hundred men.]

The martiall courage of the earle of Warwike.

But touching the kings people which were purſued in the chaſe as they fled, and were put to the worſt, manie were wounded, and manie ſlaine outright. But the reſidue of thoſe that fought in other parts could not perceiue this diſtreſſe of the kings people, bicauſe the thicke miſt would not ſuffer them to ſee anie ſpace farre off, but onelie at hand: and ſo the kings battell that ſaw not anie thing what was doone beſide them, was nothing diſcouraged. For (a few excepted that ſtood next to that part) there was not anie one that wiſt of that diſcomfiture; and the other of the earle of Warwikes men, that fought in other places ſomewhat diſtant from them, were nothing the more incouraged by this proſperous ſucceſſe of their fellowes, for they perceiued it not. And in like caſe as at the weſt end the earles battell ouerreached the kings, ſo at the eaſt end the kings ouerreached the earls, and with like ſucceſſe put the earls people in that place to the worſe.

At length after ſore fight, and greater ſlaughter made on both ſides, king Edward hauing the greater number of men (as ſome write, though other affirme the contrarie) began ſomewhat to preuaile: but the earle on the other ſide remembring his ancient fame and renowme, manfullie ſtucke to it, and incouraged his people, ſtill ſupplieng with new ſuccors in places where he ſaw expedient, and ſo the fight renewed more cruell, fierce, & bloudie than before, inſomuch that the victorie remained ſtill doubtfull, though they had fought from morning till it was now far in the daie. K. Edward therefore willing to make an end of ſo long a conflict, cauſed new power of freſh men (which he had for this purpoſe kept in ſtore) to ſet on his enimies.

The earle of Warwike was nothing abaſhed herewith, but vnderſtanding that this was all the reſidue of king Edwards power, comforted his men to beare out this laſt brunt, and in ſo dooing the victorie was ſure on their ſide, and the battell at an end: but king Edward ſo manfullie and valiantlie aſſailed his aduerſaries, in the middle and ſtrongeſt part of their battell, that with great violence he bare downe all that ſtood in his waie; for he was followed and aſſiſted by a number of moſt hardie and faithfull men of warre, that ſhewed notable proofe of tried manhood in that inſtant neceſſitie. The earle of Warwike (when his ſouldiers all wearied with long fight, and ſore weakened with woundes and hurts receiued in the battell) gaue little heed to his words (being a man of an inuincible ſtomach) ruſhed into the middeſt of his enimies, whereas he (aduenturing ſo farre from his companie, to kill and ſlea his aduerſaries, that he could not be reſcued) was amongſt the preaſſe of his enimies ſtriken downe and ſlaine.

The earle of Warwike ſlaine.

The marqueſſe Montacute ſlaine. Abr. Flem.

The marqueſſe Montacute, thinking to ſuccour his brother, was likewiſe ouerthrowne and ſlaine, with manie other of good calling, as knights and eſquiers, beſide other gentlemen. [But ſome ſaie that the ſaid marqueſſe, hauing agreed priuilie with king Edward, did weare his liuerie, whome one of his brother the earle of Warwiks men eſpieng, fell vpon him and killed him outright.] Some write that this battell was ſo driuen to the vttermoſt point, that king Edward was conſtreined to fight in his owne perſon, and that the earle of Warwike, which was wont euer to ride on horſebacke from place to place, and from ranke to ranke, comforting his men, was now aduiſed by the marqueſſe his brother, to leaue his horſſe, and to trie the extremitie by hand ſtrokes, [which may be probable & likelie. But by the report of ſome it ſeemeth that he was not ſlaine in the heat of the conflict, among the rout of the fighting men, but afterwards in this ſort. For when he ſaw the kings power preuaile and his owne ſore impaired and paſt hope of good ſpeed, with the ſlaughter of his adherents (gentlemen of name) and himſelfe in the verie mouth of the enimie in poſſibilitie to be deuoured, he lept vpon a horſſe to flie, and comming into a wood where was no paſſage, one of king Edwards men came to him, killed him, and ſpoiled him to the naked ſkin. Sir William Tirrell knight was killed on the earle of Warwikes part.]

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag.727.

The number ſlaine at Barnet field.

On both parties were ſlaine (as Ed. Hall ſaith) ten thouſand at the leaſt, where Fabian ſaith but fifteene hundred and ſomewhat aboue. Other write that there died in all about three thouſand. Vpon the kings part were ſlaine, the lord Crumwell, the lord Saie, the lord Montiois ſonne and heire, ſir Humfrie Bourchier ſonne to the lord Berners, and diuerſe other knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen. The battell indured the ſpace of three hours verie doubtfull by reaſon of the miſt, and in ſkirmiſhing and fighting, now in this place, now in that, but finallie the victorie fell on the kings ſide; and yet it could not be eſteemed that his whole armie paſſed nine thouſand fighting men (as ſome write) where his aduerſaries (as by the ſame writers appeareth) were farre aboue that number. But bicauſe thoſe that ſo write, ſeeme altogither to fauor king Edward, we maie beleeue as we liſt.

The duke of Summerſet and the earle of Oxford. Hall.

The duke of Exceſter.

Abr. Flem.

The duke of Summerſet, and the earle of Oxford fled in companie of certeine northerne men, which had beene at the battell; and (as ſome write) the earle of Oxford kept forth with them, and retired after into Scotland. But yet as well the duke of Summerſet, as the ſaid earle of Oxford, in fleeing toward Scotland, changed their purpoſe vpon the waie, and turned into Wales to Iaſper earle of Penbroke. The duke of Exceſter being ſtriken downe and ſore wounded, was left for dead in the field, amongſt other the dead bodies, bicauſe he was not knowne, and by reaſon thereof comming to himſelfe, got vp, and in great danger eſcaped vnto Weſtminſter, and there tooke ſanctuarie. [But ſome ſay, that after hee had lien in the field, ſpoiled, wounded, and (to ſee to) void of life, from ſeuen of the clocke in the morning, till foure at after noone, he was caried to a ſeruants houſe of his there by (named Ruthland) where (after his wounds were ſearched and dreſſed by a ſurgian) he was conueied into Weſtminſter ſanctuarie.]

Edw. Hall.

King Edward hauing got this victorie, refreſhing himſelfe and his people a while at Barnet, returned the ſame daie vnto London, like a triumphant conqueror, leading with him king Henrie as a captiue priſoner: & ſo making a ſolemne entrie at the church of ſaint Paule, offred his ſtandard. The dead bodies of the earle and marques were brought to London in a coffin, & before they were buried, by the ſpace of three daies laie open viſaged in the cathedrall church of S. Paule, to the intent that all men might eaſilie perceiue, that they vnfeinedlie were dead. The common brute ran, that the king was not ſo ioious of the erles death, as ſorowfull for the loſſe of the marques, whom he full well knew (and no leſſe was euident to other) to be his faithfull friend and well-willer; for whoſe onelie ſake, he cauſed both their bodies to be buried with their anceſtors in the priorie of Biſſam.

Queene Margaret landeth with a power out of France

On the tueſdaie in Eaſter weeke came knowledge to king Edward, that queene Margaret the wife of king Henrie, with hir ſonne prince Edward was landed vpon Eaſter day at Weimouth in Dorſetſhire, accompanied with Iohn Longſtrother prior of ſaint Iohns, commonlie called lord treaſuror of England, who went ouer into France to fetch them: alſo the lord Wenlocke, a man made onelie by king Edward, beſide diuerſe other knights and eſquiers, of whome part had beene long forth of the realme, and part newlie gone ouer thither to them, in companie of the lord treaſuror. They tooke their ſhips at Hunflue, the foure and twentith of March (as before you haue heard) but through contrarie winds and tempeſts, they were driuen backe, and conſtreined to abide for conuenient wind.

Now, although it came ſometimes about fit for their purpoſe, yet it continued not long in that end; ſo as if therevpon they tooke the ſea at anie time, they were forced to returne backe againe to land yer they could paſſe halfe the way ouer. And thus being diuerſe times vnder ſaile, in hope to paſſe the ſeas hither into England, they were ſtill driuen backe againe, till the thirteenth of Aprill being Eaſter euen; on which day the wind comming fauorablie about, they tooke the ſeas, and ſailed forward towards this land. The counteſſe of Warwike, hauing a ſhip of aduantage, arriued before the other at Porteſmouth, and from thence ſhe went to Southhampton, meaning to haue gone to Weimouth, where ſhe vnderſtood that the queene was landed: but here had ſhee knowledge of the loſſe of Barnet field, and that hir huſband was there ſlaine. Wherevpon ſhe went no further towards the queene, but ſecretlie got hir ouer the water into the new forreſt, and tooke ſanctuarie within the abbeie of Beaulieu.

The counteſſe of Warwike taketh ſanctuarie.

The duke of Summerſet, and the earle of Deuonſhire cõfort queene Margaret.

Queene Margaret, and hir ſonne prince Edward, with the other that landed at Weimouth, went from thence to an abbeie neere by called Cerne. Thither came vnto them Edmund duke of Summerſet, and Thomas Courtneie earle of Deuonſhire, with others, and welcommed them into England, comforting the queene in the beſt maner they could, and willed hir not to deſpaire of good ſucceſſe; for albeit they had loſt one field (whereof the queene had knowledge the ſame day being mondaie in eaſter weeke, the fifteenth of Aprill, and was therefore right ſorowfull) yet they doubted not but to aſſemble ſuch a puiſſance (and that verie ſhortlie) forth of diuerſe parts of the realme, as being faithfull, and wholie bent to ſpend their liues, and ſhed the beſt bloud in their bodies for hir ſake, & hir ſonnes, it ſhould be hard for king Edward to reſiſt them with all the power he had or could make.

The preſence of theſe noble men greatlie comforted hir, and relieued hir of the ſorrowes that in maner ouerwhelmed hir penſiue heart: for ſhe doubted ſore the end of all theſe procéedings, the which they concluded to follow vpon the aduancement of hir and hirs. Speciallie it miſgaue hir, that ſome euill ſhould chance to hir ſonne prince Edward, for ſhée greatlie weied not of hir owne perill (as ſhe hir ſelfe confeſſed) and therefore ſhe would gladlie haue had them either to haue deferred the battell till a more conuenient time: or elſe that hir ſonne might haue béene conueied ouer into France againe, there to haue remained in ſafetie, till the chance of the next battell were tried: but they being of a contrarie mind, and namelie the duke of Summerſet, ſhe at length conſented vnto that which they were reſolued vpon.

The feare which quéene Margaret had for hir ſonne.

Thus euerie man being bent to battell, gathered his power by himſelfe, firſt in Summerſetſhire, Dorſetſhire, and part of Wiltſhire, and after in Deuonſhire and Cornewall. For the better incouraging of which countries to ioine with them in their quarrell, they repaired to Exceſter. Here they ſent for ſir Iohn Arundell, and ſir Hugh Courtenie, and manie other in whom they had anie confidence. To be ſhort, they wrought ſo, that they raiſed the whole powers of Cornewall and Deuonſhire, and with a great armie departing forth of Exceſter, they tooke the right waie to Glaſtenburie, and from thence to Bath, raiſing the people in all parts where they came: for thoſe countries had bene ſo laboured, firſt by the earle of Warwike, and after by the duke of Summerſet, and the earle of Deuonſhire (which two noble men were reckoned as old inheritors of the ſame countries) that the people ſéemed there greatlie inclined to the fauor of king Henrie.

King Edward, being at London, was dailie aduertiſed by faithfull eſpials of all the doings of his aduerſaries, and was in no ſmall agonie, bicauſe he could not learne what waie his enimies ment to take; for he purpoſed to incounter them in one place or other, before they ſhould approch néere to London. And vpon ſuch reſolution, with ſuch an armie as he had got about London, furniſhed with all artillerie and other prouiſions neceſſarie, he ſet forward the nintéenth of Aprill, and came to Windſore, where he ſtaied a ſeaſon, as well to celebrate the feaſt of ſaint George, as to abide the comming of ſuch bands as he had appointed to repaire thither vnto him, making there his generall aſſemblie.

K. Edward ſetteth forward againſt his enimies.

The enimies to maſker him the more, ſent forth their foreriders vnto ſundrie townes, both aſwell to raiſe people in the countries about, as to make the king beléeue that their purpoſe was to paſſe thoſe waies, where they ment not once to come. And herevpon when they departed from Exceſter, they ſent firſt their foreriders ſtreight to Shafteſburie, and after to Saliſburie, and then they tooke the ſtreight waie to Taunton, Glaſtenburie, and after to Wels, where houering about in the countrie, they ſent another time their foreriders to a towne called Yuell, and to Bruton, as if their meaning had béene to draw towards Reading, and ſo through Barkeſhire, and Oxfordſhire to haue marched ſtreight to London, or elſe to haue ſet vpon the king at ſome aduantage, if it were offered.

But king Edward, conſidering aduiſedlie of the matter, perceiued well that they being in an angle of the realme, if they ment to go to London, they muſt either hold the ſtreight waie forth by Saliſburie, or elſe drawing vp to the ſea ſide, paſſe alongſt through Hampſhire, Suſſex and Kent; or happilie if they miſtruſted their owne ſtrengths, as not able to match with his puiſſance, they would then ſlip on the left hand, and draw towards Cheſhire, and Lancaſhire, there to increaſe their forces, and peraduenture by the waie to ioine with a power of Welſhmen, vnder the leading of Iaſper earle of Penbroke, who had béene ſent into Wales long afore, to frame and put in a readines the people there to aſſiſt king Henries friends at their comming thitherwards. And ſuch was there purpoſe in déed, for they had great confidence in ſuch aid, as they truſted to haue of the Cheſhire and Lancaſhire men.

King Edward, meaning to approch néerer vnto them, that he might the ſooner make waie to ſtop them of their paſſage, on which hand ſoeuer they drew, departed from Windeſore the morrow after ſaint Georges day, being the foure and twentith day of Aprill, kéeping forth his iournie, till on ſaturdaie the twentie and ſeuenth of Aprill he came to Abington, where he laie ſundaie all daie. On mondaie he marched forward to Chicheſter, where he had ſure aduertiſement, that they intended to be at Bath the next daie being tueſdaie, and on wedneſdaie to come forward to giue him battell. Wherevpon king Edward, deſirous to ſée his people in order of battell, drew them forth of the towne, and incamped in the field thrée miles diſtant from thence, ſtill buſieng himſelfe about his neceſſarie affaires, affording no time to idleneſſe or loitering: for he knew that there was no waie more expedite and readie to tire him in trauell, than to be giuen to negligence and ſlouth, the two weariers of well dooing, as the old ſaieng is:

Deſidia preſſus erit in ſtudio cito feſſus.

On the morrow, hearing no certeintie of their comming forward, he marched to Malmeſburie, ſtill ſéeking to incounter them: but héere he had knowledge, that they hauing changed their purpoſe, meant not to giue him battell; and therefore were turned aſide, and gone to Briſtow, where they were receiued, reléeued, and well refreſhed by ſuch as fauoured their cauſe, as well with vittels, men, and monie, as good ſtore of artillerie. Wherevpon they were ſo incouraged, that the thurſdaie after they tooke the field againe, purpoſing to giue king Edward battell indéed; and for the ſame intent had ſent their foreriders to a towne, diſtant from Briſtow nine miles, called Sudburie, appointing a ground for their field, a mile from the ſame towne, toward the kings campe, called Sudburie hill.

Sudburie hill.

The king héereof aduertiſed, the ſame thurſdaie, being the firſt of Maie, with his armie faire ranged in order of battell, came towards the place by them appointed for their field: but they came not there. For hearing that king Edward did thus approach, vpon a new change of reſolution, they left that waie: albeit ſome of their herbingers were come as farre as Sudburie towne, and there ſurpriſed fiue or ſix of the kings partie, which were raſhlie entred that towne, attending onelie to prouide lodgings for their maiſters. The lords thus hauing eftſoones changed their purpoſe, not meaning as yet to fight with the king, directed their waie ſtreight towards Berkelie, trauelling all that night. From Berkelie they marched forward towards Gloceſter.

The king in the meane time, on the thurſdaie in the after noone, came to the ſame ground called Sudburie hill, and there ſtaied a certeine ſpace, ſending forth ſcowriers, to hearken what they might vnderſtand of the enimies, whome he tooke to be ſomewhere at hand. But when he could not heare anie certeintie of them, he aduanced forward, lodging his vant-gard in a vallie beyond the hill, towards the towne of Sudburie, and laie himſelfe (with the reſidue of his people) at the ſame place, called Sudburie hill. About thrée of the clocke after midnight, he was aduertiſed, that his enimies had taken their waie by Berkeleie, towards Gloceſter. Héerevpon, taking aduiſe of his councell what was beſt to doo, he was counſelled to ſend ſome of his ſeruants with all ſpéed vnto Gloceſter, to Richard Beauchampe, ſonne and heire to the lord Beauchampe of Powike, to whome he had (before this preſent) committed the rule and cuſtodie of the towne and caſtell of Gloceſter.

The king ſent therefore with all ſpéed vnto him, commanding him to doo his beſt to defend the towne and caſtell againſt his enimies, if they came to aſſaile the ſame, as it was ſuppoſed they intended: and if they ſo did, he promiſed to come with his whole armie preſentlie to the reſcue. The meſſengers did their diligence, and ſo being ioifullie receiued into Gloceſter, the towne and caſtell, by the vigilant regard of the ſaid Richard Beauchampe, was put in ſafe kéeping. And this meſſage was doone in good time, for true it is, there were diuerſe in the towne, that could haue béene well contented that the quéene, and the lords with hir, ſhould haue béene receiued there, and would haue aduentured to haue brought it to paſſe, if they had not béene thus preuented.

Againe, the quéene and the lords with hir had good intelligence, with diuerſe in the towne, ſo as they were put in great hope to haue entred the ſame: wherevpon they trauelled their people right ſore all that night and morning, comming before the towne of Gloceſter vpon the fridaie about ten of the clocke. And when they perceiued that they were diſappointed of their purpoſe, and their entrie flatlie denied, they were highlie therewith diſpleaſed; for they knew verie well, that diuerſe within the towne bare their good willes towards them: but after they had vſed certeine menacing braueries, and made a ſhew as if they had meant to aſſalt the gates and walles, & ſo to haue entred by force, they departed their waies, marching with all ſpéed poſſible towards Teukeſburie.

Gloceſter, whie it was not aſſaulted.

It might be maruelled at, whie they attempted not the winning of Gloceſter indéed, conſidering the fréends which they knew they had within it. But the cauſe which mooued them chéeflie to forbeare, was, for that as well they without, as the other within the towne, knew that king Edward approached at hand, and was readie to ſet vpon them on the backes, if they had once begun to haue aſſaulted the towne; and ſo, neither they within the towne that were the kings fréends doubted the enimies forces, nor the enimie indéed durſt attempt anie ſuch enterpriſe againſt them. About foure of the clocke in the afternoone, they came to Teukeſburie, hauing trauelled that night laſt paſt, and that daie, ſix and thirtie long miles, in a foule countrie, all in lanes and ſtonie waies, betwixt woods, without anie good refreſhing, ſo that as well the men as the horſſes were right wearie.

A long march.

And where the more part of their armie conſiſted of footmen, the capteins could not haue gone anie further, except they would haue left their footmen behind them, and ſo of neceſſitie they were driuen to ſtaie there, determining to abide the aduenture that God would ſend them. For well they knew that the king followed them verie néere at hand, ſo as if they ſhould haue gone further, and left the moſt part of their companie behind, as it could not otherwiſe haue chanced, he would haue béene readie to haue taken the aduantage wholie, ſo to diſtreſſe them. Héerevpon they pight their field in a cloſe, euen hard at the townes end, hauing the towne and the abbeie at their backes; and directlie before them, and vpon each ſide of them, they were defended with cumberſome lanes, déepe ditches, and manie hedges, beſide hils and dales, ſo as the place ſéemed as noiſome as might be to approach vnto.

The place where yͤ lords incamped.

The king on this fridaie, verie erlie in the morning, aduanced his ſtandards, and in good order of battell hauing diuided his armie into thrée wards, marched through the plaines of Cotteſwold. The daie was verie hot, and hauing in his armie aboue thrée thouſand footmen, he trauelled with them and the reſidue thirtie miles and more. By all which waie, they could find neither horſſemeat, nor mans meat, no not ſo much as water for their horſſes, except one little brooke, of the which they receiued no great reléefe; for what with the horſſes and carriages that paſſed thorough it, the water became ſo troubled, that it ſerued them to no vſe: and ſtill all that daie king Edward with his armie was within fiue or ſix miles of his enimies, he in the plaine countrie, and they among the woods.

The painfull march of king Edward with his armie.

King Edward had euer good eſpials, to aduertiſe him ſtill what his enimies did, and which waie they tooke. At length he came with all his armie vnto a village called Chiltenham, like a fiue miles diſtant from Teukeſburie, where he had certeine knowledge that his enimies were alreadie come to Teukeſburie, and were incamped there, purpoſing to abide him in that place, and to deliuer him battell. King Edward therevpon made no long delaie, but tooke a little refection himſelfe, and cauſed his people to doo the like, with ſuch prouiſion of vittels as he had appointed to be conueied foorth with him for the reléefe of himſelfe and his armie. This doone, he ſet forward towards his enimies, and lodged that night in a field not paſt thrée miles diſtant from them.

Chiltenham.

On the morrow being ſaturdaie, and fourth of Maie, he drew towards his enimies, and marſhalled his armie, diuided into thrée battels in this ſort. He put his brother the duke of Gloceſter in the foreward, and himſelfe in the midle-ward. The lord Marques, and the lord Haſtings led the rere-ward. Héerewith he approached the enimies campe, which was right hard to be aſſailed, by reaſon of the déepe ditches, hedges, trées, buſhes, and cumberſome lanes, wherewith the ſame was fenſed, both a front, and on the ſides, ſo as the king could not well approach them to anie aduantage: and to be the better in a readineſſe to beat backe the kings power, when he ſhould come to aſſault them, they were imbattelled in this order.

The ordering of king Edwards battell.

The duke of Summerſet, and his brother the lord Iohn of Summerſet led the fore-ward. The midleward was gouerned by the prince, vnder the conduct of the lord of ſaint Iohn, and the lord Wenlocke (whome king Edward had aduanced to the degrée of a baron.) The rere-ward was appointed to the rule of the earle of Deuonſhire. Thus may yée perceiue, that king Edward was put to his ſhifts, how (to anie aduantage) to aſſault his enimies. Neuertheleſſe, he being well furniſhed with great artillerie, the ſame was aptlie lodged to annoie the enimies, that they receiued great damage thereby; and the duke of Gloceſter, who lacked no policie, galled them gréeuouſlie with the ſhot of arrowes: and they rewarded their aduerſaries home againe with like paiment, both with ſhot of arrowes, and great artillerie, although they had not the like plentie of guns as the king had. The paſſages were ſo cumberſome, that it was not poſſible to come vpon anie euen hand, to ioine at handblowes.

The duke of Gloceſter.

Teukeſburie field.

The duke of Gloceſter, vpon a politike purpoſe (as ſome haue written) reculed backe with all his companie, which when the duke of Summerſet perceiued, either mooued therewith; or elſe bicauſe he was too ſore annoied with the ſhot in that place where he and his fore-ward ſtood, like a knight more couragious than circumſpect, came out of his ſtrength with his whole battell, and aduanced himſelfe ſomewhat aſide ſlips the kings voward, and by certeine paſſages aforehand, and for that purpoſe prouided (to the kings part, although vnknowne) he paſſed a lane, and came into a faire open cloſe right before the king, where he was imbattelled, not doubting but the prince and the lord Wenlocke, with the midle-ward, had followed iuſt at his backe. But whether the lord Wenlocke diſſembled the matter for king Edwards ſake, or whether his hart ſerued him not, ſtill he ſtood, and gaue the looking on.

Edw. Hall.

The king, or (as other haue) the duke of Gloceſter, taking the aduantage that he aduentured for, turned againe face to face vnto the duke of Summerſet his battell, and winning the hedge and ditch of him, entred the cloſe, and with great violence put him and his people vp towards the hill from whence they were deſcended. Heere is to be noted, that when the king was come before his enimies, yer he gaue the onſet, he perceiued that vpon the right hand of their campe there was a parke, and much ſtore of wood growing therein; and doubting leaſt his aduerſaries had laid an ambuſh within that wood, he choſe foorth of his companies two hundred ſpeares, commanding them to keepe a ſtale, like a quarter of a mile from the field, to attend vpon that corner of the wood out of the which the ambuſh, if anie were, was to iſſue, and to incounter with them, as occaſion ſerued: but if they perceiued that there was no ambuſh at all, then to imploie their ſeruice as they ſhould ſee it expedient and behouefull for the time.

The politike foreſight of the king.

This politike prouiſion for danger that might haue inſued (although there was none that waie foorth) ſerued yet before the end of the battell, to great good purpoſe. For when thoſe ſpeares perfectlie vnderſtood that there was no ambuſh within the wood, and withall ſaw conuenient time to imploie themſelues, they came and brake with full rendon vpon the duke of Summerſet and his voward a flanke, in ſo violent wiſe vpon the ſudden, that where they had before inough to doo with thoſe with whom they were firſt matched, now with this new charge giuen on them by thoſe two hundred ſpeares, they were not a little diſmaied; and to conclude, ſo diſcouraged, that ſtreightwaie they tooke them to flight. Some fled into the parke, other into the meadow there at hand, ſome into the lanes, & ſome hid them in ditches, each one making what ſhift he could, by the which he hoped beſt to eſcape: but manie neuertheleſſe were beaten downe, ſlaine, and taken priſoners.

The vãtgard of the lords diſtreſſed.

A terrible ſtroke.

The duke of Summerſet ſeeing this vnfortunate chance, as ſome write, turned to the midle-ward, and there finding the lord Wenlocke ſtanding ſtill, after he had reuiled him, and called him traitor, with his ax he ſtroke the braines out of his head. The duke of Gloceſter purſuing after them that fled with the duke of Summerſet to their campe, where the reſt of their armie ſtood, entred the trench, and after him the king, where he bare himſelfe ſo knightlie, that therevpon the queenes part went to wracke, and was put to flight; the king and other falling in chaſe after them, ſo that manie were ſlaine, but eſpeciallie at a mill in the meadow faſt by the towne a great ſort were drowned. Manie ran towards the towne, ſome to the church, and diuerſe to the abbeie, and other to other places, where they thought beſt to ſaue themſelues. [This was the laſt fought field or pight battell tried betweene the potentats of this land in king Edward the fourths daies (which chanced on the fourth of Maie, being ſaturdaie, in the eleauenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord, 1471) as Anglorum prælia affirmeth, ſaieng:

Abr. Flem.

Edw. Hall.
Prince Edward taken.

In the winning of the campe, ſuch as ſtood to it were ſlaine out of hand Prince Edward was taken as he fled towards the towne, by ſir Richard Crofts, and kept cloſe. In the field and chaſe were ſlaine, the lord Iohn of Summerſet, called marqueſſe Dorſet, Thomas Courtenie earle of Deuonſhire, ſir Iohn Delues, ſir Edward Hampden, ſir Robert Whitingham, and ſir Iohn Leukener, with three thouſand others. After the field was ended, proclamation was made, that whoſoeuer could bring foorth prince Edward aliue or dead, ſhould haue an annuitie of a hundred pounds during his life, and the princes life to be ſaued, if he were brought foorth aliue. Sir Richard Crofts, nothing miſtruſting the kings promiſe, brought foorth his priſoner prince Edward, being a faire and well proportioned yoong gentleman; whom when king Edward had well aduiſed, he demanded of him, how he durſt ſo preſumptuouſlie enter into his realme with banner diſplaied.

Nobles ſlain

Sir Richard Crofts deliuereth the prince in hop that his life ſhould haue beene ſaued.

Wherevnto the prince boldlie anſwered, ſaieng; To recouer my fathers kingdome & heritage, from his father and grandfather to him, and from him after him to me lineallie deſcended. At which words king Edward ſaid nothing, but with his hand thruſt him from him, or (as ſome ſaie) ſtroke him with his gantlet; whom incontinentlie, George duke of Clarence, Richard duke of Gloceſter, Thomas Greie marqueſſe Dorcet, and William lord Haſtings that ſtood by, ſuddenlie murthered: for the which cruell act, the more part of the dooers in their latter daies dranke of the like cup, by the righteous iuſtice and due puniſhment of God. His bodie was homelie interred with the other ſimple corpſes, in the church of the monaſterie of blacke monks in Teukeſburie.

Prince Edward murthered.

After the victorie was thus atchiued, the king repaired to the abbeie church there, to giue God thanks for that good ſucceſſe, which it had pleaſed him to bleſſe him with: and there finding a great number of his enimies, that were fled thither to ſaue themſelues, he gaue them all his free pardon; albeit there was no franchiſe there for rebels, but that he might haue commanded them to haue beene drawen foorth without breach of anie liberties of that church. He granted alſo that the dead bodies, as well of the lords as other, ſlaine in that battell, might be buried in the ſame church, or elſe where it pleaſed their freends or ſeruants, without anie quartering & heading, or ſetting vp the heads or quarters in any publike places. [O the patience and clemencie of this good king, who (beſides the putting vp of wrongs doone to him by violence of foes without vengeance) freelie forgaue the offendors, and did ſo honorablie temper his affections!]

There were found in the abbeie and other places of the towne, Edmund duke of Summerſet, Iohn Lonſtrother lord prior of S. Iohn, ſir Thomas Treſham, ſir Gerueis Clifton, and diuerſe other knights and eſquiers, which were apprehended, and all of them being brought before the duke of Gloceſter, ſitting as conſtable of England, and the duke of Norfolke, as marſhall in the middeſt of the towne, they were arreigned, condemned, and iudged to die; and ſo vpon the tueſdaie, being the ſeuenth of Maie, the ſaid duke and the lord prior, with the two forenamed knights, and twelue other knights, were on a ſcaffold, ſet vp in the middle of the towne for that purpoſe, beheaded, and permitted to be buried, without anie other diſmembring, or ſetting vp of their heads in anie one place or other.

The duke of Summerſet & others beheded.

The ſame tueſdaie, the king departed from Teukeſburie towards Worceſter, and by the waie had knowledge that queene Margaret was found in a poore houſe of religion, not far from thence, into the which ſhe was withdrawen for ſafegard of hir ſelfe, on ſaturdaie in the morning, being the daie of the battell. She was after brought to London as priſoner, ner, and ſo kept, till hir father ranſomed hir with great ſummes of monie, which he borowed of Lewes the eleuenth king of France. And bicauſe he was not able to make repaiment thereof, he ſold vnto the ſaid Lewes (as the French writers affirme) the kingdomes of Naples, and both the Sicils, with the countie of Prouance. King Edward being at Worceſter, had aduertiſements brought foorth of the north parts, that the people there were about to aſſemble in armour againſt him, in fauour of king Henrie: wherevpon he left the right way to London, and rode to Couentrie, meaning to increaſe the number of his people, and ſo with a puiſſant armie to go northwards.

Herevpon, comming to Couentrie the eleuenth of Maie, and remaining there thrée daies, he well refreſhed ſuch as had béene with him at Tewkeſburie field. Hither was brought to him quéene Margaret, from whence ſhe was conueied to London, there to remaine in ſafe kéeping (as before you haue hard.) Whileſt he was buſie in ſending abroad vnto his friends to leauie an armie, he was aduertiſed that the commotion in the north was pacified. For after it was knowen abroad, how he obteined the victorie, as well at Tewkeſburie, as at Barnet, and in manner ſubdued all his enimies, the capteins that had ſtirred the people to that rebellion, began to quaile, and forſoke their companies.

Rebellion in the north pacified.

The earle of Northumberland.

Diuerſe of them made ſute to the earle of Northumberland, that it might pleaſe him to be a mediator to the king for their pardon; ſo that now, there was no rebellion in all the north parts, but that as well the citie of Yorke, as all other places, were at the kings commandement, readie in all things to obeie him as true and loiall ſubiects. And this was confirmed by the earle of Northumberlands owne mouth, who on the fouretéenth of Maie came to the king, as yet remaining at Couentrie: by reaſon whereof it was not thought néedfull, that the king ſhould trauell anie further northward at that time, either about the pacifieng of the people, or to ſée execution doone vpon the offendors, ſith all was there in good tranquillitie and quiet.

Thomas Neuill baſtard Fauconbridge.

But now when all things ſéemed to be at reſt, and no rebellion after ſo happie victories doubted, newes came to him before his cōming to Couentrie, from the lords of his bloud, abiding at London, that one Thomas Neuill, baſtard ſonne to that valiant capteine the lord Thomas Fauconbridge (who had latelie before béene ſent to the ſea by the earle of Warwike, and after fallen to practiſe piraſie) had ſpoiled diuerſe merchants ſhips, Portingals and others, in breach of the ancient amitie that long had continued betwixt the realms of England and Portingale; and furthermore, had now got to him a great number of mariners, out of all parts of the land, and manie traitors and miſgouerned people from each quarter of the realme, beſide diuerſe alſo foorth of other countries that delighted in theft and robberies, meaning to worke ſome exploit againſt the king.

The baſtard Fauconbridge before London with an armie.

And verelie, his puiſſance increaſed dailie, for hauing béene at Calis, and brought from thence into Kent manie euill diſpoſed perſons, he began to gather his power in that countrie, meaning (as was thought) to attempt ſome great and wicked enterpriſe. After the kings comming to Couentrie, he receiued aduertiſements, that this baſtard was come before London, with manie thouſands of men by land, and alſo in ſhips by water, purpoſing to rob and ſpoile the citie. Manie Kentiſhmen were willing to aſſiſt him in this miſchieuous enterpriſe, and other were forced againſt their wils to go with him, or elſe to aid him with their ſubſtance and monie, inſomuch that within a ſhort time, he had got togither ſixtéene or ſeuentene thouſand men, as they accompted themſelues.

With theſe he came before the citie of London the twelfe of Maie, in the quarell (as he pretended) of king Henrie, whome he alſo meant to haue out of the Tower, & to reſtore him againe vnto his crowne & roiall dignitie. And for that intent, he required to enter the citie with his people, that receiuing king Henrie foorth of the Tower, they might paſſe with him through the citie, and ſo to march ſtreight towards king Edward, whoſe deſtruction they vowed to purſue, with all their vttermoſt indeuors. But the maior and aldermen of the citie would not in anie wiſe agrée to ſatiſfie their requeſt herein, vtterlie refuſing to receiue him or anie of his companie into the citie.

Succours ſent to the citie of London.

King Edward from time to time by poſts was informed of all theſe doings, & by aduiſe of his councell, the fouretéenth of Maie, ſent to the ſuccors of the maior and aldermen fiftéene hundred of the choiſeſt ſouldiers he had about him, that they might helpe to reſiſt the enimies, till he had got ſuch an armie togither as was thought neceſſarie, meaning with all conuenient ſpéed to come therewith to the reſcue of the citie, and preſeruation of the quéene, prince, and his daughters, that were within the Tower, not in verie good ſafegard, conſidering the euill diſpoſitions of manie within the citie of London, that for the fauour they had borne to the earle of Warwike, and deſire to be partakers of the ſpoile, cared not if the baſtard might haue atteined to his full purpoſe and wiſhed intent.

The baſtards purpoſe to ſpoile the ſuburbs of London.

On the ſixtenth of Maie, king Edward ſet forth of Couentrie towards London. But here ye haue to vnderſtand, that when the baſtard could not be receiued into the citie, neither by gentle perſuaſions, nor gréeuous threatnings, he made ſemblance to paſſe ouer the Thames at Kingſton bridge, ten miles from London, and thitherwards he drew with his whole power by land, leauing his ſhips afore ſaint Katharines and thereabouts. His pretenſe was, to ſpoile and deſtroie Weſtminſter, and the ſuburbs of the citie on that ſide, and after to aſſault the citie it ſelfe, to trie if he might enter by force, and ſo to be reuenged of the citizens that had refuſed to receiue him. [Notwithſtanding all which ſtirring of coles & proud port, with hautineſſe of hart & violence of hand thinking to beare downe the people, as an inundation or flowing of water ſtreams doth all before it: yet he came ſhort of his purpoſe, & pulled vpon his owne pate finall deſtruction: though he thought himſelfe a man ordeined to glorie, & was tickled with the like flatring perſuaſion that one had in his hart, who ſaid:

Magnum iter aſcendo, ſed dat mihi gloria vires.]

Prop. lib. 4.

The baſtard altereth his purpoſe.

Now as he was onwards vpon his iornie, he was aduertiſed, that king Edward was preparing to come forwards againſt him, aſſiſted in manner with all the great lords of the realme, and others in great number, more than he had béene at anie time before. By reaſon whereof, doubting what might follow, if paſſing the riuer he ſhould fortune ſo to be incloſed, that he ſhould be driuen thereby to incounter with the kings power at ſuch ods, he thought it beſt to alter his purpoſe; and ſo returning, came backe againe before London, & muſtered his people in S. Georges field, ranged and placed in one entier battell.

And to the intent they might worke their purpoſed feat, before the kings comming to the reſcue, they reſolued with all their forces to aſſault the citie, and to enter it if they could by plaine ſtrength, that putting it to the ſacke, they might conueie the riches to their ſhips, which laie in the riuer betwixt ſaint Katharins and Blackewall, neere to Ratcliffe. Herevpon hauing brought certeine péeces of artillerie foorth of their ſhips, they planted the ſame alongſt the water ſide, right ouer againſt the citie, and ſhot off luſtilie, to annoie them within ſo much as was poſſible.

The baſtard meaneth to enter the citie by force.

But the citizens on the other ſide lodged their great artillerie againſt their aduerſaries, and with violent ſhot therof ſo galled them, that they durſt not abide in anie place alongſt the water ſide, but were driuen euen from their owne ordinance. Yet the baſtard not meaning to leaue anie waie vnaſſaied that might aduance his purpoſe, appointed a great number of his retinue to ſet fire on the bridge, ſo to open the paſſage, and to enter into the citie that way forth; and withall, he cauſed aboue thrée thouſand other to paſſe by ſhips ouer the Thames; giuing order, that when they were got ouer, they ſhould diuide themſelues into two battels, the one to aſſault Algate, and the other Biſhops gate, which order accordinglie was executed.

Algate and Biſhops gate aſſaulted.

For they did their beſt at both places to force the gates, not ſparing to bend and diſcharge ſuch guns as they had brought with them againſt the ſame, nor ceaſſing with arrowes to annoie thoſe that there ſtood at defenſe: whereby much hurt was doone, as well at the one place as the other, fire being ſet on both the gates, in purpoſe to haue burnt them vp, and ſo to haue entered. The fire which they had kindled on the bridge little auailed them, although they burnt there to the number of a thréeſcore houſes. For the citizens had laid ſuch péeces of ordinance directlie in their waie, that although the paſſage had béene wholie open, they ſhould haue had hard entering that waie forth. The maior, aldermen, and other worſhipfull citizens were in good arraie, and each man appointed and beſtowed where was thought néedfull.

Houſes burnt on the bridge.

The earle of Eſſex, and manie knights, eſquiers, and gentlemen, with their fréends and ſeruants, came to aid the citizens, taking great paine to place them in order, for defenſe of the gates and walles: and furthermore, deuiſed how and in what ſort they might make a ſallie forth vpon the enimies to diſtreſſe them: and ſuerlie, by the intermingling of ſuch gentlemen and lords ſeruants in euerie part with the citizens, they were greatlie incouraged to withſtand their enimies. Yet the rebels, vnder the leading of one Spiſing, bare themſelues ſo ſtoutlie at Algate, that they wan the bulworks there, and droue the citizens backe within the portculice, & entered with them, to the number of ſix or eight: but ſome of them were ſlaine with the fall of the portculice that was let downe vpon them, to kéepe the reſidue out, and thoſe that were entered within the gate were ſuddenlie diſpatched.

The valiancie of Robert Baſſet alderman.

Hérewith they laſhed fréelie the one part at the other with guns and bowes, although no great hurt was doone with ſhot; till at length Robert Baſſet alderman (that was appointed to the kéeping of this gate, with the moſt part of the citizens) and the recorder, named Vrſewike, either of them being well armed in ſtrong iackes, commanded the portculice to be drawen vp, and maintenantlie ruſhed forth vpon their enimies, putting them backe vnto ſaint Bothulpes church. At the ſame inſtant, the earle Riuers, hauing got togither a foure or fiue hundred men, well choſen and apparelled for the warre, iſſued forth at the poſterne by the Tower, and aſſailing the Kentiſhmen, euen vpon the point as they were thus put backe, mightilie laid vpon them.

And firſt he plaged them with the ſwift and thicke flight of his arrowes, and after ioining with them at handſtrokes, ſlue and tooke manie of them priſoners; ſo that the rebels were fullie put to flight, and followed firſt to Mile-end, and from thenſe ſome vnto Poplar, ſome to Stratford, and Stepnith, and in maner each waie forth about that part of the citie, the chaſe being followed for the ſpace of two miles in length. Manie of them were of Eſſex, and ſo made their courſe homewards; but the more part of them fled to the water ſide, and getting to their ſhips, paſſed ouer the Thames to the reſt of their companie. The other likewiſe that were buſie to aſſault Biſhops gate, when they vnderſtood that their fellowes were diſcomfited and fled from Algate, they likewiſe ſlipped awaie, and made the beſt ſhift they could to ſaue themſelues.

There were a ſeauen hundred of them that fled from Algate, and other places, ſlaine outright, beſide the priſoners. And yet there were fiers burning all at once at Algate, Biſhops gate, & on the bridge, and manie houſes conſumed with the ſame fiers. But now the baſtard, vnder whome that companie was directed that had ſet fire on the bridge, when he ſaw that he might not preuaile, and vnderſtood the euill ſucces of thoſe which he had ſet ouer the Thames, he withdrew alſo, and left the bridge. Here the hardie manhood of Rafe Joſſelin alderman is not to be paſſed with ſilence; who (after he had valiantlie reſiſted the baſtard & his band that aſſaulted the bridge) vpon their retire ſallied forth vpon them, and following them in chaſe alongſt the water ſide, till they came beyond Ratcliffe, ſlue and tooke verie manie of them.

Rafe Joſſelin.

The baſtard incampeth on Blackeheath.

The baſtard notwithſtanding gathered his companies togither, and with ſuch as were willing to remaine with him incamped on Blackeheath, by the ſpace of thrée daies next inſuing, to wit, the ſixteenth, ſeauentéenth, and eightéenth of Maie, vtterlie deſpairing of his wiſhed preie, ſith he had béene repelled from London, to his vtter confuſion. And now to conclude, hearing that king Edward was comming with a right puiſſant armie, the ſaid baſtard and his people durſt no longer abide; but brake vp and diſperſed themſelues, ſome one waie, and ſome an other. They of Calis got them thither againe with all ſpéed, and ſuch as were of other countries repaired likewiſe to their homes, and manie of the Kentiſhmen went alſo to their houſes. The baſtard with his mariners, and ſuch riotous rebels, robbers, and wicked perſons, as ſought nothing but ſpoile, got them to ſhipbord, and with all their veſſels drew downe to the coaſt.

King Edward, hauing aſſembled an armie of thirtie thouſand men (as ſome write) and accompanied in maner with all the great lords of England, came to London the one and twentith of Maie, being tueſdaie, where he was honourablie receiued by the maior, aldermen, and other worſhipfull citizens: where euen vpon their firſt méeting with him he dubbed diuerſe of them knights; as the maior, the recorder, & other aldermen, and worſhipfull commoners of the citie, which had manfullie and valiantlie acquit themſelues againſt the baſtard Fauconbridge & his wicked companie of rebels. Moreouer, here is to be remembred, that poore king Henrie the ſixt, a little before depriued (as ye haue heard) of his realme and imperiall crowne, was now in the Tower ſpoiled of his life, by Richard duke of Glouceſter (as the conſtant fame ran) who (to the intent that his brother king Edward might reigne in more ſuertie) murthered the ſaid king Henrie with a dagger.

Edw. Hall. King Henrie the ſixt murthered in the Tower.

Howbeit, ſome writers of that time, fauoring altogither the houſe of Yorke, haue recorded, that after he vnderſtood what loſſes had chanced vnto his fréends, and how not onelie his ſonne, but alſo all other his chéefe partakers were dead and diſpatched, he tooke it ſo to hart, that of pure diſpleaſure, indignation, and melancholie, he died the thrée and twentith of Maie. The dead corps on the Aſcenſion euen was conueied with billes and glaiues pompouſlie (if you

The nine and twentith of Maie.

you will call that a funerall pompe) from the Tower to the church of ſaint Paule, and there laid on a beire or coffen bare faced, the ſame in preſence of the beholders did bleed; where it reſted the ſpace of one whole daie. From thenſe he was caried to the Blackfriers, and bled there likewiſe: and on the next daie after, it was conueied in a boat, without prieſt or clerke, torch or taper, ſinging or ſaieng, vnto the monaſterie of Chertſeie, diſtant from London fifteene miles, and there was it firſt buried: but after, it was remooued to Windeſor, and there in a new vawt, newlie intoomed. He reigned eight and thirtie yeares, ſix moneths and od daies, and after his readeption of the crowne ſix moneths. He liued two and fiftie yeares, hauing by wife one onelie ſonne, called Edward, prince of Wales.

He was of a ſeemelie ſtature, of bodie ſlender, to which proportion all other members were anſwerable; his face beautifull, wherein continuallie was reſident the bountie of mind with the which he was inwardlie indued. Of his owne naturall inclination he abhorred all the vices as well of the bodie as of the ſoule. His patience was ſuch, that of all the iniuries to him doone (which were innumerable) he neuer aſked vengeance, thinking that for ſuch aduerſitie as chanced to him, his ſinnes ſhould be forgotten and forgiuen. What loſſes ſoeuer happened vnto him, he neuer eſteemed, nor made anie account thereof; but if anie thing were doone, that might ſound as an offenſe towards God, he ſore lamented, and with great repentance ſorowed for it.

So then verie vnlike it is, that he died of anie wrath, indignation, and diſpleaſure bicauſe his buſineſſe about the keeping of the crowne on his head tooke no better ſucceſſe: except peraduenture ye will ſaie, that it greeued him, for that ſuch ſlaughters and miſcheeues as had chanced within this land, came to paſſe onelie through his follie and default in gouernment: or (that more is) for his fathers, his grandfathers, and his owne vniuſt vſurping and deteining of the crowne. But howſoeuer it was, for theſe before remembred, and other the like properties of reputed holineſſe, which was ſaid to reſt in him, it pleaſed God to worke miracles for him in his life time, as men haue liſted to report.

Canonizing of kings, deere.

By reaſon whereof, king Henrie the ſeauenth ſued to Pope Iulio the ſecond, to haue him canonized a ſaint. But for that the canonizing of a king ſeemed to be more coſtlie than for a biſhop, the ſaid king left off his ſute in that behalfe; thinking better to ſaue his monie, than to purchaſe a new holie daie of ſaint Henrie with ſo great a price, remitting to God the iudgement of his will and intent. ¶ But bicauſe princes princelie qualified, can not be too highlie praiſed, I will here record a collection of his commendable conditions, doings, and ſaiengs, as I find them ſet downe to my hand, to his perpetuall renowme; and right worthie of imitation, not onelie of ſuch as are ſingled out from among infinite thouſands, to be magnified with roialtie; but alſo of priuat and meane men that conuerſe and liue one with an other in the world.

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 730, 731, &c.

This king hauing inioied as great proſperitie as fauourable fortune could afoord, & as great troubles on the other ſide as ſhe frowning could powre out; yet in both the ſtates he was patient and vertuous, that he maie be a patterne of moſt perfect vertue, as he was a worthie example of fortunes inconſtancie. He was plaine, vpright, farre from fraud, wholie giuen to praier, reading of ſcriptures, and almeſdeeds; of ſuch integritie of life, that the biſhop which had beene his confeſſour ten yeares, auouched that he had not all that time committed anie mortall crime: ſo continent, as ſuſpicion of vnchaſt life neuer touched him: and hauing in Chriſtmaſſe a ſhew of yoong women with their bare breaſts laid out preſented before him, he immediatlie departed with theſe words: Fie, fie, for ſhame; forſooth you be too blame.

Before his marriage, he liked not that women ſhould enter his chamber, and for this reſpect he committed his two brethren by the mothers ſide, Iaſper and Edmund, to moſt honeſt & vertuous prelats to be brought vp. So farre he was from couetouſneſſe, that when the executors of his vncle the biſhop of Wincheſter, ſurnamed the rich cardinall, would haue giuen him two thouſand pounds, he plainelie refuſed it, willing them to diſcharge the will of the departed, and would ſcarſelie condeſcend at length to accept the ſame ſumme of monie toward the indowing of his colleges in Cambridge & Eaton. He was religiouſlie affected (as the time then was) that at principall holidaies, he would weare ſackecloth next his ſkin. Oth he vſed none, but in moſt earneſt matters theſe words: Forſooth and forſooth.

He was ſo pitifull, that when he ſaw the quarter of a traitor againſt his crowne ouer Criplegate, he willed it to be taken awaie, with theſe words: I will not haue anie chriſtian ſo cruellie handled for my ſake. Manie great offenſes he willinglie pardoned, and receiuing at a time a great blow by a wicked man which compaſſed his death, he onelie ſaid; Forſooth forſooth, yee doo fowlie to ſmite a king annointed ſo. An other alſo which thruſt him into the ſide with a ſword when he was priſoner in the Tower, was by him pardoned when he was reſtored to his ſtate and kingdome. Not long before his death, being demanded whie he had ſo long held the crowne of England vniuſtlie; he replied: My father was king of England, quietlie inioieng the crowne all his reigne; and his father my grandſire was alſo king of England, and I euen a child in my cradell was proclamed and crowned king without anie interruption; and ſo held it fortie yeares well-neere, all the ſtates dooing homage vnto me, as to my anteceſſors: wherefore I maie ſaie with king Dauid; The lot is fallen vnto me in a faire ground; yea, I haue a goodlie heritage, my helpe is from the Lord which ſaueth the vpright in heart.

The kings colledge in Cambridge.

This good king, being of himſelfe alwaies naturallie inclined to doo good, and fearing leaſt he might ſeeme vnthankefull to almightie God for his great benefits beſtowed vpon him, ſince the time he firſt tooke vpon him the regiment of his realme, determined about the ſix and twentith yeare of his reigne, for his primer notable worke (as by the words of his will I find expreſſed) to erect and found two famous colledges in the honor and worſhip of his holy name, and for the increaſe of vertue, the dilatation of cunning, and eſtabliſhment of chriſtian faith, whereof the one in Cambridge, to be called his colledge roiall of our ladie and ſaint Nicholas: and the other at Eaton beſide Windſore, to be called his colledge of our bleſſed ladie.

And for the performance of this his deuout purpoſe, he infeoffed certeine biſhops, with other noble and worſhipfull perſonages, by his letters patents, with lands and poſſeſſions, parcell of his inheritance of the duchie of Lancaſter, to the cleare value of well neere foure & thirtie hundred pounds by yeere. Which letters patents he after confirmed by his act of parlement, declaring alſo by his will vnto his ſaid feoffees, his intent and meaning, how the ſame ſhuld be imploied vpon the edifications of his ſaid two colledges. Whereof (in my iudgement) the deuiſe is ſo excellent, and the buildings ſo princelie and apt for that purpoſe, as I cannot omit to ſet forth vnto you the verie plot of the whole colledge in Cambridge, euen as I find mentioned almoſt verbatim in his will, ſuppoſing that if the reſt of the houſe had procéeded according to the chappell alreadie finiſhed (as his full intent and meaning was) the like colledge could ſcant haue béene found againe in anie chriſtian land. The words of the will are thus.

The chappell. The bodie of the church. The quiere. The roodloft. The height of the chappell. The eaſt window.

As touching the dimenſions of the church of my ſaid colledge of our ladie and S. Nicholas of Cambridge, I haue deuiſed and appointed, that the ſame church ſhall conteine in length 288 foot of aſſiſe, without anie Iles, and all of the wideneſſe of fortie foot. And the length of the ſame church from the weſt end vnto the altars at the quiere doore, ſhall conteine an hundred and twentie foot. And from the prouoſts ſtall, vnto the gréece called Gradus chori ninetie foot; for thirtie ſix ſtalles on either ſide of the ſame quiere, anſwering to thréeſcore and ten fellowes, and ten prieſts conducts, which muſt be De prima forma. And from the ſaid ſtalles vnto the eaſt end of the ſaid church, thréeſcore & two foot of aſſiſe. Alſo a reredoſſe bearing the roodloft, departing the quiere and the bodie of the church, conteining in length fortie foot, and in breadth fourtéene foot. The walles of the ſame church to be in height ninetie foot imbattelled, vawted, and chareroffed, ſufficientlie butteraced, and euerie butterace fined with finials. And in the eaſt end of the ſame church, ſhall be a window of nine daies, and betwixt euerie butterace a window of fiue daies.

The ſide chappels. The veſtrie. The cloiſter.

And betwixt euerie of the ſame butteraces in the bodie of the church, on both ſides of the ſame church, a cloſet with an altar therein, conteining in length twentie foot, and in breadth ten foot, vawted and finiſhed vnder the ſoile of the Ile windowes. And the pauement of the church to be inhanced foure foot aboue the ground without. And the height of the pauement of the quiere one foot and an halfe aboue the pauement of the church. And the pauement of the altar thrée foot aboue that. And on the north ſide of the quiere a veſtrie conteining in length fiftie foot, and in breadth twentie and two foot, departed into two houſes beneath, & two houſes aboue, which ſhall conteine in height twentie two foot in all, with an entrie from the quiere vawted. And at the weſt end of the church a cloiſter ſquare, the eaſt pane conteining in length an hundred ſeuentie and fiue foot, and the weſt pane as much. The north pane two hundred foot, and the ſouth pane as much, of the which the deambulatorie thirtéene foot wide, and in height twentie foot to the corbill table, with cleare ſtories and butteraces with finials, vawted & imbattelled. And the ground thereof foure foot lower than the church ground.

The ſtéeple. The baſe court. The eaſt pane. The great gate.

And in the middle of the weſt pane of the cloiſter a ſtrong tower ſquare, conteining foure and twentie foot within the walles. And in the height one hundred and twentie foot to the corbill table. And foure ſmall turrets ouer that fined with pinacles. And a doore into the ſaid cloiſter inward, but outward none. And as touching the dimenſions of the houſing of the ſaid colledge, I haue deuiſed and appointed in the ſouthſide of the ſaid church a quadrant, cloſing to both ends of the ſame church; the eaſt pane whereof ſhall conteine two hundred and thirtie foot in length, and in breadth within the walles two and twentie foot. In the ſame panes middle, a tower for a gatehouſe, conteining in length thirtie foot, and in breadth two and twentie, and in height thréeſcore foot, with thrée chambers ouer the gate, euerie one ouer the other. And on either ſide of the ſame gate foure chambers, euerie one conteining in length fiue & twentie foot, and in bredth two and twentie foot. And ouer euerie of theſe chambers, two chambers aboue of the ſame meaſure or more, with two towers outward, and two towers inward.

The ſouth pane. The weſt pane. The librarie. The diſputation houſe.

The ſouth pane ſhall conteine in length two hundred thirtie and eight foot, and in breadth two and twentie foot within, in which ſhalbe ſeuen chambers, euerie one conteining in length nine and twentie foot, and in breadth twentie and two, with a chamber parcell of the prouoſts lodging, conteining in length thirtie and fiue foot, and with a chamber in the eaſt corner of the ſame pane, conteining in length twentie and fiue foot, and in breadth thirtie and two foot. And ouer euerie of all theſe chambers two chambers, and with fiue towers outward, and thrée towers inward. The weſt pane ſhall conteine in length two hundred and thirtie foot, and in breadth within twentie & foure foot, in which at the end toward the church ſhall be a librarie, conteining in length an hundred and ten foot, and in breadth twentie and foure foot. And vnder it a large houſe for reading and diſputations, conteining in length eleuen foot. And two chambers vnder the ſame librarie, each conteining twentie and nine foot in length, and in breadth foure and twentie foot.

The wardrobe. The hall. The pantrie and butterie. The colledge kitchin.

And ouer the ſaid librarie a houſe of the ſame largeneſſe, for diuerſe ſtuffe of the ſaid colledge. In the other end of the ſame pane a hall, conteining in length an hundred foot, vpon a vawt of twelue foot high, ordeined for the cellar and butterie: and the breadth of the hall ſix and thirtie foot. On euerie ſide thereof a baie window. And in the nether end of the ſame hall toward the middle of the ſame pane, a pantrie & butterie, euerie of them in length twentie foot, and in breadth ſeuentéene foot. And ouer that two chambers for officers. And at the nether end of the hall toward the weſt, a goodlie kitchin. And the ſame pane ſhall haue inward two towers, ordeined for the waies into the hall and librarie. And in euerie corner of the ſaid quadrant, ſhall be two corner towers, one inward, and one outward, more than the towers aboue rehearſed.

The prouoſts lodging. The bakehouſe and brewhouſe. The woodyard. The conduit.

And at the vpper end of the hall, the prouoſts lodging, that is to wit, more than the chambers for him aboue ſpecified, a parlour on the ground, conteining ſix and thirtie foot in length, and two and twentie foot in breadth, & two chambers aboue of the ſame quantitie. And weſtward cloſing thereto a kitchin for him, a larderhouſe, ſtables, and other neceſſarie houſings and grounds. And weſtward beyond theſe houſes, and the ſaid kitchin ordeined for the hall, a bakehouſe, a brewhouſe, and other houſes of office: betwixt which there is left a ground ſquare of fourſcore foot in euerie pane for wood and ſuch ſtuffe. And in the middle of the ſaid large quadrant, ſhall be a conduit, goodlie deuiſed for the eaſe of the ſame colledge. And I will, that the edification procéed in large forme of my ſaid colledge cleane and ſubſtantiall, ſetting apart ſuperfluitie of ſo great curious workes of intaile and buſie moulding.

The precinct of the colledge. The water gate.

And I haue deuiſed and appointed that the precinct of my ſaid colledge, as well on both ſides of the garden from the colledge to the water, as in all other places of the ſame precinct, be incloſed with a ſubſtantiall wall, of the height of fourtéene foot, with a large tower at the principall entrie againſt the middle of the eaſt pane, out of the high ſtréet. And in the ſame tower a large gate, and another tower in the middle of the weſt end at the new bridge. And the ſame wall to be creaſted, imbattelled, and fortified with towers, as manie as ſhall be thought conuenient thervnto. And I will that my ſaid colledge be edified of the moſt ſubſtantiall & beſt abiding ſtuffe, of ſtone, lead, glaſſe, and iron, that maie beſt be had and prouided thereto. ¶ Thus much I haue inlarged by occaſion of reading this good kings will: the cunning deuiſe whereof I leaue to the conſiderate iudgement of ſuch as be expert in architecture, heartilie deſiring almightie God to put into the heart of ſome noble prince of this land, one day to make perfect this roiall worke ſo charitablie begun.]

Sandwich kept by the rebels.

But now to returne to king Edward. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after his comming to London, hée reſted there but one daie, or two at the moſt, taking his iournie forthright into Kent with all his armie, folowing the baſtard, and other his complices, to ſuppreſſe them, if they were in anie place aſſembled againe to reſiſt him. But after they were once diſperſed, they durſt not ſhew themſelues againe in armor, thoſe onlie excepted that were withdrawne vnto Sandwich with the baſtard; which for the more part were mariners, about eight or nine hundred, beſide certeine other euill diſpoſed perſons, that accompanied him as his ſouldiers, and men of warre, with whoſe aſſiſtance the baſtard kept that towne by ſtrength, hauing in the hauen ſeuen and fortie ſhips, great and ſmall, vnder his gouernance.

The rebels ſue for pardon.

But vpon the kings approching néere vnto thoſe parties, they ſent to him for pardon, promiſing that vpon a reaſonable appointment, for the ſafegard of their liues, and other indemnities to be had for their benefit, they would become his faithfull ſubiects, and deliuer into his hands all the ſhips. Their offer the king vpon great conſiderations, and by good deliberate aduiſe of counſell, thought beſt to accept: and therevpon (being at that time in Canturburie) hée granted to their petitions, and ſent immediatlie vnto Sandwich his brother Richard duke of Glouceſter, to receiue them to mercie, togither with all the ſhips, which according to their promiſe they deliuered into his hands.

The baſtard of Fauconbridge beheaded.

Roger Vaughan taken and beheaded.

But notwithſtanding that (as ſome write) the baſtard Fauconbridge, and other of his companie that were got to Sandwich, had thus their pardons by compoſition at the kings hand; we find neuertheleſſe, that the ſaid baſtard Fauconbridge, being afterwards at ſea (a rouing belike, as he had vſed before) came at length into the open hauen at Southhampton, and there taking land, was apprehended, and ſhortlie after beheaded. This chanced (as ſhould appeare by Fabian) about the latter end of October. Moreouer, Roger Vaughan that had béene ſent by king Edward into Wales, anon after Teukeſburie field (being a man of great power in that countrie) to intrap and ſurpriſe by ſome ſecret ſleight the earle of Penbroke, the ſaid earle being thereof aduertiſed, tooke the ſame Roger, and without delay ſtroke off his head.

Dauid Thomas.

The earle of Penbroke with his nephue the earle of Richmond paſſe ouer into Britaine.

Execution.

After this, was the earle beſieged in the towne of Penbroke by Morgan Thomas; but the ſiege was raiſed by Dauid Thomas, brother to the ſaid Morgan, a faithfull friend to the earle; and then the earle by his helpe was conueied to Tinbie, where he got ſhips, and with his nephue the lord Henrie earle of Richmond ſailed into Britaine, where, of the duke they were courteouſlie interteined; with aſſurance made, that no creature ſhould doo them anie wrong or iniurie within his dominions. King Edward viſiting diuerſe places in Kent, ſate in iudgement on ſuch as had aided the baſtard in the laſt commotion, of whome diuerſe were condemned and executed, as Spiſing one of the capteins that aſſaulted Algate, whoſe head was ſet vp ouer the ſame gate: and ſo likewiſe was the head of one Quintine, a butcher, that was an other capteine amongeſt them, and chiefe of thoſe that aſſaulted Biſhops gate, as ſome write.

Moreouer, at Canturburie the maior of that citie was executed, and diuerſe other at Rocheſter, Maidſton and Blackeheath: for the lord marſhall and other iudges, being appointed to hold their oier and determiner in that countrie of Kent, there were aboue an hundred indicted and condemned. Diuerſe alſo of Eſſex men that had béene partakers in this rebellion with the baſtard, & holpe to ſet fire on Biſhops gate and Algate, were hanged betwixt Stratford and London. Manie alſo of the wealthie commons in Kent were put to grieuous fines.

Fabian.

The archbiſhop of Yorke.

The earle of Oxford.

1472

Now when the king had made an end of his buſineſſe in that countrie, he returned to London, comming thither againe vpon Whitſun éeuen, being the firſt of Iune. And hauing thus within the ſpace of eleuen wéekes recouered in maner the whole poſſeſſion of his realme, being relieued of the moſt part of all his doubtfull feare, he ment to remooue all ſtops out of the waie. Wherefore he ſent the archbiſhop of Yorke, brother to the earle of Warwike, and to the marques Montacute ouer to Guiſnes, there to be kept in ſafe cuſtodie within the caſtell, where he continued a long ſeaſon, till at length he was by friendſhip deliuered, and ſhortlie after (through verie anguiſh of mind) departed this life; whome Laurence Bath, and after him Thomas Rotheram in the ſée of Yorke, did ordinarilie ſuccéed. Beſide this, Iohn earle of Oxford, which after Barnet field both manfullie and valiantlie kept ſaint Michaels mount in Cornewall, either for lacke of aid, or perſuaded by his friends, gaue vp the mount, and yéelded himſelfe to king Edward (his life onelie ſaued) which to him was granted. But to be out of all doutfull imaginations, king Edward alſo ſent him ouer the ſea to the caſtell of Hammes, where, by the ſpace of twelue yéeres hée was in ſtrong priſon ſhut vp and warilie looked to.

Anno Reg. 12.

Meſſengers ſent to the duke of Britaine.

King Edward was not a litle diſquieted in mind, for that the earls of Penbroke & Richmond were not onlie eſcaped out of the realme, but alſo well receiued and no worſſe interteined of the duke of Britaine: he ſent therefore in ſecret wiſe graue & cloſe meſſengers to the ſaid duke, the which ſhould not ſticke to promiſe the duke great and rich rewards, ſo that he would deliuer both the earles into their hands and poſſeſſion. The duke, after he had heard them that were ſent, made this anſwer, that he could not with his honor deliuer them, to whome he had giuen his faith to ſée them preſerued from all iniurie: but this (he ſaid) he would doo for the king of England, that they ſhould be ſo looked vnto, as he néeded not to doubt of any attempt to be made againſt him by them, or by their meanes.

Anno Reg. 13.

A parlement.

The king receiuing this anſwer, wrote louinglie to the duke of Britaine, that he would conſider his fréendſhip with conuenient rewards, if it ſhould pleaſe him to be as good as his promiſe. The duke, perceiuing gaine comming by the abode of the two Engliſh earles in his countrie, cauſed them to be ſeparated in ſunder, and all their ſeruants being Engliſhmen to be ſequeſtred from them, and in their places appointed Britains to attend them. In the thirtéenth yéere of his reigne, king Edward called his high court of parlement at his palace of Weſtminſter, in the which all lawes and ordinances made by him before that daie were confirmed, and thoſe that king Henrie had abrogated, after his readeption of the crowne, were againe reuiued. Alſo lawes were made for the confiſcation of traitors goods, and for the reſtoring of them that were for his ſake fled the realme, which of his aduerſaries had béene atteinted of high treaſon, and condemned to die.

A ſubſidie.

A pardon.

Ambaſſadors from the duke of Burgognie.

Moreouer, towards his charges of late ſuſteined, a competent ſumme of monie was demanded, and fréelie granted. There was alſo a pardon granted almoſt for all offenſes; and all men then being within the realme, were releaſed and diſcharged of all high treaſons and crimes, although they had taken part with his aduerſaries againſt him. In this ſeaſon the duke of Burgognie had ſore wars with the French king; and to be the more ſpéedlie reuenged on his aduerſarie, he ſent ambaſſadors into England, to perſuade king Edward to make warre alſo on the French king, for the recouerie of his ancient right to the realme of France, by the ſame French king againſt all equitie withholden and deteined. In which attempt of his, there was ſome fauour of diſcréet policie, and a prouident forecaſt for his greater ſafetie, beſides the likelie poſſibilitie to obteine that whereto he made chalenge: ſith the huger hoſts (if the hardier hearts) are of moſt force, according to that ſaieng:

Virtus vnita fortior.

And therefore, by procuring the king of Englands power to ioine with his, he ſuppoſed his purpoſe atchiueable with the more facilitie. King Edward not ſo much for the loue he bare to the duke of Burgognie, as for deſire to be reuenged on the French king, whome he tooke to be his enimie for aiding the earle of Warwike, quéene Margaret, and hir ſonne prince Edward, with their complices, gaue good eare to the duke of Burgognie his meſſengers, and finallie (after he had taken aduiſe of his councell) the ſaid meſſengers were anſwered, that king Edward in the beginning of the next yeare would land at Calis with a puiſſant armie, both to reuenge ſuch iniuries as he had receiued at the French kings hands, and alſo to recouer his right, which he wrongfullie deteined from him.

Opportunitie not to be neglected.

The earle of S.Paule.

In déed the time ſerued verie well for the Engliſhmen to atchiue ſome high enterpriſe in France at that preſent. For not onelie the duke of Burgognie as then made warre againſt the French king, but alſo manie great men within the realme of France, miſliking the manners of their king, began to haue ſecret intelligence with the ſaid duke; and namelie Lewes of Lutzenburgh earle of ſaint Paule conſtable of France was ſecretlie confederate with the duke of Burgognie, intending verelie to bring the French king to ſome great hinderance, the better to haue his purpoſe accompliſhed in certeine weightie matters. King Edward vnderſtanding all theſe things, was greatlie incouraged to make a iournie into France, and therevpon with all diligence prepared all things readie for the ſame.

A ſhift to recouer monie.

But bicauſe he wanted monie, and could not well charge his commons with a new ſubſidie, for that he had receiued the laſt yeare great ſummes of monie granted to him by parlement, he deuiſed this ſhift, to call afore him a great number of the wealthieſt ſort of people in his realme; and to them declaring his néed, and the requiſite cauſes thereof, he demanded of euerie of them ſome portion of monie, which they ſticked not to giue. And therefore the king willing to ſhew that this their liberalitie was verie acceptable to him, he called this grant of monie, A beneuolence: notwithſtanding that manie with grudge gaue great ſums toward that new found aid which of them might be called, A meleuolence. But the king vſed ſuch gentle faſhions toward them, with fréendlie praier of their aſſiſtance in his neceſſitie, that they could not otherwiſe doo, but franklie and fréelie yéeld and giue him a reaſonable and competent ſumme.

Abr.Flem. ex Edw.Hall. fol.Ccxxvj.

¶ But here I will not let paſſe a pretie conceipt that happened in this gathering, in the which you ſhall not onelie note the humilitie of a king, but more the fantaſie of a woman. King Edward had called before him a widow, much abounding in ſubſtance, and no leſſe growne in yeares, of whome he merilie demanded what ſhe gladlie would giue him toward his great charges: By my trueth quoth ſhe, for thy louelie countenance thou ſhalt haue euen twentie pounds. The king looking ſcarſe for the halfe of that ſumme, thanked hir, and louinglie kiſt hir. Whether the flauor of his breath did ſo comfort hir ſtomach, or ſhe eſtéemed the kiſſe of a king ſo pretious a iewell, ſhe ſwore incontinentlie, that he ſhould haue twentie pounds more, which ſhe with the ſame will paied that ſhe offered it. ¶ This yeare the duke of Exceſter was found dead in the ſea betwéene Douer and Calis, but how he came there the certeintie could not be knowne.]

Iohn Stow.

1474 Anno Reg.14.

The K. with an armie paſſeth ouer into France.

When all things conuenient for ſuch an enterpriſe were in a readineſſe, the king came to Douer, where he found fiue hundred ſhips and hoies readie to tranſport him and his armie. And ſo the fourth daie of Iulie he paſſed ouer, and landed at Calis with great triumph; but his armie, horſſes, and munitions of war ſcarſe paſſed ouer in twentie daies. In this armie (being one of the beſt appointed that had paſſed out of England into France in manie yeares before) were fiftéene hundred men of armes well horſſed, of the which the moſt part were barded and richlie trapped, and manie of them trimmed in one ſute. There were alſo fiftéene thouſand archers with bowes and arrowes, of the which a great number were on horſbacke. There were alſo a great companie of other fighting men, and of ſuch as ſerued to ſet vp tents and pauilions, to attend the artillerie and to incloſe their campe, and otherwiſe to labour and be imploied in ſeruice.

The ſiege of Nuſſe.

The lord Scales.

In all this armie was there not one page. The king of England was at his ariuall highlie diſpleaſed with the duke of Burgognie, who in the word of a prince had promiſed to méet him at his landing, with two thouſand men of armes and light horſſemen, beſides a great number of lanceknights and halberdiers, and that he would haue begun the war thrée moneths before the kings tranſporting; whereas contrarilie the duke laie lingering at the ſiege of Nuſſe, and let paſſe the occaſion of atchiuing a more profitable enterpriſe. King Edward incontinentlie diſpatched the lord Scales in poſt vnto the duke, to put him in remembrance of his promiſe, and to aduiſe him to come and ioine with him before the ſummer were ſpent.

A defiance ſent to the French king.

Before king Edward departed from Douer, he ſent an officer of armes vnto the French king with a defiance. The French king, receiuing the king of Englands letters at the meſſengers hand, read the ſame; and after he had conſidered thereof at leaſure, he called the Engliſh herald aſide, and to him declared the little truſt that was to be put in the duke of Burgognie and the conſtable, by whoſe procurement he knew that king Edward was procured to come at that ſeaſon into France; and therefore it ſhould be better for him to haue peace with an old enimie, than to ſtaie vpon the promiſes and familiaritie of a new diſſembling fréend, which peace did highlie pleaſe God, & was the thing that he moſt deſired. ¶ But to giue the greater grace to the matter in hand, it is good to laie downe the forme of the French kings ſpéech to the ſaid herald, to whome he vttered theſe words in his wardrobe, as Edward Hall reporteth.

The office of an herald.

When he had thus ſaid, he gaue the herald three hundred crownes, promiſing him a thouſand crownes if anie good appointment came to paſſe. This herald was borne in Normandie, who being more couetous of the crownes than ſecret (according as of dutie by his office he ought to haue beene) promiſed to doo all things that in him laie, and further ſhewed waies by the which the French king might enter into the port of treatie for peace, the which he doubted not would ſort to a good concluſion. The French king glad to heare theſe things, gaue to the herald when he ſhould depart, beſide the other reward, a peece of crimſon veluet of thirtie yards long. The lord Scales, comming to the duke of Burgognie before Nuſſe, could not perſuade him to raiſe his field, and (as it ſtood him vpon) to come and ioine with king Edward, till at length conſtreined thereto by other means, he left Nuſſe vnconquered, and ſending the moſt part of his armie into Lorraine, came with a ſmall companie to king Edward lieng before Calis.

The duke of Burgognie commeth to king Edward

King Edward at the firſt comming of the duke vnto him, ſeemed much to reproove his vnwiſe dealing, in making ſo ſlow haſt to ioine with him at this time, ſith for his ſake, and at his ſute, he had paſſed the ſeas with his armie, to the intent to make wars in France in reuenge of both their iniuries; the time ſeruing their turnes ſo well as they could wiſh or deſire, the opportunitie whereof could neuer happilie be recouered againe. The duke after he had excuſed himſelfe, with alledging the diſhonour that ſhould haue redounded to him, if he had left the ſiege of Nuſſe without meane of ſome ſhew of compoſition, incouraged king Edward to aduance forward with manie golden promiſes, aſwell of his owne part, as of the conſtable. The king agreed to the dukes perſuaſion, and ſo ſet forward.

But yet when he was entred into the dukes countries, the Engliſhmen were not ſo freendlie interteined as they looked to haue beene: for at their comming to Peronne, there were but a few ſuffered to enter the gates, the remnant were driuen to lodge in the fields, better purueied of their owne, than of the dukes prouiſion. And at their comming before ſaint Quintines (which towne the conſtable had promiſed to deliuer into the hands of the duke of Burgognie) the artillerie ſhot off, and they of the towne came foorth both on horſſebacke and foot to ſkirmiſh with them that approached, of the which two or three were ſlaine. This interteinment ſeemed ſtrange to king Edward, pondering the laſt daies promiſe with this daies dooing. But the duke excuſed the matter, and would haue perſuaded him to make countenance to beſiege the towne, that the conſtable might haue a colour to render it into his hands, as though he did it by conſtraint.

The conſtable of France a deepe diſſembler.

But the king, remembring what had beene told to his herald by the French K. how he ſhould be diſſembled with, perceiued the French kings words to be too true, and therefore thought it more ſure to heare the faire words of the conſtable and the duke, than to giue credit to their vntrue and deceitfull doings. The Engliſhmen returned vnto their campe in a great chafe towards the conſtable; and the next daie to increaſe their diſpleaſure, an other coroſiue was miniſtred, that ſmarted ſorer. For duke Charles of Burgognie tooke his leaue ſuddenlie of king Edward, alledging that he muſt needs ſee his armie in Artois, promiſing ſhortlie with all his puiſſance to returne againe to the great commoditie of them both. This departing much troubled the king of England, bicauſe he looked for no ſuch thing; but thought rather that he ſhould haue had the duke his continuall fellow in armes: and therefore this diſſembling and vnſtedfaſt working cauſed the king to thinke that he neuer thought, and to doo that he neuer intended.

The duke of Burgognie departeth.

The French king in this meane while had aſſembled a mightie power; ouer the which he had made monſieur Robert de Eſtoutuile capteine, whome he ſent to Artois, to defend the frontiers there againſt the king of Englands entrie, and he himſelfe tarried ſtill at Senlis: but though he ſhewed countenance thus of warre, yet inwardlie deſirous of peace, according to the aduiſe giuen him by the Engliſh herald, he cauſed a varlet or yeoman (as I may call him) to be put in a coat armour of France, which for haſt was made of a trumpet baner. For king Lewes was a man nothing preciſe in outward ſhewes of honor, oftentimes hauing neither officer of armes, trumpet in his court, nor other roiall appurtenances belonging to the port of a prince, which ſhould be glorious and repleniſhed with pompe, as the poet ſaith:

Regia mirifici fulgent inſignia regis.

A meſſenger ſent to the king of England.

This counterfeit herald, being throughlie inſtructed in his charge, was ſent to the king of England, and ſo paſſing foorth: when he approched the Engliſh campe, he put on his coat of armes, & being eſpied of the outriders, was brought to a tent, where the lord Howard and the lord Stanleie were at dinner, of whome he was courteouſlie receiued, and by them conueied to the kings preſence, vnto whom he declared his meſſage ſo wittilie, that in the end he obteined a ſafe conduct for one hundred horſſes, for ſuch perſons as his maiſter ſhould appoint to meet, as manie to be aſſigned by king Edward in ſome indifferent place betweene both armies, to haue a like ſafe conduct from his ſaid maiſter, as he receiued from him. ¶ The words of which herald are woorth the noting, reported in writers as followeth.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Ccxxix, ccxxx.

The heralds oration to the king vttered with boldneſſe of face and libertie of toong.

RIght high and mightie prince, right puiſſant and noble king, if your excellent wiſedome did perfectlie know, or your high knowledge did apparantlie perceiue, what inward affection and feruent deſire the king my maiſter hath alwaies had, to haue a perfect peace, a ſure vnitie, & a brotherlie concord, betweene your noble perſon and your realme, and his honorable perſonage and his dominions, you would & (for truths ſake) ſhould confeſſe and ſaie, that neuer chriſtian prince more thirſted for an amitie, nor yet no louer hath more ſought to atteine to the fauour of his paramor, than he hath ſought to haue with you a perpetuall freendſhip, amitie, and aliance: to the intent that the ſubiects of both the relms, quietlie liuing vnder two princes, confederate and combined togither in an indiſſoluble confederacie and league, may mutuallie imbrace ech other in their harts, may perſonallie haue reſort and frequent each others princes territories and dominions, with their merchandizes and wares: and finallie, the one to liue with the other, as freend with freend, brother with brother, companion with companion, in continuall loue, reſt, and tranquilitie. And for his part he dooth affirme & ſaie, that ſince he receiued firſt the crowne of his kingdome, and was annointed with the holie ampull, he neuer attempted, nor yet once imagined anie war, or thing preiudiciall toward your roiall perſon, your realme, or your people.

If you peraduenture will ſaie, that he ſupported & mainteined the earle of Warwike againſt your maieſtie, he ſuerlie that dooth & will denie: for he aided him againſt the duke of Burgognie, whom he knew not onelie to be his extreame enimie, but alſo to laie in wait (both by ſea and land) either to take him, or vtterlie to deſtroie him. Which duke of Burgognie, onelie for his owne cauſe, hath excited and ſolicited your highneſſe to come ouer the troublous and tempeſtuous ſeas, to the intent to cauſe (yea in maner to compell) the king my maſter, to condeſcend to ſuch treatie and appointment, as ſhould be to his onlie profit, and neither to your honour, nor yet to your gaine. For if he & ſuch other as dailie flattered him for their peculiar profits (as he had manie in deed that dailie ſucked at his elbow) had once obteined the thing that they breathed for, all your affaires were put in obliuion, and left at large for them, or their aſſiſtants, euen as they be at this daie. Hath not the duke of Burgognie cauſed you firſt to come into France; after to ſet forward your armie; and in concluſion, for lacke of his promiſe, to looſe the faire ſeaſon of the yeare, and to lie in the fields in winter? Which warre (if it continue) ſhall neither be profitable to you, nor to your nobilitie, nor yet pleaſant but painefull to your communaltie: and finallie to both the realmes, and eſpeciallie to merchant men ſhall bring both miſerie, pouertie, and calamitie.

Came the duke of Burgognie from Nuſſe to Calis, onlie to viſit you? Rode he all that poſt haſt onelie to blind you? Returned he backe into Loraine againe for anie cauſe, but onelie to leaue you deſolate, & to abandon you? Did he or the conſtable keepe anie one promiſe with you? Why doo you then beleeue, and yet ſtill truſt them, in whome you neuer found faith nor fidelitie? But if God will it ſo ordeine, that you and my maſter may ioine in league and amitie, I dare both ſaie and ſweare, that the fine ſteele neuer cleaued faſter to the adamant ſtone, than he will ſticke & claſpe with you, both in wealth and wo, in proſperitie and aduerſitie. And if it ſhall pleaſe you, to harken to anie reaſonable treatie, I being a poore man, ſhall (on ieopardie of my life which is my chiefe treaſure) vndertake, that this communication ſhall ſort and come to ſuch an effect, that both you & your nobilitie, ſhall be glad and reioiſe, and your commons ſhall be contented and pleaſed; and they that haue deceiued you, ſhall be both abaſhed and aſhamed. Moſt humblie beſeeching your highneſſe, if your pleaſure ſhall incline this waie, that I may haue a ſure ſafe conduct for one hundred horſſes, for ſuch perſonages as the king my maſter ſhall ſend vnto you with further intimation of his mind and purpoſe. And if your pleaſure ſhall be to haue the communication in anie place indifferent betweene both the armies, then ſhall I warrant you the like ſafe conduct for your men, as you doo ſend for ours.

When he had accompliſhed his meſſage and inſtructions, the king of England and his councell highlie commended his audacitie, his toong, and his ſoberneſſe, giuing to him in reward a faire gilt cup, with a hundred angels: deliuering him a ſafe conduct according to his requeſt and demand, with the which he with ſpeed departed, hauing with him an Engliſh herald to bring a like ſafe conduct from the French king.]

Commiſſioners appointed to treat of peace.

After that the ſafe conducts were deliuered on both parts, the ambaſſadours met at a village beſide Amiens. On the king of Englands ſide, the lord Howard; ſir Thomas Saintleger; doctor Morton after biſhop of Elie, & chancellor of England, were cheefe. For the French king, the baſtard of Burbon admerall of France; the lord Saint Pierre; & the biſhop of Eureux called Heberge, were appointed as principall. The Engliſhmen demanded the whole realme of France, or at the leaſt Normandie and whole Aquitaine. The allegations were proued by the Engliſhmen, and politikelie defended by the Frenchmen, ſo that with arguments, without concluſion, the day paſſed, and the commiſſioners departed, and made relation to their maiſters. The French king and his councell would not conſent, that the Engliſhmen ſhould haue one foot of land within France; but rather determined to put him ſelfe & the whole realme in hazard and aduenture.

Articles of agreement betweene king Edward and the French king.

At the next meeting the commiſſioners agreed vpon certeine articles, which were of both the princes accepted and allowed. It was firſt accorded, that the French king ſhould paie to the king of England without delaie ſeauentie & fiue thouſand crownes of the ſunne; and yearelie fiftie thouſand crownes to be paid at London during king Edwards life. And further it was agreed, that Charles the Dolphin ſhould marrie the ladie Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter to king Edward, and they two to haue for the maintenance of their eſtates the whole duchie of Guien, or elſe fiftie thouſand crownes yearelie to be paid within the Tower of London by the ſpace of nine yeares; and at the end of that terme, the Dolphin and his wife to haue the whole duchie of Guien, and of the charge the French king to be cleerelie acquit. And it was alſo concluded, that the two princes ſhould come to an interview, and there take a corporall oth for the performance of this peace, either in ſight of other.

Want of monie procureth peace.

On the king of Englands part were compriſed as alies (if they would thereto aſſent) the dukes of Burgognie and Britaine. It was alſo couenanted, that after the whole ſumme aforeſaid of ſeuentie and fiue thouſand crownes were paid to king Edward, he ſhould leaue in hoſtage the lord Howard, and ſir John Cheinie maiſter of his horſſe, vntill he with all his armie was paſſed the ſeas. This agreement was verie acceptable to the French king; for he ſaw himſelfe and his realme thereby deliuered of great perill that was at hand: for not onelie he ſhould haue beene aſſailed (if this peace had not taken place) both by the power of England and Burgognie, but alſo by the duke of Britaine, and diuerſe of his owne people, as the conſtable and others. The king of England alſo vnderſtanding his owne ſtate, for want of monie, to mainteine the warres, if they ſhould long continue (though otherwiſe he deſired to haue attempted ſome high enterpriſe againſt the Frenchmen) was the more eaſilie induced to agree by thoſe of his councell, that loued peace better than warre, and their wiues ſoft beds better than hard armor and a ſtonie lodging.

The duke of Gloceſter an enimie to peace.
Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall fol.Ccxxxj.

But the duke of Gloceſter ⁊ others, whoſe ſwords thirſted for French bloud, cried out on this peace; ſaieng that all their trauell, paines, ⁊ expenſes were to their ſhame loſt and caſt awaie, and nothing gained but a continuall mocke [and dailie deriſion of the French king and all his minions. This imagination tooke effect without delaie. For a gentleman of the French kings chamber, after the peace was concluded, did demand of an Engliſhman, how manie battels king Edward had vanquiſht? He anſwered, nine: wherein he himſelfe perſonallie had beene. A great honour ſaid the Frenchman. But I praie you (quoth he ſmiling) how manie hath he loſt? The Engliſhman perceiuing what he meant, ſaid: one, which you by policie, and by no ſtrength, haue cauſed him to looſe.

Well ſaid the Frenchman, you maie ponder in a paire of balance, the gaine of nine gotten battels, and the rebuke of this one in this maner loſt: for I tell you, that we haue this ſaieng; The force of England hath and dooth ſurmount the force of France: but the ingenious wits of the Frenchmen excell the dull braines of Engliſhmen. For in all battels you haue beene the gainers, but in leagues and treaties our wits haue made you looſers: ſo that you maie content your ſelues with the loſſe in treaties, for the ſpoile that you gat in warres and battels. This communication was reported to the French king, who priuilie ſent for the Engliſhman to ſupper, and not onlie made him good cheere, but alſo gaue him a thouſand crownes, to praiſe the peace and to helpe to mainteine the ſame. Yet neuertheleſſe, he being not a little mooued with theſe brags, declared all the communication to the duke of Gloceſter; who ſware, that he would neuer haue ſet foot out of England, if he had not thought to haue made the Frenchmen once to aſſaie the ſtrength ⁊ puiſſance of the Engliſhmen: but what ſo euer he thought, all things were tranſferred vnto an other end than he could imagine.]

The duke of Burgognie commeth in haſt to the king of England.

When the duke of Burgognie heard that there was a peace in hand betwixt king Edward and the French king, he came in no ſmall haſt from Lutzenburgh, onelie accompanied with ſixteene horſſes into the king of Englands lodging, and began as one in a great chafe ſore to blame his dooings, declaring in plaine termes how diſhonorable this peace ſhould be vnto him, hauing atchiued nothing of that about the which he came. The king of England, after he had giuen him leaue to ſpeake his fanſie, anſwered him ſomewhat roundlie againe, openlie reproouing him for his promiſe-breaking and vncourteous dealing with him: where for his cauſe cheeflie he had paſſed the ſeas, and now found him not to keepe touch in anie one point which he had couenanted.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol.Ccxxxj.

¶ But to adde more weight to the matter in hand, ſith it was ſo ſeriouſlie debated betweene the two potentats, let vs heare what talke hiſtoriens report to haue beene interchanged betweene them. The king of England (ſaith mine author) not a little abaſhed both at the dukes ſudden comming, and his fierce countenance, like one that would rather bite than whine, demanded of him the cauſe of his ſudden comming. The duke ſharpelie anſwered, to know whether he had either entered into anie communication, or onelie had abſolutelie concluded a peace betweene the French king and him. King Edward declared how that for ſundrie and diuerſe great and vrgent cauſes, touching as well the vniuerſall publike wealth of the whole chriſtianitie, as their owne priuate commoditie and the quietneſſe of their realmes, he and the French king had concluded a peace and amitie for terme of nine yeares, in the which were compriſed, as fellowes and freends, both he and the duke of Britaine, requiring him to condeſcend and agree to the ſame.

Oh Lord, oh ſaint George (quoth the duke of Burgognie) haue you thus doone in deed? Haue you paſſed the ſeas, entered into France, and without killing of a poore flie, or burning of a ſeelie ſheepecote, and haue taken a ſhamefull truce? Did your noble anceſtor, K. Edward the third, euer make armie into France (as he made manie) in the which he did not either gaine victorie in battell, or profit in conquering cities, townes, and countries? That victorious prince, as neere kin to me, as you to king Henrie the fift, I meane whoſe bloud you haue either rightfullie or wrongfullie (God knoweth) extinguiſhed ⁊ deſtroied, with a ſmall puiſſance entered into France, conquered whole Normandie, and not alonelie conquered it, but peaceablie kept it, and neuer would either commen or agree to anie league, vntill he had the whole realme of France offered him; ⁊ was thereof made regent and heire apparant. And you without anie thing dooing, or anie honour or profit gaining, haue condeſcended to a peace, both as honourable and as profitable to you as a peaſecod, and not ſo wholeſome as a pomegranat. Thinke you that I either mooued you, or once intiſed you to take this iournie for my peculiar aduantage or commoditie (which of my power am able to reuenge mine owne cauſes, without helpe of others) but onelie to haue you recouer your old rights and poſſeſſions, which were from you both tortiouſlie and wrongfullie withholden? And to the intent that you ſhall know that I haue no need of your aid, I will neither enter into your league, nor take truce with the French king, till you be paſſed the ſea, and haue beene there three moneths.

When duke Charles had thus ſaid, he furiouſlie threw downe his chaire, and would haue departed. But the king him ſtaid ⁊ ſaid: Brother Charles, ſith you haue ſpoken at leaſure what you would, you muſt and ſhall heare againe what you would not. And firſt, as concerning our entrie into France, no man liuing knoweth that occaſion, neither ſo well, nor hath cauſe halfe ſo well to remember it as you: for if you haue not fullie put your greateſt things (to be had in memorie) in your box of obliuion, you be not yet out of mind how the French king, for all your power, tooke from you the faire towne of Amiens, and the ſtrong pile of ſaint Quintins, with diuerſe other townes, which you neither durſt nor yet were able either to reſcue or defend. Since which time, how he hath plagued you, how he hath taken from you your freends; yea, of your priuie chamber and ſecret councell (by whome all your ſecrets be to him reuealed and made open) you know or haue better cauſe to remember, and not to forget them. And when you determined to beſiege the towne of Nuſſe, you thought your ſelfe in a great doubt, whether you ſhould looſe more at home by your abſence (the French king dreaming and waiting like a fox for his preie) or gaine more in Germanie by your power and preſence. And to keepe the woolfe from the fold, that is, the French king from your caſtels and dominions, was the cheefe and principall cauſe whie you ſo faire praid me, ſo ſore laboured and intiſed me to paſſe ouer the ſea, promiſing mounteins of gold, which turned into ſnow and waſted into water, boaſting and craking to ſend horſſemen and footmen; and yet ſhewing neither lackie nor page. If we had made our enterpriſe for our ſelfe ſolie and in our owne quarell, thinke you that we would haue expected your comming? If the aduenture had beene for to haue recouered our right, imagine you that we would haue paſſed the ſea ſo ſlenderlie as we did, looking for your aid? Nay, nay, you ſhould haue well knowen, if we had intended a conqueſt, that we would haue ſo ſtronglie inuaded & ſet on the realme of France, that what with ſauour of burning of townes, and infection of the aier, corrupted by the multitude of dead carcaſes of our ſlaine enimies, your countries of Flanders & Brabant ſhould haue had cauſes enow to woonder at: truſting that that which we had gotten, we would haue kept as well as anie of our anceſtors haue doone.

But bicauſe the verie occaſion of the warre was yours, and that you wilfullie (I will not ſaie cowardlie) did not proſecute the ſame, the French king, who neuer offended me nor my ſubiects (except in mainteining the earle of Warwike, for the diſpleaſure that you bare him againſt me) offered me, being deſtitute of all your ſuccour and aid, both honourable and honeſt ouertures of peace, which offers I was in maner inforced (by verie reaſon) to incline to and accept, and ſo haue concluded a truce, which (God willing) I will both keepe and obſerue. God ſend you ioy (quoth the duke) and ſo abruptlie ended his talke for that time.]

He departeth from the king in a rage.

Heerwith (being in a great rage) he bad the king of England farewell, and ſuddenlie tooke his horſſe, and rode againe to Lutzenburgh, promiſing not to enter into anie league with the French king, till king Edward was paſſed the ſeas againe into England, and had beene there three moneths: but this promiſe was not performed, for of neceſſitie he tooke a wiſer waie, and agreed with the French king vpon a truce immediatlie after the departure of the Engliſh armie out of his countrie. The conſtable of France alſo, doubting that his vntruth would be diſcloſed to his deſtruction, by means of this agreement betweene the kings of England and France, as ſoone as he heard they were entred into communication thereof, ſent to king Edward, requiring him not to credit the French kings promiſes, which he would no longer obſerue, than vntill he ſhould once vnderſtand, that he was on the other ſide of the ſea: and rather than he ſhould agree for want of monie, he offered to lend him fiftie thouſand crownes. But the king of England, ſith the accord was paſſed and agreed, would not change anie thing for the promiſes of ſo ſlipper a merchant as he knew the conſtable to be.

The conſtable of France his offer to K. Edward.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Ccxxxij, Ccxxxiij.

¶Then was the conſtable in maner on all ſides in deſpaire, but yet he wrote to the French king by his meſſengers, beſeeching him to giue no credit or beleefe to anie tale told or fained againſt him, without hearing his anſwer, affirming that the king had alwaies knowen his truth and fidelitie toward the crowne of France, and ſo ſhould he ſtill find him till his dieng daie; promiſing and warranting him, if that it ſhould ſtand with his pleaſure, that he would ſo compaſſe the duke of Burgognie, that they two ſhould vtterlie deſtroie the king of England and his armie yer they returned. The councellors of the French king made anſwer, that their maſter and the king of England were ioined and confedered in a ſure amitie. Wherfore they would in no wiſe know nor condeſcend to anie thing that might be either preiudiciall, or once ſound to the detriment of the Engliſhmen: but they ſaid, that the king their maſter much truſted the conſtable, and that for his ſake he would talke with them in his priuie chamber. The French king, before their entrie into his chamber, cauſed the lord of Contaie, ſeruant vnto the duke of Burgognie, accompanied with the lord of Argenton, one of his priuie councell, to ſtand ſecretlie behind a ſeeling or hanging in his chamber, & he himſelfe ſat in a chaire directlie before that place, ſo that what ſoeuer were purpoſed to him, they ſtanding behind the cloth, might plainlie ſee and eaſilie heare the ſame.

Lewes de Creuell and his fellow entered into the kings chamber, of nothing thinking leſſe than of the ſpirits incloſed. They declared what paine their maſter had taken for the French kings ſake, to ſend, moue and entiſe the duke of Burgognie to leaue, and cleerelie to forſake the king of England, which duke they found in ſuch a rage and furie againſt the Engliſhmen, that at their requeſt he was not onelie vtterlie determined to forſake and refuſe their amitie, but alſo would ſend out aduenturers and lanceknights, to rob and ſpoile them in their returning. And in ſpeaking theſe words (thinking ſuerlie much to pleaſe the king) the ſaid Lewes counterfeted the faſhion and geſture of the duke of Burgognie, and began to ſtampe with his foot on the ground, and beat with his fiſt on the table, ſwearing by ſaint George that the king of England was not extracted of anie noble houſe, but was a yeomans ſonne; and that when he was not woorth one halfepenie, he was reſtored to his kingdome, and made king onelie by his aid, reprouing and reuiling him with ſuch ill words, and ſo ſhamefull termes, that all the hearers abhorred it.

Shamefull & ſlanderous words againſt the K. of Englan

The French king, faining that he was thicke of hearing, cauſed him to reiterate his ſaieng againe, who ſo counterfeited the verie geſture of the dukes angrie countenance and roring voice, that no man hath ſeene a better counterfeitor or actor in anie comedie or tragedie. The lord of Contaie was ſore diſpleaſed to ſee his maſter made a ieſting ſtocke; but he kept all theſe things ſecret, till his returne to his maſter. When the pageant was plaied, the king bad the meſſengers of the conſtable to haue him commended to his brother their maſter; and to declare to him that as newes roſe & grew, he would therof aduertiſe him, & ſo gaue them licence to depart to their maſter, who thought himſelfe now to be in great ſuertie of his eſtate, when in deed he was neuer ſo neere his fall and perdition: eſteeming the duke of Burgognie to be his aſſured freend, who hated him more than a Painime or Turke, accompting alſo the French king to haue no ill ſuſpicion in him, who neither truſted nor yet beleeued anie word, writing or meſſage that was either written or ſent from him. Such end hath diſſimulation, ſuch fruit ſpringeth of double dealing and craftie conueieng. For if either the conſtable had beene faithfull to the king his maſter, as of bounden dutie and allegiance he ought to be, or elſe had kept his promiſe made to the king of England and duke of Burgognie, and not dallied and diſſembled with them, he had ſuerlie in his extremitie beene aided, ſuccoured and comforted of one of theſe three at the leaſt; where now he was of all three forſaken, and yet not forſaken, but ſought for, looked for, and watched for; not for his profit or promotion, but for his vndoing and deſtruction: whereof he was the principall procurer, as manie a one beſides; wherto the poet had an eie, when he made this outcrie of inward greefe ſeaſoned with ſorrow and repentance:

Heu patior telis vulnera facta meis.]

After the peace was concluded, the Engliſhmen were permitted to enter into the towne of Amiens, and there to buie all ſuch neceſſarie things as they wanted, and had plentie of wine (for the French king had ſent into their armie a hundred carts of the beſt wine that could be gotten) and good cheere made them of his owne caſts. For at the enterie of euerie gate, there were two long tables ſet on euerie ſide of the ſtreet where they ſhould paſſe; and at euerie table fiue or ſix gentlemen of the beſt companions of all the countrie were appointed to interteine the Engliſhmen as they entered, not onelie to ſee them ſerued without lacking [but alſo to drinke and make good cheere, and keepe companie with them. And euer as they entered into the towne, they were taken by the bridels and in maner inforced to drinke, whereſoeuer they came they paied no monie, but were ſent ſcot free.] This cheere laſted three or foure daies not onelie to the French kings coſt, but alſo to his vnquietneſſe at length, doubting to haue beene diſpoſſeſſed of his towne.

Abr. Flem. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Ccxxxiij.

For on a daie there entered the number of nine thouſand Engliſhmen well armed in ſundrie companies, ſo that no Frenchman durſt once forbid them to enter. But finallie, order was taken by the king of England, who meant no deceit, that no greater number ſhould enter than was conuenient, and the other were called backe; ſo that the French king and his councell were well quieted, and rid of caſting further perils than need required. After this, both the kings enterviewed togither at Picquenie on the water of Some three leagues aboue Amiens, ſhewing great courteſie either to other. The letters of both their agreements were opened and red, ⁊ then either prince laid his right hand on the miſſall, and his left hand on the holie croſſe (as it was termed) and tooke there a ſolemne oth to obſerue and keepe the treatie for nine yeares concluded betweene them, with all their confederates and alies, compriſed, mentioned and ſpecified in the ſame, and further to accompliſh the marriage of their children.

The enterview betwixt king Edward the fourth, ⁊ the French king.

There was with either prince twelue noble men at this meeting, which was vpon a bridge caſt ouer the water of Some, a grate being ſet ouerthwart the ſame in the midſt, ſo from ſide to ſide, that the one prince could not come vnto the other; but onelie to imbrace ech other, in putting their armes through the holes of the *grate. There were foure Engliſhmen appointed to ſtand with the Frenchmen on the bridge to ſee their demeanour; and likewiſe foure Frenchmen were appointed to the Engliſhmen for the ſame purpoſe. There were with the king of England his brother the duke of Clarence, the earle of Northumberland, the biſhop of Elie his chancellor, the lord Haſtings his chamberleine, and eight others. They had louing and verie familiar talke togither a good ſpace, both afore their companie, and ſecretlie alone, whileſt their companie (of courteſie) withdrew ſomewhat backe.

*Of timber like to the grate where the lions be kept in the Tower.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw Hall. fol. Ccxxxiiij.

¶But it is noteworthie which I read touching both the kings meeting, the manner of their attire, and demeanour; namelie that when the token of meeting by the ſhot of the artillerie was knowne, the French king with twelue noble men entered the bridge, and came to the cloſure, with whome was Iohn duke of Burbon, and the cardinall his brother, a prelat more meet for a ladies carpet, than for an eccleſiaſticall pulpit, and ten other, amongſt whome the lord of Argenton was in like diſguiſed attire as the French king ware, for ſo was his pleaſure that daie to haue him adorned. The king of England and foure other with him were apparelled in cloth of gold friſed, hauing on his bonet of blacke veluet a flower delice of gold, ſet with verie rich and orient ſtones; he was a goodlie faire and beautifull prince, beginning a litle to grow in fleſh. Now when he approched neere the grate, hee tooke off his cap, and made a low and ſolemne obeiſance: the French king made to him an humble reuerence, but after his faſhion ſomewhat homelie. King Lewes imbraced king Edward through the barriers, ſaieng: Cooſine you be right heartilie welcome into theſe parties, aſſuring you that there is no man in the world that I haue more deſired to ſee and ſpeake with, than with you: and now lauded be almightie God, we be here met togither for a good and godlie purpoſe, whereof I doubt not but that we ſhall haue cauſe to reioiſe. The king of England thanked him, and anſwered to his words ſo ſoberlie, ſo grauelie, and ſo princelie, that the Frenchmen thereat not a litle muſed. The chancellor of England made there a ſolemne oration in laud and praiſe of peace, concluding on a propheſie, which ſaid that at Picquenie ſhould be concluded a peace both honorable and profitable to the realmes of England and France.

When the oth was taken and ſworne (as before you haue heard) the French king ſaid merilie to king Edward; Brother, if you will take pains to come to Paris, you ſhall be feaſted and interteined with ladies; and I ſhall appoint you the cardinall of Burbon for your confeſſor, which ſhall gladlie abſolue you of ſuch ſinnes, if anie be commited. The king of England tooke theſe words pleaſantlie and thankefullie, for he was informed that the cardinall was a good companion, and a chapleine meet for ſuch a dalieng paſtime. When this communication was merilie ended, the French king, intending to ſhew himſelfe like a maiſter amongſt his ſeruants, made all his companie to draw backe from him, meaning to commune with the king of England ſecretlie. The Engliſhmen withdrew them without any commandement: Then the two kings communed alone ſecretlie, I thinke not to the profit of the conſtable of France. The French king demanded of king Edward, whether the duke of Burgognie would accept the truce? King Edward anſwered that he would once againe make an offer; and then vpon the refuſall, he would referre and report the truth to them both. Then king Lewes began to ſpeake of the duke of Britaine, whome he would faine haue excepted out of the league. To whom the king of England anſwered: Brother, I require you to moue no warre to the duke of Britaine; for on my fidelitie, in the time of my need and aduerſitie, I neuer found a more friendlie, ſure and ſtedfaſt louer than he.

The manerlie Engliſh, and vnmanerlie French.

Then king Lewes called his companie againe, and with moſt lowlie and amiable commendations tooke his leaue of the king of England, ſpeaking certeine friendlie words to euerie Engliſhman: king Edward dooing likewiſe to the Frenchmen. Then both at one time departed from the barriers, ⁊ mounted on horſſebacke, and departed; the French king to Amiens, and king Edward to his armie. To whom was ſent out of the French kings houſe, all things neceſſarie for a prince, inſomuch that neither torches nor torchets lacked vnſent. When the French king was departed from Picquenie, he called to him the lord of Argenton, ſaieng: By the peace of God, the king of England is an amorous and a faire prince, he at the firſt becke would gladlie ſee Paris, where he might fortune to find ſuch pleaſant and talkatiue dames, which with faire words ⁊ pleaſant paſtimes might ſo allure him to their fantaſies, that it might breed occaſion in him to come ouer the ſea againe, which I would not gladlie ſee. For his progenitors haue beene too long and too often both in Paris and Normandie. On this ſide the ſea I loue neither his ſight nor his companie; but when he is at home I loue him as my brother, and take him as my friend.

French loue.

The French king, after this departing, ſore deſired to make warre on the duke of Britaine: which he could not doo, except he were left out of the treatie.

Wherefore he ſent the lord of Bouchage, and the lord of ſaint Pierre, to the king of England, intreating him by all waies and motions poſſible, to leaue the duke of Britaine for his alie, and not to haue him comprehended in the league. The king of England hearing them ſo ſeriouſlie and ſo feruentlie ſpeake againſt the duke of Britaine; with an earneſt countenance anſwered, ſaieng: My lords, I aſſure you, “if I were peaceablie at home in my realme, yet for the defenſe of the duke of Britaine and his countrie, “I would paſſe the ſeas againe, againſt all them that “either would doo him iniurie, or make warre vpon him. The French lords nothing further ſaieng, much maruelled why the king of England ſo ſuerlie claue to the duke of Britains partie: but they knew not (or elſe at the leaſt remembred not) that Henrie earle of Richmond was within the power and dominion of the duke of Britaine, whome king Edwards phantaſie euer gaue him would make once a title to the crowne of England, as next heire to the houſe of Lancaſter. For he knew well, that if the duke of Britaine would tranſport him into England (where hee had both kinſfolks and friends) with neuer ſo ſmall an aid (yea, though it were but the ſhadow of an armie) then were he inforced newlie to begin againe a conqueſt, as though he had neuer woone the crowne, nor obteined the poſſeſſion of the realme, which was the verie cauſe why he ſtucke ſo ſore to the duke of Britains part.

The ſame night the lords returned to Amiens, and reported to their maiſter king Edwards anſwer, who therewith was not the beſt pleaſed. But pleaſure or diſpleaſure, there was no remedie but to diſſemble the matter. This ſame night alſo, there came the lord Howard, and two other of the king of Englands councell, who had beene coadiutors toward the peace, to the French king to ſupper. The lord Howard ſaid to the French king ſecretlie in his eare, that if it ſtood with his pleaſure, he could perſuade the king of England to come to Amiens, yea, peraduenture as farre as Paris, familiarlie and friendlie to ſolace himſelfe with him, as his truſtie friend and faithfull brother. The French king, to whom this motion was nothing pleaſant, calling for water, waſhed, and roſe without anie anſwer making: but he ſaid to one of his councell, that he imagined in his owne conceipt, that this requeſt would be made. The Engliſhmen began againe to commune of that matter, the Frenchmen politikelie brake their communication, ſaieng: that the king with all celeritie muſt march forward againſt the duke of Burgognie.

Although this motion ſeemed onelie to increaſe loue and continuall amitie betweene the princes; yet the Frenchmen, hauing in their perfect remembrance the innumerable damages and hurts, which they of late daies had ſuſteined by the Engliſh nation (whereby continuall hatred increaſed againſt them in France) thought by policie and wiſedome, with faire words and friendlie countenance, to put by this requeſt, and to motion them rather to depart homeward, than to pricke them forward to Paris; where peraduenture they might be ſo interteined at this time, that they would at another come thither, both vndeſired and vnwelcomed. This peace was ſaid to be made onelie by the Holie-ghoſt, bicauſe that on the daie of meeting, a white doue ſat on the top of the king of Englands tent: whether ſhe ſate there to drie hir, or came thither as a token giuen by God, I referre it to your iudgment. At this treatie and meeting was not the duke of Gloceſter, nor other lords which were not content with this truce; but the duke came afterwards to Amiens', with diuerſe other lords of England, to the French king, which both highlie feaſted them, and alſo preſented them with plate and horſſes well garniſhed.

King Lewes, conſidering what gaine the Engliſhmen had gotten by making warre in France; and what miſerie, what calamitie, and what pouertie the French nation had ſuffered, and manie yeares ſuſteined, by reaſon of the ſaid warres; determined clearelie rather to pacifie and interteine the Engliſh nation by faire words and great rewards (although it were to his great charge) than by too much hardineſſe to put himſelfe, his nobilitie & realme in hazard, by giuing them battell, as his predeceſſors had vnwiſelie doone at Poitiers, and at Agincourt. Wherefore to buie peace, he granted king Edward for a yearelie tribute fiftie thouſand crownes, to be paied at London; which, accounting a crowne at foure ſhillings, amounteth to ten thouſand pounds. And to haue the fauour and good will of his chiefe councellors, he gaue great penſions, amounting to the ſumme of ſixteene thouſand crownes a yeere, that is to ſaie: to his chancellor, to the lord Haſtings his chiefe chamberleine, a man of no leſſe wit than vertue, and of great authoritie with his maiſter, and that not without cauſe; for he had as well in time of aduerſitie, as in the faire flattering world, well and trulie ſerued him: and to the lord Howard, to ſir Thomas Montgomerie, to ſir Thomas Sentleger, to ſir Iohn Cheinie maiſter of the kings horſſes, to the marques Dorſſet, ſonne to the queene, and diuerſe other, he gaue great and liberall rewards, to the intent to keepe himſelfe in amitie with England, while he wan and obteined his purpoſe and deſire in other places.

These perſons had giuen to them great gifts, beſide yearelie penſions. For Argenton his councellor affirmed of his owne knowledge, that the lord Howard had in leſſe than the tearme of two yeares, for reward in monie and plate, foure and twentie thouſand crownes; & at the time of this meeting, he gaue to the lord Haſtings the kings chiefe chamberleine, (as the Frenchmen write) an hundred markes of ſiluer, made in plate, whereof euerie marke is eight ounces ſterling. But the Engliſh writers affirme, that he gaue the lord Haſtings foure and twentie dozen bolles, that is to ſaie, twelue dozen gilt, & twelue dozen vngilt, euerie cup weieng ſeuenteene nobles: which gift, either betokened in him a great liberall nature, or elſe a great and eſpeciall confidence that he had repoſed in the ſaid lord chamberleine. Beſide this, he gaue him yearelie two thouſand crownes penſion, the which ſumme he ſent to him by Piers Cleret, one of the maiſters of his houſe, giuing him in charge to receiue of him an acquittance for the receipt of the ſame penſion, to the intent that it ſhould appeare in time to come, that the chancelor, chamberleine, admerall, maiſters of the horſſes to the king of England, and manie other of his councell, had bin in fee and penſionaries of the French king, whoſe yearelie acquittances (the lord Haſtings onelie excepted) remaine of record to be ſhewed in the chamber of accounts in the palace of Paris.

When Piers Cleret had paied the penſion to the lord Haſtings, he gentlie demanded of him an acquittance for his diſcharge. Which requeſt when he denied, he then onlie aſked of him a bill of three lines to be directed to the king, teſtifieng the receipt of the penſion: to the intent that the king your maiſter ſhould not thinke the penſion to be imbeſelled. The lord Haſtings, although he knew that Piers demanded nothing but reaſon, anſwered him: Sir this ” gift commeth onelie of the liberall pleaſure of the king his maiſter, and not of my requeſt: if it be his ” determinat will that I ſhall haue it, then put you it into my ſleeue; and if not, I praie you render to him ” his gift againe: for neither he nor you ſhall haue either letter, acquittance, or ſcroll ſigned with my hand of the receipt of anie penſion, to the intent to brag another daie, that the kings chamberleine of England hath béene penſionarie with the French king, ⁊ ſhew his acquittance in the chamber of accounts, to his diſhonor. Piers left his monie behind, and made relation of all things to his maiſter: which although that he had not his will, yet he much more praiſed the wiſdome and policie of the lord Haſtings, than of the other penſionaries, cõmanding him yearlie to be paied, without anie diſcharge demanding.]

K. Edward returneth into England.
Edw. Hall fol. Ccxxxvj.

When the king of England had receiued his monie, and his nobilitie their rewards, he truſſed vp his tents, laded his baggage, and departed towards Calis. [But yer he came there, he remembring the craftie diſſimulation, and the vntrue dealing of Lewes earle of ſaint Paule, high conſtable of France, intending to declare him to the French king in his verie true likeneſſe and portrature, ſent vnto him two letters of credence, written by the ſaid conſtable, with the true report of all ſuch words and meſſages as had béene to him ſent, and declared by the ſaid conſtable and his ambaſſadours. Which letters the French king gladlie receiued, and thankefullie accepted, as the chéefe inſtrument to bring the conſtable to his death: which he eſcaped no long ſeaſon after, ſuch is the end of diſſemblers.] When king Edward was come to Calis, and had ſet all things in an order, he tooke ſhip, and ſailed with a proſperous wind into England, and was roiallie receiued vpon Blackheath by the maior of London and the magiſtrates, and fiue hundred commoners apparelled in murrie, the eight and twentith daie of September, and ſo conueied through the citie of Weſtminſter, where for a while (after his long labour) he repoſed himſelfe [euerie daie almoſt talking with the quéene his wife of the marriage of his daughter, whome he cauſed to be called Dolphineſſe: thinking nothing ſurer than that marriage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which marriage cauſed him to diſſemble, and doo things which afterward chanced greatlie to the French kings profit, ⁊ ſmallie to his.]

Edw. Hall fol. Ccxxxvj.

About the ſame ſeaſon, the French king, to compaſſe his purpoſe for the getting of the conſtable into his hands, tooke truce with the duke of Burgognie for nine yeares, as a contractor in the league, and not comprehended as an other princes alie. The king of England aduertiſed hereof, ſent ouer ſir Thomas Montgomerie to the French king, offering to paſſe the ſeas againe the next ſummer in his aid, to make warres on the duke Burgognie; ſo that the French king ſhould paie to him fiftie thouſand crownes for the loſſe which he ſhould ſuſteine in his cuſtome, by reaſon that the wolles at Calis (bicauſe of the warres) could haue no vent, and alſo paie halfe the charges and halfe the wages of his ſouldiers and men of warre. The French king thanked the king of England for his gentle offer, but he alledged that the truce was alreadie concluded, ſo that he could not then attempt anie thing againſt the ſame without reproch to his honour.

Sir Thomas Mõtgomerie.

But the truth was, the French king neither loued the ſight nor liked the companie of the king of England on that ſide the ſea; but when he was here at home, he both loued him as his brother, and tooke him as his fréend. Sir Thomas Montgomerie was with plate richlie rewarded, and ſo diſpatched. There returned with him the lord Howard and ſir John Cheinie, which were hoſtages with the French king, till the Engliſh armie were returned into England. King Edward, hauing eſtabliſhed all things in good order, as men might iudge, both within his realme and without, was yet troubled in his mind, for that Henrie the earle of Richmond (one of the blood of king Henrie the ſixt) was aliue, and at libertie in Britaine; therefore to attempt eftſoones the mind of Francis duke of Britaine, he ſent ouer vnto the ſaid duke, one doctor Stillington, and two other his ambaſſadors laden with no ſmall ſumme of gold.

1475
Anno Reg. 15.

Henrie earle of Richmond.

These ambaſſadors, declaring their meſſage, affirmed that the king their maiſter willed to haue the earle of Richmond onelie for this purpoſe, to ioine with him in aliance by marriage, and ſo to plucke vp all the leauings of diſcord betwéene him and the contrarie faction. The duke gentlie heard the orators. And though at the firſt he by excuſes denied their requeſt, yet at the length, beléeuing that king Edward would giue to the earle his eldeſt daughter, the ladie Elizabeth in marriage, he conſented to deliuer him, and receiued of the Engliſh orators a great ſumme of monie. But yer they were imbarked with their preie, the duke being aduertiſed, that the earle of Richmond was not ſo earneſtlie ſought for, to be coupled in mariage with king Edwards daughter; but rather that his head might be chopped off with an hatchet, cauſed his treaſuror Peter Landoiſe to conueie the ſaid earle of Richmond into a ſanctuarie at S. Malo, where the Engliſh ambaſſadors then laie, onelie ſtaieng for a conuenient wind: who complained, that they were euill vſed, to be ſpoiled both of their monie and merchandize.

Ambaſſadors into Britaine

The earle of Richmond taketh ſanctuarie.

Yet bicauſe the matter was ſo handled, that it ſéemed the earle eſcaped into the ſanctuarie through their owne negligence, after they had receiued him into their hands; they were ſoone anſwered: but yet promiſe was made, that the earle ſhould be ſafelie kept, either in the ſanctuarie, or elſe as priſoner in the dukes houſe, that they ſhould not néed to feare him more than his ſhadow. And thus the king of England purchaſed for his monie the kéeping of his enimie, the ſpace onelie of thrée daies and no more. King Edward was ſomewhat diſpleaſed with this chance, but yet truſting that the duke of Britaine would (according to promiſe) ſée the earle of Richmond ſafelie kept from dooing anie gréeuance to him or his ſubiects, put all doubts thereof out of his mind, and began to ſtudie how to kéepe a liberall princelie houſe, and thereupon ſtoring his cheſts with monie, he imploied no ſmall portion in good houſekéeping.

¶But hauing ſpoken thus much of the earle of Richmond, whome Edward Hall compareth to a ſhéepe betraied into the téeth and clawes of the wolfe, you ſhall vnderſtand, that at ſuch time as his troubles were ſet freſh abroach, and he knowing that he was going towards his death, for verie penſifeneſſe and inward thought, fell into a feruent and ſore ague. In which verie ſeaſon, one John Cheulet, ſo eſtéemed among the princes of Britaine as few were in all the countrie, and in much credit, and well accepted with the duke, was (when theſe things were thus concluded) for his ſolace in the countrie. Who being hereof certified, was chaſed with the abhomination of the fact, reſorted to the court, and familiarlie came to the dukes preſence, where he ſtood ſo ſadlie and ſo palie, without anie word ſpeaking, that the duke was much abaſhed, and ſuddenlie maruelled at his ſad and frowning countenance, and demanded of him what ſhould ſignifie that dumpiſhneſſe of mind, and inward ſighing, the which by his countenance manifeſtlie appeared and was euident. He modeſtlie anſwered; Moſt noble and redoubted lord, this paleneſſe of viſage and deadlie looke dooth prognoſticate the time of my death to approach and be at hand, which if it had chanced to me before this daie, I aſſure you, it had much leſſe hurt me. For then had I not béene reſerued to féele the dolorous pangs and ſorowfull ſighings, which a fact by you doone (that I thought (impoſſible to be obteined) hath printed in my ſtomach and in my heart deeplie grauen: ſo that I well perceiue, that either I ſhall loſe my life, or elſe liue in perpetuall diſtreſſe and continuall miſerie.

For you my ſingular good lord, by your vertuous acts and noble feats, haue gotten to you in manner an immortall fame, which in euerie mans mouth is extolled & aduanced aboue the high clouds. But alas me ſeemeth (I praie you pardon me my rudeneſſe) that now that you haue obteined ſo high praiſe and glorie, you nothing leſſe regard than to keepe and preſerue the ſame inuiolate, conſidering that you, forgetting your faith and faithfull promiſe made to Henrie earle of Richmond, haue deliuered the moſt innocent yoong gentleman to the cruell tormentors, to be afflicted, rent in peeces, and ſlaine. Wherefore all ſuch as loue you, of the which number I am one, cannot chooſe but lament & be ſorie, when they ſee openlie the fame and glorie of your moſt renowmed name, by ſuch a diſloialtie and vntruth againſt promiſe, to be both blotted and ſtained with a perpetuall note of ſlander and infamie. Peace mine owne good John (quoth the duke) I praie thee, beleeue me there is no ſuch thing like to happen to the earle of Richmond: for king Edward hath ſent for him, to make of him, being his ſuſpected enimie, his good and faire ſonne in law.

Well well (quoth John) my redoubted lord, giue credence vnto me: the earle Henrie is at the verie brinke to periſh, whome if you permit once to ſet but one foot out of your power and dominion, there is no mortall creature able heereafter to deliuer him from death. The duke being moued with the perſuaſions of John Cheulet, which either little beleeued, or ſmallie ſuſpected king Edward, to deſire the earle for anie fraud or deceipt, or elſe ſeduced by blind auarice and loue of monie, more than honeſtie, fidelitie, or wiſedome would require, did not conſider what he vnaduiſedlie did, or what he aduiſedlie ſhould haue doone. Wherefore, with all diligence he ſent foorth Peter Landoiſe his cheefe treaſuror, commanding him to intercept and ſtaie the earle of Richmond, in all haſt poſſible, as before you haue heard.]

Sir John Croſbie his gift to the citie.

¶In this yeare deceaſſed ſir John Croſbie knight, (not long before this, maior of London) and was buried in the pariſh church of ſaint Helen in Biſhops gate ſtreet, vnto the reparing of which pariſh church he gaue fiue hundred marks, and thirtie pounds to be diſtributed to poore houſholders in the ward of Biſhops gate: to the reparing of the pariſh church at Heneworth in Middleſex fortie pounds: to the repairing of London wall one hundred pounds: toward the making of a new tower of ſtone at the ſouth end of London bridge, if the ſame were begun by the maior and communaltie within ten yeares next after his deceaſſe, one hundred pounds: to the reparations of Rocheſter bridge ten pounds: to euerie the priſons in and about London liberallie. Alſo he gaue to the wardens and communaltie of the grocers in London two large pots of ſiluer chaſed halfe guilt, weieng thirteene pounds and fiue ounces of Troie weight, to be occupied in their common hall, and elſewhere, at their diſcretions.

In this yeare were inhanced to the honour of knighthood, after the cuſtome of England, in the time of peace the kings eldeſt ſon Edward prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and earle of Cheſter, his ſecond ſonne the duke of Yorke, and with them the earle of Lincolnes ſonne and heire, the duke of Suffolke, the lord Thomas Greie, the queenes ſonne, and Richard his brother, the earle of Shrewesburie, the earle of Wilſhire, maſter Edward Woduile, the lord Neuill, the lord Barkleis ſonne and heire, the lord Audelies ſonne and heire, the lord ſaint Amand, the lord Stanleis ſonne and heire, the lord Suttons ſonne and heire, the lord Haſtings ſonne and heire, the lord Ferrers of Charleis ſonne and heire, maſter Herbert brother to the earle of Penbroke, maſter Vaughan Brian chiefe iudge, Litilton one of the iudges of the common plees, maſter Bedringham, maſter Brian Stapleton, Kneuit, Pilkinton, Ludlow, Charleton, &c. The ſame daie the king created the lord Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet before dinner, and ſo in the habit of a marqueſſe aboue the habit of his knighthood he began the table of knights in ſaint Edwards chamber. At that time he ordeined that the kings chamberleine ſhould go with the ancient and well nurtered knight, to aduertiſe and teach the order of knighthood to the eſquiers, being in the baine. The king himſelfe came in perſon and did honour to all the companie with his noble councell.]

The death of the duke of Burgognie.

This yeare the duke of Burgognie was ſlaine by the Switzers, before the towne of Nancie in Loraine, after whoſe death the French king wan all the townes which the ſaid duke held in Picardie and Artois. And bicauſe that the towne of Bullen and countie of Bullenois apperteined by right of inheritance vnto the lord Berthram de la Toure, earle of Auuergne, the French king bought of him his right and title in the ſame, and recompenſed him with other lands in the countie of Foreſts, and in other places. And bicauſe the forenamed towne and countie were holden of the earledome of Artois, he changed the tenure, and auowed to hold the ſame towne & countie of our ladie of Bolongne, and therof did homage to the image in the great church of Bolongne, offering there an hart of gold, weieng two thouſand crownes; ordeining further, that his heires and ſucceſſors at their entrie into their eſtates, by themſelues or their deputies, ſhould offer an hart of like weight and value, as a reliefe and homage for the ſame towne and countie.

Agnes Daintie on the pillorie.

¶ This yeare was Robert Baſſet maior of London, who did ſharpe correction vpon bakers, for making of light bread, he cauſed diuerſe of them to be ſet on the pillorie in Cornehill. And alſo one Agnes Daintie a butterwife for ſelling of butter new and old mingled togither, being firſt trapped with butter diſhes, was then ſet on the pillorie. ¶The counteſſe of Oxford deceaſſed and was buried at Windſore. ¶Alſo this yeare Richard Rawſon one of the ſhiriffes of London, cauſed to be builded one houſe in the church yard of S. Part of London wall new builded.
John Rouſe.
Biſhops gate new builded.

By the diligence of Ralph Joſſeline maior of London, the wall about London was new made betwixt Algate and Creplegate: he cauſed the Moore field to be ſearched for claie, and bricke to be made and burnt there: he alſo cauſed chalke to be brought out of Kent, and in the ſame Moore field to be burnt into lime, for the furtherance of that worke. The maior with his companie of the drapers made all that part betwixt Biſhops gate and Alhalowes church in the ſame wall. Biſhops gate it ſelfe was new built by the merchants Almans of the Stilliard, and from Alhalowes church toward Moore gate a great part of the ſame was builded of the goods, & by the executors of ſir John Croſbie ſomtimes an alderman of London, as may appeare by his armes in two places fixed. The companie of Skinners made that part of the wall betweene Algate and Buries markes towards Biſhops gate, as may appeare by their armes in three places fixed: the other companies of the citie made the other deale of the ſaid wall, which was a great worke to be doone in one yeare.

Burdet for a word ſpoken beheaded.

Enguerant.

Regiſter of the Greie friers.

Alſo this yeare Thomas Burdet an eſquier of Arrow in Warwikeſhire, ſonne to ſir Nicholas Burdet (who was great butler of Normandie in Henrie the ſixt daies) was beheaded for a word ſpoken in this ſort. King Edward in his progreſſe hunted in Thomas Burdets parke at Arrow, and ſlue manie of his deere, amongſt the which was a white bucke, whereof Thomas Burdet made great account. And therefore when he vnderſtood thereof, he wiſhed the buckes head in his bellie that moued the king to kill it. Which tale being told to the king, Burdet was apprehended and accuſed of treaſon, for wiſhing the buckes head (hornes and all) in the kings bellie: he was condemned, drawne from the Tower of London to Tiburne, and there beheaded, and then buried in the Greie friers church at London. Wherefore it is good counſell that the wiſeman giueth, ſaieng: Keepe thy tong & keepe thy life, for manie times we ſee, that ſpeech offendeth & procureth miſcheefe, where ſilence is author neither of the one nor the other, as it is trulie and in praiſe of ſilence ſpoken by the poet:

-nulli tacuiſſe nocet, nocet eſſe loquutum.]

About this ſeaſon, through great miſhap, the ſparke of priuie malice was newlie kindled betwixt the king and his brother the duke of Clarence, inſomuch that where one of the dukes ſeruants was ſuddenlie accuſed (I can not ſaie whether of truth, or vntrulie ſuſpected by the dukes enimies) of poiſoning, ſorcerie or inchantment, and thereof condemned, and put to execution for the ſame; the duke which might not ſuffer the wrongfull condemnation of his man (as he in his conſcience iudged) nor yet forbeare but to murmur and reproue the dooing thereof, moued the king with his dailie exclamation to take ſuch diſpleaſure with him, that finallie the duke was caſt into the Tower, and therewith adiudged for a traitor, and priuilie drowned in a butt of malmeſie, the eleuenth of March, in the beginning of the ſeuententh yeare of the kings reigne.

Anno Reg. 17. George duke of Clarence drowned in a butt of malmeſie.

Some haue reported, that the cauſe of this noble mans death roſe of a fooliſh propheſie, which was, that after K. Edward one ſhould reigne, whoſe firſt letter of his name ſhould be a G. Wherewith the king and queene were ſore troubled, and began to conceiue a greeuous grudge againſt this duke, and could not be in quiet till they had brought him to his end. And as the diuell is woont to incumber the minds of men which delite in ſuch diueliſh fantaſies, they ſaid afterward, that that propheſie loſt not his effect, when after king Edward, Gloceſter vſurped his kingdome. Other alledged, that the cauſe of his death was for that the duke, being deſtitute of a wife, by the meanes of his ſiſter the ladie Margaret, ducheſſe of Burgognie, procured to haue the ladie Marie, daughter and heire to hir huſband duke Charles.

Propheſies diueliſh fantaſies.

Which marriage king Edward (enuieng the proſperitie of his brother) both gainesaid and diſturbed, and thereby old malice reuiued betwixt them: which the queene and hir bloud (euer miſtruſting, and priuilie barking at the kings linage) ceaſſed not to increaſe. But ſure it is, that although king Edward were conſenting to his death; yet he much did both lament his infortunate chance, & repent his ſudden execution: inſomuch that when anie perſon ſued to him for the pardon of malefactors condemned to death, he would accuſtomablie ſaie, & openlie ſpeake: « Oh infortunate brother, for whoſe life not one would « make ſute. Openlie and apparantlie meaning by ſuch words, that by the meanes of ſome of the nobilitie he was deceiued and brought to confuſion.

This duke left behind him two yoong infants begot of the bodie of his wife, the daughter of Richard late earle of Warwike: which children by deſtinie as it were, or by their owne merits, following the ſteps of their anceſtors, ſucceeded them in like miſfortune and ſemblable euill chance. For Edward his heire, whom king Edward had created earle of Warwike was three and twentie yeares after, in the time of Henrie the ſeauenth, atteinted of treaſon, and on the Tower hill loſt his head. Margaret his ſole daughter maried to ſir Richard Pole knight, and by Henrie the eight reſtored to the name, title, & poſſeſſions of the earledome of Saliſburie, was at length for treaſon committed againſt the ſaid Henrie the eight atteinted in open parlement; and ſixtie two yeares after hir father had ſuffered death in the Tower, ſhe on the greene within the ſame place was beheaded. In whoſe perſon died the verie ſurname of Plantagenet, which from Geffrie Plantagenet ſo long in the bloud roiall of this realme had floriſhed and continued.

Edward erle of warwike ſonne & heire to George duke of Clarence.

Margaret ducheſſe of Saliſburie.

A great peſtilence.

After the death of this duke, by reaſon of great heat and diſtemperance of aire, happened ſo fierce & quicke a peſtilence, that fifteene yeares warre paſt conſumed not the third part of the people, that onelie foure moneths miſerablie and pitifullie diſpatched & brought to their graues. So that if the number had beene kept by multiplieng of vnities, & out of them to haue raiſed a complet number, it would haue mooued matter of verie great admiration. But it ſhould ſeeme that they were infinit, if conſideration be had of the compariſon, inferred for the more effectuall ſetting foorth of that cruell and ceaſeleſſe contagion. And ſuerlie it ſoundeth to reaſon, that the peſtilence ſhould fetch awaie ſo manie thouſands, as in iudgement by proportion of fifteene yeares warre one maie gather; and manie more too. For euerie man knoweth that in warres, time, place, perſons, and meanes are limited: time of warre begun and ended; place circumſcribed; perſons imbattelled, and weapons alſo whereby the fight is tried: ſo that all theſe haue their limitations, beyond which they haue no extent. But the peſtilence, being a generall infection of the aire, an element ordeined to mainteine life, though it haue a limitation in reſpect of the totall compaſſe of the world; yet whole climats maie be poiſoned; and it were not abſurd to ſaie, that all and euerie part of the aire maie be peſtilentlie corrupted; and ſo conſequentlie not limited: wherefore full well it maie be ſaid of the peſtilence (procuring ſo great a depopulation) as one ſaith of ſurfetting:

Enſe cadunt multi, perimit ſed crapula plures.

Auſon.

1478. Anno Reg. 18.

The councellors of the yoong ducheſſe of Burgognie ſent to K. Edward for aid againſt the French king. About the ſame time had the queene of England ſent to the ladie Margaret ducheſſe of Burgognie, for the preferrement of hir brother Anthonie erle Riuers to the yoong damſell. But the councell of Flanders, conſidering that he was but an earle of meane eſtate, and ſhe the greateſt inheritrice of all chriſtendome at that time, gaue but deafe eare to ſo vnmeet a requeſt. To which deſire, if the Flemings had but giuen a liking eare by outward ſemblance, and with gentle words delaied the ſute, ſhe had beene both ſuccoured and defended. Whether king Edward was not contented with this refuſall, or that he was loth to breake with the French king, he would in no wiſe conſent to ſend an armie into Flanders againſt the French king: but yet he ſent ambaſſadours to him with louing and gentle letters, requiring him to grow to ſome reaſonable order & agreement with the yoong ducheſſe of Burgognie, or at the leaſt to take a truce with hir at his requeſt.

The ambaſſadours of England were highlie receiued, bountifullie feaſted, and liberallie rewarded, but anſwer to their deſire had they none; ſauing that ſhortlie after, the French king would ſend ambaſſadours, hoſtages, and pledges to the king of England their maiſter, for the perfecting and concluding of all things depending betweene them two; ſo that their ſouereigne lord & they ſhould haue cauſe to be contented and pleaſed. Theſe faire words were onelie delaies to driue time, vntill he might haue ſpace to ſpoile the yoong damſell of hir townes and countries. And beſide this, to ſtaie king Edward from taking part with hir, he wrote to him, that if he would ioine with him in aid, he ſhould haue and inioie to him and his heires the whole countie & countrie of Flanders, diſcharged of homage, ſuperioritie and reſort, to be claimed by the French king, or his ſucceſſors.

Large offers made to the king of England by the French king.

He alſo wrote that he ſhould haue the whole duchie of Brabant, whereof the French king offered at his owne coſt and charge to conquer foure of the chiefeſt and ſtrongeſt townes within the ſaid duchie, & them in quiet poſſeſſion to deliuer to the king of England: granting further to paie him ten thouſand angels toward his charges, with munitions of warre and artillerie, which he promiſed to lend him, with men and carriage for the conueiance of the ſame. The king of England refuſed to make anie warres againſt thoſe countries that were thus offered to him: but if the French king would make him partner of his conqueſts in Picardie, rendering to him part of the townes alreadie gotten, as Bologne, Monſterell, and Abuile, then he would ſuerlie take his part, and aid him with men at his owne coſts and charges.

Anno Reg. 19.

Thus paſſed faire words and golden promiſes betweene theſe two princes: and in the meane time the yoong ducheſſe of Burgognie was ſpoiled of hir townes, caſtels & territories, till at length for maintenance ſhe condeſcended to marrie with Maximilian ſonne to the emperour Frederike, that he might keepe the woolfe from the fold. King Edward in the nineteenth yeare of his reigne began (more than he was before accuſtomed) to ſerch the forfeiture of penall lawes and ſtatutes, as well of the cheefe of his nobilitie as of other gentlemen, being proprietaries of great poſſeſſions, or abundantlie furniſhed with goods; likewiſe of merchants, and other inferior perſons. By reaſon whereof, it was of all men iudged that he would proue hereafter a ſore and a rigorous prince among his ſubiects. But this his new inuented practiſe and couetous meaning (by reaſon of foreine affaires and abridgement of his daies in this tranſitorie life, which were within two yeares after conſumed) tooke ſome (but not great) effect.

Peſtilence.

Vnaduiſed & vnſeemelie demeanor puniſhed with a fine.

Conduit in Cheape builded.

¶ In this yeare was great mortalitie and death by the peſtilence, not onelie in London, but in diuerſe parts of the realme, which began in the latter end of September in the yeare laſt before paſſed, and continued all this yeare till the beginning of Nouember, which was about fourteene moneths: in the which ſpace died innumerable of people in the ſaid citie & elſe-where. ¶ This yeare alſo the maior of London being in Paules, kneeling in his deuotions at ſaint Erkenwalds ſhrine, Robert Bifield one of the ſhiriffes vnaduiſedlie kneeled downe nigh vnto the maior: whereof afterward the maior charged him to haue doone more than becomed him. But the ſhiriffe anſwering rudelie and ſtubbornlie, would not acknowledge to haue committed anie offenſe: for the which he was afterward by a court of aldermen fined at fiftie pounds to be paid toward the reparations of the conduits in London, which was trulie paid. ¶ This yeere Thomas Ilam one of the ſhirifs of London newlie builded the great conduit in Cheape, of his owne charges. ¶ This yeare alſo king Edward began his Chriſtmaſſe at Waking, and at fiue daies end remooued to Greenewich, where he kept out the other part of his Chriſtmaſſe with great roialtie.]

1480
Anno Reg.20

Ambaſſadours were ſent to and fro betwixt the king of England and France, and ſtill the French king fed the king of England with faire words, putting him in hope to match his ſonne and heire the Dolphin with the ladie Elizabeth daughter to the king of England, according to the concluſions of agreement had and made at Picquenie betwixt them, although in verie deed he meant nothing leſſe. His ambaſſadours euer made excuſes if anie thing were amiſſe, and he vſed to ſend change of ambaſſadours; ſo that if thoſe which had beene here before, and were returned, had ſaid or promiſed anie thing (though they were authoriſed ſo to doo) which might turne to their maſters hinderance, the other that came after, might excuſe themſelues by ignorance of that matter; affirming that they wanted commiſſion once to talke or meddle with that matter: or if he perceiued that anie thing was like to be concluded contrarie to his mind, for a ſhift he would call his ambaſſadours home in great haſt, and after ſend an other with new inſtructions nothing depending on the old.

The French king feedeth the king of England with faire words and promiſes.

Thus the French king vſed to dallie with king Edward in the caſe of this mariage, onelie to keepe him ſtill in amitie. And certeinelie the king of England, being a man of no ſuſpicious nature, thought ſooner that the ſunne ſhould haue fallen from his circle, than that the French king would haue diſſembled or broken promiſe with him. But there is none ſo ſoone beguiled, as he that leaſt miſtruſteth; nor anie ſo able to deceiue, as he to whome moſt credence is giuen. But as in miſtruſting nothing, is great lightneſſe; ſo in too much truſting, is too much follie: which well appeared in this matter. For the French king, by cloking his inward determinate purpoſe with great diſſimulation and large promiſes, kept him ſtill in freendſhip with the king of England, till he had wrought a great part of his will againſt the yoong ducheſſe of Burgognie. Which king Edward would not haue ſuffered, if he had put anie great doubt in the French kings faire promiſes, conſidering that the crowne of France was in this meane time ſo much increaſed in dominions, to the great reenforcement of that realme.

Fiue theeues for ſacrilege ſeuerelie executed.

¶ On the two and twentith of Februarie were fiue notable theeues put to death, for robbing the church called ſaint Martins le grand in London, and other places; three of them were drawne to the Tower hill, hanged & burnt, the other two were preſſed to death. A ſore and ſeuere kind of execution no doubt, but yet thought by iuſtice meritorious in the malefactors, for their offenſes of ſacrilege. Heinous enough had it beene to ſpoile a priuat man of his goods, and by law of nations puniſhable with death; but much more horrible, that prophane perſons with polluted hands ſhould priuilie or openlie ſo touch holie & conſecrated things, as to take them out of a ſacred place, whereto (for holy vſes) they were dedicated, & applie them to the ſatiſfieng of the corrupt concupiſcences of their owne hearts, the bottomleſſe gulfe whereof bicauſe no booties nor ſpoiles could ſatiſfie; it ſtood with the high praiſe of iuſtice that they and their ceaſeleſſe deſires were ſeuered by deſerued death; wherefore it is wiſelie ſaid by the comicall poet of ſuch greedie guts:

Plau. in Pe

Quam quis auidus poſcit eſcam auariter,
Decipitur in tranſenna peritque auaritia.

In this yeare king Edward required great ſums of monie to be lent him. The citizens of London granted him fiue thouſand marks, which were ſeized of the fiue and twentie wards: which fiue thouſand marks was trulie repaid againe in the next yeare following. ¶Alſo this yeare on Whitſundaie K. Edward the fourth created the lord Berkleie, vicount Berkeleie, at Greenewich. ¶ In this yeare alſo an houſe on London bridge called the common ſiege, or priuie, fell downe into the Thames, where through it fiue perſons were drowned. ¶This yeare the king with his queene kept a roiall Chriſtmas at Windſor.

Scala temporum.

The king feaſteth the maior and aldermen.

Alſo this yeere was one Richard Chawrie maior of London, whome king Edward ſo greatlie fauoured, that he tooke him (with certeine of his brethren the aldermen, & commons of the citie of London) into the foreſt of Waltham, where was ordeined for them a pleaſant lodge of greene boughs, in which lodge they dined with great cheere; & the king would not go to dinner vntill he ſaw them ſerued. Moreouer he cauſed the lord chamberlaine, with other lords, to cheere the ſaid maior and his companie ſundrie times whileſt they were at dinner. After dinner they went a hunting with the king, and ſlue manie deare, as well red as fallow, whereof the king gaue vnto the maior and his companie good plentie, and ſent vnto the ladie maireſſe and hir ſiſters the aldermens wiues, two harts, ſix bucks, and a tun of wine to make them merrie with, which was eaten in the drapers hall. The cauſe of which bountie thus ſhewed by the king, was (as moſt men did take) for that the maior was a merchant of woonderous aduentures into manie and ſundrie countries. By reaſon whereof, the king had yearelie of him notable ſummes of monie for his cuſtomes, beſide other pleaſures that he had ſhewed vnto the king before times. ¶ This yeere the Scots begen to ſtir, againſt whom the king ſent the duke of Gloceſter & manie others, which returned againe without any notable battell.]

Ambaſſadors forth of Scotland.

In this verie ſeaſon James the third of that name king of Scots ſent into England a ſolemne ambaſſage for to haue the ladie Cicilie, king Edwards ſecond daughter, to be married to his eldeſt ſonne James, prince of Scotland, duke of Rothſaie, and earle of Caricke. King Edward and his councell, perceiuing that this affinitie ſhould be both honourable and profitable to the realme, did not onelie grant to his deſire; but alſo before hand diſburſed certeine ſummes of monie, to the onelie intent that the marriage hereafter ſhould neither be hindered nor broken. With this condition, that if the ſaid mariage by anie accidentall meane ſhould in time to come take none effect; or that king Edward would notifie to the king of Scots, or his councell, that his pleaſure was determined to haue the ſaid marriage diſſolued: then the prouoſt and merchants of the towne of Edenburgh, ſhould be bound for repaiment of the ſaid ſummes againe. All which things were with great deliberation concluded, paſſed, and ſealed, in hope of continuall peace and indiſſoluble amitie.

But king James was knowne to be a man ſo wedded to his owne opinion, that he could not abide them that would ſpeake contrarie to his fanſie: by meanes whereof, he was altogither led by the counſell and aduiſe of men of baſe linage, whome for their flatterie he had promoted vnto great dignities and honourable offices. By which perſons diuerſe of the nobilitie of his realme were greatlie miſuſed and put to trouble, both with impriſonment, exactions, & death; inſomuch that ſome of them went into voluntarie exile. Amongſt whome Alexander duke of Albanie, brother to king James, being exiled into France, & paſſing through England, taried with K. Edward: and vpon occaſion mooued him to make warre againſt his brother, the ſaid king James, for that he forgetting his oth, promiſe, and affinitie concluded with king Edward, cauſed his ſubiects to make roads and forraies into the Engliſh borders, ſpoiling, burning, and killing king Edwards liege people.

King Edward, not a little diſpleaſed with this vnprincelie dooing, prouoked and ſet on alſo by the duke of Albanie, determined to inuade Scotland with an armie, as well to reuenge his owne iniuries receiued at the hands of king James, as to helpe to reſtore the duke of Albanie vnto his countrie and poſſeſſions againe. Herevpon all the Winter ſeaſon he muſtered his men, prepared his ordinance, rigged his ſhips, and left nothing vnprouided for ſuch a iournie: ſo that in the beginning of the yeare, all things apperteining to the warre, and neceſſarie for his voiage, were in a readineſſe. To be the cheefteine of his hoaſt, and lieutenant generall, Richard duke of Gloceſter was appointed by his brother king Edward; and with him were adioined as aſſociats, Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, Thomas lord Stanleie lord ſteward of the kings houſe, the lord Louell, the lord Greieſtocke, and diuerſe other noble men and worthie knights.

Preparation for warre againſt Scotland.

Anno Reg.22.

An armie ſent into Scotland.

These valiant capteins came to Alnewike in Northumberland, about the beginning of Julie, where they firſt incamped themſelues, & marſhalled their hoaſt. The fore-ward was led by the earle of Northumberland, vnder whoſe ſtandard were the lord Scroope of Bolton, ſir John Middleton, ſir John Dichfield, and diuerſe other knights, eſquiers, & ſouldiers, to the number of ſix thouſand and ſeauen hundred. In the midle-ward was the duke of Gloceſter, and with him the duke of Albanie, the lord Louell, the lord Greieſtocke, ſir Edward Wooduile, and other, to the number of fiue thouſand & eight hundred men. The lord Neuill was appointed to follow, accompanied with three thouſand. The lord Stanleie led the wing on the right hand of the dukes battell with foure thouſand men of Lancaſhire & Cheſhire. The lord Fitz Hugh, ſir William a Parre, ſir James Harrington, with the number of two thouſand ſouldiers, guided the left wing. And beſide all theſe, there were one thouſand appointed to giue their attendance on the ordinance.

Creplegate builded.

¶In this yeare Edmund Shaw goldſmith and maior of London newlie builded Creplegate from the foundation, which gate in old time had bene a priſon, whereunto ſuch citizens and other as were arreſted for debt (or like treſpaſſes) were committed, as they be now to the counters, as maie appeare by a writ of king Edward the ſecond, in theſe words: Rex vic London ſalutem. Ex graui querela capti & detenti in priſona noſtra de Creplegate, pro x. li. quas coram Radulpho Sandwico, tunc cuſtode ciuitatis noſtræ London, & I. de Blackewell cuſtode recognit. debitorum, &c. King Edward held his Chriſtmas at Eltham, and kept his eſtate all the whole feaſt in his great chamber; and the queene in hir chamber, where were dailie more than two thouſand perſons. The ſame yeare on Candlemas day, he with his queene went on proceſſion from ſaint Stephans chappell into Weſtminſter hall, accompanied with the earle of Angus, the lord Greie, & ſir James Liddall, ambaſſadors from Scotland. And at his proceeding out of his chamber he made ſir John Wood vnder-treaſuror of England, & ſir William Cateſbie one of the iuſtices of the cōmon plees, knights.]

Berwike wonne by the Engliſhmen.

But to returne to the kings affaires concerning Scotland. The roiall armie aforeſaid, not intending to loſe time, came ſuddenlie by the water ſide to the towne of Berwike, and there (what with force, and what with feare of ſo great an armie) tooke and entered the towne: but the earle of Bothwell, being capteine of the caſtell, would in no wiſe deliuer it; wherfore the capteins, vpon good and deliberate aduiſe, planted a ſtrong ſiege round about it. When this ſiege was laid, the two dukes and all the other ſouldiers (except the lord Stanleie, ſir Iohn Elrington treaſuror of the kings houſe, ſir William a Parre, and foure thouſand men that were left behind to keepe the ſiege before the caſtell) departed from Berwike toward Edenburgh; and in marching thitherward, they burnt and deſtroied manie townes and baſtiles. King Iames hauing ſmall confidence in his communaltie, and leſſe truſt in his nobilitie, kept himſelfe within the caſtell of Edenburgh.

The duke of Gloceſter entered into the towne, and at the eſpeciall deſire of the duke of Albanie ſaued the towne, and the inhabitants from fire, bloud, and ſpoile, taking onelie of the merchants, ſuch preſents as they gentlie offered to him and his capteins, cauſing Gartier principall king at armes to make a publike proclamation at the high croſſe in the market place of Edenburgh; by the which he warned and admoniſhed king Iames, to kéepe, obſerue, and performe, all ſuch promiſes, compacts, conenants, and agréements, as he had concluded and ſealed with the king of England, and alſo to make ſufficient recompenſe vnto his ſubiects, for the tyrannie, ſpoile, and crueltie which he and his people had committed and doone, contrarie to the league, within the marches of his realme of England, before the firſt daie of Auguſt next inſuing: and further without delaie to reſtore his brother the duke of Albanie to his eſtate, & all his poſſeſſions, offices, and authorities, in as large maner as he occupied & inioied the ſame before. Or elſe the duke of Gloceſter, lieutenant generall for the king of England, was readie at hand to deſtroie him, his people, and countries, with ſlaughter, flame, and famine.

King Iames would make no anſwer, neither by word nor writing, but kept himſelfe cloſe within the caſtell. But the lords of Scotland lieng at Hadington with a great puiſſance, determined firſt to practiſe with the duke of Gloceſter for a peace, and after by ſome meanes to allure the duke of Albanie from the Engliſh amitie. And vpon this motion, the ſecond daie of Auguſt they wrote to the duke of Gloceſter, requiring that the mariage betwéene the prince of Scotland, and king Edwards daughter might be accompliſhed, according to the couenants: and further, that a peace from thenceforth might be louinglie concluded betwéene both the realmes. The duke of Gloceſter anſwered againe vnto theſe demands; that for the article of the mariage, he knew not the king his brothers determinate pleaſure, either for the affirmance or deniall of the ſame; but neuertheleſſe he deſired full reſtitution of all the ſums of monie preſſed out in lone vpon the ſame mariage. And as for peace, he aſſured them that he wold agrée to none, except the caſtell of Berwike might be to him deliuered; or at the leaſt wiſe, that he ſhould vndertake that the ſiege lieng afore the ſame ſhould not be troubled by the king of Scots, nor by anie of his ſubiects, nor by his or their procurement or meanes.

The biſhop elect of Murreie ſent to the duke of Gloceſter.

The Scottiſh lords, vpon this anſwer and demands of the duke of Gloceſter, ſent to him the elect of Murreie, and the lord Dernleie, which excuſed the matter touching the repaiment of the monie: for that the time of the lawfull contract of the ſaid mariage was not yet come, and no daie appointed for the monie to be paied before the contract begun. But for further aſſurance either for the contract to be made, or for the paiment of the monie, they promiſed therevnto accordinglie (as reaſon ſhould require) to agrée. Secondarilie, as touching the caſtell of Berwike, they alledged that it apperteined to the realme of Scotland, as the old inheritance of the ſame.

The duke, notwithſtanding all that they could ſaie, would agrée to no peace, except the caſtell of Berwike might be deliuered to the K. of England. And ſo the meſſengers departed. The ſame daie the archbiſhop of S. Andrews, the biſhop of Dunkeld, Colin earle of Argile, lord Campbell, and lord Andrew lord of Anandale chancellor of Scotland, wrote to the duke of Albanie, a ſolemne and an autenticall inſtrument, ſigned and ſealed with their hands and ſeales, concerning a generall pardon to him and his ſeruants, vpon certeine conditions to be granted; which conditions ſéemed to be ſo reaſonable, that the duke of Albanie, deſirous to be reſtored to his old eſtate, poſſeſſions, and natiue countrie, willinglie accepted the ſame.

But before he departed from the duke of Gloceſter, he promiſed both by word and writing of his owne hand, to doo and performe all ſuch things, as he before that time had ſworne and promiſed to king Edward: notwithſtanding anie agréement now made, or after to be made with the lords of Scotland. And for performance of the effect hereof, he againe tooke a corporall oth, and ſealed the writing before the duke of Gloceſter, in the Engliſh campe at Leuington beſides Hadington, the third daie of Auguſt, in the yeare 1482. After he was reſtored, the lords of Scotland proclamed him great lieutenant of Scotland; and in the kings name made proclamation, that all men within eight daies ſhould be readie at Crauſhaus, both to raiſe the ſiege before the caſtell, and for the recouering againe of the towne of Berwike.

The duke of Albanie reſtored home.

He is created great lieutenant of Scotland.

The duke of Albanie wrote all this preparation to the duke of Gloceſter, requiring him to haue no miſtruſt in his dealings. The duke of Gloceſter wrote to him againe his mind verie roundlie, promiſing that he with his armie would defend the beſiegers from all enimies that ſhould attempt to tronble them, or elſe die in the quarell. To be briefe, when the lords of Scotland ſaw that it booted them not to aſſaie the raiſing of the ſiege, except they ſhould make account to be fought withall, they determined to deliuer the caſtell of Berwike to the Engliſhmen, ſo that therevpon there might be an abſtinence of warre taken for a ſeaſon.

And herewith they ſent to the duke of Gloceſter a charter indented, which was dated the foure and twentith daie of Auguſt, in the ſaid yeare 1482, contracted betwéene the duke of Gloceſter lieutenant generall for the king of England, & Alexander duke of Albanie lieutenant for Iames king of Scots; that an eſpeciall abſtinence of warre ſhould be kept betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland, as well by ſea as by land, to begin the eighth daie of September next comming, & to indure till the fourth daie of Nouember next following. And in the ſame ſeaſon, the towne & caſtle of Berwike to be occupied and remaine in the reall poſſeſſion of ſuch, as by the king of Englands deputie ſhould be appointed.

The caſtell of Berwike deliuered.

Herevnto the duke of Gloceſter agreed, and ſo then was the caſtell of Berwike deliuered to the lord Stanleie, and other thereto appointed; who therein put both Engliſhmen and artillerie, ſufficient to defend it againſt all Scotland, for ſix months. The duke of Albanie alſo cauſed the prouoſt and burgeſſes of Edenburgh, to make a ſufficient inſtrument obligatorie to king Edward, for the true ſatiſfaction and contentation of the ſame monie, which he alſo ſent by the ſaid prouoſt to the duke of Gloceſter to Alnewike; the verie copie whereof hereafter followeth.

The true copie of the ſaid inſtrument obligatorie.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall. fol. Ccl

BE it knowne to all men by theſe preſent letters, vs Walter Bertraham, prouoſt of the towne of Edenburgh in Scotland, and the whole fellowſhip, merchants, burgeſſes, & communaltie of the ſame towne, to be bound and obliged by theſe preſents, vnto the moſt excellent, and moſt mightie prince Edward, by the grace of God king of England. That where it was communed and agreed betweene his excellencie on the one part, and the right high & mightie prince our ſouereigne lord, Iames king of Scots on the other part, that mariage and matrimonie ſhould haue beene ſolemnized and had betwixt a mightie and excellent prince Iames the firſt begotten ſonne and heire apparant to our ſouereigne lord aforeſaid, & the right noble princeſſe Cicilie, daughter to the ſaid Edward K. of England; and for the ſaid mariage to haue beene performed, certeine and diuerſe great ſummes of monie bene paid and contented by the moſt excellent prince, vnto our ſouereigne lord aforeſaid, as by certeine writings betwixt the ſaid princes therevpon made more at large plainlie appeares.

That if it be the pleaſure of the ſaid Edward king of England, to haue the ſaid mariage to be performed and completed, according to the ſaid communication in writing, that then it ſhall be well and trulie, without fraud, deceipt, or colluſion obſerued, kept, and accompliſhed on the partie of our ſouereigne lord aforeſaid, & the nobles ſpirituall and temporall of the realme of Scotland. And if it be not the pleaſure of the ſaid excellent prince Edward king of England, to haue the ſaid mariage performed and completed; that then we Walter, prouoſt, burgeſſes, merchants, and commons of the aboue named towne of Edenburgh, or anie of vs, ſhall paie and content to the king of England aforeſaid, all the ſummes of monie that was paied for the ſaid mariage, at ſuch like termes & daies immediatlie inſuing after the refuſall of the ſaid mariage, and in ſuch like maner & forme as the ſaid ſummes were afore deliuered, contented and paied; that then this obligation and bond to be void, and of no ſtrength. Prouided alwaies, that the ſaid Edward king of England, ſhall giue knowledge of his pleaſure and election in the premiſſes in taking or refuſing of the ſaid mariage, or of repaiment of the ſaid ſums of monie, to our ſaid ſouereigne lord, or lords of his councell, or to vs the ſaid prouoſt, merchants, or any of vs, within the realme of Scotland, being for the time, betwixt this & the feaſt of Alhalowes next to come.

To the which paiment well and trulie to be made, we bind and oblige vs, & euerie of vs, our heires, ſucceſſors, executors, and all our goods, merchandizes, & things what ſoeuer they be, where ſoeuer, or in what place, by water or by land, on this ſide the ſea or beyond, we ſhall happen to be found, anie league, anie truce or ſafegard made or to be made, notwithſtanding. In witneſſe whereof to this our preſent writing, and letters of bond, we, the ſaid prouoſt, burgeſſes, merchants, and communitie, haue ſet our common ſeale of the ſaid towne of Edenburgh, the fourth daie of Auguſt, the yeare of our Lord God, 1482. Giuen in the preſence of the right mightie prince Richard duke of Gloceſter, Alexander duke of Albanie, the reuerend father in God Iames biſhop of Dunkeld, & the right noble lord Henrie earle of Northumberland, Colin earle of Argile, Thomas lord Stanleie, maiſter Alexander Engliſh, and others, &c.

So that you ſee it was conteined in the ſaid inſtrument or writing, that king Edward ſhould intimate his pleaſure vnto the ſaid prouoſt and burgeſſes of Edenburgh, before the feaſt of Alſaints next following, whether he would the mariage ſhould take place, or that he would haue the paiment of the monie. According to which article, king Edward ſent Gartier his principall king of armes, and Northumberland herald, to declare his refuſall of the mariage, and the election and choiſe of the repaiment of the monie. They came to Edenburgh eight daies before the feaſt of Alſaints, where (according to their commiſſion and inſtructions) Gartier declared the pleaſure of the king his maiſter vnto the prouoſt and burgeſſes of Edenburgh, to whom he [illegible]nlie ſaid as followeth.

Gartier king of armes is ſent into Scotland.

The intimation of Gartier king of armes to the Edenburghers.

Abr.Fl. ex Edw.Hall. fol.Ccxlvij.

I Gartier king of armes, ſeruant, proctour and meſſenger vnto the moſt high and mightie prince, my moſt dread ſouereigne lord Edward, by the grace of God king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, by vertue [illegible] letters of procuracie here readie to be ſhewed to me, by my ſaid ſouereigne lord made and giuen, make notice and giue knowledge vnto you prouoſt, burgeſſes, merchants and communaltie of the towne of Edenburgh in Scotland, that whereas it was ſometime communed and agreed betweene my ſaid ſouereigne lord on the one partie, and the right high & mightie prince Iames king of Scots on the other partie, that mariage and matrimonie ſhould haue beene ſolemnized, and had betweene Iames the firſt begotten ſonne of the ſaid king of Scots, and ladie Cicilie, daughter to my ſaid ſouereigne lord the king of England.

And for the ſaid mariage to haue beene performed, certeine and diuers great ſums of monie beene paied and contented by my ſaid ſouereigne lord, which ſummes of monie, in caſe of refuſall of the ſaid mariage, by my ſaid ſouereigne lord to be made and declared, yee the ſaid prouoſt, burgeſſes, merchants, and communaltie, and euerie one of you are bound and obliged by your letters, vnder your common ſeale of your towne of Edenburgh, to repaie vnto his highnes vnder like forme, & at ſuch termes as they were firſt paied. So that the king my ſouereigne lord would make notice and knowledge of his pleaſure and election in taking or refuſing of the ſaid mariage, of the repaiment of the ſaid ſums of monie, before the feaſt of Alhalowes next to come; like as in your ſaid letters, bearing date at Edenburgh the fourth daie of Auguſt laſt paſt, it was conteined all at large.

The pleaſure and election of my ſaid ſoueraigne lord, for diuerſe cauſes and conſiderations him mouing, is to refuſe the accompliſhment of the ſaid mariage, and to haue the repaiment of all ſuch ſummes of monie, as (by occaſion of the ſaid betruſted mariage) his highneſſe had paied. The ſaid repaiment to be had of you prouoſt, burgeſſes, merchants, and communaltie, and euerie of you, your heires and ſucceſſours, according to your bond and obligation afore rehearſed. And therefore I giue you notice & knowledge by this writing, which I deliuer vnto you, within the terme in your ſaid letters limited and expreſſed, to all intents and effects, which thereof may inſue.

When Gartier had thus declared all things giuen to him in charge, the prouoſt and other burgeſſes made anſwer, that they now knowing the kings determinat pleaſure, would (according to their bond) prepare for the repaiment of the ſaid ſummes; and gentlie interteining Gartier conueied him to Berwike, from whence he departed to Newcaſtell, to the duke of Gloceſter, making relation to him of all his doings: which duke with all ſpéed returned to Shrifhuton, and there abode. Shortlie after Gartiers departing, the duke of Albanie, thinking to obteine againe the high fauour of the king his brother, deliuered him out of captiuitie and priſon, wherin he had a certeine ſpace continued (not without the dukes aſſent, which beſieged him in the caſtell of Edenburgh a little before) and ſet him at large, of whome outwardlie he receiued great thanks, when inwardlie nothing but reuenging & confuſion was in the kings ſtomach fullie ſetled. So that ſhortlie after in the kings preſence he was in ieopardie of his life, and all vnprouided for dread of death, conſtrained to take a ſmall balinger, and to ſaile into France, where ſhortlie after riding by the men of armes, which incountered at the tilt, by Lewes then duke of Orleance, after French king, he was with miſcharging of a ſpeare by fortunes peruerſe countenance pitifullie ſlaine and brought to death, leauing after him one onelie ſon named Iohn, which being baniſhed Scotland, inhabited & maried in France, and there died.

How dolorous, how ſorrowfull is it to write, and much more painefull to remember the chances and infortunities that happened within two yeares in England & Scotland, betwéene naturall brethren. For king Edward, ſet on by ſuch as enuied the eſtate of the duke of Clarence, forgetting nature and brotherlie amitie, conſented to the death of his ſaid brother. Iames king of Scots, putting in obliuion that Alexander his brother was the onelie organ and inſtrument, by whome he obteined libertie & fréedome, ſeduced and led by vile and malicious perſons, which maligned at the glorie and indifferent iuſtice of the duke of Albanie, imagined and compaſſed his death, and exiled him for euer. What a pernicious ſerpent, what a venemous toade, and what a peſtiferous ſcorpion is that diueliſh whelpe, called priuie enuie? Againſt it no fortreſſe can defend, no caue can hide, no wood can ſhadow, no fowle can eſcape, nor no beaſt can auoid. Hir poiſon is ſo ſtrong, that neuer man in authoritie could eſcape from the biting of hir téeth, ſcratching of hir pawes, blaſting of hir breth, & filth of hir taile. Notable therefore is the Gréeke epigram in this behalfe, touching enuie of this kind, which ſaith, that a worſſe thing than enuie there is not in the world, and yet hath it ſome goodneſſe in it; for it conſumeth the eies and the hart of the enuious. The words in their owne tong ſententiouſlie ſound thus:

ὁ φθόνος ἐστὶ κάκιστον, ἔχει δέ τι καλὸν ἐν αὐτῷ,
τήκει γὰρ φθονερῶν ὄμματα καὶ κραδίαν.]

Although king Edward reioiſed that his buſineſſe came to ſo good a concluſion with the Scots, yet he was about the ſame time ſore diſquieted in his mind towards the French king, whome he now perceiued to haue dallied with him, as touching the agreement of the mariage to be had betwixt the Dolphin and his daughter the ladie Elizabeth. For the lord Howard, being as then returned out of France, certified the king (of his owne knowledge) how that he being preſent, ſaw the ladie Margaret of Auſtrich daughter to duke Maximilian, ſonne to the emperor Frederike, receiued into France with great pompe and roialtie, and at Ambois to the Dolphin contracted and eſpouſed. King Edward highlie diſpleaſed with ſuch double and vniuſt dealing of the French king, called his nobles togither, and opened to them his gréefes; who promiſed him for redreſſe thereof, to be readie with all their powers to make warres in France at his pleaſure and appointment.

But whileſt he was buſie in hand to make his purueiance for warres thus againſt France, whether it was with melancholie and anger, which he tooke with the French kings doings and vncourteous vſage; or were it by any ſuperfluous ſurfet (to the which he was verie much giuen) he ſuddenlie fell ſicke, and was ſo gréeuouſlie taken, that in the end he perceiued his naturall ſtrength in ſuch wiſe to decaie, that there was little hope of recouerie in the cunning of his phyſicians, whome he perceiued onlie to prolong his life for a ſmall time. Wherefore he began to make readie for his paſſage into another world, not forgetting (as after ſhall appeare) to exhort the nobles of his realme (aboue all things) to an vnitie among themſelues. And hauing (as he tooke it) made an attonement betwixt the parties that were knowne to be ſcant fréends, he commended vnto their graue wiſedoms the gouernment of his ſonne the prince, and of his brother the duke of Yorke, during the time of their tender yeares. But it ſhall not be amiſſe to adde in this place the words which he is ſaid to haue ſpoken on his death-bed, which were in effect as followeth.

The words of king Edward vttered by him on his death-bed.

Abr. Fl. ex Edw. Hall, fol. Ccxlviij, Ccxlix.

My welbeloued and no leſſe betruſted fréends, councellors, and alies, if we mortall men would dailie and hourlie with our ſelues reuolue, and intentiuelie in our hearts ingraue, or in our minds ſeriouſlie ponder, the fraile and fading imbecillitie of our humane nature, and the vnſtableneſſe of the ſame: we ſhould apparantlie perceiue, that we being called reaſonable creatures, and in that predicament compared and ioined with angels, be more worthie to be named and déemed perſons vnreaſonable, and rather to be aſſociate in that name with brute beaſts called vnreaſonable (of whoſe life and death no creature ſpeaketh) rather than in that point to be reſembled to the angelicall ſocietie and reaſonable companie.

For while health in vs floriſheth, or proſperitie aboundeth, or the gloſing world laugheth, which is he, ſo reaſonable of vs all, that can ſaie (if he will not erre from the truth) that he once in a wéeke remembreth his fatall end, or the preſcribed terme of his induring; or once prouided by labour, ſtudie, or otherwiſe, to ſet a ſtedfaſt and ſure order for the ſecuritie, profit, and continuance either of his poſſeſſions & dominions, or of his ſequele and poſteritie which after him ſhall naturallie ſucceed. Such is the blindneſſe of our fraile and weake nature, euer giuen to carnall concupiſcence and worldlie delectations, dailie darkened and ſeduced with that lithargious and deceiuable ſerpent called hope of long life, that all we put in obliuion our duetie preſent, and leſſe remember the politike purueiance for things to come: for blindlie we walke in this fraile life, till we fall groueling with our eies ſuddenlie vpon death.

The vanities of this world be to vs ſo agreeable, that when we begin to liue, we eſteeme our life a whole world; which once ouerpaſſed, it ſheweth no better but duſt driuen awaie with a puffe of wind. I ſpeake this to you of my ſelfe, and for your ſelues to you; ſore lamenting and inwardlie bewailing, that I did not performe & finallie conſummate ſuch politike deuiſes, & good and godlie ordinances, in my long life and peaceable proſperitie, which then I fullie determined to haue begun, ſet forward, and completlie to haue finiſhed. Which now for the extreame paines and tortures of my angrie maladie, and for the ſmall terme of my naturall life, I can neither performe, neither yet liue to ſee either to take effect, or to ſort to anie good concluſion.

For God I call to record, my heart was fullie ſet, and my mind deliberatlie determined, ſo to haue adorned this realme with wholeſome lawes, ſtatutes and ordinances; ſo to haue trained and brought vp mine infants and children in vertue, learning, actiuitie, and policie, that, what with their roiall puiſſance, & your freendlie aſſiſtance, the proudeſt prince of Europe durſt not once attempt to mooue anie hoſtilitie, againſt them, you, or this realme. But oh Lord, all things that I of long time haue in my mind reuolued and imagined, that ſtealing theefe death goeth about to ſubuert, and in the moment of an houre cleerelie to ouertred. Wherefore (as men ſaie) I now being driuen to the verie hard wall, haue perfect confidence and ſure hope in the approoued fidelitie, and conſtant integritie, which I haue euer experimented and knowne to be rooted and planted in the hearts of your louing bodies, towards me and mine.

So that I may ſaie and auouch, that neuer prince bearing ſcepter and crowne ouer realmes and regions, hath found or prooued more faithfull councellors, nor truer ſubiects, than I haue doone of you; nor neuer potentate nor gouernour put more affiance and truſt in his vaſſals and ſeruants, than I, ſince the adeption of the crowne, firmelie haue fixed in your circumſpect wiſedoms and ſober diſcretions. And now of very force compelled, lieng in a doutfull hope, betweene liuing and dieng, betweene remembrance and obliuion, I doo require you, and inſtantlie mooue you, that as I haue found you faithfull, obedient, and to all my requeſts and deſires (while I was here in health conuerſant with you) diligent and intentiue: ſo after my death, my hope is with a ſure anchor grounded, & mine inward conceipt vndoubtedlie reſolued, that the eſpeciall confidence and inward fidelitie, which ſo long hath continued betweene vs, being together liuing, ſhall not wholie by my death be extinct and vaniſhed like ſmoke.

For what auaileth freendſhip in life, when truſt deceiueth after death? What profiteth amitie in apparant preſence, when confidence is fraudulentlie beguiled in abſence? What loue groweth by coniunction of matrimonie, if the ofſpring after doo not agree and accord? Or what profiteth princes to aduance and promote their ſubiects, if after their death, the bountifulneſſe by them ſhewed, be of the receiuers of the ſame and their ſequele neither regarded nor yet remembred? The parents make the marriage for an indiſſoluble amitie. Princes promote ſomtime for fauour, ſometime for deſert, & ſometime for pleaſure: yet (if you will conſider) the verie ſcope, to the which all gifts of promotions doo finallie tend, is to haue loue, fauour, faithfull counſell, and diligent ſeruice, of ſuch as be by them promoted and exalted, not onelie in their owne liues, being but breefe and tranſitorie: but alſo that they and their progenie, calling to remembrance the fauor, eſtimation, and aduancement, which they of ſo liberall and munificent a prince had receiued and obteined, ſhould with ſpeare and ſhield, toong and wit, hand and pen, continuallie ſtudie to defend, counſell and preferre, not onelie him during his life; but alſo to ſerue, aſſiſt, and mainteine his ſequele and lineall ſucceſſion, as the verie images and carnall portratures of his ſtirpe, line, and ſtemme, naturallie deſcended.

In this caſe am I, whome you know, not without vnſpeakable trouble & moſt dangerous war to haue obteined the ſcepter and diademe of this realme and empire. During which reigne, I haue had either litle peace, or ſmall tranquillitie: and now when I thought my ſelfe ſure of a quiet life, and worldlie reſt, death hath blowne his terrible trumpet, calling and ſummoning me (as I truſt) to perpetuall tranquillitie and eternall quietneſſe. Therefore now, for the perfect and vnmoueable confidence that I haue euer had in you, and for the vnfeined loue that you haue euer ſhewed vnto me, I commend and deliuer into your gouernance, both this noble realme, and my naturall children, and your kinſmen. My children by your diligent ouerſight and politike prouiſion to be taught, informed, and inſtructed, not onelie in the ſciences liberall, vertues morall, and good literature: but alſo to be practiſed in trickes of martiall actiuitie, and diligent exerciſe of prudent policie. For I haue heard clarkes ſaie, although I am vnlettered, that fortunate is that realme where philoſophers reigne, or where kings be philoſophers and louers of wiſedome.

In this tender age, you may writh and turne them into euerie forme and faſhion. If you bring them vp in vertue, you ſhall haue vertuous princes. If you ſet them to learning, your gouernours ſhall be men of knowledge. If you teach them actiuitie, you ſhall haue valiant capteins. If they practiſe policie, you ſhall haue both politike and prudent rulers. On the other ſide, if by your negligence they fall to vice (as youth is to all euill prone and readie) not onelie their honor, but alſo your honeſtie ſhall be ſpotted and appalled. If they be ſluggards and giuen to ſlouth, the publike wealth of this realme muſt ſhortlie decaie. If they be vnlearned, they may by flatterie ſoone be blinded, and by adulation often deceiued. If they lacke actiuitie, euerie creature (be he neuer ſo baſe of birth) ſhall foile and ouerthrow them like dum beaſts and beaſtlie daſtards. Therefore I deſire you, and in Gods name adiure you, rather to ſtudie to make them rich in godlie knowledge, and vertuous qualities; than to take paine to glorifie them with abundance of worldlie treaſure, and mundane ſuperfluitie.

And certeinlie, when they come to ripeneſſe of age, and ſhall peraduenture conſider, that by your omiſſion and negligent education, they haue not ſuch graces, nor are indued with ſuch notable qualities as they might haue beene, if you had performed the truſt to you by me committed: they ſhall not onelie deplore and lament their vngarniſhed eſtate, and naked condition; but alſo it may fortune, that they ſhall conceiue inwardlie againſt you ſuch a negligent vntruth, that the ſequele thereof may rather turne to diſpleaſure than thanks, and ſooner to an ingratitude than to a reward. My kingdome alſo I leaue in your gouernance, during the minoritie of my children, charging you (on your honors oths and fidelitie made and ſworne to me) ſo indifferentlie to order and gouerne the ſubiects of the ſame, both with iuſtice and mercie, that the wils of malefactors haue not too large a ſcope, nor the harts of the good people by too much extremitie be neither ſorowfullie daunted, nor vnkindlie kept vnder. Oh I am ſo ſléepie, that I muſt make an end. And now before you all I commend my ſoule to almightie God my ſauiour and redéemer, my bodie to the wormes of the earth, my kingdome to the prince my ſonne: and to you my louing fréends my heart, my truſt, and my whole confidence. [And euen with that he fell on ſléepe.]

Hauing thus ſpoken, and ſet things in good ſtaie, as might be ſuppoſed, he ſhortlie after departed this life at Weſtminſter the ninth of Aprill, in the yeare 1483, after he had reigned two and twentie yeares, one moneth, and eight daies. His bodie was with funerall pompe conueied to Windſore, and there buried. He left behind him iſſue by the quéene his wife two ſonnes, Edward and Richard, with fiue daughters; Elizabeth that was after quéene, married to Henrie the ſeauenth; Cicilie married to the vicount Welles; Briget a nunne profeſſed in Sion or Dertford, as ſir Thomas More ſaith; Anne married to the lord Thomas Howard, after earle of Surrie, and duke of Norffolke; Katharine wedded to the lord William Courtenie ſonne to the earle of Deuonſhire. Beſide theſe he left behind him likewiſe a baſe ſonne named Arthur, that was after vicount Liſle. For the deſcription of his perſon & qualities I will referre you to that which ſir Thomas More hath written of him in that hiſtorie, which he wrote and left vnfiniſhed of his ſonne Edward the fift, and of his brother king Richard the third: which we ſhall (God willing) hereafter make you partaker of, as we find the ſame recorded among his other workes, word for word; when firſt we haue (according to our begun order) rehearſed ſuch writers of our nation as liued in his daies.

As firſt, Nicholas Kenton borne in Suffolke a Carmelit frier in Gippeſwich, prouinciall of his order through England; Henrie Parker a Carmelit frier of Doncaſter, preached againſt the pride of prelats, and for ſuch doctrine as he ſet foorth, was impriſoned with his fellow Thomas Holden, and a certeine blacke frier alſo for the like cauſe; Parker was forced to recant thrée ſpeciall articles, as Bale noteth out of Leland; Iohn Harding an eſquier borne in the north parts, wrote a chronicle in Engliſh verſe, and among other ſpeciall points therein touched, he gathered all the ſubmiſſions and homages had and made by the Scotiſh kings, euen from the daies of king Athelſtan [whereby it euidentlie may appeare, how the Scotiſh kingdome euen in manner from the firſt eſtabliſhing thereof here in Britaine, hath béene apperteining vnto the kings of England, and holden of them as their chéefe & ſuperior lords.]

William Iue a doctor of diuinitie and prebendarie of ſaint Paules in London; Thomas Wilton a diuine, and deane of the ſaid church of Paules in London; Iulian Bemes, a gentlewoman indued with excellent gifts both of bodie and mind, wrote certeine treatiſes of hawking and hunting, delighting greatlie hir ſelfe in thoſe exerciſes and paſtimes; ſhe wrote alſo a booke of the lawes of armes, and knowledge apperteining to heralds; Iohn Stamberie borne in the weſt parts of this realme, a Carmelit frier, and confeſſor to king Henrie the ſixt, he was alſo maiſter of Eaton colledge, and after was made biſhop of Bangor, and remooued from thence to the ſée of Hereford; Iohn Sluelcie an Auguſtine frier, prouinciall of his order; Iohn Forteſcue a iudge and chancellor of England, wrote diuerſe treatiſes concerning the law and politike gouernement.

Rochus a Chaterhouſe monke borne in London, of honeſt parents, and ſtudied in the vniuerſitie of Paris, he wrote diuerſe epigrams; Iohn Phreas borne alſo in London was fellow of Balioll colledge in Oxenford, and after went into Italie, where he heard Guarinus that excellent philoſopher read in Ferrara, he prooued an excellent phyſician and a ſkilfull lawier, there was not in Italie (whileſt he remained there) that paſſed him in eloquence & knowledge of both the toongs, Gréeke and Latine; Walter Hunt a Carmelit frier, a great diuine, and for his excellencie in learning ſent from the whole bodie of this realme, vnto the generall councell holden firſt at Ferrara, and after at Florence by pope Eugenius the fourth, where he diſputed among other with the Gréekes, in defenſe of the order and ceremonies of the Latine church; Thomas Wighenhall a monke of the order called Premonſtratenſis in the abbie of Durham in Norffolke.

Iohn Gunthorpe went into Italie, where he heard that eloquent learned man Guarinus read in Ferrara, after his comming home into England he was deane of Welles, and kéeper of the priuie ſeale; Iohn Hambois an excellent muſician, and for his notable cunning therein made doctor of muſicke; William Caxton wrote a chronicle called Fructus temporum, and an appendix vnto Treuiſa, beſide diuerſe other bookes and tranſlations; Iohn Miluerton a Carmelit frier of Briſtow, and prouinciall of his order through England, Ireland, and Scotland, at length (bicauſe he defended ſuch of his order as preached againſt endowments of the church with temporall poſſeſſions) he was brought into trouble, committed to priſon in caſtell S. Angelo in Rome, where he continued thrée yeares, and at length was deliuered thorough certeine of the cardinals that were appointed his iudges; Dauid Morgan a Welſh man, treaſuror of the church of Landaffe, wrote of the antiquities of Wales, & a deſcription of the countrie.

Iohn Tiptoft, a noble man borne, a great traueller, excellentlie learned, and wrote diuerſe treatiſes, and finallie loſt his head in the yeare 1471, in time of the ciuill warre betwixt the houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter; Iohn Shirwood biſhop of Durham; Thomas Kent an excellent philoſopher; Robert Huggon borne in Norffolke in a towne called Hardingham, wrote certeine vaine propheſies; Iohn Marfield a learned phyſician; William Gréene a Carmelit frier; Thomas Norton borne in Briſtow an alcumiſt; Iohn Meare a monke of Norwich; Richard Porland borne in Norffolke a Franciſcane frier, and a doctor of diuinitie; Thomas Milling a monke of Weſtminſter, a doctor of diuinitie and preferred to the biſhoprike of Hereford; Scogan a learned gentleman and ſtudent for a time in Oxford, of a pleſant wit, and bent to merrie deuiſes, in reſpect whereof he was called into the court, where giuing himſelfe to his naturall inclination of mirth & pleaſant paſtime, he plaied manie ſporting parts, although not in ſuch vnciuill maner as hath béene of him reported.

Thus farre the proſperous reigne of Edward the fourth, ſonne and heire to Richard duke of Yorke.

Deſcription of Edward the fourth.

The hiſtorie of king Edward the fift, and king Richard the third vnfiniſhed, written by maiſter Thomas More then one of the vnder ſhiriffes

of London, about the yeare of our Lord 1513, according to a copie of his owne hand, printed
among his other workes.

1483

KIng Edward the fourth of that name, after that he had liued fiftie & three yeeres, ſeuen moneths, and ſix daies, and thereof reigned two and twentie yeares, one moneth, & eight daies, died at Weſtminſter the ninth daie of Aprill, the yeare of our redemption, a thouſand foure hundred foureſcore and three; leauing much faire iſſue, that is to wit, Edward the prince, a thirteene yeares of age; Richard duke of Yorke two yeares yoonger; Elizabeth, whoſe fortune and grace was after to be queene, wife vnto king Henrie the ſeuenth, and mother vnto the eight; Cicilie, not ſo fortunate as faire; Briget, which repreſenting the vertue of hir, whoſe name ſhe bare, profeſſed and obſerued a religious life in Dertford, an houſe of cloſe nunnes; Anne, that was after honorablie married vnto Thomas, then lord Howard, and after earle of Surrie; and Katharine, which long time toſſed in either fortune, ſometime in wealth, oft in aduerſitie, at the laſt, if this be the laſt (for * yet ſhe liueth) is by the benignitie of hir nephue king Henrie the eight, in verie proſperous eſtate, and worthie hir birth and vertue.

The loue of the people.

This noble prince deceaſſed at his palace of Weſtminſter, and with great funerall honor and heauines of his people from thence conueied, was interred at Windſor. A king of ſuch gouernance & behauior, in time of peace (for in warre each part muſt needs be others enimie) that there was neuer anie prince of this land, atteining the crowne by battell, ſo heartilie beloued with the ſubſtance of the people: nor hee himſelfe ſo ſpeciallie in anie part of his life, as at the time of his death. Which fauour and affection, yet after his deceaſſe, by the crueltie, miſchiefe, and trouble of the tempeſtuous world that followed, highlie toward him more increaſed. At ſuch time as he died, the diſpleaſure of thoſe that bare him grudge for king Henries ſake the ſixt, whome he depoſed, was well aſſwaged, & in effect quenched, in that manie of them were dead in more than twentie yeres of his reigne, a great part of a long life: and manie of them in the meane ſeaſon growne into his fauour, of which he was neuer ſtrange.

Deſcription of Edward the fourth.

He was a goodlie perſonage, and princelie to behold, of heart couragious, politike in counſell, in aduerſitie nothing abaſhed, in proſperitie rather ioifull than proud, in peace iuſt and mercifull, in warre ſharpe and fierce, in the field bold and hardie, and natheles no further (than wiſdome would) aduenturous, whoſe warres who ſo well conſidered, he ſhall no leſſe commend his wiſedome where he voided, than his manhood where he vanquiſhed. He was of viſage louelie, of bodie mightie, ſtrong, and cleane made: howbeit, in his latter daies with ouer liberall diet ſomewhat corpulent and borelie, and natheleſſe not vncomelie. He was of youth greatlie giuen to fleſhlie wantonneſſe: from which health of bodie, in great proſperitie and fortune, without a ſpeciall grace hardlie reſtraineth, the poet implieng no leſſe and ſaieng:

Mens erit apta capi tunc cùm lætiſſima rerum,
Vt ſeges in pingui luxuriabit humo.

This fault not greatlie greeued the people: for neither could anie one mans pleaſure ſtretch and extend to the diſpleaſure of verie manie, and was without violence, and ouer that in his latter daies leſſed, and well left. In which time of his latter daies this realme was in quiet and proſperous eſtate, no feare of outward enimies, no warre in hand, nor none toward, but ſuch as no man looked for. The people toward the prince, not in a conſtreined feare, but in a willing and louing obedience: among themſelues the commons in good peace. The lords, whome hee knew at variance, himſelfe in his death bed appeaſed: he had left all gathering of monie (which is the onelie thing that withdraweth the hearts of Engliſh men from the prince) nor anie thing intended he to take in hand, by which he ſhould be driuen therto: for his tribute out of France he had before obteined; and the yeare foregoing his death, he had obteined Berwike.

And albeit that all the time of his reigne he was with his people, ſo benigne, courteous, and ſo familiar, that no part of his vertues was more eſteemed: yet the condition in the end of his daies (in which manie princes by a long continued ſoueraigntie decline into a proud port from debonair behauior of their beginning) maruellouſlie in him grew and increaſed: ſo farre forth, that in ſummer (the laſt that euer hee ſaw) his highnes being at Windſor in hunting, ſent for the maior & aldermen of London to him for none other errand, but to haue them hunt & be merrie with him, where he made them not ſo ſtatelie, but ſo freendlie and familiar cheere, and ſent veniſon from thence ſo freelie into the citie, that no one thing in manie daies before gat him either more hearts, or more heartie fauour amongeſt the common people; which oftentimes more eſteeme and take for greater kindneſſe a little courteſie, than a great benefit.

The hiſtorie of king Edward the fift, and king Richard the third vnfiniſhed, written by maiſter Thomas More then one of the vnder ſhiriffes

of London, about the yeare of our Lord 1513, according to a copie of his owne hand, printed
among his other workes.

1483 KIng Edward the fourth of that name, after that he had liued fiftie & thrée yéeres, ſeuen moneths, and ſix daies, and thereof reigned two and twentie yeares, one moneth, & eight daies, died at Weſtminſter the ninth daie of Aprill, the yeare of our redemption, a thouſand foure hundred foureſcore and thrée; leauing much faire iſſue, that is to wit, Edward the prince, a thirtéene yeares of age; Richard duke of Yorke two yeares yoonger; Elizabeth, whoſe fortune and grace was after to be quéene, wife vnto king Henrie the ſeuenth, and mother vnto the eight; Cicilie, not ſo fortunate as faire; Briget, which repreſenting the vertue of hir, whoſe name ſhe bare, profeſſed and obſerued a religious life in Dertford, an houſe of cloſe nunnes; Anne, that was after honorablie married vnto Thomas, then lord Howard, and after earle of Surrie; and Katharine, which long time toſſed in either fortune, ſometime in wealth, oft in aduerſitie, at the laſt, if this be the laſt (for * yet ſhe liueth) is by the benignitie of hir nephue king Henrie the eight, in verie proſperous eſtate, and worthie hir birth and vertue.

* She liued at ſuch time as this ſtorie was penned.

The loue of the people.

This noble prince deceaſſed at his palace of Weſtminſter, and with great funerall honor and heauines of his people from thence conueied, was interred at Windſor. A king of ſuch gouernance & behauior, in time of peace (for in warre each part muſt néeds be others enimie) that there was neuer anie prince of this land, atteining the crowne by battell, ſo heartilie beloued with the ſubſtance of the people: nor hée himſelfe ſo ſpeciallie in anie part of his life, as at the time of his death. Which fauour and affection, yet after his deceaſſe, by the crueltie, miſchiefe, and trouble of the tempeſtuous world that followed, highlie toward him more increaſed. At ſuch time as he died, the diſpleaſure of thoſe that bare him grudge for king Henries ſake the ſixt, whome he depoſed, was well aſſwaged, & in effect quenched, in that manie of them were dead in more than twentie yeres of his reigne, a great part of a long life: and manie of them in the meane ſeaſon growne into his fauour, of which he was neuer ſtrange.

Deſcription of Edward the fourth.

He was a goodlie perſonage, and princelie to behold, of heart couragious, politike in counſell, in aduerſitie nothing abaſhed, in proſperitie rather ioifull than proud, in peace iuſt and mercifull, in warre ſharpe and fierce, in the field bold and hardie, and natheles no further (than wiſdome would) aduenturous, whoſe warres who ſo well conſidered, he ſhall no leſſe commend his wiſedome where he voided, than his manhood where he vanquiſhed. Sée before pag. 705.

So deceaſſed (as I haue ſaid) this noble king, in that time in which his life was moſt deſired. Whoſe loue of his people, and their entier affection towards him, had béene to his noble children (hauing in themſelues alſo as manie gifts of nature, as manie princelie vertues, as much goodlie towardneſſe as their age could receiue) a maruellous fortreſſe and ſure armor, if diuiſion and diſſention of their fréends had not vnarmed them, and left them deſtitute, and the execrable deſire of ſouereigntie prouoked him to their deſtruction: which if either kind or kindneſſe had holden place, muſt néeds haue béene their chéefe defenſe. For Richard the duke of Gloceſter, by nature their vncle, by office their protector, to their father beholden, to themſelues by oth and allegiance bounden, all the bands broken that bind man and man togither, without anie reſpect of God or the world, vnnaturallie contriued to beréeue them, not onelie their dignitie, but alſo their liues.

Richard duke of Yorke.

But forſomuch as this dukes demeanor miniſtreth in effect all the whole matter whereof this booke ſhall intreat, it is therefore conuenient ſomewhat to ſhew you yer we further go, what maner of man this was, that could find in his hart ſuch miſchiefe to conceiue. Richard duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by warre, but by law to chalenge the crowne, putting his claime into the parlement, where his cauſe was either for right or fauor ſo farre foorth aduanced, that king Henrie his bloud (albeit he had a goodlie prince) vtterlie reiected, the crowne was by authoritie of parlement intailed vnto the duke of Yorke and his iſſue male in remainder, immediatlie after the death of king Henrie. But the duke not induring ſo long to tarrie, but intending vnder pretext of diſſention and debate ariſing in the realme, to preuent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in king Henrie his life, was with manie nobles of the realme at Wakefield ſlaine, leauing thrée ſonnes, Edward, George, and Richard.

Edward.

George duke of Clarence.

*had not ſet

All thrée as they were great ſtates of birth, ſo were they great and ſtatelie of ſtomach, gréedie and ambitious of authoritie, and impatient of partners. Edward reuenging his fathers death, depriued king Henrie, and atteined the crowne. George duke of Clarence was a goodlie noble prince, and at all times fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not ſet him againſt his brother, or the enuie of his enimies *his brother againſt him. For were it by the quéene and lords of hir bloud, which highlie maligned the kings kinred (as women commonlie not of malice, but of nature hate them whome their huſbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the duke himſelfe, intending to be king; at the leaſt wiſe heinous treaſon was there laid to his charge: and finallie, were hée faultie, were he faultleſſe, atteinted was he by parlement, and iudged to the death, and there vpon haſtilie drowned in a butt of malmeſie. Whoſe death king Edward (albeit he commanded it) when he wiſt it was doone, pitiouſlie bewailed, and ſorrowfullie repented.

The deſcription of Richard the third.

Richard the third ſonne, of whome we now intreat, was in wit and courage equall with either of them, in bodie and proweſſe farre vnder them both, litle of ſtature, ill featured of limmes, crooke backed, his left ſhoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of viſage, and ſuch as is in ſtates called warlie, in other men otherwiſe; he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth euer froward. It is for truth reported, that the ducheſſe his mother had ſo much adoo in hir trauell, that ſhe could not be deliuered of him vncut; and that he came into the world with the féet forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the fame runneth alſo) not vntoothed, whether men of hatred report aboue the truth, or elſe that nature changed hir courſe in his beginning, which in the courſe of his life manie things vnnaturallie committed. So that the full confluence of theſe qualities, with the defects of fauour and amiable proportion, gaue proofe to this rule of phyſiognomie:

Diſtortum vultum ſequitur diſtorſio morum.

None euill capteine was he in the warre, as to which his diſpoſition was more méetly than for peace. Sundrie victories had he, & ſometimes ouerthrowes; but neuer on default as for his owne perſon, either of hardineſſe or politike order. Frée was he called of diſpenſe, and ſomewhat aboue his power liberall: with large gifts he gat him vnſtedfaſt fréendſhip, for which he was faine to pill and ſpoile in other places, and got him ſtedfaſt hatred. He was cloſe and ſecret, a déepe diſſembler, lowlie of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardlie companiable where he inwardlie hated, not letting to kiſſe whome he thought to kill: deſpitious and cruell, not for euill will alway, but ofter for ambition, and either for the ſuertie or increaſe of his eſtate.

The death of king Henrie the ſixt.

Friend and fo was much what indifferent, where his aduantage grew, he ſpared no mans death whoſe life withſtoode his purpoſe. He ſlue with his owne hands king Henrie the ſixt, being priſoner in the Tower, as men conſtantlie ſaid, and that without commandement or knowledge of the king, which would vndoubtedlie (if he had intended that thing) haue appointed that butcherlie office to ſome other, than his owne borne brother. Some wiſe men alſo wéene, that his drift couertlie conueied, lacked not in helping foorth his brother of Clarence to his death: which he reſiſted openlie, howbeit ſomewhat (as men déemed) more faintlie than he that were hartilie minded to his wealth.

And they that thus déeme, thinke that he long time in kings Edwards life forethought to be king; in caſe that the king his brother (whoſe life he looked that euill diet ſhould ſhorten) ſhould happen to deceaſſe (as in déed he did) while his children were yoong. And they déeme, that for this intent he was glad of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whoſe life muſt néeds haue hindered him ſo intending, whether the ſame duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephue the yoong king, or enterpriſed to be king himſelfe. But of all this point is there no certeintie, and who ſo diuineth vpon coniectures, maie as well ſhoot too farre as too ſhort.

Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the ſelfe night, in which king Edward died, one Miſtlebrooke, long yer morning, came in great haſt to the houſe of one Pottier dwelling in Redcroſſe-ſtréete without Creplegate: and when he was with haſtie rapping quickelie letten in, he ſhewed vnto Pottier, that king Edward was departed. By my truth man quoth Pottier, then will my » maiſter the duke of Gloceſter be king. What cauſe he had ſo to thinke, hard it is to ſaie; whether he being toward him, anie thing knew that he ſuch thing purpoſed, or otherwiſe had anie inckeling thereof: for he was not likelie to ſpeake it of nought.

But now to returne to the courſe of this hiſtorie. Were it that the duke of Gloceſter had of old foreminded this concluſion, or was now at erſt thereunto moued, and put in hope by the occaſion of the tender age of the yoong princes, his nephues (as opportunitie & likelihood of ſpéed putteth a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certeine it is that he contriued their deſtruction, with the vſurpation of the regall dignitie vpon himſelfe. And forſomuch as he well wiſt and holpe to mainteine a long continued grudge and heart-burning betwéene the quéens kinred and the kings bloud, either partie enuieng others authoritie, he now thought that their diuiſion ſhould be (as it was in déed) a furtherlie beginning to the purſuit of his intent.

Nay he was reſolued, that the ſame was a ſure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might firſt (vnder the pretext of reuenging of old diſpleaſure) abuſe the anger and ignorance of the tone partie to the deſtruction of the tother; and then win to his purpoſe as manie as he could, and thoſe that could not be wonne, might be loſt yer they looked therfore. For of one thing was he certeine, that if his intent were perceiued, he ſhould ſoone haue made peace betweene both the parties with his owne bloud. King Edward in his life, albeit that this diſſention betweene his freends ſomewhat irked him: yet in his good health he ſomewhat the leſſe regarded it: bicauſe he thought whatſoeuer buſineſſe ſhould fall betweene them, himſelfe ſhould alwaie be able to rule both the parties.

But in his laſt ſickeneſſe, when he perceiued his naturall ſtrength ſo ſore infeebled, that he deſpaired all recouerie, then he, conſidering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing leſſe miſtruſted than that that hapned; yet well foreſeeing that manie harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children ſhould lacke diſcretion of themſelues, & good counſell of their freends, of which either partie ſhould counſell for their owne commoditie, & rather by pleſant aduiſe to win themſelues fauor, than by profitable aduertiſement to doo the children good, he called ſome of them before him that were at variance, and in eſpeciall the lord marqueſſe Dorſet the queenes ſonne by hir firſt huſband.

Haſtings lord chamberleine maligned of the queene & hir kin.

So did he alſo William the lord Haſtings a noble man, then lord chamberleine, againſt whome the queene ſpeciallie grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him: and alſo for that ſhe thought him ſecretlie familiar with the king in wanton companie. Hir kinred alſo bare him ſore, as well for that the king had made him capteine of Calis, which office the lord Riuers, brother to the queene, clamed of the kings former promiſe, as for diuerſe other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. When theſe lords, with diuerſe other of both the parties, were come in preſence, the king lifting vp himſelfe, and vnderſet with pillowes, as it is reported, on this wiſe ſaid vnto them.

The oration of the king on his death-bed.

My lords, my deere kinſmen and alies, in what plight I lie you ſee, and I feele. By which the leſſe while I looke to liue with you, the more deepelie am I mooued to care in what caſe I leaue you, for ſuch as I leaue you, ſuch be my children like to find you. Which if they ſhould (as God forbid) find you at variance, might hap to fall themſelues at warre, yer their diſcretion would ſerue to ſet you at peace. Ye ſee their youth, of which I reckon the onelie ſuertie to reſt in your concord. For it ſufficeth not that all you loue them, if ech of you hate other: if they were men, your faithfulneſſe happilie would ſuffice. But childhood muſt be mainteined by mens authoritie, and ſlipper youth vnderpropped with elder counſell, which neither they can haue but ye giue it, nor ye giue it if ye gree not.

For where ech laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of ech of others perſon impugneth ech others counſell, there muſt it needs be long yer anie good concluſion go forward. And alſo while either partie laboureth to be cheefe, flatterie ſhall haue more place than plaine and faithfull aduiſe: of which muſt needs inſue the euill bringing vp of the prince, whoſe mind in tender youth infect, ſhall redilie fall to miſcheefe and riot, and draw downe with his noble relme to ruine. But if grace turne him to wiſedome: which if God ſend, then they that by euill meanes before pleaſed him beſt, ſhall after fall furtheſt out of fauour: ſo that euer at length euill drifts ſhall draw to nought, and good plaine waies proſper.

Great variance hath there long beene betweene you, not alwaie for great cauſes. Sometimes a thing right well intended, our miſconſtruction turneth vnto worſe; or a ſmall diſpleaſure doone vs, either our owne affection or euill toongs aggreeueth. But this wot I well, ye neuer had ſo great cauſe of hatred, as ye haue of loue. That we be all men, that we be chriſtian men, this ſhall I leaue for preachers to tell you; and yet I wot neere whether anie preachers words ought more to mooue you, than his that is by & by going to the place that they all preach of.

But this ſhall I deſire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my bloud, the other of mine alies; and ech of you with other either of kinred or affinitie; which ſpirituall kinred of affinitie, if the ſacraments of Chriſts church beare that weight with vs that would God they did, ſhould no leſſe mooue vs to charitie, than the reſpect of fleſhlie conſanguinitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the worſe, for the ſelfe cauſe that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where find we ſo deadlie debate, as among them, which by nature and law moſt ought to agree togither. Such a peſtilent ſerpent is ambition and deſire of vaine glorie and ſouereigntie, which among ſtates where ſhe once entereth, creepeth forth ſo farre, till with diuiſion and variance ſhe turneth all to miſcheefe: firſt longing to be next vnto the beſt, afterward equall with the beſt, & at laſt cheefe and aboue the beſt.

The nature of ambition.

Of which immoderat appetite of worſhip, and thereby of debate and diſſention, what loſſe, what ſorow, what trouble hath within theſe few yeares growne in this realme, I praie God as well forget, as we well remember. Which things if I could as well haue foreſeene, as I haue with my more paine than pleaſure prooued, by Gods bleſſed ladie (that was euer his oth) I would neuer haue woone the courteſie of mens knees, with the loſſe of ſo manie heads. But ſithens things paſſed can not be gaine called, much ought we the more beware, by what occaſion we haue taken ſo great hurt afore, that we eftſoones fall not in that occaſion againe.

Now be thoſe greefs paſſed, and all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likelie right well to proſper in wealthfull peace vnder your cooſins my children, if God ſend them life and you loue. Of which two things, the leſſe loſſe were they, by whom though God did his pleaſure, yet ſhould the realme alwaie find kings, and peraduenture as good kings.

But if you among your ſelues in a childs reigne fall at debate, manie a good man ſhall periſh, and happilie he too, and ye too, yer this land find peace againe. Wherfore in theſe laſt words that euer I looke to ſpeake with you, I exhort you and require you all, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me; for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you; for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all; from this time forward (all greefs forgotten) ech of you loue other. Which I verelie truſt you will, if ye anie thing earthlie regard, either God or your king, affinitie or kinred, this realme, your owne countrie, or your owne ſuertie. And therewithall the king no longer induring to ſit vp, laid him downe on his right ſide, his face towards them: and none was there preſent that could refraine from weeping.

But the lords recomforting him with as good words as they could, and anſwering for the time as they thought to ſtand with his pleaſure, there in his preſence, as by their words appeared, ech forgaue other, and ioined their hands togither, when (as it after appeared by their deeds) their hearts were farre aſunder. As ſoone as the king was departed, the noble prince his ſonne drew toward London, which at the time of his deceaſſe kept his houſhold at Ludlow in Wales, which countrie being farre off from the law and recourſe to iuſtice, was begun to be farre out of good rule, and waxen wild robbers and reauers, walking at libertie vncorrected. And for this occaſion the prince was in the life of his father ſent thither, to the end that the authoritie of his preſence ſhould refraine euill diſpoſed perſons from the boldneſſe of their former outrages.

A counterfet and pretended reconcilement.

To the gouernance and ordering of this yoong prince at his ſending thither, was there appointed ſir Anthonie Wooduile lord Riuers, and brother vnto the queene, a right honourable man, as valiant of hand as politike in counſell. Adioined were there vnto him other of the ſame partie; and in effect euerie one as he was neereſt of kin vnto the queene, ſo was he planted next about the prince. That drift by the queene not vnwiſelie deuiſed, whereby hir bloud might of youth be rooted into the princes fauour, the duke of Gloceſter turned vnto their deſtruction; and vpon that ground ſet the foundation of all his vnhappie building. For whome ſoeuer he perceiued either at variance with them, or bearing himſelfe their fauour, he brake vnto them ſome by mouth, & ſome by writing.

Lord Riuers.

The duke of Gloceſters ſolicitations.

Nay, he ſent ſecret meſſengers ſaieng, that it neither was reaſon, nor in anie wiſe to be ſuffered, that the yoong king their maiſter and kinſman, ſhould be in the hands and cuſtodie of his mothers kinred, ſequeſtred in maner from their companie and attendance, of which euerie one ought him as faithfull ſeruice as they, and manie of them farre more honourable part of kin than his mothers ſide. Whoſe bloud (quoth he) ſauing the kings pleaſure, was full vnmeetelie to be matched with his: which now to be as who ſay remooued from the king, and the leſſe noble to be left about him, is (quoth he) neither honourable to his maieſtie nor to vs, and alſo to his grace no ſuertie, to haue the mightieſt of his freends from him; and vnto vs no little ieopardie, to ſuffer our well prooued euill willers to grow in ouer-great authoritie with the prince in youth; namelie, which is light of beleefe and ſoone perſuaded.

Yee remember (I trow) king Edward himſelfe, albeit he was a man of age & diſcretion, yet was he in manie things ruled by the bend, more than ſtood either with his honor, or our profit, or with the cõmoditie of any man elſe, except onlie the immoderate aduancement of themſelues. Which, whether they ſorer thirſted after their owne weale, or our wo, it were hard (I weene) to geſſe. And if ſome folks freendſhip had not holden better place with the king, than anie reſpect of kinred, they might peraduenture eaſilie haue betrapped and brought to confuſion ſome of vs yer this. Why not as eaſilie as they haue doone ſome other alreadie, as neere of his roiall bloud as we? But our Lord hath wrought his will, and (thanks be to his grace) that perill is paſt. Howbeit as great is growing, if we ſuffer this yoong king in our enimies hand, which without his witting might abuſe the name of his commandement, to anie of our vndooing, which thing God [defend] and good prouiſion forbid.

Of which good prouiſion none of vs hath anie thing the leſſe need, for the late made attonement, in which the kings pleaſure had more place than the parties willes. Nor none of vs (I beleeue) is ſo vnwiſe, ouerſoone to truſt a new freend made of an old fo; or to thinke that an hourlie kindnes, ſuddenlie contracted in one houre, continued yet ſcant a fortnight, ſhould be deeper ſettled in their ſtomachs, than a long accuſtomed malice manie yeares rooted. With theſe words and writings, and ſuch other, the duke of Gloceſter ſoone ſet on fire them that were of themſelues eaſie to kindle, & in ſpeciallie twaine, Edward duke of Buckingham, and William lord Haſtings then chamberleine, both men of honour & of great power; the one by long ſucceſſion from his anceſtrie, the other by his office and the kings fauour. Theſe two, not bearing ech to other ſo much loue, as hatred both vnto the queenes part: in this point accorded togither with the duke of Gloceſter, that they would vtterlie remoue from the kings companie all his mothers freends, vnder the name of their enimies.

A conſent to worke wickedneſſe.

Vpon this concluded the duke of Gloceſter, vnderſtanding that the lords, which at that time were about the king, intended to bring him vp to his coronation accõpanied with ſuch power of their freends, that it ſhould be hard for him to bring his purpoſe to paſſe, without the gathering and great aſſemblie of people and in maner of open warre, whereof the end (he wiſt) was doubtfull, and in which the king being on their ſide, his part ſhould haue the face and name of a rebellion: he ſecretlie therfore by diuers means cauſed the queene to be perſuaded and brought in the mind, that it neither were need, and alſo ſhould be ieopardous, the king to come vp ſtrong.

For whereas now euerie lord loued other, and none other thing ſtudied vpon, but about the coronation and honor of the king: if the lords of hir kindred ſhould aſſemble in the kings name much people, they ſhould giue the lords, betwixt whome and them had beene ſometime debate, to feare and ſuſpect, leaſt they ſhould gather this people, not for the kings ſafegard, whome no man impugned, but for their deſtruction, hauing more regard to their old variance, than their new attonement. For which cauſe they ſhould aſſemble on the other partie much people againe for their defenſe, whoſe power ſhe wiſt well far ſtretched: and thus ſhould all the realme fall on a rore. And of all the hurt that thereof ſhould inſue, which was likelie not to be little, and the moſt harme there like to fall where ſhe leaſt would, all the world would put hir and hir kindered in the wight, and ſaie that they had vnwiſelie and vntrulie alſo broken the amitie & peace, that the king hir huſband ſo prudentlie made, betwéene his kin and hirs in his death bed, and which the other partie faithfullie obſerued.

The quéene, being in this wiſe perſuaded, ſuch word ſent vnto hir ſonne, and vnto hir brother being about the king, and ouer that the duke of Glouceſter himſelfe and other lords the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the king ſo reuerentlie, and to the quéenes fréends there ſo louinglie, that they nothing earthlie miſtruſting, brought the king vp in great haſt, not in good ſpéed, with a ſober companie. Now was the king in his waie to London gone from Northampton, when theſe dukes of Glouceſter and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the lord Riuers the kings vncle, intending on the morrow to follow the king, and to be with him at Stonie Stratford [certeine] miles thence earlie yer he departed. So was there made that night much fréendlie chéere betwéene theſe dukes & the lord Riuers a great while. But incõtinent, after that they were openlie with great courteſie departed, and the lord Riuers lodged, the dukes ſecretlie with a few of their moſt priuie fréends ſet them downe in councell, wherein they ſpent a great part of the night.

The practiſes of the duke of Buckingham & Glouceſter.

And at their riſing in the dawning of the daie, they ſent about priuilie to their ſeruants in their Ins & lodgings about, giuing them commandement to make themſelues ſhortlie readie, for their lords were to horſſe backeward. Vpon which meſſages, manie of their folke were attendant, when manie of the lord Riuers ſeruants were vnreadie. Now had theſe dukes taken alſo into their cuſtodie the keies of the In, that none ſhould paſſe forth without their licence. And ouer this, in the high waie toward Stonie Stratford, where the king lay, they had beſtowed certeine of their folke, that ſhould ſend backe againe, and compell to returne, anie man that were gotten out of Northampton, toward Stonie Stratford, till they ſhould giue other licence. For aſmuch as the dukes themſelues intended for the ſhew of their diligence, to be the firſt that ſhould that daie attend vpon the kings highneſſe out of that towne. Thus bare they folke in hand.

But when the lord Riuers vnderſtood the gates cloſed, and the waies on euerie ſide beſet, neither his ſeruants nor himſelfe ſuffered to gone out, perceiuing well ſo great a thing without his knowledge not begun for naught, comparing this manner preſent with this laſt nights chéere, in ſo few houres ſo great a change, maruellouſlie miſliked. Howbeit, ſith he could not get awaie, and kéepe himſelfe cloſe, he would not, leaſt he ſhould ſéeme to hide himſelfe for ſome ſecret feare of his owne fault, whereof he ſaw no ſuch cauſe in himſelfe; he determined vpon the ſuertie of his owne conſcience, to go boldlie to them, and inquire what this matter might meane. Whom aſſoone as they ſaw, they began to quarrell with him and ſaie, that he intended to ſet diſtance betwéene the king and them, and to bring them to confuſion, but it ſhould not lie in his power.

The lord Riuers put in ward.

And when he began (as he was a verie well ſpoken man) in goodlie wiſe to excuſe himſelfe, they taried not the end of his anſwer, but ſhortlie tooke him, and put him in ward, and that doone, forthwith went to horſſebacke, and tooke the waie to Stonie Stratford, where they found the king with his companie, readie to leape on horſſebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, bicauſe it was too ſtreight for both companies. And aſſoone as they came in his preſence, they light adowne with all their companie about them. To whome the duke of Buckingham ſaid; Go afore gentlemen, & yeomen kéepe your roomes. And thus in a goodlie araie, they came to the king, and on their knées in verie humble wiſe ſaluted his grace, which receiued them in verie ioious and amiable manner, nothing earthlie knowing nor miſtruſting as yet.

The lord Greie is quarelled againſt.

But euen by and by in his preſence they piked a quarrell to the lord Richard Greie, the kings other brother by his mother, ſaieng, that he with the lord marqueſſe his brother, & the lord Riuers his vncle, had compaſſed to rule the king and the realme, and to ſet variance among the ſtates, and to ſubdue and deſtroie the noble bloud of the Realme. Toward the accõpliſhing wherof they ſaid that the lord marqueſſe had entered into the Tower of London, & thence taken out the kings treaſure, and ſent men to the ſea. All which things theſe dukes wiſt well were doone for good purpoſes and neceſſarie, by the whole councell at London, ſauing that ſomewhat they muſt ſaie.

Vnto which words the king anſwered; What my brother marqueſſe hath doone I cannot ſaie, but in good faith I dare well anſwer for mine vncle Riuers and my brother here, that they be innocent of anie ſuch matter. Yea my liege (quoth the duke of Buckingham) they haue kept their dealing in theſe matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And forthwith they areſted the lord Richard and ſir Thomas Vaughan knight, in the kings preſence; and brought the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counſell. And there they ſent awaie from the king, whom it pleaſed them, and ſet new ſeruants about him, ſuch as liked better them than him. At which dealing he wept, and was nothing content; but it booted not.

And at dinner, the duke of Glouceſter ſent a diſh from his owne table vnto the lord Riuers, praieng him to be of good chéere: all ſhould be well inough. And he thanked the duke, and praied the meſſenger to beare it to his nephue the lord Richard, with the ſame meſſage for his comfort, who he thought had more néed of comfort, as one to whome ſuch aduerſitie was ſtrange. But himſelfe had béene all his daies in vre therewith, & therefore could beare it the better. But for all this comfortable courteſie of the duke of Glouceſter, he ſent the lord Riuers, and the lord Richard, with ſir Thomas Vaughan into the north countrie, into diuerſe places to priſon, and afterward all to Pomfret, where they were in concluſion beheaded.

The death of the lord Riuers & other.

In this wiſe the duke of Glouceſter tooke vpon himſelfe the order and gouernance of the yoong king, whome with much honor and humble reuerence he conueied vpward towards the citie. But anon, the tidings of this matter came haſtilie to the quéene a a little before the midnight following, and that in the ſoreſt wiſe; that the king hir ſon was taken, hir brother, hir ſonne, & hir other fréends arreſted, and ſent no man wiſt whither, to be doone with God wot what. With which tidings the quéene in great flight & heauineſſe, bewailing hir childes reigne, hir fréends miſchance, and hir owne infortune, damning the time that euer ſhe diſſuaded the gathering of power about the king, gat hir ſelfe in all the haſt poſſible with hir yoonger ſonne and hir daughters out of the palace of Weſtminſter, in which ſhe then laie, into the ſanctuarie, lodging hir ſelfe and hir companie there in the abbats place.

The quéene taketh ſanctuarie.

Now came there one in likewiſe not long after midnight from the lord chamberleine, to doctor Rotheram the archbiſhop of Yorke, then chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Weſtminſter, And for that he ſhewed his ſeruants that he had tidings of ſo great importance, that his maiſter gaue him in charge, not to forbeare his reſt, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admit this meſſenger in, to his bed ſide. Of whom he heard that theſe dukes were gone backe with the kings grace from Stonie Stratford vnto Northampton. Notwithſtanding ſir (quoth he) my lord ſendeth your lordſhip word, that there is no feare: for he aſſureth you that all ſhall be well. I aſſure him (quoth the archbiſhop) be it as well as it will, it will neuer be ſo well as we haue ſéene it.

And there vpon, by and by after the meſſenger departed, he cauſed in all the haſt all his ſeruants to be called vp, and ſo with his owne houſhold about him, and euerie man weaponed, he tooke the great ſeale with him, and came yet before daie vnto the quéene. About whom he found much heauineſſe, rumble, haſt and buſineſſe, carriage and conueiance of hir ſtuffe into ſanctuarie, cheſts, coffers, packs, fardels, truſſed all on mens backs, no man vnoccupied, ſome lading, ſome going, ſome diſcharging, ſome comming for more, ſome breaking downe the walles to bring in the next waie, and ſome yet drew to them that holpe to carrie a wrong waie: ſuch made their lucre of others loſſe, praiſing a bootie aboue beautie, to whome the poets verſe may be well applied, to wit:

Tibul. lib. 2. eleg. 3.

Ferrea non Venerem ſed prædam ſæcula laudant.

The deſolate ſtate of the quéene.

The quéene hir ſelfe ſate alone alow on the ruſhes all deſolate and diſmaid, whome the archbiſhop comforted in beſt manner he could, ſhewing hir that he truſted the matter was nothing ſo ſore as ſhe tooke it for, and that he was put in good hope and out of feare by the meſſage ſent him from the lord chamberleine. Ah wo worth him (quoth ſhe) for he is one of them that laboreth to deſtroie me and my bloud. Madame (quoth he) be yée of good chéere, for I aſſure you, if they crowne anie other king than your ſonne, whome they now haue with them, we ſhall on the morow crowne his brother, whome you haue here with you. And here is the great ſeale, which in likewiſe as that noble prince your huſband deliuered it vnto me; ſo here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vſe and behoofe of your ſonne: and therewith he betooke hir the great ſeale, and departed home againe, yet in the dawning of the daie.

By which time, he might in his chamber window ſée all the Thames full of boates of the duke of Gloceſters ſeruants, watching that no man ſhould go to ſanctuarie, nor none could paſſe vnſearched. Then was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as ſpeciallie in the citie, the people diuerſlie diuining vpon this dealing. And ſome lords, knights, and gentlemen, either for fauour of the quéene, or for feare of themſelues, aſſembled in ſundrie companies, and went flockmele in harneſſe: and many alſo, for that they reckoned this demeanor attempted, not ſo ſpeciallie againſt the other lords, as againſt the king himſelfe in the diſturbance of his coronation. But then by and by the lords aſſembled togither at [a certeine place.]

Toward which méeting, the archbiſhop of Yorke fearing that it would be aſcribed (as it was indéed) to his ouermuch lightneſſe, that he ſo ſuddenlie had yéelded vp the great ſeale to the quéene, to whome the cuſtodie thereof nothing perteined, without eſpeciall commandement of the king, ſecretlie ſent for the ſeale againe, and brought it with him after the cuſtomable maner. And at this méeting the lord Haſtings (whoſe truth toward the king no man doubted, nor néeded to doubt) perſuaded the lords to beléeue, that the duke of Gloceſter was ſure and faſtlie faithfull to his prince, and that the lord Riuers, and lord Richard with the other knights, were for matters attempted by them againſt the duke of Gloceſter and Buckingham, put vnder arreſt for their ſuertie, not for the kings ieopardie: and that they were alſo in ſafegard, and there no longer ſhould remaine, than till the matter were, not by the dukes onelie, but alſo by all the other lords of the kings councell indifferentlie examined, & by others diſcretions ordered, and either iudged or appeaſed.

Neuertheleſſe he was depriued thereof ſhortlie after.

But one thing he aduiſed them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth, yer they knew the truth; nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irriting and prouoking men vnto anger, and diſturbing the kings coronation, towards which the dukes were comming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter ſo farre out of ioint, that it ſhould neuer be brought in frame againe. Which ſtrife if it ſhould hap (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all other things equall; yet ſhould the authoritie be on that ſide where the king is himſelfe. With theſe perſuaſions of the lord Haſtings, whereof part himſelfe beléeued, of part he wiſt the contrarie, theſe commotions were ſomewhat appeaſed. But ſpeciallie by that, that the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham were ſo néere and came ſo ſhortlie on with the king, in none other manner, with none other voice or ſemblance than to his coronation, cauſing the fame to be blowen about, that theſe lords and knights which were taken, had contriued the deſtruction of the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham, and of other the noble bloud of the realme, to the end that themſelues would alone demeane and gouerne the king at their pleaſure.

And for the colourable proofe thereof, ſuch of the dukes ſeruants as rode with the carts of their ſtuffe that were taken (among which ſtuffe, no maruell though ſome were harneſſe, which at the breaking vp of that houſhold muſt néeds either be brought awaie or caſt awaie) they ſhewed vnto the people all the waies as they went; „Lo here be the barrels of harneſſe that theſe traitors had priuilie conueid in their carriage to deſtroie the noble lords withall. This deuiſe albeit that it made the matter to wiſe men more vnlikelie, well perceiuing that the intendors of ſuch a purpoſe would rather haue had their harneſſe on their backs, than to haue bound them vp in barrels, yet much part of the common people were therewith verie well ſatiſfied, and ſaid it were almeſſe to hang them.

When the king approched néere to the citie, Edmund Shaw goldſmith, then maior, with William White, and Iohn Mathew ſhiriffes, and all the other aldermen in ſcarlet, with fiue hundred horſſe of the citizens, in violet, receiued him reuerentlie at Harneſie; and riding from thence accompanied him into the citie, which he entered the fourth daie of Maie, the firſt and laſt yeare of his reigne. But the duke of Gloceſter bare him in open ſight ſo reuerentlie to the prince, with all ſemblance of lowlineſſe, that from the great obloquie in which he was ſo late before, he was ſuddenlie fallen in ſo great truſt, that at the councell next aſſembled he was made the onelie man, choſen and thought moſt méet to be protector of the king and his realme, ſo that (were it deſtinie or were it follie) the lambe was betaken to the woolfe to kéepe.

The kings comming to London.

The duke of Gloceſter made protector.

At which councell alſo, the archbiſhop of Yorke chancellor of England, which had deliuered vp the great ſeale to the quéene, was thereof greatlie reprooued, and the ſeale taken from him, and deliuered to doctor Ruſſell biſhop of Lincolne, a wiſe man and a good, and of much experience, and one of the beſt learned men vndoubtedlie that England had in his time. Diuerſe lords and knights were appointed vnto diuerſe roomes. The lord chamberleine and ſome other kept ſtill their offices that they had before. Now all were it ſo that the protector ſo ſore thirſted for the finiſhing of that he had begun, that thought euerie daie a yeare till it were atchiued; yet durſt he no further ther attempt, as long as he had but halfe his preie in his hand.

The protectors oration.

And why? Well did he wéet, that if he depoſed the one brother, all the realme would fall to the other, if he either remained in ſanctuarie, or ſhould happilie be ſhortlie conueied to his fathers libertie. Wherfore incontinent at the next méeting of the lords at the councell, he propoſed to them, that it was a heinous déed of the quéene, & procéeding of great malice toward the kings councellors, that ſhe ſhould kéepe in ſanctuarie the kings brother from him, whoſe ſpeciall pleaſure & comfort were to haue his brother with him. And that by hir doone to none other intent, but to bring all the lords in obloquie and murmur of the people.

As though they were not to be truſted with the kings brother, that by the aſſent of the nobles of the land, were appointed as the kings néereſt fréends, to the tuition of his owne roiall perſon. The proſperitie whereof ſtandeth (quoth he) not all in kéeping from enimies, or ill viand, but partlie alſo in recreation, and moderate pleaſure: which he cannot (in this tender youth) take in the companie of ancient perſons, but in the familiar conuerſation of thoſe that be neither farre vnder, nor farre aboue his age: and neuertheleſſe of eſtate conuenient to accompanie his noble maieſtie. Wherefore, with whome rather, than with his owne brother?

And if anie man thinke this conſideration light (which I thinke none thinks that loues the king) let him conſider, that ſometime without ſmall things, greater cannot ſtand. And verelie, it redoundeth greatlie to the diſhonor both of the kings highneſſe, and of all vs that béene about his grace, to haue it run in euerie mans mouth, not in this realme onlie, but alſo in other lands (as euill words walke far) that the kings brother ſhould be faine to kéepe ſanctuarie. For euerie man will wéene, that no man will ſo doo for naught. And ſuch euill opinion once faſtned in mens harts, hard it is to wreſt out, and may grow to more gréefe than anie man can here diuine.

The lord cardinall thought the fitteſt man to deale with the quéene for the ſurrendring of hir ſonne.

Wherefore me thinketh it were not worſt to ſend vnto the quéene, for the redreſſe of this matter, ſome honorable truſtie man, ſuch as both tendereth the kings weale and the honour of his councell, and is alſo in fauour and credence with hir. For all which conſiderations, none ſéemeth more méetlie, than our reuerend father here preſent, my lord cardinall, who may in this matter doo moſt good of anie man, if it pleaſe him to take the paine; which I doubt not of his goodneſſe he will not refuſe for the kings ſake and ours, and welth of the young duke himſelfe, the kings moſt honorable brother, and (after my ſouereigne lord himſelfe) my moſt déere nephue, conſidered that thereby ſhall be ceaſſed the ſlanderous rumor and obloquie now going, and the hurts auoided that thereof might inſue, and much reſt and quiet grow to all the realme.

And if ſhe be percaſe ſo obſtinate, and ſo preciſelie ſet vpon hir owne will, that neither his wiſe and faithfull aduertiſement can not mooue hir, nor anie mans reaſon content hir; then ſhall we by mine aduiſe, by the kings authoritie fetch him out of that priſon, and bring him to his noble preſence, in whoſe continuall companie he ſhall be ſo well cheriſhed and ſo honorablie intreated, that all the world ſhall to our honour and hir reproch perceiue, that it was onelie malice, frowardneſſe, or follie, that cauſed hir to kéepe him there. This is my purpoſe and mind in this matter for this time, except anie of your lordſhips anie thing perceiue to the contrarie; for neuer ſhall I (by Gods grace) ſo wed my ſelfe to mine owne will, but that I ſhall be readie to change it vpon your better aduiſes.

When the protector had ſaid, all the councell affirmed, that the motion was good and reaſonable; and to the king and the duke his brother, honorable; and a thing that ſhould ceaſſe great murmur in the relme, if the mother might be by good means induced to deliuer him. Which thing the archbiſhop of Yorke, whome they all agréed alſo to be thereto moſt conuenient, tooke vpon him to mooue hir, and therein to doo his vttermoſt deuoir. Howbeit, if ſhe could be in no wiſe intreated with hir good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and ſuch other as were of the ſpiritualtie preſent, that it were not in anie wiſe to be attempted to take him out againſt hir will.

Reaſons why it was not thought méet to fetch the quéens ſon out of ſanctuarie.

For it ſhould be a thing that would turne to the great grudge of all men, and high diſpleaſure of God, if the priuilege of that holie place ſhould now be broken, which had ſo manie yeares be kept, which both kings and popes ſo good had granted, ſo manie had confirmed, and which holie ground was more than fiue hundred yeares ago (by ſaint Peter in his owne perſon in ſpirit accompanied with great multitudes of angels by night) ſo ſpeciallie halowed, & dedicated to God (for the proofe wherof, they haue yet in the abbeie ſaint Peters cope to ſhew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer ſo vndeuout a king that durſt that ſacred place violate, or ſo holie a biſhop that durſt it preſume to conſecrate.

And therefore (quoth the archbiſhop of Yorke) God forbid that anie man ſhould for anie thing earthlie, enterpriſe to breake the immunitie & libertie of the ſacred ſanctuarie, that hath béene the ſafegard of ſo manie a good mans life. And I truſt (quoth he) with Gods grace, we ſhall not néed it. But for anie maner néed, I would not we ſhould doo it. I truſt that ſhée ſhall be with reaſon contented, and all things in good maner obteined. And if it happen that I bring it not ſo to paſſe, yet ſhall I toward it ſo farre forth doo my beſt, that ye ſhall all well perceiue, that no lacke of my deuoire, but the mothers dread and womaniſh feare ſhall be the let.

The duke of Buckinghãs words againſt the quéene.

Womaniſh feare, naie womaniſh frowardnes (quoth the duke of Buckingham.) For I dare take it vpon my ſoule, ſhe well knoweth ſhe néedeth no ſuch thing to feare, either for hir ſon or for hir ſelfe. For as for hir, here is no man that will be at war with women. Would God ſome of the men of hir kin were women too, & then ſhould all be ſoone in reſt. Howbeit there is none of hir kin the leſſe loued, for that they be hir kin, but for their owne euill deſeruing. And natheleſſe, if we loued neither hir nor hir kin, yet were there no cauſe to thinke that wee ſhould hate the kings noble brother, to whoſe grace we our ſelues be of kin. Whoſe honor, if ſhe as much deſired as our diſhonor, and as much regard tooke to his wealth as to hir owne will, ſhe would be as loth to ſuffer him to be abſent from the king, as anie of vs be. For if ſhe haue anie wit (as would God ſhe had as good will as ſhe hath ſhrewd wit) ſhe reckoneth hir ſelfe no wiſer than ſhe thinketh ſome that be here, of whoſe faithfull mind ſhe nothing doubteth, but verelie beléeueth and knoweth, that they would be as ſorie of his harme as hir ſelfe, and yet would haue him from hir if ſhe bide there: and we all (I thinke) contented, that both be with hir, if ſhe come thence, and bide in ſuch place where they may with their honors be. Now then, if ſhe refuſe in the deliuerance of him, to follow the counſell of them, whoſe wiſdome ſhe knoweth, whoſe truth ſhe well truſteth: it is eaſie to perceiue, that frowardneſſe letteth hir, and not feare. But go to, ſuppoſe that ſhe feare (as who maie let hir to feare hir owne ſhadow) the more ſhe feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we feare to leaue him in hir hands.

For if ſhe caſt ſuch fond doubts, that ſhe feare his hurt: then will ſhe feare that he ſhall be fet thence.

For ſhe will ſone thinke, that if men were ſet (which God forbid) vpon ſo great a miſchiefe, the ſanctuarie would little let them: which good men might (as me thinketh) without ſinne ſomewhat leſſe regard than they doo. Now then, if ſhe doubt, leaſt he might be fetched from hir, is it not likelie inough that ſhe ſhall ſend him ſome where out of the realme? Verelie I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but ſhee now as ſore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if ſhe might happen to bring that to paſſe (as it were no great maiſtrie, we letting hir alone) all the world would ſaie, that we were a wiſe ſort of councellors about a king, that let his brother be caſt awaie vnder our noſes.

And therefore, I inſure you faithfullie for my mind, I will rather (mauger hir mind) fetch him awaie, than leaue him there, till hir frowardneſſe and fond feare conueie him awaie. And yet will I breake no ſanctuarie therefore. For verely, ſith the priuileges of that place, and other like, haue béene of long continued, I am not he that would be about to breake them. And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be he that ſhould be about to make them. Yet will I not ſay naie, but that it is a déed of pitie, that ſuch men as the ſea, or their euill debtors haue brought in pouertie, ſhould haue ſome place of libertie, to kéepe their bodies out of danger of their cruell creditors.

Of ſanctuaries.

And alſo, if the crowne happen (as it hath doone) to come in queſtion, while either part taketh other as traitors, I will well there be ſome places of refuge for both. But as for théeues, of which theſe places be full, and which neuer fall from the craft, after they once fall thereto, it is pitie the ſanctuarie ſhould ſerue them. And much more, mankillers, whome God bad to take from the altar and kill them, if their murther were wilfull. And where it is otherwiſe, there néed we not the ſanctuaries that God appointed in the old law. For if either neceſſitie, his owne defenſe, or miſfortune draweth him to that déed, a pardon ſerueth, which either the law granteth of courſe, or the king of pitie maie. Then looke me now how few ſanctuarie men there be, whome anie fauourable neceſſitie compelled to go thither. And then ſée on the other ſide, what a ſort there be commonlie therin of them, whom wilfull vnthriftineſſe hath brought to naught.

Weſtminſter and ſaint Martins.

The abuſe of ſanctuaries.

What a rabble of théeues, murtherers, and malicious heinous traitors, and that in two places ſpeciallie; the one at the elbow of the citie, the other in the verie bowels. I dare well auow it, weie the good that they doo, with the hurt that commeth of them, and ye ſhall find it much better to lacke both, than haue both. And this I ſaie, although they were not abuſed as they now be, & ſo long haue be, that I feare me euer they will be, while men be afraid to ſet their hands to the mendment, as though God & S. Peter were the patrones of vngratious liuing. Now vnthrifts riot & run in debt, vpon boldneſſe of theſe places, yea, and rich men run thither with poore mens goods, there they build, there they ſpend, & bid their creditors go whiſtle them. Mens wiues run thither with their husbands plate, & ſaie they dare not abide with their husbands for beating. Théeues bring thither their ſtollen goods, and there liue thereon.

There deuiſe they new robberies, nightlie they ſteale out, they rob, and reaue, and kill, and come in againe, as though thoſe places gaue them not onelie a ſafegard for the harme they haue doone, but a licence alſo to doo more. Howbeit, much of this miſchiefe (if wiſe men would ſet their hands to it) might be amended, with great thanks to God, and no breach of the priuilege. The reſidue, ſith ſo long ago, I wote néere what pope, and what prince more pitious than politike, hath granted it, & other men ſince, of a certeine religious feare, haue not broken it, let vs take a paine therewith, and let it a Gods name ſtand in force, as farre foorth as reaſon will, which is not fullie ſo farre foorth, as may ſerue to let vs of the fetching foorth of this noble man to his honor and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can be a ſanctuarie man.

The vſe of ſanctuaries.

A ſanctuarie ſerueth alwaie to defend the bodie of that man that ſtandeth in danger abroad, not of great hurt onlie, but alſo of lawfull hurt: for againſt vnlawfull harmes, neuer pope nor king intended to priuilege anie one place, for that priuilege hath euerie place. Knoweth anie man, anie place wherein it is lawfull one man to doo another wrong? That no man vnlawfullie take hurt, that libertie, the king, the law, and verie nature forbiddeth in euerie place, and maketh (to that regard) for euerie man euerie place a ſanctuarie. But where a man is by lawfull means in perill, there néedeth he the tuition of ſome ſpeciall priuilege, which is the onelie ground and cauſe of all ſanctuaries.

From which neceſſitie, this noble prince is farre, whoſe loue to his king, nature and kinred prooueth; whoſe innocencie to all the world, his tender youth prooueth; and ſo ſanctuarie, as for him, neither none he néedeth, nor alſo none can haue. Men come not to ſanctuarie, as they come to baptiſme, to require it by their godfathers; he muſt aſke it himſelfe that muſt haue it, and reaſon; ſith no man hath cauſe to haue it, but whoſe conſcience of his owne fault maketh him fain, néed to require it. What will then hath yonder babe, which and if he had diſcretion to require it, if néed were, I dare ſay would now be right angrie with them that kéepe him there? And I would thinke without anie ſcruple of conſcience, without anie breach of priuilege, to be ſomewhat more homelie with them that be there ſanctuarie men in déed.

For if one go to ſanctuarie with another mans goods, whie ſhould not the king, leauing his bodie at libertie, ſatiſfie the partie of his goods, euen within the ſanctuarie? For neither king nor pope can giue anie place ſuch a priuilege, that it ſhall diſcharge a man of his debts, being able to paie. [And with that, diuerſe of the clergie that were preſent (whether they ſaid it for his pleaſure, or as they thought) agréed plainelie, that by the law of God, and of the church, the goods of a ſanctuarie man ſhould be deliuered in paiment of his debts, and ſtollen goods to the owner, and onlie libertie reſerued him to get his liuing with the labor of his hands.]

Verelie (quoth the duke) I thinke you ſay verie truth. And what if a mans wife will take ſanctuarie, bicauſe ſhe luſt to run frõ hir husband, I would wéen if ſhe could alledge none other cauſe, he maie lawfullie without anie diſpleaſure to ſaint Peter, take hir out of ſaint Peters church by the arme. And if no bodie maie be taken out of ſanctuarie, that ſaith hée will bide there; then if a child will take ſanctuarie, bicauſe he feareth to go to ſchoole, his maiſter muſt let him alone. And as ſimple as that ſample is, yet is there leſſe reaſon in our caſe than in that; for therein, though it be a childiſh feare, yet is there at the leaſt wiſe ſome feare, and herein is there none at all. And verelie, I haue often heard of ſanctuarie men, but I neuer heard earſt of ſanctuarie children.

And therefore, as for the concluſion of my mind, who ſo maie haue deſerued to néed it, if they thinke it for their ſuertie, let them kéepe it. But he can be no ſanctuarie man, that neither hath wiſdome to deſire it, nor malice to deſerue it; whoſe life or libertie can by no lawfull proceſſe ſtand in ieopardie. And he that taketh one out of ſanctuarie to doo him good, I ſaie plainlie, that he breaketh no ſanctuarie. When the duke had doone, the temporall men whole, and a good part of the ſpirituall alſo, thinking no hurt earthlie meant toward the yoong babe, condeſcended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, he ſhould be fetched. Howbeit they thought it all beſt, in the auoiding of all maner of rumor, that the lord cardinall ſhould firſt aſſaie to get him with hir good will.

Wherevpon all the councell came vnto the Starre chamber at Weſtminſter; and the lord cardinall, leauing the protector with the councell in the Starchamber, departed into the ſanctuarie to the quéene, with diuers other lords with him: were it for the reſpect of his honor, or that ſhe ſhould by preſence of ſo manie perceiue, that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the protector intended not in this matter to truſt anie one man alone; or elſe, that if ſhe finallie were determined to kéepe him, ſome of that companie had happilie ſecret inſtruction, incontinent (maugre hir mind) to take him, and to leaue hir no reſpit to conueie him, which ſhe was likelie to mind after this matter broken to hir, if hir time would in anie wiſe ſerue hir.

When the quéene and theſe lords were come togither in preſence, the lord cardinall ſhewed vnto hir, that it was thought vnto the protector, and vnto the whole councell, that hir kéeping of the kings brother in that place, was the thing which highlie ſounded, not onelie to the great rumor of the people and their obloquie; but alſo to the importable gréefe and diſpleaſure of the kings roiall maieſtie, to whoſe grace it were as ſingular a comfort, to haue his naturall brother in companie, as it was their both diſhonour, and all theirs and hirs alſo, to ſuffer him in ſanctuarie, as though the one brother ſtood in danger and perill of the other [and therefore more conuenient it were they ſhould be togither, than parted aſunder; that the world may well thinke and ſaie both of their kinred and alſo of them, when they ſhall ſée and heare how they kéepe continuall companie, and liue in mutuall amitie (as becometh brethren) which bringeth commodities with it, for number, infinite; and for vſe, comfortable and neceſſarie; as it is truelie ſaid:

Quæ ligat vnanimes fœlix concordia fratres,
O quales fructus vtilitatis habet!]

The cardinall ſhewed hir likewiſe, that the councell therefore had ſent him vnto hir, to require hir the deliuerie of him, that he might be brought vnto the kings preſence at his libertie, out of that place, which they reckoned as a priſon; and there ſhould he be demeaned according to his eſtate: and ſhe in this dooing, ſhould both doo great good to the realme, pleaſure to the councell, and profit to hir ſelfe, ſuccour to hir fréends that were in diſtreſſe, and ouer that (which he wiſt well ſhe ſpeciallie tendered) not onelie great comfort and honor to the king, but alſo to the yoong duke himſelfe, whoſe both great wealth it were to be togither, as well for manie greater cauſes, as alſo for their both diſport & recreation. Which thing the lord eſtéemed no ſlight, though it ſéeme light, well pondering that their youth without recreation and plaie cannot indure; nor anie ſtranger, for the conuenience of both their ages and eſtates, ſo méetlie in that point for anie of them, as either of them for other.

Protector.

The quéenes anſwer.

My lord (quoth the quéene) I ſaie not naie, but that it were verie conuenient, that this gentleman, whome yée require, were in companie of the king his brother: and in good faith, me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet awhile, to béene in the cuſtodie of their mother, the tender age conſidered of the elder of them both, but ſpeciallie the yoonger, which (beſides his infancie, that alſo néedeth good looking to) hath awhile béene ſo ſore diſeaſed, vexed with ſickneſſe, and is ſo newlie rather a little amended, than well recouered, that I dare put no perſon earthlie in truſt with his kéeping, but my ſelfe onelie, conſidering that there is (as phyſicians ſaie) and as we alſo find, double the perill in the recidination, than was in the firſt ſickneſſe, with which diſeaſe nature being ſore laboured, forewearied and weakened, wareth the leſſe able to beare out and ſuſteine a new ſurfet. And albeit there might be founden other that would happilie doo their beſt vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, than I that ſo long haue kept him: or is more tenderlie like to cheriſh him, than his owne mother that bare him.

The quéene is loth to part with hir ſon.

No man denieth, good madame (quoth the cardinall) but that your grace were of all folke moſt neceſſarie about your children: and ſo would all the councell not onelie be content, but glad that ye were (if it might ſtand with your pleaſure) to be in ſuch place as might ſtand with their honour. But if you doo appoint your ſelfe to tarrie héere, then thinke they it more conuenient that the duke of Yorke were with the king honourablie at his libertie, to the comfort of them both: than héere as a ſanctuarie man, to their both diſhonour and obloquie, ſith there is not alwaie ſo great neceſſitie to haue the child to be with the mother: but that occaſion may ſometime be ſuch, that it ſhould be more expedient to kéepe him elſewhere. Which in this well appeareth, that at ſuch time as your déereſt ſonne then prince, and now king, ſhould for his honor, and good order of the countrie, kéepe houſhold in Wales, farre out of your companie: your grace was well content therewith your ſelfe.

Not verie well content (quoth the quéene) and yet the caſe is not like, for the tone was then in health, and the tother is now ſicke. In which caſe, I maruell greatlie, that my lord protector is ſo deſirous to haue him in his kéeping, where if the child in his ſickneſſe miſcarried by nature, yet might he run into ſlander and ſuſpicion of fraud. And where they call it a thing ſo ſore againſt my childes honor, and theirs alſo, that he bideth in this place: it is all their honours there to ſuffer him bide, where no man doubteth he ſhall be beſt kept; and that is héere, while I am héere, which as yet intend not to come foorth and ieopard my ſelfe after other of my fréends, which would God were rather héere in ſuertie with me, than I were there in ieopardie with them.

The quéenes miſtruſt of the lord protector.

Whie madame (quoth another lord) know you anie thing whie they ſhould be in ieopardie? Naie verelie ſir (quoth ſhée) nor whie they ſhould be in priſon neither, as they now be. But it is (I trow) no great maruell though I feare, leaſt thoſe that haue not letted to put them in dureſſe without colour, will let as little to procure their deſtruction without cauſe. The cardinall made a countenance to the other lord, that he ſhould harpe no more vpon that ſtring; and then ſaid he to the quéene, that he nothing doubted, but that thoſe lords of hir honorable kin, which as yet remained vnder arreſt, ſhould vpon the matter examined, doo well inough: and as toward hir noble perſon, neither was nor could be anie maner ieopardie.

The lord Howard, ſaith Edw. Hall.

Whereby ſhould I truſt that (quoth the quéene) in that I am giltleſſe? As though they were giltie, in that I am with their enimies better loued than they? When they hate them for my ſake, in that I am ſo néere of kin to the king? And how far they be off, if that would helpe, as God ſend grace it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpoſe not as yet to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my ſonne, I mind that he ſhall be where I am, till I ſée further: for I aſſure you, for that I ſée ſome men ſo gréedie, without anie ſubſtantiall cauſe to haue him, this maketh me much the more fearder to deliuer him.

Truelie madame, quoth he, and the fearder that you be to deliuer him, the fearder bin other men to ſuffer you to kéepe him, leaſt your cauſeleſſe feare might cauſe you further to conueie him; and manie be there that thinke he can haue no priuilege in this place, which neither can haue will to aſke it, nor malice to deſerue it. And therefore, they reckon no priuilege broken, though they fetch him out; which if yée finallie refuſe to deliuer him, I verelie thinke they will. So much dread hath my lord his vncle, for the tender loue he beareth him, leaſt your grace ſhould hap to ſend him awaie.

The quéenes replie vpon the lord cardinall.

A ſir (quoth the quéene) hath the protector ſo tender zeale, that he feareth nothing but leaſt he ſhould eſcape him? Thinketh he that I would ſend him hence, which neither is in the plight to ſend out. And in what place could I reckon him ſure, if he be not ſure in this ſanctuarie, whereof was there neuer tyrant yet ſo diueliſh that durſt preſume to breake? And I truſt God is as ſtrong now to withſtand his aduerſaries, as euer he was. But my ſonne can deſerue no ſanctuarie, and therefore he can not haue it. Forſooth he hath found a goodlie gloſe, by which that place that may defend a théefe, may not ſaue an innocent. But he is in no ieopardie, nor hath no néed thereof, would God he had not.

Troweth the protector (I praie God he may proue a protector) troweth he that I perceiue not wherevnto his painted proceſſe draweth? It is not honourable that the duke bide héere: it were comfortable for them both, that he were with his brother, bicauſe the king lacketh a plaifellow. Be you ſure? I praie God ſend them both better plaifellowes than him, that maketh ſo high a matter vpon ſuch a trifling pretext: as though there could none be founden to plaie with the king, but if his brother that hath no luſt to plaie for ſickneſſe, come out of ſanctuarie out of his ſafegard to plaie with him. As though princes (as yoong as they be) could not plaie but with their péeres, or children could not plaie but with their kinred, with whome for the more part they agrée much worſe than with ſtrangers.

But the child cannot require the priuilege. Who told him ſo? He ſhall heare him aſke it, and he will. Howbeit, this is a gaie matter. Suppoſe he could not aſke it, ſuppoſe he would not aſke it, ſuppoſe he would aſke to go out. If I ſaie he ſhall not; if I aſke the priuilege but for my ſelfe, I ſay he that againſt my will taketh him out, breaketh the ſanctuarie. Serueth this libertie for my perſon onelie, or for my goods too? Yée may not hence take my horſſe fro me: and may you take my child fro me? He is alſo my ward: for as my learned counſell ſheweth me, ſith he hath nothing by deſcent holden by knights ſeruice, the law maketh his mother his gardian. Then may no man I ſuppoſe take my ward fro me out of ſanctuarie, without the breach of the ſanctuarie.

And if my priuilege could not ſerue him, nor he aſke it for himſelfe, yet ſith the law committeth to me the cuſtodie of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a child a gardian onelie for his goods and lands, diſcharging him of the cure and ſafe kéeping of his bodie, for which onelie both lands and goods ſerue. (*) And if examples be ſufficient to obteine priuilege for my child, I néed not farre to ſéeke. For in this place in which we now be (and which is now in queſtion whether my child may take benefit of it) mine other ſonne now king was borne, and kept in his cradle, and preſerued to a more proſperous fortune, which I praie God long to continue. And as all you know, this is not the firſt time that I haue taken ſanctuarie.

This that is héere betwéene this marke () & this marke () was not writtẽ by him in Engliſh but is tranſlated out of this hiſtorie which he wrote in Latine.

For when my lord my husband was baniſhed, and thruſt out of his kingdome, I fled hither, being great with child, and héere I bare the prince. And when my lord my husband returned ſafe againe, and had the victorie, then went I hence to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the prince vnto his father, when he firſt tooke him in his armes. And I praie God that my ſonnes palace may be as great ſafegard vnto him now reigning, as this place was ſometime to the kings enimie. In which place I intend to kéepe his brother, ſith, &c. (*) Wherefore héere intend I to kéepe him, ſith mans law ſerueth the gardian to kéepe the infant.

The law of nature will the mother to kéepe hir child, Gods law priuilegeth the ſanctuarie, and the ſanctuarie my ſonne, ſith I feare to put him in the protectors hands that hath his brother alreadie, and were (if both failed) inheritour to the crowne. The cauſe of my feare hath no man to doo to examine. And yet feare I no further than the law feareth, which (as learned men tell me) forbiddeth euerie man the cuſtodie of them, by whoſe death he maie inherit leſſe land than a kingdome. I can no more, but whoſoeuer he be that breaketh this holie ſanctuarie, I praie God ſhortlie ſend him néed of ſanctuarie, when he maie not come to it. For taken out of ſanctuarie would I not my mortall enimie were.

The lord cardinall vſeth an other way to perſuade the quéene.

The lord cardinall, perceiuing that the quéene waxed euer the longer the farther off, and alſo that ſhe began to kindle and chafe, and ſpake more biting words againſt the protector, and ſuch as he neither beléeued, and was alſo loth to heare, he ſaid to hir for a finall concluſion, that he would no longer diſpute the matter: but if ſhe were content to deliuer the duke to him, and to the other lords preſent, he durſt laie his owne bodie & ſoule both in pledge, not onelie for his ſuertie, but alſo for his eſtate. And if ſhe would giue them a reſolute anſwer to the contrarie, he would forthwith depart therwithall, and ſhift who ſo would with this buſineſſe afterwards: for he neuer intended more to mooue hir in that matter, in which ſhe thought that he & all other alſo (ſaue hir ſelfe) lacked either wit or truth: wit, if they were ſo dull that they could nothing perceiue what the protector intended: truth, if they ſhould procure hir ſonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they ſhould perceiue toward the child anie euill intended.

The quéene with theſe words ſtood a good while in a great ſtudie. And forſomuch as hir ſéemed the cardinall more readie to depart than ſome of the remnant, and the protector himſelfe readie at hand; ſo that ſhe verelie thought ſhe could not kéepe him, but that he ſhould incontinentlie be taken thenſe; and to conueie him elſe-where, neither had ſhe time to ſerue hir, nor place determined, nor perſons appointed, all things vnreadie, this meſſage came on hir ſo ſuddenlie, nothing leſſe looking for, than to haue him fet out of ſanctuarie, which ſhe thought to be now beſet in ſuch places about, that he could not be conueied out vntaken, and partlie as ſhe thought it might fortune hir feare to be falſe, ſo well ſhe wiſt it was either néedleſſe or bootleſſe: wherefore if ſhe ſhould needs go from him, ſhe déemed it beſt to deliuer him.

She falleth to a reſolution touching hir ſonnes deliuerie.

And ouer that, of the cardinals faith ſhe nothing doubted, nor of ſome other lords neither, whome ſhe there ſaw. Which as ſhe feared leaſt they might be deceiued: ſo was ſhe well aſſured they would not be corrupted. Then thought ſhe it ſhould yet make them the more warilie to looke to him, and the more circumſpectlie to ſée to his ſuertie, if ſhe with hir owne hands betooke him to them of truſt. And at the laſt ſhe tooke the yoong duke by the hand, and ſaid vnto the lords: My lords (quoth ſhe) and all my lords, I neither am ſo vnwiſe to miſtruſt your wits, nor ſo ſuſpicious to miſtruſt your truths: of which thing I purpoſe to make you ſuch a proofe, as if either of both in you, might turne both you and me to great ſorow, the realme to much harme, and you to great reproch.

For lo, here is (quoth ſhe) this gentleman, whom I doubt not but I could here keepe ſafe, if I would, what euer anie man ſay: & I doubt not alſo, but there be ſome abroad ſo deadlie enimies vnto my bloud, that if they wiſt where anie of it laie in their owne bodie, they would let it out. We haue alſo experience that deſire of a kingdome knoweth no kinred. The brother hath beene the brothers bane: and maie the nephues be ſure of their vncle? Ech of theſe children is the others defenſe while they be aſunder, and ech of their liues lieth in the others bodie. Keepe one ſafe and both be ſure, and nothing for them both more perillous, than to be both in one place. For what wiſe merchant aduentureth all his goods in one ſhip?

All this notwithſtanding, here I deliuer him and his brother in him, to keepe, into your hands, of whom I ſhall aske them both afore God & the world. Faithfull ye be that wot I well, & I know well you be wiſe. Power and ſtrength to keepe him (if you liſt) lacke ye not of your ſelfe, nor can lacke helpe in this cauſe. And if ye can not elſe-where, then maie you leaue him here. But onelie one thing I beſeech you, for the truſt which his father put in you euer, & for the truſt that I put in you now, that as farre as ye thinke that I feare to much, be you well ware that you feare not as farre to little. And therewithall ſhe ſaid vnto the child; Fare well mine owne ſweete ſonne, God ſend you good keeping: let me kiſſe you yet once yer you go, for God knoweth when we ſhall kiſſe togither againe. And therewith ſhe kiſſed him and bleſſed him, turned hir backe and wept and went hir waie, leauing the child weeping as faſt. [Howbeit ſhe was ſorie afterwards that ſhe had ſo parted from hir ſon (when it was paſt hir power to procure remedie, & no hope of helpe left againſt afterclaps) which is the common caſe of all that kind, as the prouerbe ſaith:

Femineus verè dolor eſt poſt facta dolere.]

O diſſimulation.

When the lord cardinall, and theſe other lords with him, had receiued this yong duke, they brought him into the Star chamber, where the protector tooke him in his armes and kiſſed him with theſe words: Now welcome my lord euen with all my verie heart. And he ſaid in that of likelihood as he thought. Therevpon forthwith they brought him vnto the king his brother into the biſhops palace at Paules, and from thenſe thorough the citie honourablie into the Tower, out of the which after that daie they neuer came abroad. (*) When the protector had both the children in his hands, he opened himſelfe more boldlie, both to certeine other men, and alſo cheeflie to the duke of Buckingham. Although I know that manie thought that this duke was priuie to all the protectors counſell, euen from the beginning; and ſome of the protectors freends ſaid, that the duke was the firſt moouer of the protector to this matter, ſending a priuie meſſenger vnto him, ſtreict after king Edwards death.

This that is here betweene this marke () & this marke () was not written by him in Engliſh but is tranſlated out of his hiſtorie which he wrote in Latine.

But others againe, which knew better the ſubtill wit of the protector, denie that he euer opened his enterpriſe to the duke, vntill he had brought to paſſe the things before rehearſed. But when he had impriſoned the queenes kinſfolks, & gotten both hir ſonnes into his owne hands, then he opened the reſt of his purpoſe with leſſe feare to them whome he thought meet for the matter, and ſpeciallie to the duke, who being wonne to his purpoſe, he thought his ſtrength more than halfe increaſed. The matter was broken vnto the duke by ſubtill folks, and ſuch as were their craftes-maſters in the handling of ſuch wicked deuiſes: who declared vnto him that the yong king was offended with him for his kinſfolks ſake, and if he were euer able he would reuenge them, who would pricke him forward therevnto if they eſcaped (for they would remember their impriſonment) or elſe if they were put to death, without doubt the yong K. would be carefull for their deaths, whoſe impriſonment was greeuous vnto him.

Alſo that with repenting the duke ſhould nothing auaile, for there was no waie left to redeeme his offenſe by benefits, but he ſhould ſooner deſtroie himſelfe than ſaue the king, who with his brother and his kinſfolks he ſaw in ſuch places impriſoned, as the protector might with a becke deſtroie them all: and that it were no doubt but he would do it in deed, if there were anie new enterpriſe attempted. And that it was likelie, that as the protector had prouided priuie gard for himſelfe, ſo had he ſpials for the duke, and traines to catch him, if he ſhould be againſt him; and that peraduenture from them, whome he leaſt ſuſpected. For the ſtate of things and the diſpoſitions of men were then ſuch, that a man could not well tell whome he might truſt, or whome he might feare.

The dukes full reſolution, to go thorough with his enterpriſe.

Theſe things and ſuch like, being beaten into the dukes mind, brought him to that point, that where he had repented the waie that he had entered; yet would he go forth in the ſame; and ſith he had once begun, he would ſtoutlie go thorough. And therefore to this wicked enterpriſe, which he beleeued could not be voided, he bent himſelfe, and went through; and determined, that ſith the common miſcheefe could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie. Then it was agreed, that the protector ſhuld haue the dukes aid to make him king, and that the protectors onelie lawfull ſonne ſhould marrie the dukes daughter, and that the protector ſhould grant him the quiet poſſeſſion of the earldome of Hereford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could neuer obteine it in king Edwards time.

Beſides theſe requeſts of the duke, the protector of his owne mind promiſed him a great quantitie of the kings treaſure, and of his houſhold ſtuffe. And when they were thus at a point betweene themſelues, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the yong king, as they would haue it ſeeme. And that they might turne both the eies and minds of men from perceiuing of their drifts other-where, the lords being ſent for from all parts of the realme, came thicke to that ſolemnitie. But the protector and the duke, after that they had ſent the lord cardinall, the archbiſhop of Yorke then lord chancellor, the biſhop of Elie, the lord Stanleie, and the lord Haſtings then lord chamberlaine, with manie other noble men (*) to common & deuiſe about the coronation in one place, as faſt were they in an other place, contriuing the contrarie, and to make the protector king.

To which councell albeit there were adhibited verie few, and they were ſecret: yet began there here and there abouts, ſome maner of muttering among the people, as though all ſhould not long be well, though they neither wiſt what they feared, nor wherefore: were it, that before ſuch great things, mens hearts of a ſecret inſtinct of nature miſgiue them; as the ſea without wind ſwelleth of himſelfe ſometime before a tempeſt: or were it that ſome one man, happilie ſomewhat perceiuing, filled manie men with ſuſpicion, though he ſhewed few men what he knew. Howbeit ſomewhat the dealing it ſelfe made men to muſe on the matter, though the councell were cloſe. For by little and little all folke withdrew from the Tower, and drew vnto Croſbies in Biſhops gates ſtreet, where the protector kept his houſhold. The protector had the reſort, the king in maner deſolate.

While ſome for their buſineſſe made ſute to them that had the doing, ſome were by their freends ſecretlie warned, that it might happilie turne them to no good, to be to much attendant about the king without the protectors appointment, which remoued alſo diuerſe of the princes old ſeruants from him, and ſet new about him. Thus manie things comming togither, partlie by chance, partlie of purpoſe, cauſed at length not common people onelie, that wond with the wind; but wiſe men alſo, and ſome lords eke to marke the matter and muſe thereon; ſo farre foorth that the lord Stanleie that was after earle of Derbie, wiſelie miſtruſted it, and ſaid vnto the lord Haſtings, that he much miſliked theſe two ſeuerall councels. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the tone place, little wot we wherof they talke in the tother place.

My lord (quoth the lord Haſtings) on my life neuer doubt you: for while one man is there, which is neuer thenſe, neuer can there be thing once moued, that ſhould ſound amiſſe toward me, but it ſhould be in mine eares yer it were well out of their mouths. This ment he by Cateſbie, which was of his neere ſecret councell, and whome he verie familiarlie vſed, and in his moſt weightie matters put no man in ſo ſpeciall truſt, reckoning himſelfe to no man ſo liefe, ſith he well wiſt there was no man ſo much to him beholden as was this Cateſbie, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this land, and by the ſpeciall fauour of the lord chamberlaine, in good authoritie, and much rule bare in all the countie of Leiceſter, where the lord chamberlains power cheefelie laie.

Cateſbie and his conditions deſcribed.

But ſuerlie great pitie was it, that he had not had either more truth, or leſſe wit. For his diſſimulation onelie kept all that miſcheefe vp. In whome if the lord Haſtings had not put ſo ſpeciall truſt, the lord Stanleie & he had departed with diuerſe other lords, and broken all the danſe, for manie ill ſignes that he ſaw, which he now conſtrues all to the beſt. So ſuerlie thought he, that there could be none harme toward him in that councell intended, where Cateſbie was. And of truth the protector and the duke of Buckingham made verie good ſemblance vnto the lord Haſtings, and kept him much in companie. And vndoubtedlie the protector loued him well, and loth was to haue loſt him, ſauing for feare leaſt his life ſhould haue quailed their purpoſe.

For which cauſe he moued Cateſbie to prooue with ſome words caſt out a farre off, whether he could thinke it poſſible to win the lord Haſtings vnto their part. But Cateſbie, whether he aſſaied him, or aſſaied him not, reported vnto them, that he found him ſo faſt, and heard him ſpeake ſo terrible words, that he durſt no further breake. And of truth, the lord chamberlaine of verie truſt ſhewed vnto Cateſbie the diſtruſt that others began to haue in the matter. And therefore he, fearing leaſt their motion might with the lord Haſtings miniſh his credence, whervnto onelie all the matter leaned, procured the protector haſtilie to rid him. And much the rather, for that he truſted by his death to obteine much of the rule that the lord Haſtings bare in his countrie: the onelie deſire whereof was the allectiue that induced him to be partner, and one ſpeciall contriuer of all this horrible treaſon.

An aſſemblie of lords in the Tower.

Whervpon ſoone after, that is to wit, on the fridaie [being the thirteenth of Iune] manie lords aſſembled in the Tower, and there ſat in councell, deuiſing the honourable ſolemnitie of the kings coronation, of which the time appointed then ſo neere approched, that the pageants and ſubtilties were in making daie & night at Weſtminſter, and much vittels killed therfore, that afterward was caſt awaie. Theſe lords ſo ſitting togither communing of this matter, the protector came in amongſt them, firſt about nine of the clocke, ſaluting them courteouſlie, and excuſing himſelfe that he had beene from them ſo long, ſaieng merilie that he had beene a ſleeper that daie.

After a little talking with them, he ſaid vnto the biſhop of Elie; My lord you haue verie good ſtrawberries at your garden in Holborne, I require you let vs haue a meſſe of them. Gladlie my lord (quoth he) would God I had ſome better thing as readie to your pleaſure as that! And therewithall in all the haſt he ſent his ſeruant for a meſſe of ſtrawberies. The protector ſet the lords faſt in communing, & therevpon praieng them to ſpare him for a little while, departed thenſe. And ſoone after one houre, betweene ten & eleuen he returned into the chamber amongſt them all, changed with a woonderfull ſoure angrie countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and fretting, and gnawing on his lips: and ſo ſat him downe in his place.

The behauiour of the lord protector in the aſſemblie of the lords.

All the lords were much diſmaid and ſore marueled at this maner of ſudden change, and what thing ſhould him aile. Then, when he had ſitten ſtill a while, thus he began: What were they worthie to haue that compaſſe and imagine the deſtruction of me, being ſo neere of bloud vnto the king, and protector of his roiall perſon and his realme? At this queſtion, all the lords ſat ſore aſtonied, muſing much by whome this queſtion ſhould be meant, of which euerie man wiſt himſelfe cleere. Then the lord chamberlaine (as he that for the loue betweene them thought he might be boldeſt with him) anſwered and ſaid, that they were worthie to be puniſhed as heinous traitors, whatſoeuer they were. And all the other affirmed the ſame. That is (quoth he) yonder ſorcereſſe my brothers wife, and other with hir (meaning the queene.)

At theſe words manie of the other lords were greatlie abaſhed, that fauoured hir. But the lord Haſtings was in his mind better content, that it was moued by hir, than by anie other whome he loued better: albeit his heart ſomewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counſell in this matter, as he was of the taking of hir kinred, and of their putting to death, which were by his aſſent before deuiſed to be beheaded at Pomfret this ſelfe ſame daie, in which he was not ware that it was by other deuiſed, that he himſelfe ſhould be beheaded the ſame daie at London. Then ſaid the protector: Ye ſhall all ſee in what wiſe that ſorcereſſe, and that other witch of hir councell Shores wife, with their affinitie, haue by their ſorcerie and witchcraft waſted my bodie. And therwith he plucked vp his dublet ſleeue to his elbow vpon his left arme, where he ſhewed a weeriſh withered arme, and ſmall; as it was neuer other.

Herevpon euerie mans mind ſore miſgaue them, well perceiuing that this matter was but a quarell. For they well wiſt that the queene was too wiſe to go about anie ſuch follie. And alſo if ſhe would, yet would ſhe of all folke leaſt, make Shores wife of hir counſell, whome of all women ſhe moſt hated, as that concubine whome the king hir huſband had moſt loued. And alſo, no man was there preſent, but well knew that his arme was euer ſuch ſince his birth. Naththeleſſe, the lord chamberlaine (which from the death of king Edward kept Shores wife, on whome he ſomewhat doted in the kings life, ſauing (as it is ſaid) he that while forbare hir of reuerence toward the king, or elſe of a certeine kind of fidelitie to his freend) anſwered and ſaid: Certeinelie my lord, if they haue ſo heinouſlie doone, they be worthie heinous puniſhment.

What (quoth the protector) thou ſerueſt me I weene with ifs and with ands, I tell thee they haue ſo doone, and that I will make good on thy bodie traitor: and therewith as in a great anger, he clapped his fiſt vpon the bord a great rap. At which token one cried, Treaſon, without the chamber. Therewith a doore clapped, and in come there ruſhing men in harneſſe, as manie as the chamber might hold. And anon the protector ſaid to the lord Haſtings: I arreſt thée traitor: What me my lord? (quoth he.) Yea thée traitor quoth the protector. And an other let flie at the lord Stanleie, which ſhrunke at the ſtroke, & fell vnder the table, or elſe his head had béene cleft to the téeth: for as ſhortlie as he ſhranke, yet ran the bloud about his eares.

The lord Stanleie wounded.

Then were they all quickelie beſtowed in diuerſe chambers, except the lord chamberleine, whome the protector bad ſpéed and ſhriue him apace, for by ſaint Paule (quoth he) I will not to dinner till I ſée thy head off. It booted him not to aſke whie, but heauilie tooke a prieſt at aduenture, & made a ſhort ſhrift: for a longer would not be ſuffered, the protector made ſo much haſt to dinner, which he might not go to, vntill this were doone, for ſauing of his oth. So was he brought foorth to the gréene beſide the chappell within the Tower, and his head laid downe vpon a long log of timber, and there ſtriken off, and afterward his bodie with the head interred at Windſor beſide the bodie of king Edward, both whoſe ſoules our Lord pardon. [Thus began he to eſtabliſh his kingdome in bloud, growing thereby in hatred of the nobles, and alſo abridging both the line of his life, and the time of his regiment: for God will not haue bloudthirſtie tyrants daies prolonged, but will cut them off in their ruffe; according to Dauids words:

Lord Haſtings lord chamberleine beheaded.

Impio, fallaci, auidóque cædis

Buchan. in pſal. 55.

A maruellous caſe is it to heare either the warnings of that he ſhould haue voided, or the tokens of that he could not void. For the ſelfe night next before his death, the lord Stanleie ſent a truſtie meſſenger vnto him at midnight in all the haſt, requiring him to riſe and ride awaie with him, for he was diſpoſed vtterlie no longer to bide, he had ſo fearfull a dreame; in which him thought that a boare with his tuſkes ſo raſed them both by the heads, that the bloud ran about both their ſhoulders. And forſomuch as the protector gaue the boare for his cogniſance, this dreame made ſo fearefull an impreſſion in his heart, that he was throughlie determined no longer to tarie, but had his horſſe readie, if the lord Haſtings would go with him, to ride yet ſo farre the ſame night, that they ſhould be out of danger yer daie.

The lord Stanleies dreame.

Ha good Lord (quoth the lord Haſtings to this meſſenger) leaneth my lord thy maiſter ſo much to ſuch trifles, and hath ſuch faith in dreames, which either his owne feare fantaſieth, or doo riſe in the nights reſt by reaſon of his daies thought? Tell him it is plaine witchcraft to beléeue in ſuch dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh he not that we might be as likelie to make them true by our going, if we were caught & brought backe, as fréends faile fliers; for then had the boare a cauſe likelie to raſe vs with his tuſks, as folke that fled for ſome falſehood. Wherefore, either is there perill, or none there is in déed: or if anie be, it is rather in going than biding. And in caſe we ſhould néeds fall in perill one waie or other, yet had I rather that men ſhould ſée that it were by other mens falſehood, than thinke it were either by our owne fault, or faint heart. And therefore go to thy maiſter (man) and commend me to him, & praie him be merie & haue no feare: for I inſure him I am as ſure of the man that he woteth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God ſend grace ſir (quoth the meſſenger) and went his waie.

Foretokens of imminent miſfortune to the lord Haſtings.

Certeine is it alſo, that in riding towards the Tower, the ſame morning in which he was beheded, his horſſe twiſe or thriſe ſtumbled with him, almoſt to the falling. Which thing albeit ech man wote well dailie happeneth to them, to whom no ſuch miſchance is toward; yet hath it béene of an old rite and cuſtome obſerued, as a token oftentimes notablie foregoing ſome great miſfortune. Now this that followeth was no warning, but an enuious ſcorne. The ſame morning yer he was vp, came a knight vnto him, as it were of courteſie, to accompanie him to the councell; but of truth ſent by the protector to haſt him thitherwards, with whome he was of ſecret confederacie in that purpoſe; a meane man at that time, and now of great authoritie.

This knight (I ſay) when it happened the lord chamberleine by the waie to ſtaie his horſſe, & common a while with a prieſt whom he met in the Tower ſtréet, brake his tale, and ſaid merilie to him; What my lord, I pray you come on, whereto talke you ſo long with that prieſt? you haue no néed of a prieſt yet: and therwith he laughed vpon him, as though he would ſay, Ye ſhall haue ſoone. But ſo little wiſt the tother what he ment, and ſo little miſtruſted, that he was neuer merier, nor neuer ſo full of good hope in his life, which ſelfe thing is oft ſéene a ſigne of change. But I ſhall rather let anie thing paſſe me, than the vaine ſuertie of mans mind ſo néere his death [flattering himſelfe with deceitfull conceipts of inward motions of life to be prolonged, euen in preſent caſes of deadlie danger, and heauie miſfortunes offering great miſtruſt; as he did that is noted for ſpeaking like a foole:

Non eſt (crede mihi) ſapientis dicere, Viuam:
Naſcentes morimur, finiſq; ab origine pendet.]

Manil. lib. 4. Aſtro.

Vpon the verie Tower wharfe, ſo neare the place where his head was off ſoone after, there met he with one Haſtings a purſeuant of his owne name. And at their méeting in that place, he was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before to méet in like manner togither in the ſame place. At which other time the lord chamberleine had béene accuſed vnto king Edward by the lord Riuers the quéenes brother, in ſuch wiſe, as he was for the while (but it laſted not long) farre fallen into the kings indignation, & ſtood in great feare of himſelfe. And forſomuch as he now met this purſeuant in the ſame place, that ieopardie ſo well paſſed, it gaue him great pleaſure to talke with him thereof, with whom he had before talked thereof in the ſame place, while he was therein.

And therefore he ſaid: Ha Haſtings, art thou remembred when I met thée here once with an heauie heart? Yea my lord (quoth he) that remember I well, and thanked be God, they gat no good, nor you no harme thereby. Thou wouldeſt ſay ſo (quoth he) if thou knewest as much as I know, which few know elſe as yet, and mo ſhall ſhortlie. That meant he by the lords of the quéenes kinred that were taken before, and ſhould that daie be beheaded at Pomfret: which he well wiſt, but nothing ware that the ax hung ouer his owne head. In faith man (quoth he) I was neuer ſo ſorie, nor neuer ſtood in ſo great dread in my life, as I did when thou and I met here. And lo how the world is turned, now ſtand mine enimies in the danger (as thou maieſt hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life ſo merrie, nor neuer in ſo great ſuertie.

O good God, the blindneſſe of our mortall nature, when he moſt feared, he was in good ſuertie; when he reckoned himſelfe ſureſt, he loſt his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man, a good knight and a gentle, of great authoritie with his prince, of liuing ſomewhat diſſolute, plaine and open to his enimie, & ſecret to his friend, eaſie to beguile, as he that of good heart and courage foreſtudied no perils, a louing man, and paſſing well beloued: verie faithfull, and truſtie inough, truſting too much. Now flew the fame of this lords death ſwiftlie through the citie, and ſo forth further about like a wind in euerie mans eare. But the protector, immediatlie after dinner, intending to ſet ſome colour vpon the matter, ſent in all the haſt for manie ſubſtantiall men out of the citie into the Tower.

Now at their comming, himſelfe with the duke of Buckingham, ſtood harneſſed in old ill faring briganders, ſuch as no man ſhould weene, that they would vouchſafe to haue put vpon their backs, except that ſome ſudden neceſſitie had conſtreined them. And then the protector ſhewed them, that the lord chamberleine, and other of his conſpiracie, had contriued to haue ſuddenlie deſtroied him, and the duke, there the ſame day in the councell. And what they intended further, was as yet not well knowne. Of which their treaſon he neuer had knowledge before ten of the clocke the ſame forenoone, which ſudden feare draue them to put on for their defenſe ſuch harneſſe as came next to hand. And ſo had God holpen them, that the miſchiefe turned vpon them that would haue doone it. And this he required them to report.

The protectors proclamation.

Euerie man anſwered him faire, as though no man miſtruſted the matter, which of truth no man beleeued. Yet for the further appeaſing of the peoples minds, he ſent immediatlie after diner in all the haſt one herald of armes, with a proclamation to be made through the citie in the kings name, conteining, that the lord Haſtings, with diuerſe other of his traitorous purpoſe, had before conſpired the ſame day to haue ſlaine the lord protector, and the duke of Buckingham ſitting in the councell; and after to haue taken vpon them to rule the king & the realme at their pleaſure, and therby to pill and ſpoile whome they liſt vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that proclamation, deuiſed to the ſlander of the lord chamberleine, as that he was an ill councellor to the kings father, intiſing him to manie things highlie redounding to the miniſhing of his honour, and to the vniuerſall hurt of the realme.

The life and deeds of the lord chamberleine laid open

The meanes whereby; namelie, his euill companie, ſiniſter procuring, and vngratious example, as well in manie other things, as in the vicious liuing and inordinate abuſion of his bodie, both with manie other, and alſo ſpeciallie with Shores wife, which was one alſo of his moſt ſecret counſell in this moſt heinous treaſon, with whom he laie nightlie, and namelie the night laſt paſt next before his death. So that it was the leſſe maruell, if vngratious liuing brought him to an vnhappie ending, which he was now put vnto by the moſt dred commandement of the kings highneſſe, and of his honorable and faithfull councell, both for his demerits, being ſo openlie taken in his falſlie conceiued treaſon, and alſo leaſt the delaieng of his execution might haue incouraged other miſchiefous perſons, partners of his conſpiracie, to gather and aſſemble themſelues togither, in making ſome great commotion for his deliuerance: whoſe hope being now by his well deſerued death politikelie repreſſed, all the realme ſhould (by Gods grace) reſt in good quiet and peace.

Now was this proclamation made within two houres after that he was beheaded, and it was ſo curiouſlie indicted, & ſo faire written in parchment, in ſo well a ſet hand, and therewith of it ſelfe ſo long a proceſſe, that euerie child might well perceiue that it was prepared before. For all the time, betweene his death and the proclaming, could ſcant haue ſufficed vnto the bare writing alone, all had it bene but in paper, and ſcribled forth in haſt at aduenture. So that vpon the proclaming thereof, one that was ſchoolemaiſter of Powles, of chance ſtanding by, and comparing the ſhortneſſe of the time with the length of the matter, ſaid vnto them that ſtood about him; Here is a gaie goodlie caſt foule caſt awaie for haſt. And a merchant anſwered him, that it was written by propheſie.

Shores wife ſpoiled of all that ſhe had.

Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for couetiſe, the protector ſent into the houſe of Shores wife (for hir huſband dwelled not with hir) and ſpoiled hir of all that euer ſhe had, aboue the value of two or three thouſand markes, and ſent hir bodie to priſon. And when he had a while laid vnto hir (for the maner ſake) that ſhe went about to bewitch him, and that ſhe was of counſell with the lord chamberleine to deſtroie him: in concluſion, when that no colour could faſten vpon theſe matters, then he laid heinouſlie to hir charge, that thing that hir ſelfe could not denie, and that all the world wiſt was true, and that natheleſſe euerie man laughed at, to heare it then ſo ſuddenlie ſo highlie taken, that ſhee was naught of hir bodie.

Shores wife put to open penance.

And for this cauſe (as a goodlie continent prince, cleane and faultleſſe of himſelfe, ſent out of heauen into this vicious world for the amendment of mens maners) he cauſed the biſhop of London to put hir to open penance, going before the croſſe in proceſſion vpon a ſundaie with a taper in hir hand. In which ſhe went in countenance and paſe demure ſo womanlie; that albeit ſhe were out of all araie, ſaue hir kirtle onelie, yet went ſhe ſo faire and louelie, namelie while the woondering of the people caſt a comelie rud in hir cheeks (of which ſhe before had moſt miſſe) that hir great ſhame wan hir much praiſe among thoſe that were more amorous of hir bodie, than curious of hir ſoule. And manie good folks alſo that hated hir liuing, & glad were to ſee ſin corrected: yet pitied they more hir penance, than reioiſed therin, when they conſidered that the protector procured it, more of a corrupt intent, than anie vertuous affection.

The deſcription of Shores wife.

This woman was borne in London, worſhipfullie friended, honeſtlie brought vp, and verie well maried, ſauing ſomewhat too ſoone, hir huſband an honeſt citizen, yoong and goodlie, & of good ſubſtance. But forſomuch as they were coupled yer ſhe were well ripe, ſhe not verie feruentlie loued him, for whom ſhe neuer longed, which was happilie the thing that the more eaſilie made hir incline vnto the kings appetite, when he required hir. Howbeit the reſpect of his roialtie, the hope of gaie apparell, eaſe, and other wanton wealth, was able ſoone to pearſe a ſoft tender heart, [ſo that ſhe became flexible and pliant to the kings appetite and will; being ſo blinded with the bright glorie of the preſent courtlie brauerie which ſhee inioied, that ſhe vtterlie forgat how excellent a treaſure good name and fame is, and of what incomparable ſweetneſſe, euen by the iudgement of him, whoſe match for wiſdome the world neuer bred vp, ſaieng:

Eob. Heſſ. in Eccleſ. Sal.

Sunt optanda magis puræ bona nomina famæ,
Nobilis vnguenti quàm pretioſus odor.]

But when the king had abuſed hir, anon hir huſband (as he was an honeſt man, and one that could his good, not preſuming to touch a kings concubine) left hir vp to him altogither. When the king died, the lord chamberleine tooke hir, which in the kings daies, albeit he was ſore inamoured vpon hir, yet he forbare hir; either for reuerence, or for a certeine friendlie faithfulneſſe. Proper ſhe was and faire; nothing in hir bodie that you would haue changed, but if ye would haue wiſhed hir ſomewhat higher. Thus ſaie they that knew hir in hir youth. Albeit ſome that now ſee hir (for yet* ſhe liueth) deem hir neuer to haue beene well viſaged; whoſe iudgement ſeemeth me ſomewhat like, as though men ſhould geſſe the beautie of one long before departed, by hir ſcalpe taken out of the charnell houſe.

* Meaning when this ſtorie was written.

For now is ſhe old, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but riuelled ſkin, and hard bone. And yet being euen ſuch, who ſo well aduiſe hir viſage, might geſſe and deuiſe, which parts how filled would make it a faire face. Yet delighted not men ſo much in hir beautie, as in hir pleaſant behauiour. For a proper wit had ſhe, and could both read well and write, merrie in companie, readie and quicke of anſwer, neither mute, nor full of bable, ſomtime tawnting without diſpleaſure, and not without diſport. The king would ſaie that he had three concubins, which in three diuerſe properties diuerſlie excelled. One the merrieſt, another the wilieſt, the third the holieſt harlot in his realme, as one whome no man could get out of the church lightlie to any place, but it were to his bed.

K. Edwards three concubines.

The other two were ſomewhat greater perſonages, and natheleſſe of their humilitie content to be nameleſſe, and to forbeare the praiſe of thoſe properties: but the merieſt was this Shores wife, in whom the king therefore tooke ſpeciall pleaſure. For manie he had, but hir he loued; whoſe fauour to ſay the truth (for ſin it were to beelie the diuell) ſhe neuer abuſed to anie mans hurt, but to manie a mans comfort and releefe. Where the king tooke diſpleaſure, ſhee would mitigate and appeaſe his mind: where men were out of fauour, ſhe would bring them in his grace. For manie that had highlie offended ſhee obteined pardon. Of great forfeitures ſhe gat men remiſſion.

Finallie, in manie weightie ſutes ſhe ſtood manie a man in great ſtead, either for none or verie ſmall rewards, and thoſe rather gaie than rich; either that ſhe was content with the deed it ſelfe well doone; or for that ſhe delighted to be ſued vnto, and to ſhew what ſhe was able to doo with the king; or for that wanton women and wealthie be not alwaies couetous. I doubt not ſome ſhall thinke this woman too ſlight a thing to be written of, and ſet among the remembrances of great matters: which they ſhall ſpeciallie thinke, that happilie ſhall eſteeme hir onelie by that they now ſee hir.

But me ſeemeth the chance ſo much the more worthie to be remembred, in how much ſhe is now in the more beggerlie condition, vnfreended and worne out of acquaintance, after good ſubſtance, after as great fauour with the prince, after as great ſute and ſeeking to with all thoſe, that thoſe daies had buſineſſe to ſpeed, as manie other men were in their times, which be now famous onelie by the infamie of their ill deeds. Hir doings were not much leſſe, albeit they be much leſſe remembred, bicauſe they were not ſo euill. For men vſe if they haue an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who ſo dooth vs a good turne, we write it in duſt, which is not worſt proued by hir: for at this daie ſhe beggeth of manie at this daie liuing, that at this daie had begged if ſhe had not beene.

Now was it ſo deuiſed by the protector and his councell, that the ſelfe daie, in which the lord chamberleine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the ſelfe ſame houre, was there (not without his aſſent) beheaded at Pomfret, the foreremembred lords & knights that were taken from the king at Northampton and Stonie Stratford. Which thing was doone in the preſence, and by the order of ſir Richard Ratcliffe knight, whoſe ſeruice the protector ſpeciallie vſed in that councell, and in the execution of ſuch lawleſſe enterpriſes, as a man that had beene long ſecret with him, hauing experience of the world, and a ſhrewd wit, ſhort & rude in ſpeech, rough and boiſterous of behauiour, bold in miſchiefe, as far from pitie as from all feare of God.

Sir Richard Ratcliffe.

This knight bringing them out of the priſon to the ſcaffold, and ſhewing to the people about that they were traitors (not ſuffering them to declare & ſpeake their innocencie, leaſt their words might haue inclined men to pitie them, and to hate the protector and his part) cauſed them haſtilie, without iudgement, proceſſe, or maner of order to be beheaded, and without other earthlie gilt, but onelie that they were good men, too true to the king, and too nigh to the queene. Now when the lord chamberleine & theſe other lords and knights were thus beheaded, and rid out of the waie: then thought the protector, that when men muſed what the matter meant, while the lords of the realme were about him out of their owne ſtrengths, while no man wiſt what to thinke, nor whom to truſt, yer euer they ſhould haue ſpace to diſpute and digeſt the matter and make parties; it were beſt haſtilie to purſue his purpoſe, and put himſelfe in poſſeſſion of the crowne, yer men could haue time to deuiſe anie waie to reſiſt.

The lord Riuers & other beheaded.

But now was all the ſtudie by what meanes this matter, being of it ſelfe ſo heinous, might be firſt broken to the people, in ſuch wiſe that it might be well taken. To this councell they tooke diuerſe, ſuch as they thought meetlie to be truſted, likelie to be induced to that part, and able to ſtand them in ſteed either by power or policie. Among whome they made of councell Edmund Shaw knight then maior of London, which vpon truſt of his owne aduancement, whereof he was of a proud heart highlie deſirous, ſhould frame the citie to their appetite. Of ſpirituall men they tooke ſuch as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people for opinion of their learning, and had no ſcrupulous conſcience. Among theſe had they Iohn Shaw clearke brother to the maior, and frier Penker, prouinciall of the Auguſtine friers both doctors of diuinitie, both great preachers, both of more learning than vertue, of more fame than learning. For they were before greatlie eſteemed among the people: but after that neuer.

Edmund Shaw maior of London.

Of theſe two the one had a ſermon in praiſe of the protector before the coronation, the other after, both ſo full of tedious flatterie, that no mans eares could abide them. Penker in his ſermon ſo loſt his voice, that he was faine to leaue off, and come downe in the midſt. Doctor Shaw by his ſermon loſt his honeſtie, & ſoone after his life, for verie ſhame of the world, into which he durſt neuer after come abroad. But the frier forced for no ſhame, and ſo it harmed him the leſſe. Howbeit ſome doubt, and manie thinke, that Penker was not of counſell in the matter before the coronation, but after the common maner fell to flatterie after: namelie ſith his ſermon was not incontinentlie vpon it, but at ſaint Marie hoſpitall at the Eaſter after.

Doct. Shaw. Frier Penker.

But certeine it is, that doctor Shaw was of counſell in the begining, ſo farre foorth that they determined that he ſhould firſt breake the matter in a ſermon at Paules croſſe, in which he ſhould (by the authoritie of his preaching) incline the people to the protectors ghoſtlie purpoſe. But now was all the labor and ſtudie in the deuiſe of ſome conuenient pretext, for which the people ſhould be content to depoſe the prince, and accept the protector for king. In which diuerſe things they deuiſed. But the cheefe thing & the weightieſt of all that inuention reſted in this, that they ſhould alledge baſtardie, either in king Edward himſelfe, or in his children, or both. So that he ſhould ſeeme diſabled to inherit the crowne, by the duke of Yorke, and the prince by him.

The chiefeſt deuiſe to depoſe the prince.

To laie baſtardie in king Edward, ſounded openlie to the rebuke of the protectors owne mother, which was mother to them both; for in that point could be no other color, but to pretend that his owne mother was an adultreſſe, which notwithſtanding, to further this purpoſe he letted not. But neuertheleſſe he would that point ſhould be leſſe and more fauourablie handled: not euen fullie plaine and directlie, but that the matter ſhould be touched aſlope craftilie, as though men ſpared in that point to ſpeake all the truth, for feare of his diſpleaſure. But the other point concerning the baſtardie that they deuiſed to ſurmize in king Edwards children, that would he ſhould be openlie declared and inforced to the vttermoſt. The colour and pretext whereof cannot be well perceiued, but if we firſt repeat you ſome things long before doone about king Edwards mariage.

Sée before pag. 667, 668.

After that king Edward the fourth had depoſed king Henrie the ſixt, and was in peaceable poſſeſſion of the realme, determining himſelfe to marie (as it was méet both for him ſelfe & the realme) he ſent ouer in ambaſſage the erle of Warwike, with other noble men in his companie to Spaine, to treat & conclude a mariage betwéene K. Edward & the kings daughter of Spaine. In which thing the erle of Warwike found the parties ſo toward & willing, that he ſpéedily (according to his inſtructions without any difficultie) brought the matter to very good cõcluſion. Now happened it, that in the meane ſeaſon there came to make a ſute by petition to the king dame Elizabeth Greie, which was after his quéene, at that time a widow, borne of noble bloud, by hir mother, duches of Bedford, yer ſhe maried the lord Wooduile, hir father.

Dame Elizabeth Greie.

Howbeit, this dame Elizabeth hir ſelfe, being in ſeruice with quéene Margaret, wife vnto king Henrie the ſixt, wis maried vnto one [Iohn] Greie an eſquier, whome king Henrie made knight vpon the field that he had on [Barnet heath by ſaint Albons] againſt king Edward. But litle while inioied he that knighthood: for he was at the ſame field ſlaine. After which doone, and the earle of Warwike, being in his ambaſſage about the afore remembred mariage, this poore ladie made humble ſute vnto the king, that ſhe might be reſtored vnto ſuch ſmall lands as hir late huſband had giuen hir in iointure. Whome when the king beheld, and heard hir ſpeake, as ſhe was both faire and of a goodlie fauor, moderate of ſtature, well made, and verie wiſe: he not onelie pitied hir, but alſo waxed inamoured of hir. And taking hir afterward ſecretlie aſide, began to enter in talking more familiarlie. Whoſe appetite when ſhe perceiued, ſhe vertuouſlie denied him.

A wiſe anſwer of a chaſt and continent ladie.

But that did ſhe ſo wiſelie, and with ſo good maner, and words ſo well ſet, that ſhe rather kindled his deſire than quenched it. And finallie, after manie a méeting, much wooing, and many great promiſes, ſhe well eſpieng the kings affection toward hir ſo greatlie increaſed, that ſhe durſt ſomewhat the more boldlie ſaie hir mind, as to him whoſe hart ſhe perceiued more feruentlie ſet, than to fall off for a word. And in concluſion, ſhe ſhewed him plaine, that as ſhe wiſt hir ſelfe too ſimple to be his wife, ſo thought ſhe hir ſelfe too good to be his concubine. The king much maruelling at hir conſtancie (as he that had not béene wont elſewhere to be ſo ſtiffelie ſaid naie) ſo much eſtéemed hir continencie and chaſtitie, that he ſet hir vertue in the ſtéed of poſſeſſion and riches: and thus taking counſell of his deſire, determined in all poſſible haſt to marie hir.

The kings mother.

Now after he was thus appointed, and had betwéene them twaine inſured hir: then aſked he counſell of his other fréends, and that in ſuch maner, as they might then perceiue it booted not greatlie to ſay naie. Notwithſtanding the duches of Yorke his mother was ſo ſore-moued therewith, that ſhe diſſuaded the mariage as much as ſhe poſſible might; alledging that it was his honour, profit, and ſuertie alſo, to marie in a noble progenie out of his realme, wherevpon depended great ſtrength to his eſtate, by the affinitie and great poſſibilitie of increaſe of his poſſeſſion. And that he could not well otherwiſe doo, ſéeing that the earle of Warwike had ſo farre moued alreadie: which were not likelie to take it well, if all his voiage were in ſuch wiſe fruſtrate, and his appointment deluded. And ſhe ſaid alſo, that it was not princelie to marie his owne ſubiect, no great occaſion leading therevnto, no poſſeſſions, or other commodities depending therevpon; but onlie as it were a rich man that would marie his maid, onelie for a little wanton dotage vpon hir perſon.

In which mariage manie mo commend the maidens fortune, than the maiſters wiſedome. And yet therein (ſhe ſaid) was more honeſtie than honour in this mariage. For ſomuch as there is betwéene no merchant and his owne maid ſo great difference, as betwéene the king and this widow. In whoſe perſon, albeit there was nothing to be miſliked; yet was there (ſhe ſaid) nothing ſo excellent, but that it might be found in diuerſe other that were more méetlie (quoth ſhe) for your eſtate, and maidens alſo; whereas the onelie widowhead of Elizabeth Greie, though ſhe were in all other things conuenient for you, ſhuld yet ſuffice (as me ſéemeth) to refraine you from hir mariage, ſith it is an vnfitting thing, and a verie blemiſh and high diſparagement to the ſacred maieſtie of a prince, that ought as nigh to approch prieſthood in cleanneſſe as he dooth in dignitie, to be defiled with bigamie in his firſt mariage.

The kings anſwer to his mother.

The king, when his mother had ſaid, made hir anſwer, part in earneſt, part in plaie merilie, as he that wiſt himſelfe out of hir rule. And albeit he would gladlie that ſhe ſhould take it well, yet was at a point in his owne mind, tooke ſhe it well or otherwiſe. Howbeit ſomewhat to ſatiſfie hir, he ſaid, that albeit mariage (being a ſpirituall thing) ought rather to be made for the reſpect of God, where his grace inclineth the parties to loue togither, as he truſted it was in his, than for the regard of anie temporall aduanuantage: yet neuertheleſſe, him ſéemed that this mariage, euen worldlie conſidered, was not vnprofitable. For he reckoned the amitie of no earthlie nation ſo neceſſarie for him, as the fréendſhip of his owne, which he thought likely to beare him ſo much the more hartie fauour, in that he diſdeined not to marie with one of his owne land.

And yet if outward aliance were thought ſo requiſite, he would find the means to enter thereinto, much better by other of his kin, where all the parties could be contented, than to marie himſelfe whome he ſhould happilie neuer loue; and for the poſſibilitie of more poſſeſſions, léeſe the fruit and pleaſure of this that he had alreadie. For ſmall pleaſure taketh a man of all that euer he hath beſide, if he be wiued againſt his appetite. And I doubt not (quoth he) but there be (as ye ſay) other, that be in euerie point comparable with hir. And therefore I let not them that like them to wed them. No more is it reaſon, that it miſlike anie man, that I marrie where it liketh me. And I am ſure that my couſine of Warwike neither loueth me ſo little, to grudge at that I loue; nor is ſo vnreaſonable, to looke that I ſhould in choiſe of a wife, rather be ruled by his eie, than by mine owne: as though I were a ward that were bound to marie by the appointment of a gardian.

Libertie preferred before a kingdome.

I would not be a king with that condition, to forbeare mine owne libertie in choiſe of mine owne mariage. As for poſſibilitie of more inheritance by new affinitie in ſtrange lands, is oft the occaſion of more trouble than profit. And we haue alreadie title by that meanes vnto ſo much, as ſufficeth to get and kéepe well in one mans daies. That ſhe is a widow, and hath alreadie children; by Gods bleſſed ladie, I am a bacheler, and haue ſome too, and ſo ech of vs hath a proofe that neither of vs is like to be barren. And therefore (madame) I praie you be content, I truſt in God ſhe ſhall bring foorth a yoong prince that ſhall pleaſe you. And as for the bigamie, let the biſhop hardlie laie it in my waie when I come to take orders. For I vnderſtand it is forbidden a preeſt, but I neuer wiſt it yet, that it was forbidden a prince. [This ſpake he as alluding to the libertie of princes, whoſe luſt ſtandeth oftentimes for law, and their opinion for reaſon, according to the ſaieng of the poet;

Claudi.

The duches with theſe words nothing appeaſed, and ſeeing the king ſo ſet thereon, that ſhe could not pull him backe, ſo highlie ſhe diſdained it, that vnder pretext of hir dutie to Godward, ſhe deuiſed to diſturbe this mariage, and rather to helpe that he ſhould marie one dame Elizabeth Lucie, whome the king had alſo not long before gotten with child. Wherefore the kings mother openlie obiected againſt his mariage, as it were in diſcharge of hir conſcience, that the king was ſure to dame Elizabeth Lucie and hir huſband before God. By reaſon of which words, ſuch obſtacle was made in the matter, that either the biſhops durſt not, or the king would not proceed to the ſolemnization of this wedding, till theſe ſame were clearlie purged, and the truth well and openlie teſtified. Wherevpon dame Elizabeth Lucie was then ſent for.

Elizabeth Lucie.

And albeit that ſhe was by the kings mother and manie other put in good comfort, to affirme that ſhe was enſured vnto the king: yet when ſhe was ſolemnlie ſworne to ſaie the truth, ſhe confeſſed that they were neuer enſured. Howbeit ſhe ſaid his grace ſpake ſo louing words vnto hir, that ſhe verelie hoped he would haue married hir. And that if it had not beene for ſuch kind words, ſhe would neuer haue ſhewed ſuch kindneſſe to him, to let him ſo kindlie get hir with child. This examination ſolemnelie taken, when it was cleerelie perceiued, that there was none impediment: the king with great feaſt and honourable ſolemnitie married dame Elizabeth Greie, and hir crowned queene that was his enimies wife, and manie times had praied full hartilie for his loſſe, in which God loued hir better than to grant hir hir boone.

The kings mariage.

But when the earle of Warwike vnderſtood of this marriage, he tooke it ſo highlie that his ambaſſage was deluded, that for verie anger and diſdaine he (at his returning) aſſembled a great puiſſance againſt the king, and came ſo faſt vpon him yer he could be able to reſiſt, that he was faine to void the realme, and flee into Holland for ſuccor, where he remained for the ſpace of two yeares, leauing his new wife at Weſtminſter in ſanctuarie, where ſhe was deliuered of Edward the prince, of whome we before haue ſpoken. In which meane time the earle of Warwike tooke out of priſon, and ſet vp againe king Henrie the ſixt, who was before by king Edward depoſed, and that much what by the power of the erle of Warwike, which was a wiſe man, and a couragious warriour, and of ſuch ſtrength, what for his lands, his aliance, and fauor with all people, that he made kings and put downe kings almoſt at his pleaſure, and not impoſſible to haue atteined it himſelfe, if he had not reckoned it a greater thing to make a king than to be a king.

The king fled.

The prince borne.

King Henrie the ſixt ſet vp.

Of the earle of Warwike.

But nothing laſteth alwaie: for in concluſion, king Edward returned, and with much leſſe number than he had at Barnet on the Eaſterdaie field, ſlue the earle of Warwike, with manie other great eſtates of that partie, & ſo ſtablie atteined the crowne againe, that he peaceablie enioied it vntill his dieng daie: and in ſuch plight left it, that it could not be loſt but by the diſcord of his verie friends, or falſhood of his feined friends. I haue rehearſed this buſineſſe about this marriage ſomewhat the more at length, bicauſe it might thereby the better appeare, vpon how ſlipperie a ground the protector builded his colour, by which he pretended king Edwards children to be baſtards. But that inuention, ſimple as it was, it liked them to whome it ſufficed to haue ſomewhat to ſaie, while they were ſure to be compelled to no larger proofe than themſelues liſt to make.

The earle of Warwike ſlaine.

Now then (as I began to ſhew you) it was by the protector and his councell concluded, that this doctor Shaw ſhould in a ſermon at Pauls croſſe ſignifie to the people, that neither king Edward himſelfe, nor the duke of Clarence, were lawfullie begotten, nor were not the verie children of the duke of Yorke, but gotten vnlawfullie by other perſons, in adulterie, of the duches their mother. And that alſo dame Elizabeth Lucie was verelie the wife of king Edward, and ſo the prince and all his children baſtards, that were begotten vpon the queene. According to this deuiſe doctor Shaw the ſundaie after, at Paules croſſe in a great audience (as alwaie aſſembled great number to his preaching) he tooke for his theame; Spuria vitilamina non agent radices altas, that is to ſaie; Baſtard ſlippes ſhall neuer take deepe root.

Doc. Shaws ſermon.

Therevpon when he had ſhewed the great grace that God giueth, and ſecretlie infundeth in right generation after the lawes of matrimonie, then declared he, that commonlie thoſe children lacked that grace, and for the puniſhment of their parents were (for the more part) vnhappie, which were gotten in baſe, and ſpeciallie in adulterie. Of which, though ſome, by the ignorance of the world and the truth hid from knowledge, inherited for the ſeaſon other mens lands, yet God alwaie ſo prouideth, that it continueth not in their bloud long: but the truth comming to light, the rightfull inheritors be reſtored, and the baſtard ſlip pulled vp yer it can be rooted deepe. And ſo he did laie for the proofe and confirmation of this ſentence certeine inſamples taken out of the old teſtament, and other ancient hiſtories.

Then began he to deſcend into the praiſe of the lord Richard late duke of Yorke, calling him father to the lord protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the crowne, to whome it was (after the death of king Henrie the ſixt) intailed by authoritie of parlement. Then ſhewed he that his verie right heire of his bodie lawfullie begotten was onelie the lord protector. For he declared then, that king Edward was neuer lawfullie married vnto the queene, but was before God huſband vnto dame Elizabeth Lucie, and ſo his children baſtards. And beſides that, neither king Edward himſelfe, nor the duke of Clarence, among thoſe that were ſecret in the houſhold, were reckoned verie ſuerlie for the children of the noble duke, as thoſe that by their fauours more reſembled other knowne men than him. From whoſe vertuous conditions he ſaid alſo that the late king Edward was far off.

This preacher was taught his leſſon yer he came into the pulpit.

K. Edward ſlandered in a ſermon.

But the lord protector he ſaid, the verie noble prince, the ſpeciall paterne of knightlie proweſſe, as well in all princelie behauior, as in the lineaments and fauour of his viſage, repreſented the verie face of the noble duke his father. This is, quoth he, the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his viſage, the ſure vndoubted image, the plaine expreſſe likeneſſe of that noble duke. Now was it before deuiſed, that in the ſpeaking of theſe words, the protector ſhould haue comen in among the people to the ſermon ward, to the end that thoſe words meeting with his preſence, might haue beene taken among the hearers, as though the Holie ghoſt had put them in the preachers mouth, & ſhould haue moued the people euen there to crie; King Richard, king Richard: that it might haue beene after ſaid, that he was ſpeciallie choſen by God, and in maner by miracle. But this deuiſe quailed, either by the protectors negligence, or the preachers ouermuch diligence.

A maruelous deuiſe to moue the aſſemblie.

K. Richard commended by the preacher.

For while the protector found by the waie tarieng leaſt he ſhould preuent thoſe words, and the doctor fearing that he ſhould come yer his ſermon could come to theſe words, haſted his matter thereto, he was come to them and paſt them, and entred into other matters yer the protector came. Whome when he beheld comming, he ſuddenlie left the matter with which he was in hand, and without anie deduction therevnto, out of all order and out of all frame, began to repeat thoſe words againe: This is the verie noble prince, the ſpeciall patrone of knightlie proweſſe, which as well in all princelie behauior, as in the lineaments & fauor of his viſage, repreſenteth the verie face of the noble duke of Yorke his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his viſage, the ſure vndoubted image, the plaine expreſſe likeneſſe of the noble duke, whoſe remembrance can neuer die while he liueth.

Note ẏ course of Gods iudgement.

While theſe words were in ſpeaking, the protector accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, went through the people into the place where the doctors commonlie ſtand in the vpper ſtorie, where he ſtood to hearken the ſermon. But the people were ſo farre fro crieng; K. Richard, that they ſtood as they had beene turned into ſtones, for wonder of this ſhamefull ſermon. After which once ended, the preacher gat him home, and neuer after durſt looke out for ſhame, but kept him out of ſight like an owle. And when he once aſked one that had beene his old friend what the people talked of him, all were it that his owne conſcience well ſhewed him that they talked no good; yet when the tother anſwered him, that there was in euerie mans mouth ſpoken of him much ſhame, it ſo ſtrake him to the heart, that within few daies after he withered and conſumed awaie [for verie thought and inward pine, procured by irrecouerable cares, whoſe nature is noted by obſeruation of their effects:

Ouid. lib.3. met.

Attenuant vigiles corpus miſerabile curæ.]

Then on the tueſdaie following this ſermon, there came to the Guildhall in London the duke of Buckingham, accompanied with diuerſe lords and knights mo than happilie knew the meſſage that they brought. And there in the eaſt end of the hall, where the maior keepeth the Huſtings, the maior and all the aldermen being aſſembled about him, all the commons of the citie gathered before them. After ſilence commanded vpon great paine in the protectors name: the duke ſtood vp, and (as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature maruelouſlie well ſpoken) he ſaid vnto the people with a cleare and lowd voice in this maner of wiſe.

The duke of Buckinghams oration to the aſſemblie of the maior, aldermen, and commoners.

FRiends, for the zeale and heartie fauour that we beare you, we be comen to breake vnto you of a matter right great and weightie, and no leſſe weightie than pleaſing to God, and profitable to all the realme: nor to no part of the realme more profitable, than to you the citizens of this noble citie. For whie, that thing that we wote well ye haue long time lacked, and ſore longed for, that yee would haue giuen great good for, that yee would haue gone farre to fetch; that thing we be come hither to bring you without your labour, paine, coſt, aduenture or ieopardie. What thing is that? Certes the ſuertie of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wiues and your daughters, the ſafegard of your goods: of all which things in times paſt ye ſtood euermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that would reckon himſelfe lord of his own goods among ſo manie grens & traps as was ſet therefore, among ſo much pilling and polling, among ſo manie taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, & oftentimes no need? Or if anie were, it rather grew of riot, and vnreaſonable waſt, than anie neceſſarie or honourable charge.

A notable perſuaſion.

So that there was dailie pilled fro good men and honeſt, great ſubſtance of goods, to be laſhed out among vnthrifts; ſo far forth, that fifteenes ſufficed not, nor anie vſuall names of knowne taxes: but vnder an eaſie name of beneuolence and good will, the commiſſioners ſo much of euerie man tooke as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence had ſignified, that euerie man ſhould paie, not what himſelfe of his owne good will liſt to grant, but what the king of his good will liſt to take. Which neuer aſked little, but euerie thing was hawſed aboue the meaſure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ranſoms, ſmall treſpaſſes into miſpriſon, miſpriſon into treaſon. Whereof (I thinke) no man looketh that we ſhould remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, that was for a word ſpoken in haſt cruellie beheaded, by the miſconſtruing of the laws of this realme, for the princes pleaſure.

Burdet.

Markam.

Coke.

With no leſſe honour to Markam then cheefe iuſtice, that left [the benefit & dignitie] of his office, rather than he would aſſent to the diſhoneſtie of thoſe, that either for feare or flatterie gaue that iudgement. What Cooke, your owne worſhipfull neighbour, alderman and maior of this noble citie, who is of you ſo either negligent that he knoweth not, or ſo forgetfull that he remembreth not, or ſo hard hearted that he pittieth not that worſhipfull mans loſſe? What ſpeake we of loſſe? His vtter ſpoile and vndeſerued deſtruction, onelie for that it hapned thoſe to fauour him whome the prince fauoured not. We need not (I ſuppoſe) to rehearſe of theſe anie mo by name, ſith there be (I doubt not) manie heere preſent, that either in themſelues or in their nigh friends haue knowne, as well their goods as their perſons greatlie indangered, either by feigned quarels, or ſmall matters aggreeued with heinous names. And alſo there was no crime ſo great, of which there could lacke a pretext.

For ſith the king, preuenting the time of this inheritance, atteined the crowne by battell: it ſufficed in a rich man for a pretext of treaſon, to haue beene of kinred or aliance, neer familiaritie, or legier acquaintance with anie of thoſe that were at anie time the kings enimies, which was at one time and other more than halfe the relme. Thus were neither your goods in ſuertie, and yet they brought your bodies in ieopardie, beſide the common aduenture of open warre, which albeit that it is euer the will and occaſion of much miſchæfe, yet is it neuer ſo miſchæuous, as where anie people fall at diſtance among themſelues; nor in none earthlie nation ſo deadlie and ſo peſtilent, as when it hapneth among vs; and among vs neuer ſo long continued diſſention, nor ſo manie batels in that ſeaſon, nor ſo cruell and ſo deadlie fought, as was in that kings daies that dead is, God forgiue it his ſoule.

Ciuill warre the occaſion of manie great inconueniences.

In whoſe time, and by whoſe occaſion, what about the getting of the garland, kæping it, læſing and winning againe, it hath coſt more Engliſh bloud, than hath twiſe the winning of France. In which inward war among our ſelues, hath bæne ſo great effuſion of the ancient noble bloud of this realme, that ſcarſelie the halfe remaineth, to the great infæbling of this noble land, beſide manie a good towne ranſacked and ſpoiled by them, that haue bæne going to the field or comming from thence. And peace long after not much ſurer than war. So that no time was therein, which rich men for their monie, and great men for their lands, or ſome other for ſome feare, or ſome diſpleaſure were not out of perill. For whom truſted he that miſtruſted his owne brother? Whome ſpared he that killed his owne brother? Or who could perfectlie loue him, if his owne brother could not?

Shores wife more ſued vnto than all the lords in England.

What maner of folke he moſt fauoured we ſhall for his honour ſpare to ſpeake of. Howbeit this wote you well all, that who ſo was beſt, bare alwaie leaſt rule; & more ſute was in his daies to Shores wife, a vile and an abhominable ſtrumpet, than to all the lords in England: except vnto thoſe that made hir their proctor. Which ſimple woman was well named & honeſt, till the king for his wanton luſt and ſinfull affection bereft hir from hir huſband, a right honeſt ſubſtantiall yoong man among you. And in that point, which in good faith I am ſorie to ſpeake of, ſauing that it is in vaine to kæpe in counſell that thing that all men know, the kings grædie appetite was inſatiable, and euerie where ouer all the realme intollerable.

For no woman was there anie where, yoong or old, rich or poore, whome he ſet his eie vpon, in whome he anie thing liked, either perſon or fauour, ſpæch, paſe, or countenance, but without anie feare of God, or reſpect of his honour, murmur or grudge of the world, he would importunelie purſue his appetite, and haue hir, to the great deſtruction of manie a good woman, and great dolor to their huſbands, and their other frends; which being honeſt people of them ſelues, ſo much regard the cleanneſſe of their houſe, the chaſtitie of their wiues, and their children, that them were leauer to læſe all that they had beſide, than to haue ſuch a villanie doone them. And all were it that with this and other importable dealing, the realme was in euerie part annoied: yet ſpeciallie yæ hære the citizens of this noble citie, as well for that amongeſt you is moſt plentie of all ſuch things as miniſter matter to ſuch iniuries as for that you were næreſt at hand, ſith that nære hære abouts was commonlie his moſt abiding.

He directeth his ſpæch to ẏ communaltie of the citie.

London the kings ſpeciall chamber.

And yet be yæ the people, whome he had as ſingular cauſe well and kindlie to intreat, as anie part of his realme; not onelie for that the prince (by this noble citie, as his ſpeciall chamber, & the ſpeciall well renowmed citie of this realme) much honourable fame receiueth among all other nations; but alſo for that yæ (not without your great coſt, & ſundrie perils & ieopardies in all his warres) bare euen your ſpeciall fauor to his part. Which your kind minds borne to the houſe of Yorke, ſith he hath nothing worthilie acquited, there is of that houſe that now by Gods grace better ſhall: which thing to ſhew you is the whole ſumme and effect of this our preſent errand. It ſhall not (I wot well) næd that I rehearſe you againe, that yæ haue alreadie heard of him that can better tell it, and of whome I am ſure yæ will better beleeue it. And reaſon is that it ſo be.

Doct. Shaw commended by the duke of Buckinghã.

I am not ſo proud, to looke therefore that yæ ſhould reckon my words of as great authoritie as the preachers of the word of God, namlie a man ſo cunning and ſo wiſe, that no man better woteth what he ſhould ſaie, and thereto ſo good and vertuous, that he would not ſaie the thing which he wiſt he ſhould not ſaie, in the pulpit namelie, into the which no honeſt man commeth to lie. Which honorable preacher, yæ well remember, ſubſtantiallie declared vnto you at Paules croſſe, on ſundaie laſt paſſed, the right & title that the moſt excellent prince Richard duke of Gloceſter, now protector of this realme, hath vnto the crowne and kingdome of the ſame. For as the worſhipfull man groundlie made open vnto you, the children of king Edward the fourth were neuer lawfullie begotten, forſomuch as the king (leauing his verie wife dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfullie maried vnto the quæne their mother, whoſe bloud, ſauing that he ſet his voluptuous pleaſure before his honor, was full vnmætlie to be matched with his; and the mingling of whoſe bloud togither, hath bæne the effuſion of a great part of the noble bloud of this realme.

A ſlanderous lie confirmed.

Wherby it may well ſæme the mariage not well made, of which there is ſo much miſchæfe growne. For lacke of which lawfull coupling, & alſo of other things which the ſaid worſhipfull doctor rather ſignified than fullie explaned, & which things ſhall not be ſpoken for me, as the thing wherein euerie man forbereth to ſay that he knoweth in auoiding diſpleaſure of my noble lord protector, bearing (as nature requireth) a filiall reuerence to the ducheſſe his mother. For theſe cauſes (I ſay) before remembred, that is to wit, for lacke of other iſſue lawfullie of the late noble prince Richard duke of Yorke, to whoſe roiall bloud the crowne of England and of France is by the high authoritie of parlement intailed, the right and title of the ſame is by the iuſt courſe of inheritance (according to the cōmon lawes of the land) deuolued & commen vnto the moſt excellent prince the lord protector, as to the verie lawfullie begotten ſonne of the foreremembred noble duke of Yorke.

The title of K. Richard to the crowne.

Which thing well conſidered, and the great knightlie prowеſſe pondered, with manifold vertues, which in his noble perſon ſingularlie abound; the nobles and commons alſo of this realme, and ſpeciallie of the north part, not willing anie baſtard bloud to haue the rule of the land, nor the abuſions before in the ſame vſed anie longer to continue, haue condeſcended and fullie determined, to make humble petition to the moſt puiſſant prince the lord protector, that it maie like his grace (at our humble requeſt) to take vpon him the guiding and gouernance of this realme, to the wealth and increaſe of the ſame, according to his verie right and iuſt title. Which thing I wote it well, he will be loth to take vpon him, as he whoſe wiſdome well perceiueth the labor and ſtudie both of mind and bodie, that come therewith, to whomſoeuer ſo will occupie the roome, as I dare ſay hee will, if he take it. Which roome I warne you well is no childs office. And that the great wiſe man well perceiued, when hee ſaid: Væ regno cuius rex puer eſt: Wo is that realme that hath a child to their king.

The dignitie and office of a king full of care & ſtudie.

Wherefore ſo much the more cauſe haue we to thanke God, that this noble perſonage, which is ſo rightlie intituled thervnto, is of ſo ſad age, & thereto ſo great wiſedome ioined with ſo great experience, which albeit hee will bee loth (as I haue ſaid) to take it vpon him, yet ſhall he to our petition in that behalfe more gratiouſlie incline, if ye the worſhipfull citizens of this the cheefe citie of this realme, ioine with vs the nobles in our ſaid requeſt. Which for your owne weale (we doubt not) but ye will: and natheleſſe I heartilie pray you ſo to doo, whereby you ſhall doo great profit to all this realme beſide, in chooſing them ſo good a king, and vnto your ſelues ſpeciall commoditie, to whom his maieſtie ſhall euer after beare ſo much the more tender fauor, in how much he ſhall perceiue you the more prone and beneuolentlie minded toward his election. Wherin deere friends what mind you haue, wee require you plainlie to ſhew vs.

When the duke had ſaid, and looked that the people, whome he hoped that the maior had framed before, ſhould after this propoſition made, haue cried; King Richard, king Richard: all was huſht and mute, and not one word anſwered thervnto. Wherewith the duke was maruellouſlie abaſhed, and taking the maior neerer to him, with other that were about him priuie to that matter, ſaid vnto them ſoftlie. What meaneth this, that the people be ſo ſtill? Sir (quoth the maior) percaſe they perceiue you not well. That ſhall we mend (quoth he) if that will helpe. And by & by ſomwhat lowder he reherſed to them the ſame matter againe in other order, and other words, ſo well and ornatlie, and natheleſſe ſo euidentlie and plaine, with voice, geſture, and countenance ſo comelie, and ſo conuenient, that euerie man much maruelled that heard him, and thought that they neuer had in their liues heard ſo euill a tale ſo well told [inſomuch that he ſeemed as cunning an orator, as he, of whome the poet ſpake to his high praiſe & cōmendation, ſaieng:

Quælibet eloquio cauſa fit apta ſuo.]

The election of K. Richard hardlie to be preferred.

But were it for woonder or feare, or that each looked that other ſhould ſpeake firſt: not one word was there anſwered of all the people that ſtood before, but all was as ſtill as the midnight, not ſomuch as rowning amongeſt them, by which they might ſeeme to commune what was beſt to do. When the maior ſaw this, he with other partners of that councell drew about the duke, and ſaid that the people had not beene accuſtomed there to be ſpoken vnto, but by the recorder, which is the mouth of the citie, and happilie to him they will anſwer. With that the recorder, called Fitz William, a ſad man, & an honeſt, which was ſo new come into that office, that he neuer had ſpoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to begin, notwithſtanding thervnto commanded by the maior, made rehearſall to the commons of that the duke had twiſe rehearſed to them himſelfe.

Fitz William recorder.

But the recorder ſo tempered his tale, that he ſhewed euerie thing as the dukes words, and no part his owne. But all this noting no change made in the people, which alwaie after one ſtood as they had beene men amazed. Whervpon the duke rowned vnto the maior and ſaid; This is a maruellous obſtinate ſilence: and therewith he turned vnto the people againe with theſe words; Deere friends, we come to mooue you to that thing, which peraduenture we not ſo greatlie needed, but that the lords of this realme, and the commons of other parties might haue ſufficed, ſauing that we ſuch loue beare you, and ſo much ſet by you, that we would not gladlie doo without you, that thing in which to be partners is your weale and honor, which (as it ſeemeth) either you ſee not, or weie not. Wherefore we require you giue vs anſwer one way or other, whether you be minded, as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue this noble prince, now protector, to be your king or not.

At theſe words the people began to whiſper among themſelues ſecretly, that the voice was neither lowd nor diſtinct, but as it were the ſound of a ſwarme of bees, till at the laſt in the nether end of the hall, an ambuſhment of the dukes ſeruants and Naſhfields, and other belonging to the protector, with ſome prentiſſes and lads that thruſt into the hall amongſt the preaſe, began ſuddenlie at mens backes to crie out, as lowd as their throtes would giue; King Richard, king Richard: and threw vp their caps in token of ioy. And they that ſtood before, caſt backe their heads maruelling therof, but nothing they ſaid. Now when the duke and the maior ſaw this maner, they wiſelie turned it to their purpoſe, and ſaid it was a goodlie crie, & a ioifull, to heare euerie man with one voice, no man ſaieng naie.

K. Richards election preferred by voices of confederacie.

Wherefore friends (quoth the duke) ſith we perceiue it is all your whole minds to haue this noble man for your king (whereof we ſhall make his grace ſo effectuall report, that we doubt not but it ſhall redound vnto your great weale and commoditie) we require ye, that ye to morrow go with vs, and we with you vnto his noble grace, to make our humble requeſt vnto him in maner before remembred. And therewith the lords came downe, and the companie diſſolued and departed, the more part all ſad: ſome with glad ſemblance that were not verie merrie, and ſome of thoſe that came thither with the duke not able to diſſemble their ſorrow, were faine at his backe to turne their face to the wall, while the dolor of their hearts burſt out of their eies.

The maiors comming to Bainards caſtell vnto the lord protector.

Then on the morrow after, the maior with all the aldermen, and chiefe commoners of the citie, in their beſt maner appareled, aſſembling themſelues togither, reſorted vnto Bainards caſtell, where the protector laie. To which place repaired alſo (according to their appointment) the duke of Buckingham, and diuerſe noble men with him, beſide manie knights and other gentlemen. And therevpon the duke ſent word vnto the lord protector, of the being there of a great and honourable companie, to moue a great matter vnto his grace. Wherevpon the protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if he firſt knew ſome part of their errand, as though he doubted and partlie miſtruſted the comming of ſuch a number vnto him ſo ſuddenlie, without anie warning or knowledge, whether they came for good or harme.

Then the duke, when he had ſhewed this to the maior and other, that they might thereby ſée how little the protector looked for this matter, they ſent vnto him by the meſſenger ſuch louing meſſage againe, and therewith ſo humblie beſought him, to vouchſafe that they might reſort to his preſence to propoſe their intent, of which they would vnto none other perſon anie part diſcloſe; that at the laſt he came forth of his chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but ſtood aboue in a gallerie ouer them, where they might ſée him, and ſpeake to him, as though he would not yet come too néere them till he wiſt what they ment. And therupon the duke of Buckingham firſt made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to propoſe vnto his grace the intent of their comming, without his diſpleaſure, without which pardon obteined, they durſt not be bold to moue him of that matter.

In which albeit they ment as much honor to his grace, as wealth to all the realme beſide, yet were they not ſure how his grace would take it, whome they would in no wiſe offend. Then the protector (as he was verie gentle of himſelfe, and alſo longed ſore to wit what they ment) gaue him leaue to propoſe what him liked, verelie truſting (for the good mind that he bare them all) none of them anie thing would intend vnto himward, wherewith he ought to bée gréeued. When the duke had this leaue and pardon to ſpeake, then waxed he bold to ſhew him their intent and purpoſe, with all the cauſes mouing them therevnto (as ye before haue heard) and finallie to beſéech his grace, that it would like him, of his accuſtomed goodneſſe and zeale vnto the realme, now with his eie of pitie to behold the long continued diſtreſſe and decaie of the ſame, and to ſet his gratious hands to redreſſe and amendment thereof.

All which he might well doo, by taking vpon him the crowne and gouernance of this realme, according to his right and title lawfullie deſcended vnto him, and to the laud of God, profit of the land, & vnto his noble grace ſo much the more honour, and leſſe paine, in that, that neuer prince reigned vpon anie people, that were ſo glad to liue vnder his obeiſance, as the people of this realme vnder his. When the protector had heard the propoſition, he looked verie ſtrangelie thereat, and anſwered; that all were it that he partlie knew the things by them alledged to be true, yet ſuch entire loue he bare vnto king Edward and his children, that ſo much more regarded his honour in other realmes about, than the crowne of anie one of which he was neuer deſirous, that he could not find in his hart in this point to incline to their deſire. For in all other nations, where the truth were not well knowne, it ſhould peraduenture be thought, that it were his owne ambitious mind and deuiſe, to depoſe the prince, and take himſelfe the crowne.

O ſingular diſſimulation of king Richard.

With which infamie he would not haue his honour ſtained for anie crowne, in which he had euer perceiued much more labour and paine, than pleaſure to him that ſo would vſe it, as he that would not, were not worthie to haue it. Notwithſtanding, he not onlie pardoned them the motion that they made him, but alſo thanked them for the loue and hartie fauour they bare him, praieng them for his ſake to giue and beare the ſame to the prince, vnder whom he was, and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counſell (as farre as ſhould like the king to vſe him) he would doo his vttermoſt deuoir to ſet the realme in good ſtate, which was alreadie in this little while of his protectorſhip (the praiſe giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of ſuch as were before occaſion of the contrarie, and of new intended to be, were now partlie by good policie, & partlie more by Gods ſpeciall prouidence, than mans prouiſion, repreſſed.

K. Richard ſpake otherwiſe than he meant.

Vpon this anſwer giuen, the duke by the protectors licence, a little rowned aſwell with other noble men about him, as with the maior and recorder of London. And after that (vpon like pardon deſired & obteined) he ſhewed alowd vnto the protector, that for a finall concluſion, that the realme was appointed K. Edwards line ſhould not anie longer reigne vpon them, both for that they had ſo farre gone, that it was now no ſuertie to retreat, as for that they thought it for the weale vniuerſall to take that waie, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore, if it would like his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humblie beſéech him therevnto. If he would giue them a reſolute anſwer to the contrarie, which they would be loth to heare, then muſt they néeds ſéeke and ſhould not faile to find ſome other noble man that would. Theſe words much moued the protector, which elſe (as euerie man may wéet) would neuer of likelihood haue inclined therevnto.

But when he ſaw there was none other waie, but that either he muſt take it, or elſe he and his both go from it, he ſaid vnto the lords and commons; Sith we perceiue well that all the realme is ſo ſet, whereof we be verie ſorie, that they will not ſuffer in any wiſe king Edwards line to gouerne them, whom no man earthlie can gouerne againſt their willes; & we well alſo perceiue, that no man is there, to whome the crowne can by iuſt title apperteine, as to our ſelues, as verie right heire lawfully begotten of the bodie of our moſt déere father Richard late duke of Yorke, to which title is now ioined your election, the nobles and commons of this realme, which we of all titles poſſible take for the moſt effectuall: we be content and agrée fauourablie to incline to your petition and requeſt, and (according to the ſame) here we take vpon vs the roiall eſtate, preheminence and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France: the one from this daie forward by vs and our heires to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other by Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and ſubdue, and eſtabliſh for euer in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the aduancement whereof we neuer aſke of God longer to liue than we intend to procure.

The protector taketh vpon him to be king.

With this there was a great ſhout, crieng; King Richard, king Richard. And then the lords went vp to the king (for ſo was he from that time called) and the people departed, talking diuerſlie of the matter, euerie man as his fantaſie gaue him. But much they talked and maruelled of the maner of this dealing, that the matter was on both parts made ſo ſtrange, as though neither had euer communed with other thereof before, when that themſelues wiſt there was no man ſo dull that heard them, but he perceiued well inough that all the matter was made betwéene them. Howbeit ſome excuſed that againe, and ſaid all muſt be doone in good order though: and men muſt ſometime for the maners ſake, not be aknowen what they know [though it be hard to outreach the circumſpect, wiſe, & vigilant minded man; as the poet ſaith:

A made match to couſen the people.

Iuuenal. ſat. 2.

——— non facile eſt tibi
Decipere Vlyſſem.]

For at the conſecration of a biſhop, euerie man woteth well by the paieng for his buls, that he purpoſeth to be one, & though he paie for nothing elſe. And yet muſt he be twiſe asked whether he will be biſhop or no, and he muſt twiſe ſaie naie, and the third time take it, as compelled therevnto by his owne will. And in a ſtage plaie, all the people know right well, that one plaieng the Soldan, is percaſe a ſowter; yet if one ſhould can ſo little good, to ſhew out of ſeaſon what aquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name while he ſtandeth in his maieſtie, one of his tormentors might hap to breake his head (and worthie) for marring of the plaie. And ſo they ſaid, that theſe matters be kings games, as it were ſtage plaies, and for the more part plaied vpon ſcaffolds, in which poore men be but the lookers on. And they that wiſe be will meddle no further. For they that ſometime ſtep vp, and plaie with them, when they can not plaie their parts, they diſorder the plaie, and do themſelues no good.

Thus farre Edward the fift, who was neuer king crowned, but ſhamefullie by his vncle ſlaine, as in the proceſſe following appeereth.

Richard the third, third ſonne to Richard duke of Yorke, and vncle to Edward the fift.

Anno Reg. 1. 1483

() This that is here betwéene this marke & this marke () was not written by maiſter More in this hiſtorie written by him in Engliſh, but is tranſlated out of this hiſtorie which he wrote in Latine.

(*) THe next daie the protector with a great traine went to Weſtminſter hall, & there when he had placed himſelfe in the court of the Kings bench, declared to the audience, that he would take vpon him the crowne in that place there, where the king himſelfe ſitteth and miniſtreth the law, bicauſe he conſidered that it was the chiefeſt dutie of a king to miniſter the lawes. Then with as pleaſant an oration as he could, he went about to win vnto him the nobles, the merchants, the artificers, and in concluſion all kind of men, but eſpeciallie the lawiers of this realme. And finallie, to the intent that no man ſhould hate him for feare, and that his deceitfull clemencie might get him the good will of the people, when he had declared the diſcommodities of diſcord, & the cõmodities of concord & vnitie, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his mind all enimities, and that he there did openlie pardon all offenſes committed againſt him.

And to the intent that he might ſhew a proofe thereof, he commanded that one Fog, whom he had long deadlie hated, ſhould be brought then before him, who being brought out of the ſanctuarie (for thither had he fled for feare of him) in the ſight of the people, he tooke him by the hand. Which thing the common people reioiſed at, and praiſed, but wiſe men tooke it for a vanitie. In his returne homeward, whom ſo euer he met, he ſaluted. For a mind that knoweth it ſelfe guiltie, is in a manner deiected to a ſeruile flatterie [which refuſeth no dutifulneſſe, tend the ſame to neuer ſo hie a degrée of indignitie; which one noteth, ſaieng:

——— rides? maiore cachinno
Concutitur; flet, ſi lachrymas aſpexit amici;
Frigeſcis? friget; ſi dixeris, æſtuo, ſudat.]

When he had begun his reigne in the moneth of Iune, after this mockiſh election, then was he crowned king in the verie ſame moneth. And that ſolemnitie was furniſhed, for the moſt part, with the ſelfe ſame prouiſion that was appointed for the coronation of his nephue. () But here to ſhew the maner of his coronation, as the ſame is inſerted in this pamphlet of ſir Thomas More, by maiſter Edward Hall and Richard Grafton (although not found in the ſame pamphlet) thus we find it by them reported. () Firſt, to be ſure of all enimies (as he thought) he ſent for fiue thouſand men of the north againſt his coronation, which came vp euill apparelled, and worſe harneſſed, in ruſtie harneſſe, neither defenſible, nor ſcowred to the ſale, which muſtered in Finſburie field to the great diſdaine of the lookers on. [By which beginning it appéered to the world that he had his ſtate in ſuſpicion, otherwiſe he would not haue procured ſuch a power to be attendant at his commandement, and that at ſuch time as (all weapons laid aſide) peace and tranquillitie ſhould haue béene ſought after for the comforts of the peoples minds, & the ſafetie of his owne perſon; but being verie miſtruſtfull & fraught with carefull thoughts, he was in a maze betwéene hope and feare, according to this verie true ſaieng:

From this marke () to this () is not found in ſir Thomas More but in maiſter Hall and Grafton.

What péeres & ſtates were attendant on him going to his coronation.

The ſolemne ceremonies vſed at king Richards coronation.

On the morow, being the ſixt daie of Iulie, the king with quéene Anne his wife, came downe out of the White hall into the great hall at Weſtminſter, and went directlie into the kings Bench. And from thenſe, the king and the quéene going vpon raie cloth barefooted, went vnto ſaint Edwards ſhrine, and all his nobilitie going with him, euerie lord in his degrée. And firſt went the trumpets, and then the heralds of armes in their rich coats, & next followed the croſſe with a ſolemne proceſſion, the prieſts hauing fine ſurpliſſes and graie amiſſes vpon them. The abbats and biſhops mitred and in rich copes, & euerie of them caried their croſiers in their hands. The biſhop of Rocheſter bare the croſſe before the cardinall. Then followed the earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt ſpurres, ſignifieng knighthood. Then followed the earle of Bedford bearing ſaint Edwards ſtaffe for a relike.

After them came the earle of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointleſſe ſword naked in his hand, which ſignified mercie. The lord Stanleie bare the mace of the conſtableſhip. The earle of Kent bare the ſecond ſword on the right hand of the king naked, with a point, which ſignified iuſtice vnto the temporaltie. The lord Louell bare the third ſword on the left hand with a point, which ſignified iuſtice to the cleargie. The duke of Suffolke followed with the ſcepter in his hand, which ſignified peace. The earle of Lincolne bare the ball and croſſe, which ſignified a monarchie. The erle of Surrie bare the fourth ſword before the king in a rich ſcabberd, and that is called the ſword of eſtate. Then went thrée togither, in the middeſt went Garter king at armes in his rich cote: and on his left hand went the maior of London, bearing a mace: and on his right hand went the gentleman vſher of the priuie chamber. Then followed the duke of Norffolke, bearing the kings crowne betwéene his hands.

Then followed king Richard in his robes of purple veluet, and ouer his head a canopie, borne by foure barons of the cinque ports. And on euerie ſide of the king there went one biſhop, that is to ſaie, the biſhop of Bath, and the biſhop of Durham. Then followed the duke of Buckingham bearing the kings traine, with a white ſtaffe in his hand, ſignifieng the office of the high ſteward of England. Then there followed a great number of earles and barons before the quéene. And then came the earle of Huntington, who bare the quéenes ſcepter, and the vicount Liſle bearing the rod with the doue. And the earle of Wilſhire bare the quéenes crowne. Then followed quéene Anne daughter to Richard earle of Warwike in robes like to the king, betwéene two biſhops, and a canopie ouer hir head borne by the barons of the ports. On hir head a rich coronet ſet with ſtones and pearle.

Quéene Anne wife to king Richard and daughter to Richard earle of Warwike, and hir traine,

After hir followed the counteſſe of Richmond heire to the duke of Summerſet, which bare vp the quéenes traine. After followed the ducheſſe of Suffolke and Norffolke, with counteſſes, baroneſſes, ladies, and manie faire gentlewomen. In this order they paſſed through the palace, and entered the abbeie at the weſt end; and ſo came to their ſeats of eſtate. And after diuerſe ſongs ſolemnelie ſoong, they both aſcended to the high altar, and were ſhifted from their robes, and had diuerſe places open from the middle vpward, in which places they were annointed. Then both the king and the queene changed them into cloth of gold, and aſcended to their ſeats, where the cardinall of Canturburie, & other biſhops them crowned according to the cuſtome of the realme, giuing him the ſcepter in the left hand, & the ball with the croſſe in the right hand; and the queene had the ſcepter in hir right hand, and the rod with the doue in hir left hand.

The king & queene crowned.

On euerie ſide of the king ſtood a duke, and before him ſtood the earle of Surrie with the ſword in his hands. And on euerie ſide of the quéene ſtanding a biſhop, & a ladie kneeling. The cardinall ſoong maſſe, and after pax, the king and the queene deſcended, and before the high altar they were both houſeled, with one hoſt diuided betweene them. After maſſe finiſhed, they both offered at ſaint Edward his ſhrine, and there the king left the crowne of ſaint Edward, and put on his owne crowne. And ſo in order as they came, they departed to Weſtminſter hall; and ſo to their chambers for a ſeaſon: during which time the duke of Norffolke came into the hall, his horſſe trapped to the ground in cloth of gold, as high marſhall, and voided the hall. About foure of the clocke, the king and queene entered the hall, and the king ſate in the middle, and the queene on the left hand of the table, and on euerie ſide of hir ſtood a counteſſe, holding a cloth of pleaſance, when ſhe liſt to drinke.

And on the right hand of the king ſat the biſhop of Canturburie. The ladies ſat all on one ſide, in the middle of the hall. And at the table againſt them ſat the chancellor and all the lords. At the table next the cupboord, ſat the maior of London; and at the table behind the lords, ſat the barons of the ports: and at the other tables ſat noble and worſhipfull perſonages. When all perſons were ſet, the duke of Norffolke earle marſhall, the earle of Surrie, conſtable for that daie, the lord Stanlie lord ſteward, ſir William Hopton treaſuror, & ſir Thomas Perſie controllor, came in and ſerued the king ſolemnelie, with one diſh of gold, and an other of ſiluer, and the quéene all in gilt veſſell, and the biſhop all in ſiluer.

Sir Robert Dimmocke the kings champion his challenge in the behalfe of king Richard.

At the ſecond courſe came into the hall ſir Robert Dimmocke the kings champion, making proclamation, that whoſoeuer would ſaie, that king Richard was not lawfull king, he would fight with him at the vtterance, and threw downe his gantlet, and then all the hall cried; King Richard. And ſo he did in thrée parts of the hall, and then one brought him a cup of wine couered, and when he had drunke, he caſt out the drinke, and departed with the cup. After that, the heralds cried a largeſſe thriſe in the hall, and ſo went vp to their ſtage. At the end of dinner, the maior of London ſerued the king & quéene with ſwéete wine, and had of each of them a cup of gold, with a couer of gold. And by that time that all was doone, it was darke night. And ſo the king returned to his chamber, and euerie man to his lodging.

A gaie pretenſe of iuſtice and equitie.

When this feaſt was thus finiſhed, the king ſent home all the lords into their countries that would depart, except the lord Stanleie, whome he reteined, till he heard what his ſonne the lord Strange went about. And to ſuch as went home, he gaue ſtreight charge and commandement, to ſée their countries well ordered, and that no wrong nor extortion ſhould be doone to his ſubiects. And thus he taught other to execute iuſtice and equitie, the contrarie whereof he dailie exerciſed. He alſo with great rewards giuen to the Northernemen, which he ſent for to his coronation, ſent them home to their countrie with great thanks: whereof diuerſe of them (as they be all of nature verie gréedie of authoritie, & ſpeciallie when they thinke to haue anie comfort or fauour) tooke on them ſo highlie, and wrought ſuch maiſteries, that the king was faine to ride thither in his firſt yeare, and to put ſome in execution, and ſtaie the countrie, or elſe no ſmall miſcheefe had inſued.

Sir Thomas More egaine.

Now fell there miſcheefs thicke. And as the thing euill gotten is neuer well kept, thorough all the time of his reigne neuer ceaſſed there cruell death and ſlaughter, till his owne deſtruction ended it. But as he finiſhed his time with the beſt death and the moſt rigtehous, that is to wit, his owne; ſo began he with the moſt pitious and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocent nephues, the yoong king and his tender brother: whoſe death and finall infortune hath naitheleſſe comen ſo farre in queſtion, that ſome remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies deſtroied or no. Not for that onelie that Perkin Werbecke by manie folks malice, and mo folks follie, ſo long ſpace abuſing the world, was as well with princes as the poorer people reputed and taken for the yonger of theſe two; but for that alſo that all things were in late daies ſo couertlie demeaned, one thing pretended, and an other meant.

Perkin Werbecke.

Cloſe dealing is euer ſuſpected.

Inſomuch that there was nothing ſo plaine and openlie prooued, but that yet for the common cuſtome of cloſe and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardlie ſuſpect; as manie well counterfaited iewels make the true miſtruſted. Howbeit, concerning the opinion, with the occaſions mooving either partie, we ſhall haue place more at large to intreat, if we hereafter happen to write the time of the late noble prince of famous memorie king Henrie the ſeauenth, or percaſe that hiſtorie of Perkin in anie compendious proceſſe by it ſelfe. But in the meane time, for this preſent matter, I ſhall rehearſe you the dolorous end of thoſe babes, not after euerie waie that I haue heard, but after that waie that I haue ſo heard by ſuch men and by ſuch meanes, as me thinketh it were hard but it ſhould be true.

King Richard after his coronation, taking his waie to Glouceſter to viſit (in his new honour) the towne of which he bare the name of his old, deuiſed (as he rode) to fulfill the thing which he before had intended. And forſomuch as his mind gaue him, that his nephues liuing, men would not reckon that he could haue right to the realme: he thought therefore without delaie to rid them, as though the killing of his kinſmen could amend his cauſe, and make him a kindlie king. Wher vpon he ſent one John Gréene, (whom he ſpeciallie truſted) vnto ſir Robert Brakenberie, conſtable of the Tower, with a letter and credence alſo, that the ſame ſir Robert ſhould in anie wiſe put the two children to death.

John Gréene, Robert Brakenberie conſtable of the Tower.

The murther of the two yoong princes ſet abroch.

This John Gréene did his errand vnto Brakenberie, knéeling before our ladie in the Tower. Who plainelie anſwered, that he would neuer put them to death to die therefore. With which anſwer John Gréene returning, recounted the ſame to king Richard at Warwike yet in his waie. Where with he tooke ſuch diſpleaſure & thought, that the ſame night he ſaid vnto a ſecret page of his: Ah! whom ſhall a man truſt? Thoſe that I haue brought vp my ſelfe, thoſe that I had wéent would moſt ſuerlie ſerue me, euen thoſe faile me, and at my commandement will doo nothing for me. Sir (quoth his page) there lieth one on your pallet without, that I dare well ſaie, to doo your grace pleaſure, the thing were right hard that he would refuſe. Meaning this by ſir James Tirrell, which was a man of right goodlie perſonage, and for natures gifts worthie to haue ſerued a much better prince, if he had well ſerued God, and by grace obteined as much truth and good will as he had ſtrength and wit.

Sir James Tirrell deſcribed.

The man had an high heart, & ſore longed vpward, not riſing yet ſo faſt as he had hoped, being hindered & kept vnder by the meanes of ſir Richard Ratcliffe, and ſir William Cateſbie, which longing for no mo parteners of the princes fauour; and namelie, not for him, whoſe pride they wiſt would beare no péere, kept him by ſecret drifts out of all ſecret truſt, which thing this page well had marked and knowne. Wherefore this occaſion offered, of verie ſpeciall friendſhip he tooke his time to put him forward, and by ſuch wiſe doo him good, that all the enimies he had (except the deuill) could neuer haue doone him ſo much hurt. For vpon this pages words king Richard aroſe (for this communication had he ſitting at the draught, a conuenient carpet for ſuch a councell) and came out into the pallet chamber, on which he found in bed ſir Iames and ſir Thomas Tirrels, of perſon like, and brethren of bloud, but nothing of kin in conditions.

Then ſaid the king merilie to them; What ſirs, be ye in bed ſo ſoone? And calling vp ſir Iames, brake to him ſecretlie his mind in this miſchéeuous matter. In which he found him nothing ſtrange. Wherefore on the morow he ſent him to Brakenberie with a letter, by which he was commanded to deliuer ſir Iames all the keies of the Tower for one night, to the end he might there accompliſh the kings pleaſure, in ſuch things as he had giuen him commandement. After which letter deliuered, & the keies receiued, ſir Iames appointed the night next inſuing to deſtroie them, deuiſing before and preparing the meanes. The prince (as ſoone as the protector left that name, and tooke himſelfe as king) had it ſhewed vnto him, that he ſhould not reigne, but his vncle ſhuld haue the crowne. At which word the prince ſore abaſhed, began to ſigh, and ſaid: Alas, I would my vncle would let me haue my life yet, though I léeſe my kingdome.

Then he that told him the tale, vſed him with good words, and put him in the beſt comfort he could. But forthwith was the prince and his brother both ſhut vp, & all other remooued from them, onelie one (called Blacke Will, or William Slaughter) excepted, ſet to ſerue them and ſée them ſure. After which time the prince neuer tied his points, nor ought rought of himſelfe; but with that yoong babe his brother, lingered with thought and heauineſſe, vntill this traitorous death deliuered them of that wretchedneſſe. For ſir Iames Tirrell deuiſed, that they ſhould be murthered in their beds. To the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forreſt, one of the foure that kept them, a fellow fleſhed in murther before time. To him he ioined one Iohn Dighton his owne horſſe-keeper, a big, broad, ſquare, and ſtrong knaue.

Then all the other being remooued from them, this Miles Forreſt, and Iohn Dighton, about midnight (the ſéelie children lieng in their beds) came into the chamber, & ſuddenlie lapping them vp among the clothes, ſo to bewrapped them and intangled them, kéeping downe by force the fether-bed and pillowes hard vnto their mouths, that within a while, ſmoothered and ſtifled, their breath failing, they gaue vp to God their innocent ſoules into the ioies of heauen, leauing to the tormentors their bodies dead in the bed. Which after that the wretches perceiued, firſt by the ſtrugling with the paines of death, and after long lieng ſtill, to be thoroughlie dead, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the bed, and fetched ſir Iames to ſée them; which vpon the ſight of them, cauſed thoſe murtherers to burie them at the ſtaire foot, méetlie déepe in the ground, vnder a great heape of ſtones.

Then rode ſir Iames in great haſt to king Richard, and ſhewed him all the maner of the murther; who gaue him great thanks, and (as ſome ſaie) there made him knight. But he allowed not (as I haue heard) the burieng in ſo vile a corner, ſaieng, that he would haue them buried in a better place, bicauſe they were a kings ſonnes. Lo the honourable courage of a king. Wher vpon they ſaie, that a prieſt of ſir Robert Brakenberies tooke vp the bodies againe, and ſecretlie interred them in ſuch place, as by the occaſion of his death, which onelie knew it, could neuer ſince come to light. Verie truth is it, and well knowne, that at ſuch time as ſir Iames Tirrell was in the Tower, for treaſon committed againſt the moſt famous prince king Henrie the ſeauenth, both Dighton and he were examined, and confeſſed the murther in maner aboue written: but whither the bodies were remooued, they could nothing tell.

The murther confeſſed.

And thus (as I haue learned of them that much knew, and little cauſe had to lie) were theſe two noble princes, theſe innocent tender children, borne of moſt roiall bloud, brought vp in great wealth, likelie long to liue, reigne, and rule in the realme, by traitorous tyrannie taken, depriued of their eſtate, ſhortlie ſhut vp in priſon, and priuilie ſlaine and murthered, their bodies caſt God wot where, by the cruell ambition of their vnnaturall vncle & his deſpiteous tormentors. Which things on euerie part well pondered, God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neither in what vnſuertie ſtandeth this worldlie weale; or what miſchéefe worketh the proud enterpriſe of an high heart; or finallie, what wretched end inſueth ſuch deſpiteous crueltie.

The iuſt iudgement of God ſeuerelie reuenging the murther of the innocent princes vpon the malefactors.

For firſt, to begin with the miniſters, Miles Forreſt, at S. Martins péecemeale rotted awaie. Dighton in déed yet walketh on aliue in good poſſibilitie to be hanged yer he die. But ſir Iames Tirrell died at the Tower hill beheaded for treaſon. King Richard himſelfe, as ye ſhall hereafter heare, ſlaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enimies hands, harried on horſſe-backe dead, his haire in deſpite torne and tugged like a curre dog; and the miſchéefe that he tooke, within leſſe than thrée yeares of the miſchéefe that he did: and yet all (in the meane time) ſpent in much paine & trouble outward, much feare, anguiſh and ſorow within. For I haue heard by credible report of ſuch as were ſecret with his chamberleine, that after this abhominable déed doone, he neuer had a quiet mind. [Than the which there can be no greater torment. For a giltie conſcience inwardlie accuſing and bearing witneſſe againſt an offendor, is ſuch a plague and puniſhment, as hell it ſelfe (with all the féends therein) can not afford one of greater horror & affliction; the poet implieng no leſſe in this triſtichon:

Pœna autem vehemens, ac multo ſæuior illis,
Quas & Cæditius grauis inuenit & Radamanthus,
Nocte diéque ſuum geſtare in pectore teſtem.

Perſ. ſat. 3.

He neuer thought himſelfe ſure. Where he went abroad, his eies whirled about, his bodie priuilie fenſed, his hand euer vpon his dagger, his countenance and maner like one alwaies readie to ſtrike againe, he tooke ill reſt a nights, laie long waking and muſing, ſore wearied with care and watch, rather ſlumbered than ſlept, troubled with fearefull dreames, ſuddenlie ſometime ſtart vp, lept out of his bed, and ran about the chamber; ſo was his reſtleſſe heart continuallie toſſed and tumbled with the tedious impreſſion and ſtormie remembrance of his abhominable déed. Now had he outward no long time in reſt. For herevpon, ſoone after began the conſpiracie, or rather good confederation, betwéene the duke of Buckingham and manie other gentlemen againſt him. The occaſion wherevpon the king and the duke fell out, is of diuerſe folke in diuerſe wiſe pretended.

The outward and inward troubles of tyrants by meanes of a grudging conſcience.

This duke (as I haue for certeine béene informed) as ſoone as the duke of Glouceſter, vpon the death of king Edward, came to Yorke, & there had ſolemne funerall ſeruice for king Edward, ſent thither in the moſt ſecret wiſe he could, one *Perſall his truſtie ſeruant, who came to Iohn Ward a chamberer of like ſecret truſt with the duke of Glouceſter, deſiring that in the moſt cloſe and couert maner, he might be admitted to the preſence and ſpéech of his maiſter. And the duke of Gloceſter aduertiſed of his deſire, cauſed him in the dead of the night (after all other folke auoided) to be brought vnto him in his ſecret chamber, where Perſall (after his maiſters recommendations) ſhewed him that he had ſecret ſent him to ſhew him, that in this new world he would take ſuch part as he would, & wait vpon him with a thouſand good fellowes, if néed were.

The meſſenger ſent backe with thanks, & ſome ſecret inſtruction of the protectors mind, yet met him againe with further meſſage from the duke his maſter within few daies after at Notingham: whither the protector from Yorke with manie gentlemen of the north countrie, to the number of ſix hundred horſſes, was come on his waie to London-ward, & after ſecret méeting and communication had, eftſoones departed. Wherevpon at Northhampton, the duke met with the protector himſelfe with thrée hundred horſſes, and from thenſe ſtill continued with him partner of all his deuiſes; till that after his coronation, they departed (as it ſéemed) verie great fréends at Gloceſter. From whenſe as ſoone as the duke came home, he ſo lightlie turned from him, and ſo highlie conſpired againſt him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And ſuerlie, the occaſion of their variance is of diuerſe men diuerſelie reported.

Cauſes of the duke of Buckingham and K. Richards falling out.

Some haue I heard ſay, that the duke a little before his coronation, among other things, required of the protector the duke of Herefords lands, to the which he pretended himſelfe iuſt inheritor. And forſomuch as the title, which he claimed by inheritance, was ſomwhat interlaced with the title to the crowne by the line of king Henrie before depriued, the protector conceiued ſuch indignation, that he reiected the dukes requeſt with manie ſpitefull and minatorie words. Which ſo wounded his heart with hatred and miſtruſt, that he neuer after could indure to looke aright on king Richard, but euer feared his owne life; ſo far forth, that when the protector rode through London toward his coronation, he feined himſelfe ſicke, bicauſe he would not ride with him. And the other alſo taking it in euill part, ſent him word to riſe, and come ride, or he would make him be caried. Wherevpon he rode on with euill will, and that notwithſtanding on the morow, roſe from the feaſt, feining himſelfe ſicke, and king Richard ſaid it was doone in hatred and deſpite of him.

The duke of Buckingham and king Richard miſtruſt each other.

And they ſaid, that euer after continuallie, each of them liued in ſuch hatred and diſtruſt of other, that the duke verelie looked to haue béene murthered at Gloceſter: from which natheleſſe, he in faire maner departed. But ſuerlie ſome right ſecret at that daie denie this: and manie right wiſe men thinke it vnlikelie (the déepe diſſembling nature of both thoſe men conſidered, and what néed in that gréene world the protector had of the duke, and in what perill the duke ſtood, if he fell once in ſuſpicion of the tyrant) that either the protector would giue the duke occaſion of diſpleaſure, or the duke the protector occaſion of miſtruſt. And verelie, men thinke, that if king Richard had anie ſuch opinion conceiued, he would neuer haue ſuffered him to eſcape his hands. Verie truth it is, the duke was an high minded man, and euill could beare the glorie of another; ſo that I haue heard of ſome that ſay they ſaw it, that the duke, at ſuch time as the crowne was firſt ſet vpon the protectors head, his eie could not abide the ſight thereof, but wried his head another way.

But men ſay, that he was of truth not well at eaſe, and that both to king Richard well knowne, and not euill taken; nor anie demand of the dukes vncourteouſlie reiected; but he both with great gifts, and high beheſts, in moſt louing and truſtie maner departed at Gloceſter. But ſoone after his comming home to Brecknocke, hauing there in his cuſtodie by the commandement of king Richard doctor Morton biſhop of Elie, who (as ye before heard) was taken in the councell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar, whoſe wiſedome abuſed his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the dukes deſtruction. The biſhop was a man of great naturall wit, verie well learned, and honorable in behauior, lacking no wiſe waies to win fauour. He had béene faſt vpon the part of king Henrie, while that part was in wealth; and natheleſſe left it not, nor forſooke it in wo, but fled the realme with the quéene & the prince, while king Edward had the king in priſon, neuer came home, but to the field.

Docto ton bi Elie, a pagam placed,

After which loſt, and that part vtterlie ſubdued, the other (for his faſt faith and wiſedome) not onelie was content to receiue him, but alſo wooed him to come, and had him from thenceforth both in ſecret truſt, and verie ſpeciall fauour, which he nothing deceiued. For he being (as yée haue heard) after king Edwards death, firſt taken by the tyrant for his truth to the king, found the meane to ſet this duke in his top, ioined gentlemen togither in the aid of king Henrie, deuiſing firſt the mariage betwéene him & king Edwards daughter: by which his faith he declared the good ſeruice to both his maſters at once, with infinit benefit to the realme by the coniunction of thoſe two bloods in one, whoſe ſeuerall titles had long diſquieted the land, he fled the realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world; till the noble prince king Henrie the ſeuenth gat him home againe, made him archbiſhop of Canturburie, and chancellor of England, whereunto the pope ioined the honour of cardinall. Thus liuing manie daies in as much honor as one man might well wiſh, ended them ſo godlie, that his death with Gods mercie well changed his life.

The high nour of Morton.

This man therefore (as I was about to tell you) by the long & often alternate proofe, as well of proſperitie as aduerſe fortune, had gotten by great experience (the verie mother and miſtreſſe of wiſedome) a déepe inſight in politike worldlie drifts. Whereby perceiuing now this duke glad to commune with him, fed him with faire words, and manie pleaſant praiſes. And perceiuing by the proceſſe of their communications, the dukes pride now and then belking out a little breath of enuie toward the glorie of the king, and thereby féeling him eaſie to fall out if the matter were well handled: he craftilie ſought the waies to pricke him forward, taking alwaies the occaſion of his comming, and ſo kéeping himſelfe ſo cloſe within his bounds, that he rather ſéemed to follow him, than to lead him. For when the duke firſt began to praiſe and boaſt the king, and ſhew how much profit the realme ſhould take by his reigne: my lord Morton anſwered thus.

Biſhop Mortons ſubtil vndermining of the duke.

Suerlie, my lord, follie were it for me to lie, for if I would ſweare the contrarie, your lordſhip would not (I wéene) beléeue; but that if the world would haue gone as I would haue wiſhed, king Henries ſonne had had the crowne, and not king Edward. But after that God had ordered him to léeſe it, and king Edward to reigne, I was neuer ſo mad that I would with a dead man ſtriue againſt the quicke. So was I to king Edward a faithfull chapleine, & glad would haue béene that his child had ſuccéeded him. Howbeit, if the ſecret iudgment of God haue otherwiſe prouided, I purpoſe not to ſpurne againſt a pricke, nor labour to ſet vp that God pulleth downe. And as for the late protector and now king. And euen there he left, ſaieng that he had alreadie medled to much with the world, and would from that daie meddle with his booke and his beads, and no further.

Then longed the duke ſore to heare what he would haue ſaid, bicauſe he ended with the king, and there ſo ſuddenlie ſtopped, and exhorted him ſo familiarlie betwéene them twaine to be bold to ſaie whatſoeuer he thought; whereof he faithfullie promiſed there ſhould neuer come hurt, and peraduenture more good than he would wéene; and that himſelfe intended to vſe his faithfull ſecret aduiſe & counſell, which (he ſaid) was the onelie cauſe for which he procured of the king to haue him in his cuſtodie, where he might reckon himſelfe at home, and elſe had he béene put in the hands of them with whome he ſhould not haue found the like fauour. The biſhop right humblie thanked him, and ſaid: In good faith my lord, I loue not to talke much of princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault, forſomuch as it ſhall not be taken as the partie ment it, but as it pleaſeth the prince to conſtrue it.

Princes matters perillous to meddle in.

And euer I thinke on Aeſops tale, that when the lion had proclaimed that (on paine of death) there ſhould no horned beaſt abide in that wood: one that had in his forehed a bunch of fleſh, fled awaie a great pace. The fox that ſaw him run ſo faſt, aſked him whither he made all that haſt? And he anſwered, In faith I neither wote, nor recke, ſo I were once hence, bicauſe of this proclamation made of horned beaſts. What foole (quoth the fox) thou maieſt abide well inough; the lion ment not by thée, for it is no horne that is in thine head. No marie (quoth he) that wote I well inough. But what and he call it an horne, where am I then? The duke laughed merilie at the tale, and ſaid, My lord; I warrant you, neither the lion nor the bore ſhall pike anie matter at anie thing héere ſpoken: for it ſhall neuer come néere their eare.

In good faith ſir (ſaid the biſhop) if it did, the thing that I was about to ſay, taken as well as (afore God I ment it) could deſerue but thanke: and yet taken as I wéene it would, might happen to turne me to to little good, and you to leſſer. Then longed the duke yet much more to wit what it was. Wherevpon the biſhop ſaid; In good faith (my lord) as for the late protector, ſith he is now king in poſſeſſion, I purpoſe not to diſpute his title; but for the weale of this realme, whereof his grace hath now the gouernance, and whereof I am my ſelfe one poore member, I was about to wiſh, that to thoſe good habilities whereof he hath alreadie right manie, little néeding my praiſe, it might yet haue pleaſed God, for the better ſtore, to haue giuen him ſome of ſuch other excellent vertues, méet for the rule of a realme, as our Lord hath planted in the perſon of your grace: and there left againe.

Here endeth ſir Thomas Moore, & this that followeth is taken out of maſter Hall.

The duke ſomewhat maruelling at his ſudden pauſes, as though they were but parentheſes, with a high countenance ſaid: My lord, I euidentlie perceiue, and no leſſe note your often breathing, and ſudden ſtopping in your communication; ſo that to my intelligence, your words neither come to anie direct or perfect ſentence in concluſion, whereby either I might perceiue and haue knowledge, what your inward intent is now toward the king, or what affection you beare toward me. For the compariſon of good qualities aſcribed to vs both (for the which I my ſelfe acknowledge and recogniſe to haue none, nor looke for no praiſe of anie creature for the ſame) maketh me not a little to muſe, thinking that you haue ſome other priuie imagination, by loue or by grudge, ingrauen and imprinted in your heart, which for feare you dare not, or for childiſh ſhamefaſtneſſe you be abaſhed to diſcloſe and reueale and ſpeciallie to mée being your fréend; which on my honor doo aſſure you, to be as ſecret in this caſe, as the deafe and dumbe perſon is to the ſinger, or the trée to the hunter.

The biſhop being ſomewhat bolder, conſidering the dukes promiſe, but moſt of all animated and incouraged bicauſe he knew the duke deſirous to bée exalted and magnified; and alſo he perceiued the inward hatred and priuie rancor which he bare toward king Richard: was now boldened to open his ſtomach euen to the verie bottome, intending thereby to compaſſe how to deſtroie, and vtterlie confound king Richard, and to depriue him of his dignitie roiall; or elſe to ſet the duke ſo on fire with the deſire of ambition, that he himſelfe might be ſafe and eſcape out of all danger and perill. Which thing he brought ſhortlie to concluſion, both to the kings deſtruction, and the dukes confuſion, and to his owne ſafegard, and finallie to his high promotion.

Biſhop Morton buildeth vpō the dukes ambition.

And ſo (as I ſaid before) vpon truſt and confidence of the dukes promiſe, the biſhop ſaid: My ſingular good lord, ſince the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces cuſtodie, I may rather call it a liberall libertie, more than a ſtreict impriſonment, in auoiding idleneſſe, mother and nouriſher of all vices, in reading bookes and ancient pamphlets I haue found this ſentence written, that no man is borne frée, and in libertie of himſelfe onelie: for one part of dutie he oweth or ſhould owe to his parents for his procreation, by a verie naturall inſtinct and filiall courteſie: another part to his fréends and kinſfolke; for proximitie of bloud and naturall amitie dooth euerie dutie chalenge and demand: but the natiue countrie, in the which he taſted firſt the ſwéet aires of this pleaſant and flattering world after his natiuitie, demandeth as a debt by a naturall bond, neither to be forgotten, nor yet to be put in obliuion.

Which ſaieng cauſeth me to conſider in what caſe this realme my natiue countrie now ſtandeth, and in what eſtate and aſſurance (before this time) it hath continued: what gouernour we now haue, and what ruler we might haue. For I plainelie perceiue the realme being in this caſe, muſt néeds decaie, and be brought to vtter confuſion, and finall extermination. But one hope I haue incorporat in my breſt, that is, when I conſider, and in my mind doo diligentlie remember, and dailie behold your noble perſonage, your iuſtice, and indifferencie, your feruent zeale, and ardent loue toward your naturall countrie, and in like manner, the loue of your countrie toward you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and goodlie eloquence, which ſo much dooth abound in the perſon of your grace, I muſt néeds thinke this realme fortunate, yea twiſe more than fortunate, which hath ſuch a prince in ſtore, méet and apt to be a gouernour, in whoſe perſon (being indued with ſo manie princelie qualities) conſiſteth and reſteth the verie vndoubted ſimilitude and image of true honour.

The duke of Buckingham highlie commended.

But on the other ſide, when I call to memorie the good qualities of the late protector, and now called king, ſo violated and ſubuerted by tyrannie, ſo changed and altered by vſurped authoritie, ſo clouded and ſhadowed by blind and inſatiable ambition; yea, and ſo ſuddenlie (in manner by a metamorphoſis) transformed from politike ciuilitie, to deteſtable tyrannie: I muſt néeds ſaie, & iuſtlie affirme, that he is neither méet to be a king of ſo noble a realme, nor ſo famous a realme méet to be gouerned by ſuch a tyrant [whoſe kingdome (if it were of more ampleneſſe than it is) could not long continue; neither would the Lord ſuffer him in his bloudthirſtines to abuſe the holie and diuine eſtate of a prince by the cruell title of tyrannie. For ſuch he will ouerthrow, yea he will bring moſt horrible ſlaughter vpō them, as it is propheſied:

Diſpraiſe of the lord protector or king in eſſe.

Impius ad ſummos quamuis aſcendat honores,
Aſpice quas clades tempora ſæua vehent.

Was not his firſt enterpriſe to obteine the crowne begun and incepted by the murther of diuerſe noble, valiant true, and vertuous perſonages? O holie beginning to come to a miſcheeuous ending! Did he not ſecondarilie proceed (contrarie to all lawes of honeſtie) ſhamefullie againſt his owne naturall mother, being a woman of much honour and more vertue, declaring hir openlie to be a woman giuen to carnall affection, and diſſolute liuing? Which thing if it had beene true, as it was not indeed, euerie good & naturall child would haue rather mummed at it, than haue blaſted it abroad, and eſpeciallie ſhe being aliue. Declaring furthermore his two brethren, and his two nephues to be baſtards, and to be borne in adulterie: yet was he not with all this content.

After that he had obteined the garland, for the which he ſo long thirſted, he cauſed the two poore innocents his nephues, committed to him for eſpeciall truſt, to be murthered and ſhamefullie to be killed. The bloud of which ſeelie and litle babes dailie crie to God from the earth for vengeance. Alas, my hart ſobbeth, to remember this bloudie butcher, and cruell monſter. What ſuertie ſhall be in this realme to anie perſon, either for life or goods vnder ſuch a cruell prince, which regardeth not the deſtruction of his owne bloud, and then leſſe the loſſe of other? And moſt eſpeciallie (as oftentimes it chanceth) where a couetous or a cruell prince taketh ſuſpicion, the ſmalleſt ſwaruing that is poſſible (if the thing be miſconſtrued) may be the cauſe of the deſtruction of manie guiltleſſe perſons: and in eſpeciall of noble and wealthie perſonages, hauing great poſſeſſions and riches; ſuch a lord is Lucifer when he is entered into the hart of a proud prince, giuen to couetouſneſſe and crueltie.

Suſpicion in a prince how miſcheefous it is.

But now my lord to conclude what I meane toward your noble perſon, I ſaie and affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your natiue countrie, you muſt your ſelfe take vpon you the crowne and imperiall diademe of this noble empire, both for the maintenance of the honour of the ſame (which ſo long hath flouriſhed in fame and renowme) as alſo for the deliuerance of your naturall countrimen, from the bondage and thraldome (worſe than the captiuitie of Aegypt) of ſo cruell a tyrant and arrogant oppreſſor. For thus I dare ſaie, if anie forren prince or potentate, yea the Turke himſelfe would take vpon him the regiment here, and the crowne, the commons would rather admit and obeie him, than to liue vnder ſuch a bloudſucker and child-killer. But how much more ioifull and glad would they be to liue vnder your grace, whome they all know to be a ruler meet and conuenient for them, and they to be louing and obedient ſubiects, meet to liue vnder ſuch a gouernour? Deſpiſe not, nor forſake not ſo manifeſt an occaſion ſo louinglie offered.

And if you your ſelfe, knowing the paine and trauell that apperteineth to the office of a king, or for any other conſideration, will refuſe to take vpon you the crowne and ſcepter of this realme: then I adiure you, by the faith that you owe to God, by your honor and by your oth made to ſaint George, patrone of the noble order of the garter (whereof you be a companion) and by the loue and affection that you beare to your natiue countrie, and the people of the ſame; to deuiſe ſome waie, how this realme (now being in miſerie) may by your high diſcretion and princelie policie, be brought and reduced to ſome ſuertie and conuenient regiment, vnder ſome good gouernour by you to be appointed: for you are the verie patrone, the onelie helpe, refuge and comfort for the poore amazed and deſolate commons of this realme.

The biſhop adiureth the duke to releaſe the realme by ſome deuiſe from the preſent euill ſtate.

For if you could either deuiſe to ſet vp againe the linage of Lancaſter, or aduance the eldeſt daughter of king Edward to ſome high and puiſſant prince, not onelie the new crowned king ſhall ſmall time inioy the glorie of his dignitie; but alſo all ciuill war ſhould ceaſſe, all domeſticall diſcord ſhould ſleepe, and peace, profit and quietneſſe ſhould be ſet forth and imbraced. When the biſhop had thus ended his ſaieng, the duke ſighed, and ſpake not of a great while. Which ſore abaſhed the biſhop, and made him change colour. Which thing when the duke perceiued, he ſaid; Be not afraid my lord, all promiſes ſhall be kept, to morrow we will common more; let vs go to ſupper. So that night they communed no more, not a little to the diſquieting of the biſhop, which now was euen as deſirous to know the dukes mind and intent, as the duke longed the daie before to know his opinion and meaning.

A new conference betweene the biſhop and the duke.

So the next daie, the duke ſent for the biſhop, and rehearſed to him in maner (for he was both wittie and eloquent) all the communication had betweene them before, and ſo pauſed a while, and after a little ſeaſon, putting off his bonet, he ſaid: O Lord God creator of all things, how much is this relme of England, and the people of the ſame, bounden vnto thy goodneſſe! For where we now be in vexation and trouble with great ſtormes oppreſſed, ſailing and toſſing in a deſperate ſhip, without good maiſter or gouernour: yet by thy helpe good Lord I truſt per long time paſſe, that we ſhall prouide for ſuch a ruler, as ſhall be both to thy pleaſure, and alſo to the ſecuritie and ſafegard of this noble realme.

And then he put on his bonet, ſaieng to the biſhop; My lord of Elie, whoſe true hart and ſincere affection toward me at all times I haue euidentlie perceiued and knowen, and now moſt of all in our laſt priuie communication and ſecret deuiſing; I muſt needs in hart thinke, and with mouth confeſſe and ſaie, that you be a ſure freend, a truſtie councellor, a vigilant foreſeer, a verie louer of your countrie, and a naturall countrieman: for which kindnes for my part, I moſt louinglie render to you my hartie thanks now with words, hereafter truſting to recompenſe and remunerate you with deeds, if life and power ſhall ſerue.

And ſith, at our laſt communication, you haue diſcloſed and opened the verie ſecrets and priuities of your ſtomach, touching the duke of Glocester now vſurper of the crowne; and alſo haue a little touched the aduancement of the two noble families of Yorke and Lancaſter: I ſhall likewiſe not onelie declare and manifeſt vnto you all my open acts, attempts, and doings, but alſo my priuie intents, and ſecret cogitations. To the intent that as you haue vnbuckeled the bouget of your priuie meanings, and ſecret purpoſes to me: ſo ſhall all my cloudie workings, cloſe deuiſes, and ſecret imaginations be (as cleere as the ſunne) reuealed, opened, and made lightſome to you.

The duke openeth himſelfe and his ſecrets to the biſhop.

And to begin, I declare, that when king Edward was deceaſſed, to whome I thought my ſelfe little or nothing beholden (although we two had maried two ſiſters) bicauſe he neither promoted, nor preferred me, as I thought I was worthie, and had deſerued; neither fauoured nor regarded me, according to my degree and birth (for ſuerlie I had by him little authoritie, and leſſe rule, and in effect nothing at all: which cauſed me leſſe to fauour his children, bicauſe I found ſmall humanitie, or none in their parent) I then began to ſtudie, and with ripe deliberation to ponder and conſider, how and in what manner this realme ſhould be ruled and gouerned. And firſt I remembred an old prouerbe worthie of memorie, that often rueth the realme where children rule, and women gouerne.

The duke complaineth of want of preferment in king Edwards daies.

This old adage ſo ſanke and ſettled in my head, that I thought it a great errour, and extreame miſchiefe to the whole realme, either to ſuffer the yoong king to rule, or the quéene his mother to be a gouerneſſe ouer him, conſidering that hir brethren, and hir firſt children (although they were not extract of high and noble linage) tooke more vpon them, and more exalted themſelues, by reaſon of the quéene, than did the kings brethren, or anie duke in his realme: which in concluſion turned to their confuſion. Then I being perſuaded with my ſelfe in this point, thought it neceſſarie both for the publike and profitable wealth of this realme, and alſo for mine owne commoditie and emolument, to take part with the duke of Gloceſter; whom (I aſſure you) I thought to be as cleane without diſſimulation, as tractable without iniurie, as mercifull without crueltie; as now I know him perfectlie to be a diſſembler without veritie, a tyrant without pitie, yea & worſe than the tyrant Phalaris, deſtitute of all truth and clemencie.

And ſo by my meanes, at the firſt councell holden at London, when he was moſt ſuſpected of that thing that after happened (as you my lord know well inough) he was made protector and defendor both of the king and of the realme, which authoritie once gotten, & the two children partlie by * policie brought vnder his gouernance, he being moued with that gnawing and couetous ſerpent deſire to reigne, neuer ceaſſed priuilie to exhort and require, yea and ſometimes with minatorie tearmes to perſuade me and other lords, as well ſpirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the crowne, till the prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeares, and were able to gouerne the realme, as a ripe and ſufficient king.

* An vnhappie policie tending to ſlaughter & bloudſhed.

Which thing when he ſaw me ſomewhat ſticke at, both for the ſtrangeneſſe of the example (bicauſe no ſuch preſident had béene ſéene) and alſo bicauſe we remembred that men once aſcended to the higheſt type of honour and authoritie, will not gladlie deſcend againe; he then brought in inſtruments, autentike doctors, proctors, and notaries of the law, with depoſitions of diuerſe witneſſes, teſtifieng king Edwards children to be baſtards. Which depoſitions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to be feined; and teſtified by perſons with rewards vntrulie ſuborned. When the ſaid depoſitions were before vs read and diligentlie heard, he ſtood vp bareheaded, ſaieng: Well my lords, euen as I and you (ſage and diſcréet councellors) would that my nephue ſhould haue no wrong; ſo I praie you doo me nothing but right. For theſe witneſſes & ſaiengs of famous doctors being true, I am onelie the vndubitate heire to lord Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, adiudged to be the verie heire to the crowne of this relme by authoritie of parlement.

Which things ſo by learned men to vs for a veritie declared, cauſed me and other to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and ſoureigne lord. For well we knew that the duke of Clarence ſonne, by reaſon of the atteindor of his father, was diſabled to inherit; and alſo the duke himſelfe was named to be a baſtard, as I my ſelfe haue heard ſpoken, and that vpon great preſumptions more times than one: ſo againe, by my aid and fauour, he of a protector was made a king, and of a ſubiect made a gouernor. At which time he promiſed me on his fidelitie (laieng his hand in mine at Bainards caſtell) that the two yoong princes ſhould liue, and that he would ſo prouide for them, and ſo mainteine them in honorable eſtate, that I and all the realme ought and ſhould be content. [But his words wanted weight, which is a foule diſcredit to a prince, to a péere, yea to a priuat and meane common man, as teſtifieth this ſentence:

Dedecus eſt rebus cum bona verba carent.

For when he was once crowned king, and in full poſſeſſion of the whole realme, he caſt awaie his old conditions as the adder dooth hir ſkin, verifieng the old prouerbe; Honours change manners, as the pariſh préeſt remembreth that he was neuer pariſh clearke. For when I my ſelfe ſued vnto him for my part of the earle of Herefords lands which his brother king Edward wrongfullie deteined and withheld from me; and alſo required to haue the office of the high conſtableſhip of England, as diuerſe of my noble anceſtors before this time haue had, and in long deſcent continued: in this my firſt ſute ſhewing his good mind toward me; he did not onelie firſt delaie me, and afterward denaie me, but gaue me ſuch vnkind words, with ſuch tawnts & retawnts, ye in manner checke and checkemate, to the vttermoſt proofe of my patience: as though I had neuer furthered him, but hindered him; as though I had put him downe, and not ſet him vp.

The principall cauſe why the duke of Buckingham cõceiued ſuch inward grudge againſt king Richard.

Yet all theſe ingratitudes and vndeſerued vnkindneſſes I bare cloſelie, & ſuffered patientlie, and couertlie remembred, outwardlie diſſembling that I inwardlie thought: and ſo with a painted countenance, I paſſed the laſt ſummer in his laſt companie, not without manie faire promiſes, but without anie good déeds. But when I was credible informed of the death of the two yoong innocents, his owne naturall nephues contrarie to his faith and promiſe, to the which (God be my iudge) I neuer agréed, nor condeſcended; O Lord, how my veines panted, how my bodie trembled, and how my heart inwardlie grudged! inſomuch that I ſo abhorred the ſight, and much more the companie of him, that I could no longer abide in his court, except I ſhould be openlie reuenged: the end whereof was doubtfull. And ſo I feined a cauſe to depart, and with a merrie countenance and a deſpitefull heart I tooke my leaue humblie of him (he thinking nothing leſſe than that I was diſpleaſed) and ſo returned to Brecknocke to you.

But in that iournie (as I returned) whither it were by the inſpiration of the Holie-ghoſt, or by melancholious diſpoſition, I had diuerſe and ſundrie imaginations how to depriue this vnnaturall vncle, and bloudie butcher, from his roiall ſeat, and princelie dignitie. Firſt I fantiſed, that if I liſt to take vpon me the crowne, and imperiall ſcepter of the realme, now was the time propice and conuenient. For now was the waie made plaine, and the gate opened, and occaſion giuen: which now neglected, ſhould peraduenture neuer take ſuch effect and concluſion. For I ſaw he was diſdeined of the lords temporall, abhored and accurſſed of the lords ſpirituall, deteſted of all gentlemen, and deſpiſed of all the communaltie: ſo that I ſaw my chance as perfectlie as I ſaw mine owne image in a glaſſe, that there was no perſon (if I had béene gréedie to attempt the enterpriſe) could nor ſhould haue woone the ring, or got the gole before me. And on this point I reſted in imagination ſecretlie with my ſelfe two daies at Tewkeſburie.

The imaginations of the duke of Buckingham to depriue K. Richard.

From thence ſo iournieng, I muſed and thought that it was not beſt nor conuenient to take vpon me as a conqueror. For then I knew that all men, and eſpeciallie the nobilitie, would with all their power withſtand me, both for reſcuing of poſſeſſions and tenures, as alſo for ſubuerting of the whole eſtate, laws and cuſtomes of the realme: ſuch a power hath a conqueror, as you know well inough my lord. But at the laſt, in all this doubtfull caſe there ſprang a new branch out of my head, which ſuerlie I thought ſhould haue brought forth faire floures; but the ſunne was ſo hot, that they turned to drie wéeds. For I ſuddenlie remembred that the lord Edmund duke of Summerſet my grandfather, was with king Henrie the ſixt in the two and thrée degrées, from John duke of Lancaſter lawfullie begotten: ſo that I thought ſure, my mother being eldeſt daughter to duke Edmund, that I was next heire to king Henrie the ſixt of the houſe of Lancaſter.

Note the working of ambition in the duke.

This title pleaſed well ſuch as I made priuie of my counſell, but much more it incouraged my fooliſh deſire, and eleuated my ambitious intent; inſomuch that I cleerelie iudged, and in mine owne mind was determinatlie reſolued, that I was indubitate heire of the houſe of Lancaſter, and therevpon concluded to make my firſt foundation, and erect my new building. But whether God ſo ordeined, or by fortune it ſo chanced, while I was in a maze either to conclude ſuddenlie on this title, & to ſet it open amongſt the common people, or to keepe it ſecret a while, ſee the chance: as I rode betweene Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I incountered with the ladie Margaret counteſſe of Richmond, now wife vnto the lord Stanlie, which is the verie daughter and ſole heire to lord Iohn duke of Summerſet, my grandfathers elder brother, which was as cleane out of my mind, as though I had neuer ſeene hir: ſo that ſhe and hir ſonne the earle of Richmond be both bulworke and portcullice betweene me and the gate, to enter into the maieſtie roiall and getting of the crowne.

Now when we had communed a little concerning hir ſonne, as I ſhall ſhew you after, and were departed, ſhee to our ladie of Worceſter, and I to Shrewſburie: I then new changed, and in maner amazed, began to diſpute with my ſelfe, little conſidering that thus my earneſt title was turned to a tittell not ſo good as Eſt Amen. Eftſoones I imagined whether were beſt to take vpon me, by election of the nobilitie and communaltie, which me thought eaſie to be done, the vſurper king thus being in hatred and abhorred of this whole realme; or to take it by power, which ſtandeth in fortunes chance, and difficile to be atchiued and brought to paſſe. Thus tumbling and toſſing in the waues of ambiguitie, betweene the ſtone and the ſacrifice, I conſidered firſt the office, dutie, and paine of a king, which ſuerlie thinke I that no mortall man can iuſtlie and trulie obſerue, except he be called, elected, and ſpeciallie appointed by God as K. Dauid, and diuerſe other haue beene.

The office of a king verie hard to diſcharge.

But further, I remembred that if I once tooke on me the ſcepter, and the gouernance of the realme; that of two extreame enimies I was dailie ſure, but of one truſtie friend (which now a daies be gone a pilgrimage) I was neither aſſured nor credible aſcerteined; ſuch is the worlds mutation. For I manifeſtlie perceiued, that the daughters of king Edward, and their alies and freends, which be no ſmall number, being both for his ſake much beloued, and alſo for the great iniurie & manifeſt tyrannie doone to them by the new vſurper, much lamented and pitied, would neuer ceaſſe to barke if they cannot bite at the one ſide of me. Semblablie, my coſine the earle of Richmond, his aids and kinſfolks, which be not of little power, will ſuerlie attempt like a fierce greihound, either to bite or to pearſe me on the other ſide. So that my life and rule ſhould euer hang by a haire, neuer in quiet, but euer in doubt of death, or depoſition.

And if the ſaid two linages of Yorke and Lancaſter, which ſo long haue ſtriued for the imperiall diadem, ſhould ioine in one againſt me, then were I ſuerlie mated, and the game gotten. Wherefore I haue cleerelie determined, and with my ſelfe concluded, vtterlie to relinquiſh all ſuch fantaſticall imaginations, concerning the obteining of the crowne. But all ſuch plagues, calamities and troubles, which I feared and ſuſpected might haue chanced on me if I had taken the rule and regiment of this realme, I ſhall with a reredemaine ſo make them rebound to our common enimie that calleth himſelfe king, that the beſt ſtopper that he hath at tenice ſhall not well ſtop without a fault.

The dukes reſolution not to medle in ſeeking to obteine the crowne.

For (as I told you before) the counteſſe of Richmond in my returne from the new named king, meeting me in the high waie, praied me firſt for kinred ſake, ſecondarlie for the loue that I bare to my grandfather duke Humfrie, which was ſworne brother to hir father, to moue the king to be good to hir ſonne Henrie earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into England. And if it were his pleaſure ſo to doo, ſhe promiſed that the earle hir ſonne ſhould marrie one of king Edwards daughters, at the appointment of the king, without anie thing to be taken or demanded for the ſaid eſpouſals, but onelie the kings fauour: which requeſt I ſoone ouerpaſſed, and gaue hir faire words, and ſo departed.

But after in my lodging, when I called to memorie with a deliberate ſtudie, and did circumſpectlie ponder them, I fullie adiudged, that the Holie-ghoſt cauſed hir to moue a thing (the end whereof ſhe could not conſider) both for the ſecuritie of the realme, as alſo for the preferment of hir child, and the deſtruction and finall confuſion of the common enimie king Richard. Which thing, ſhe neither then thought (I am ſure) as I by hir words could make coniecture, nor I my ſelfe caſt not hir deſire to be ſo profitable to the realme, as I now doo perceiue. But ſuch a Lord is God, that with a little ſparkle he kindleth a great fire, and (to the admiration of the world) of impoſſibilities he maketh poſſibilities, of ſmall beginnings mightie increaſings, of drops great floods.

And ſo finallie to declare to you the verie concluſion, to the which I am both bent and ſet, my mind is, and my power and purſſe ſhall helpe, that the earle of Richmond, verie heire of the houſe of Lancaſter (in the quarrell of the which linage, both my father and grandfather loſt their liues in battell) ſhall take to wife ladie Elizabeth eldeſt daughter to king Edward, by the which mariage both the houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter may be ioined and vnited in one, to the cleere eſtabliſhment of the title to the crowne of this noble relme. To which concluſion if the mothers of both parts, and eſpeciallie the earle himſelfe, and the ladie will agree: I doubt not but the * bragging bore, which with his tuskes raſeth euerie mans skin, ſhall not onelie be brought to confuſion (as he hath deſerued) but that this empire ſhall euer be certeine of an vndubitate heire, & then ſhall all ciuill and inteſtine warre ceaſe, which ſo long hath continued to the paring of manie mens crownes, and this realme ſhall be reduced againe to quietneſſe, renowme and glorie.

The duke of Buckingham reſolued to helpe to depoſe king Richard, and to prefer the erle of Richmond to the crowne.

* The duke of Glouceſter now king.

This inuention of the duke manie men thought after, that it was more imagined for the inward hatred that he bare to king Richard, than for anie fauor that he bare to the earle of Richmond. But of ſuch doubtfull matter it is not beſt to iudge, for erring to farre from the mind and intent of the author. But whatſoeuer he intended, this deuiſe once opened to king Richard was the verie occaſion, that he was rounded ſhorter by the whole head, without attaindor or iudgement. When the duke had ſaid, the biſhop which fauoured euer the houſe of Lancaſter, was wonderous ioifull, and much reioiſed to heare this deuiſe. For now came the wind about euen as he would haue it, ſith all his imagination tended to this effect, to haue king Richard ſubdued, and to haue the lines of king Edward, and king Henrie the ſixt againe raiſed and aduanced.

The ſumme of the dukes purpoſe.

But lord how he reioiſed, to thinke how that by this marriage the linages of Yorke and Lancaſter ſhould be conioined in one, to the verie ſtedfaſtneſſe of the publike wealth of this realme. And leaſt the dukes courage ſhould ſwage, or his mind ſhould againe alter, as it did often before (as you may eaſilie perceiue by his owne tale) he thought to ſet vp all the ſailes that he had, to the intent that the ſhip of his pretended purpoſe might come ſhortlie to ſome ſure port, and ſaid to the duke: My lord, ſith by Gods prouiſion and your incomparable wiſedome and policie, this noble coniunction is firſt moued, now is it conuenient, yea and neceſſarie, to conſider what perſonages, and what fréends we ſhall firſt make priuie of this high deuiſe and politike concluſion: [which is not raſhlie & without aduiſement to be aduentured, for therin is danger, as the wiſeman ſaith:

Semper habet damnum mentis temerarius ardor.]

The motion for the coniunction of the two houſes of Lancaſter & Yorke (deuiſed by ẏ duke) furthered.

By my truth, quoth the duke, we will begin with the ladie Richmond, the earles mother, which knoweth where he is, either in captiuitie, or at large in Britaine. For I heard ſaie, that the duke of Britaine reſtored him to libertie, immediatlie after the death of king Edward, by whoſe means he was reſtreined. Sith you will begin that waie (ſaid the biſhop) I haue an old fréend with the counteſſe, a man ſober, ſecret, and well witted, called Reginald Braie; whoſe prudent policie I haue knowne to haue compaſſed things of great importance, for whome I ſhall ſecretlie ſend, if it be your pleaſure; and I doubt not but he will gladlie come and that with a good will. So with a little diligence the biſhop wrote a letter to Reginald Braie, requiring him to come to Brecknocke with ſpéed, for great and vrgent cauſes touching his miſtreſſe: and no other thing was declared in the letter. So the meſſenger rode into Lancaſhire where Braie was with the counteſſe, and lord Thomas Stanlie hir huſband, and deliuered the letter: which when he had read, he tooke it as a ſigne or preſage of ſome good fortune to come.

Then he (with the meſſenger) came to the caſtell of Brecknocke, where the duke and the biſhop declared what thing was deuiſed, both for to ſet the relme in a quiet ſtedfaſtneſſe, as alſo for the high preferment of the earle of Richmond, ſonne to his ladie and miſtreſſe: willing hir firſt to compaſſe how to obteine the good will of quéene Elizabeth, and alſo of hir eldeſt daughter bearing the ſame name: and after ſecretlie to ſend to hir ſonne into Britaine, to declare what high honor was prepared for him, if he would ſweare to marrie the ladie Elizabeth aſſoone as he was king, and in roiall poſſeſſion of the relme. Reginald Braie with a glad heart, forgetting nothing giuen to him in charge, in great haſt and with good ſpéed returned to the counteſſe his ladie and miſtreſſe.

When Braie was departed, and this great doubtfull veſſell once ſet abroach, the biſhop thirſting for nothing more than for libertie: when he ſaw the duke pleaſant and well minded toward him; he told the duke, that if he were in his Ile of Elie, he could make manie fréends to further their enterpriſe: and if he were there and had but foure daies warning, he little regarded the malice of king Richard, his countrie was ſo ſtrong. The duke knew well all this to be true, but yet loth he was that the biſhop ſhould depart: for he knew well, that as long as the biſhop was with him, he was ſure of politike aduiſe, ſage counſell, and circumſpect procéeding. And ſo he gaue the biſhop faire words, ſaieng, that he ſhould ſhortlie depart, and that well accompanied for feare of enimies.

Biſhop Mortons deuiſe for to be at his owne libertie in his biſhoprike of Elie.

The Biſhop being as wittie as the duke was wilie, did not tarrie till the dukes companie were aſſembled, but ſecretlie diſguiſed, in a night departed (to the dukes great diſpleaſure) and came to his ſée of Elie; where he found monie and fréends; and ſo ſailed into Flanders, where he did the earle of Richmond good ſeruice, and neuer returned againe, till the erle of Richmond (after being king) ſent for him, and ſhortlie promoted him to the ſee of Canturburie. Thus the biſhop woond himſelfe from the duke when he had moſt néed of his aid, for if he had taried ſtill, the duke had not made ſo manie blabs of his counſell, nor put ſo much confidence in the Welſhmen, nor yet ſo temerariouſlie ſet forward (without knowledge of his fréends) as he did, which things were his ſudden ouerthrowe (as they that knew it did report) [and might perhaps haue béene auoided by the biſhops wiſdome for the dukes ſaftie, as his owne, ſith

Qui ſapit, ille poteſt alios ſapuiſſe docere.]

The biſhop of Elie ſaileth into Flanders to the earle of Richmond.

When Reginald Braie had declared his meſſage and priuie inſtruction to the counteſſe of Richmond his miſtreſſe, no maruell though ſhe were ioious and glad, both of the good newes, and alſo for the obteining of ſuch a high fréend in hir ſonnes cauſe as the duke was. Wherefore ſhe willing not to ſléepe this matter, but to further it to the vttermoſt of hir power and abilitie, deuiſed a means how to breake this matter to quéene Elizabeth then being in ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter. And therevpon ſhe, hauing in hir familie at that time (for the preſeruation of hir health) a certeine Welſhman called Lewes, learned in phyſicke, which for his grauitie and experience, was well knowne, and much eſtéemed amongeſt great eſtates of the realme, brake hir mind to him.

For with this Lewes ſhe vſed ſometime liberallie and familiarlie to talke, and now hauing opportunitie and occaſion to expreſſe hir hart vnto him in this weightie matter, declared that the time was come that hir ſonne ſhould be ioined in marriage with ladie Elizabeth, daughter and heire to king Edward; and that king Richard being taken and reputed of all men for the common enimie of the relme, ſhould out of all honor & eſtate be deiected, & of his crowne and kingdome be cléerelie ſpoiled and expelled: and required him to go to quéene Elizabeth (with whome in his facultie he was of counſell) not as a meſſenger, but as one that came fréendlie to viſit and conſolate hir, and (as time & place ſhould require) to make hir priuie of this deuiſe; not as a thing concluded, but as a purpoſe by him imagined.

This phyſician did not long linger to accompliſh hir deſire, but with good diligence repaired to the quéene, being ſtill in the ſanctuarie at Weſtminſter. And when he ſaw time propice and conuenient for his purpoſe, he ſaid vnto hir: Madame, although my imagination be verie ſimple, and my deuiſe more fooliſh; yet for the entier affection that I beare toward you and your children, I am ſo bold to vtter vnto you a ſecret and priuie conceit that I haue caſt and compaſſed in my fantaſticall braine. When I well remembred and no leſſe conſidered the great loſſe and damage that you haue ſuſteined, by the death of your noble and louing huſband; and the great dolour and ſorow that you haue ſuffered and tollerated, by the cruell murther of your innocent children: I can no leſſe doo both of bounden duetie and chriſtian charitie, than dailie to ſtudie, and hourelie imagine, not onelie how to bring your hart to comfort and gladneſſe, but alſo deuiſe how to reuenge the righteous quarell of you and your children on that bloudie bloudſupper, and cruell tyrant king Richard.

Lewes the phyſician ſheweth the quéene the whole conceipt and deuiſe of the matter.

And firſt conſider, what battell, what manſlaughter, what miſchéefe hath riſen in this realme by the diſſention betwéene the two noble houſes of Yorke & Lancaſter. Which two families (as I haue contriued) if they may be ioined in one, I thinke, yea and doubt not, but your line ſhall be againe reſtored to the priſtinate eſtate and degrée; to your great ioie and comfort, and to the vtter confuſion of your mortall enimie the vſurper king. You know verie well madame, that of the houſe of Lancaſter, the earle of Richmond is next of bloud, who is liuing, and a luſtie yong batcheler, and to the houſe of Yorke your daughters now are heires. If you could agree and inuent the meane how to couple your eldeſt daughter with the yong earle of Richmond in matrimonie, no doubt but the vſurper of the realme ſhould be ſhortlie depoſed, and your heire againe to hir right reſtored.

The coniunction of the two families moued to the Q. by the phyſician.

When the queene had heard this friendlie motion (which was as farre from hir thought, as the man that the rude people ſaie is in the moone) lord how hir ſpirits reuiued, and how hir heart leapt in hir bodie for ioie and gladneſſe! And firſt giuing laud to almightie God, as the chiefe authour of hir comfort, ſecondarilie to maiſter Lewes, as the deuiſer of theſe good newes & tidings, ſhe inſtantlie beſought him, that as he had béene the firſt inuenter of ſo great an enterpriſe, ſo now he would not relinquiſh nor deſiſt to follow the ſame: requiring him further (bicauſe he was apperteining to the counteſſe of Richmond mother to the erle Henrie) that he would with all diligent celeritie reſort to hir, then lodging in hir husbands place, within the citie of London: and to declare on the quéenes behalfe to the counteſſe, that all the friends and fautors of king Edward hir husband, ſhould aſſiſt and take part with the earle of Richmond hir ſonne, ſo that he would take a corporall oth after the kingdome obteined, to eſpouſe and take to wife the ladie Elizabeth hir daughter, or elſe ladie Cicilie, if the eldeſt daughter were not then liuing.

The quéenes readineſſe to ſet forward this cõcluſion.

Maiſter Lewes with all dexteritie ſo ſped his buſineſſe, that he made and concluded a finall end and determination of this enterpriſe betwene the two mothers. And bicauſe he was a phyſician, and out of all ſuſpicion and miſdéeming, he was the common curror and dailie meſſenger betwéene them, aiding and ſetting forth the inuented conſpiracie againſt king Richard. So the ladie Margaret counteſſe of Richmond, brought into a good hope of the preferment of hir ſonne, made Reginald Braie hir moſt faithfull ſeruant, chiefe ſollicitor and priuie procuror of this conſpiracie; giuing him in charge ſecretly to inuegle and attract ſuch perſons of nobilitie to ioine with hir and take hir part, as he knew to be ingenious, faithfull, diligent, and of actiuitie. This Reginald Braie within few daies brought vnto his lure (firſt of all taking of euerie perſon a ſolemne oth to be true and ſecret) ſir Giles Daubneie, ſir Iohn Cheinie knight, Richard Gilford, and Thomas Rame eſquiers, and diuers other. The counteſſe of Richmond was not ſo diligent for hir part, but quéene Elizabeth was as vigilant on the other ſide, and made friends, and appointed councellors to ſet forward and aduance hir buſineſſe.

In the meane ſeaſon, the counteſſe of Richmond tooke into hir ſeruice Chriſtopher Vrſwike, an honeſt and wiſe prieſt, and (after an oth of him for to be ſecret taken and ſworne) ſhe vttered to him all hir mind and counſell, adhibiting to him the more confidence and truth, that he all his life had fauoured and taken part with king Henrie the ſixt, and as a ſpeciall iewell put to hir ſeruice by ſir Lewes hir phyſician. So the mother, ſtudious for the proſperitie of hir ſon, appointed this Chriſtopher Vrſwike to ſaile into Britaine to the earle of Richmond, and to declare and reueale to him all pacts and agréements betwene hir & the quéene agréed and concluded. But ſuddenlie ſhe remembring that the duke of Buckingham was one of the firſt inuentors, and a ſecret founder of this enterpriſe, determined to ſend ſome perſonage of more eſtimation than hir chapleine.

The counteſſe of Richmond vttereth the matter to Vrſwike hir chapleine, ſwearing him to be ſecret.

Herevpon ſhe elected for a meſſenger Hugh Conweie eſquier, & ſent him into Britaine with a great ſum of monie to hir ſonne, giuing him in charge, to declare to the earle the great loue and eſpeciall fauor that the moſt part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, the louing hearts & beneuolent minds which the whole communaltie of their owne frée will frankelie offered, and liberallie exhibited to him, willing and aduiſing him not to neglect ſo good an occaſion apparantlie offered; but with all ſpéed and diligence, to addict and ſettle his mind & full intention how to returne home againe into England, where he was both wiſhed and looked for: giuing him further monition and counſell, to take land and arriuall in the principalitie of Wales, where hée ſhould not doubt to find both aid, comfort and friends.

Hugh Cõweie eſquire ſent ouer to the erle of Richmond to informe him of his roiall preferment.

Richard Gilford, leaſt Hugh Conweie might fortune to be taken, or ſtopped at Plimmouth, where he intended to take his nauigation, ſent out of Kent Thomas Rame with the ſame inſtructions: and both made ſuch diligence, and had ſuch wind and weather, the one by land from Calis, and the other by water from Plimmouth, that within leſſe than an houre both arriued in the duke of Britains court, and ſpake with the earle of Richmond, which (from the death of king Edward) went at pleaſure and libertie, and to him counted and manifeſted the cauſe and effect of their meſſage and ambaſſage. When the earle had receiued this meſſage (which was the more pleaſant, bicauſe it was vnlooked for) he rendered to Ieſu his ſauiour, his moſt humble & heartie thanks, being in firme credence and beléefe, that ſuch things as hée with buſie mind and laborious intent had wiſhed & deſired, could neuer haue taken anie effect, without the helpe and preferment of almightie God.

Tho. Rame ſent ouer for the ſame purpoſe for feare of interception.

And now being put in comfort of his long longing, he did communicate & breake to the duke of Britaine all his ſecrets, and priuie meſſages, which were to him declared; aduertiſing him that he was entered into a ſure and ſtedfaſt hope, to obteine and get the crowne and kingdome of the realme of England, deſiring him both of his good will and friendlie helpe toward the atchiuing of his offered enterpriſe, promiſing him when he came to his intended purpoſe, to render to him againe equall kindnes, and condigne recompenſe. Although the duke of Britaine before that daie, by Thomas Hutton ambaſſadour from king Richard, had both by monie and praiers béene ſollicited and moued to put againe into ſafe cuſtodie the earle of Richmond, he neuertheleſſe promiſed faithfullie to aid him; and his promiſe hée trulie performed.

The earle of Richmond maketh the duke of Britaine priuie to the matter.

Wherevpon the earle with all diligence ſent into England againe Hugh Conweie, and Thomas Rame, which ſhould declare his comming ſhortlie into England: to the intent that all things, which by counſell might be for his purpoſe prouided, ſhould be ſpéedilie and diligentlie doone; and that all things doubtfull, ſhould of his friends be prudentlie foreſéene, in auoiding all engines or ſnares which king Richard had or might ſet in diſturbance of his purpoſe: and he in the meane ſeaſon would make his abode ſtill in Britaine, till all things neceſſarie for his iournie were prepared, and brought in a readineſſe. In the meane ſeaſon, the chiefteins of the coniuration in England began togither manie enterpriſes: ſome in conuenient fortreſſes put ſtrong garriſons, ſome kept armed men priuilie, to the intent that when they ſhould haue knowledge of the earles landing, they would begin to ſtir vp the war: other did ſecretlie moue and ſolicit the people to riſe & make an inſurrection: other (amongſt whom Iohn Morton biſhop of Elie then being in Flanders was chiefe) by priuie letters and cloked meſſengers did ſtir and moue to this new coniuration, all ſuch which they certeinlie knew to haue a rooted hatred, or to beare cankered malice toward king Richard and his proceedings.

Hugh Cõweie and Thomas Rame returne into England and deliuer their anſwer.

Preparation to bring in, receiue, & erect the earle to the kingdome.

Although this great enterpriſe were neuer ſo priuilie handled, and ſo ſecretlie amongſt ſo circumſpect perſons treated, compaſſed and conueied; yet knowledge therof came to the eares of king Richard, who with the ſudden chance was not a little mooued and aſtonied. Firſt, bicauſe he had no hoſt readie prepared; ſecondlie, if he ſhould raiſe an armie ſo ſuddenlie, he knew not where to méet his enimies, or whither to go, or where to tarrie. Wherefore he determined to diſſemble the matter, as though he knew nothing, till he had aſſembled his hoſt; and in the meane ſeaſon either by the rumour of the common people, or by the diligence of his eſpials to ſearch out all the counſels, determinations, intents, and compaſſes of his cloſe aduerſaries; or elſe by policie to intercept and take ſome perſon of the ſame coniuration, conſidering that there is no more ſecret nor hid eſpiall, than that which lurketh in diſſimulation of knowledge and intelligence, or is hidden in name and ſhadow of counterfeit humanitie and feined kindneſſe. But yet wiſedome hath a deuiſe to auoid & ſhift off all ſuch deceiuers, as the poet well ſaieth:

K. Richards purpoſe in the caſe of coniuration againſt him.

Diſsimulatores vitat prudentia vafros.

The duke of Buckingham conſpireth againſt king Richard.

And bicauſe he knew the duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aid of the coniuration, hée thought it moſt neceſſarie to plucke him from that part, either by faire promiſes or open warre. Whereupon he addreſſed his louing letters to the duke, full of gentle words, & moſt friendlie ſpeach; giuing further in charge to the meſſenger that caried the letter to promiſe the duke (in his behalfe) golden hilles, and ſiluer riuers, and with all gentle and pleaſant means to perſuade and exhort the duke to come to the court. But the duke as wilie as the king, miſtruſting the faire flattering words, and the gaie promiſes to him ſo ſuddenlie without any cauſe offered, knowing the craftie caſts of king Richards bow, which in diuerſe affaires before time he had ſéene practiſed, required the king to pardon him, excuſing himſelfe that he was ſo diſeaſed in his ſtomach, that ſcant he could either take refection or reſt.

King Richard not being content with this excuſe, would in no wiſe admit the ſame; but incontinent directed to the duke other letters, of a more rougher and hautier ſort, not without tawnting and biting tearmes, and checking words, commanding him (all excuſes ſet apart) to repaire without anie delaie to his roiall preſence. The duke made to the meſſeng a determinate anſwer, that he would not come to his mortall enimie, whome he neither loued, nor fauoured: and immediatlie prepared open warre againſt him, and perſuaded all his complices and partakers, that euerie man in his quarter, with all diligence ſhould raiſe vp people & make a commotion. And by this means almoſt in one moment Thomas marques Dorſet came out of ſanctuarie, where ſince the begining of K. Richards daies he had continued, whoſe life by the onelie helpe of ſir Thomas Louell was preſerued from all danger & perill in this troublous world, gathered togither a great band of men in Yorkeſhire.

The duke of Buckingham a profeſſed enimie to king Richard.

Sir Edward Courtneie, and Peter his brother biſhop of Exceſter, raiſed an other amie in Deuonſhire and Cornewall. In Kent Richard Gilford and other gentlemen collected a great companie of ſouldiers, and openlie began warre. But king Richard, who in the meane time had gotten togither a great ſtrength and puiſſance, thinking it not moſt for his part beneficiall, to diſperſe and diuide his great armie into ſmall branches, and particularlie to perſecute anie one of the coniuration by himſelfe, determined (all other things being ſet aſide) with his whole puiſſance to ſet on the chiefe head, which was the duke of Buckingham. And ſo remoouing from London, he tooke his iournie toward Saliſburie, to the intent that in his iournie he might ſet on the dukes armie, if he might know him in anie place incamped, or in order of battell arraied.

K. Richards fault in the diſpoſing of his armie.

The king was ſcarſe two daies iournie from Saliſburie, when the duke of Buckingham accompanied with a great power of wild Welſhmen, whom he (being a man of great courage and ſharpe ſpéech) in maner againſt their willes had rather thereto inforced and compelled by lordlie and ſtreict commandement, than by liberall wages and gentle demenour, which thing was the verie occaſion why they left him deſolate, & cowardlie forſooke him. The duke with all his power marched through the foreſt of Deane, intending to haue paſſed the riuer Seuerne at Glouceſter, & there to haue ioined his armie with the Courtneis, and other weſterne men of his confederacie and affinitie. Which if he had doone, no doubt but king Richard had béene in great ieopardie, either of priuation of his realme, or loſſe of his life, or both.

The duke of Buckinghãs power of wild Welſhmen (falſeharted) doo faile him.

But ſée the chance. Before he could atteine to Seuerne ſide, by force of continuall raine and moiſture, the riuer roſe ſo high that it ouerflowed all the countrie adioining, inſomuch that men were drowned in their beds, and houſes with the extreame violence were ouerturned, children were caried about the fields ſwimming in cradels, beaſts were drowned on hilles. Which rage of water laſted continuallie ten daies, inſomuch that in the countrie adioining they call it to this daie, The great water; or, the duke of Buckinghams great water. By this floud the paſſages were ſo cloſed, that neither the duke could come ouer Seuern to his adherents, nor they to him. During the which time, the Welſhmen lingring idelie, and without monie, vittels, or wages, ſuddenlie ſcattered and departed: and for all the dukes faire promiſes, threatnings, and inforcements, would in no wiſe either go further nor abide.

A ſore floud or high water dooing much harme, called the duke of Buckinghãs great water.

The duke (being thus left almoſt poſt alone) was of neceſſitie compelled to flie, and in flight was with this ſudden fortune maruellouſlie diſmaid: and being vnpurueied what counſell he ſhould take, and what waie he ſhould follow, like a man in deſpaire, not knowing what to doo, of verie truſt & confidence conueied himſelfe into the houſe of Humfreie Banaſter his ſeruant beſide Shrewesburie, whome he had tenderlie brought vp, and whome he aboue all men loued, fauoured, and truſted; now not doubting but that in his extreame neceſſitie he ſhould find him faithfull, ſecret, and truſtie, intending there couertlie to lurke, till either he might raiſe againe a new armie, or elſe ſhortlie to ſaile into Britaine to the earle of Richmond. [But alas (good duke) the meanes (by occaſion of Gods prouidence, ſhaking men out of their ſhifts of ſuppoſed ſafetie) failed him, and he fell infortunatlie into the hands of the foming bore, that tare him in péeces with his tuſkes.]

Now when it was knowne to his adherents, which were redie to giue battell, that his hoſt was ſcatred, and had left him almoſt alone, and was fled, & could not be found; they were ſuddenlie amazed & ſtriken with a ſudden feare, that euery man like perſons deſperate ſhifted for himſelfe & fled. Some went to ſanctuarie, and to ſolitarie places; ſome fled by ſea, whereof the moſt part within a few daies after arriued ſafelie in the duchie of Britaine. Among which number were theſe perſons; Peter Courtneie biſhop of Exceſter, and ſir Edmund Courtneie his brother, by king Henrie the ſeuenth after created earle of Deuonſhire; Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet, John lord

The dukes adherents & their powers diſperſed.

Welles, ſir John Bourchier, ſir Edward Wooduile, a valiant man in armes, brother to quéene Elizabeth, ſir Robert Willoughbie, ſir Giles Daubneie, ſir Thomas Arundell, ſir John Cheinie and his two brethren, ſir William Barkelie, ſir William Brandon, & Thomas his brother, ſir Richard Edgecombe: all theſe for the moſt part being knights, John Halowell, and Edward Poinings, a politike capteine.

At this verie ſeaſon, John Morton biſhop of Elie, and Chriſtopher Urſwike prieſt, and an other companie of noble men ſoiourned in Flanders; and by letters and meſſengers procured manie enimies againſt king Richard, which vſing a vigilant eie, and a quicke remembrance, being newlie come to Saliſburie, hauing perfect notice and knowledge how the duke was fled, and how his complices intended to paſſe out of the realme; firſt he ſent men of warre to all the next ports and paſſages, to kéepe ſtreictlie the ſea coaſt, ſo that no perſon ſhould paſſe outward, nor take land within the realme without their aſſent and knowledge; ſecondarilie he made proclamation, that what perſon could ſhew and reueale where the duke of Buckingham was, ſhould be highlie rewarded; if he were a bondman, he ſhould be infranchiſed and ſet at libertie; if he were of frée bloud, he ſhould haue a generall pardon, and be rewarded with a thouſand pounds.

A proclamation for the apprehenſion of the duke of Buckinghã with large rewards to the apprehendor.

Furthermore, bicauſe he vnderſtood by Thomas Hutton, which (as you haue heard) was newlie returned out of Britaine, that Francis duke of Britaine not onelie refuſed to kéepe the earle of Richmond as a priſoner, at his contemplation, and for his ſake; but alſo that he was readie to aid and ſuccour the ſaid earle, with men, monie, and all things neceſſarie for his tranſporting into England: he therefore rigged and ſent out ſhips of warre, well furniſhed and decked with men and artillerie, to ſcowre and kéepe that part of the ſea that lieth ouer againſt Britaine, to the intent that if the earle of Richmond would aduenture to ſaile toward England, either he ſhould be taken captiue, or be beaten and driuen from the coaſt of England. And moreouer, to the intent that euerie coaſt, waie, paſſage, and corner, ſhould be diligentlie watched & kept, he ſet at euerie doubtfull and ſuſpected place men of warre, to ſéeke, ſearch, and inquire, if anie creature could tell tidings of the duke of Buckingham; or of anie or his confederation, adherents, fautors or partakers.

K. Richard ſendeth forth a nauie to ſcowre the ſea ouer againſt Britaine.

While this buſie ſearch was diligentlie applied and put in execution, Humfreie Banaſter (were it more for feare of life and loſſe of goods, or allured & prouoked by the auaricious deſire of the thouſand pounds) he bewraied his gueſt and maiſter to John Mitton then ſhiriffe of Shropſhire; which ſuddenlie with a ſtrong power of men in harneſſe apprehended the duke in a little groue adioining to the manſion of Humfreie Banaſter, and in great haſt and euill ſpéed conueied him apparelled in a pilled blacke cloake to the towne of Shrewſburie, where king Richard then kept his houſhold. Whether this Banaſter bewraied the duke more for feare than couetous, manie men doo doubt: but ſure it is, that ſhortlie after he had betraied the duke his maſter; his ſonne and heire waxed mad, & ſo died in a bores ſtie; his eldeſt daughter of excellent beautie, was ſuddenlie ſtriken with a foule leproſie; his ſecond ſonne maruellouſlie deformed of his lims, and made lame; his yoonger ſonne in a ſmall puddle was ſtrangled and drowned; and he being of extreame age, arreigned, and found guiltie of a murther, and by his cleargie ſaued. And as for his thouſand pounds, K. Richard gaue him not one farthing, ſaieng that he which would be vntrue to ſo good a maiſter, would be falſe to all other: howbeit ſome ſaie that he had a ſmall office or a farme to ſtop his mouth withall.

Humfrie Banaſter ſeruant vnto the duke of Buckingham betraied his maiſter.

Gods ſecret iudgements vpon Banaſter and his children after the duke was apprehended.

The duke being by certeine of the kings councell diligentlie vpon interrogatories examined, what things he knew preiudiciall vnto the kings perſon, opened and declared franklie and fréelie all the coniuration, without diſſembling or gloſing; truſting, bicauſe he had trulie and plainelie reuealed and confeſſed all things that were of him required, that he ſhould haue licence to ſpeake to the king: which (whether it were to ſue for pardon and grace, or whether he being brought to his preſence, would haue ſticked him with a dagger as men then iudged) he ſore deſired and required. But when he had confeſſed the whole fact & conſpiracie, vpon All ſoules daie, without arreignment or iudgement, he was at Saliſburie in the open market place, on a new ſcaffold beheaded and put to death.

The duke of Buckingham beheaded without arreignment or iudgement.

This death (as a reward) the duke of Buckingham receiued at the hands of king Richard, whom he before in his affaires, purpoſes and enterpriſes had holpen, ſuſteined, and ſet forward, aboue all Gods forbode. By this all men may eaſilie perceiue, that he not onelie loſeth both his labour, trauell, and induſtrie (and further ſtaineth and ſpotteth his line with a perpetuall ignominie and reproch) which in euill and miſchiefe aſſiſteth and aideth an euill diſpoſed perſon, conſidering for the moſt part, that he for his fréendlie fauour ſhould receiue ſome great diſpleaſure or importunate chance. Beſide that, God of his iuſtice in concluſion appointed to him a condigne paine and affliction for his merits and deſerts. [Auailable therefore, and for his beſt aduantage had it béene, to haue followed the wiſe counſell of him, that willed him, and ſuch as he, to kéepe them from the man that hath power to ſlaie; ſo ſhalt thou doubt (ſaith he) the feare of death. And if thou come vnto him make no fault, leaſt he take awaie thy life: remember that thou goeſt in the middeſt of ſnares, & that thou walkeſt vpon the towers of the citie. Which aduiſe a learned man, in good place, and neceſſarie ſeruice about the prince, neatlie compriſed in theſe few verſes:

Vtere principibus modicè, nimis eſſe propinquus
Si cupis, in vitæ multa pericla rues.
Si tua te fortuna facit ſeruire potenti,
Diſpice ne titubes, atque repentè cadas,
Sollicitè vigiles, laquei ſunt vndique fuſi,
Turribus in ſummis es ſitus, ergo caue.]

Gu. Ha.

The earle of Richmonds preparation of ſhips and ſouldiers to the ſea.

While theſe things were thus handled and ordered in England, Henrie earle of Richmond prepared an armie of fiue thouſand manlie Britons, and fortie well furniſhed ſhips. When all things were prepared in a readineſſe, and the daie of departing and ſetting forward was appointed, which was the twelfe daie of the moneth of October, the whole armie went on ſhipbord, and halſed vp their ſailes, and with a proſperous wind tooke the ſea. But toward night the wind changed, and the weather turned, and ſo huge and terrible a tempeſt ſo ſuddenlie aroſe, that with the verie power and ſtrength of the ſtorme, the ſhips were diſparkled, ſeuered & ſeparated aſunder: ſome by force were driuen into Normandie, ſome were compelled to returne againe into Britaine. The ſhip wherein the earle of Richmond was, aſſociat onelie with one other barke, was all night toſſed and turmoiled.

His ſhips diſparkled by tempeſt.

In the morning after, when the rage of the furious tempeſt was aſſwaged, and the ire of bluſtering wind was ſome deale appeaſed; about the houre of noone the ſame daie, the earle approched to the ſouth part of the realme of England, euen at the mouth of the hauen of Pole, in the countie of Dorſet, where he might plainelie perceiue all the ſea bankes & ſhores garniſhed and furniſhed with men of warre and ſouldiers, appointed and deputed there to defend his arriuall and landing (as before is mentioned.) Wherefore he gaue ſtreict charge, and ſore commandement,

He ſéeth all the ſea bankes furniſhed with ſouldiers.

that

He ſendeth to know whether they were with him or againſt him.

that no perſon ſhould once preſume to take land, and go to ſhore, vntill ſuch time as the whole nauie were aſſembled and come togither. And while he taried and lingered, he ſent out a ſhipboate toward the land ſide, to know whether they, which ſtood there in ſuch a number, and ſo well furniſhed in apparell defenſiue, were his foes and enimies, or elſe his fréends and comfortors.

A forged tale to intrap the earles meſſengers.

They that were ſent to inquire, were inſtantlie deſired of the men of warre keeping the coaſt (which thereof were before inſtructed ⁊ admoniſhed) to deſcend and take land, affirming that they were appointed by the duke of Buckingham there to await and tarie for the arriuall and landing of the earle of Richmond, and to conduct him ſafelie into the campe, where the duke not far of laie incamped with a mightie armie, and an hoſt of great ſtrength and power, to the intent that the duke and the earle, ioining in puiſſances and forces togither, might proſecute and chaſe king Richard being deſtitute of men, and in maner deſperate, and ſo by that meanes, and their owne labours, to obteine the end of their enterpriſe which they had before begun.

The earle of Richmond ſuſpecting their flattering requeſt to be but a fraud (as it was in déed) after he perceiued none of his ſhips to appeare in ſight, he weied vp his anchors, halſed vp his ſailes, ⁊ hauing a proſperous and ſtreinable wind, and a freſh gale ſent euen by God to deliuer him from that perill and ieopardie, arriued ſafe and in all ſecuritie in the duchie of Normandie, where he (to refreſh and ſolace his ſoldiers and people) tooke his recreation by the ſpace of thrée daies, and cléerelie determined with part of his companie to paſſe all by land againe into Britaine. And in the meane ſeaſon he ſent ambaſſadors to the French king, called Charles the eight, which newlie ſuccéeded his father king Lewes the eleuenth, not long before departed to God, requiring of him a ſafe conduct and licence to paſſe thorough his countrie of Normandie into Britaine.

The earle arriueth in Normandie ⁊ paſſeth by land into Britaine againe.

Charles the 8. of France his beneuolence to the earle of Richmond.

This yoong king, hauing compaſſion of the miſfortune of the earle of Richmond, not onelie gentlie granted and aſſigned to him a paſport; but alſo liberallie diſburſed to him a great ſumme of monie for his conduct and expenſes neceſſarie in his long iournie and paſſage. But the earle truſting in the French kings humanitie, aduentured to ſend his ſhips home into Britaine, and to ſet forward himſelfe by land on his iournie, making no great haſt till his meſſengers were returned. Which being with that benefit ſo comforted, and with hope of proſperous ſucceſſe ſo incouraged, marched towards Britaine with all diligence, intending there to conſult further with his louers ⁊ fréends of his affaires and enterpriſes. When he was returned againe into Britaine, he was certified by credible information, that the duke of Buckingham had loſt his head; and that the marqueſſe Dorſet, and a great number of noble men of England, had a little before inquired and ſearched for him there, and were now returned to Vannes.

The earle lamenteth and reioiſeth.

When he had heard theſe newes thus reported, he firſt ſorowed and lamented his firſt attempt and ſetting forward of his fréends, and in eſpeciall of the nobilitie, not to haue more fortunatelie ſuccéeded. Secondarilie, he reioiſed on the other part, that God had ſent him ſo manie valiant and prudent capteins to be his companions in his martiall enterpriſes, truſting ſuerlie and nothing doubting in his owne opinion, but that all his buſineſſe ſhould be wiſelie compaſſed, and brought to a good concluſion. Wherefore he determining with all diligence to ſet forward his new begun buſineſſe, departed to Rheims, and ſent certeine of his priuie ſeruitours to conduct and bring the marqueſſe and other noble men to his preſence. When they knew that he was ſafelie returned into Britaine, Lord how they reioiſed! for before that time they miſſed him, and knew not in what part of the world to make inquirie or ſearch for him. For they doubted and no leſſe feared leaſt he had taken land in England, ⁊ fallen into the hands of king Richard, in whoſe perſon they knew well was neither mercie nor compaſſion.

Wherefore in all ſpéedie maner they galoped toward him, and him reuerentlie ſaluted. Which méeting after great ioy and ſolace, and no ſmall thanks giuen and rendered on both parts, they aduiſedlie debated and commined of their great buſineſſe and weightie enterpriſe. In the which ſeaſon the feaſt of the Natiuitie of our ſauiour Chriſt happened, on which daie all the Engliſh lords went with their ſolemnitie to the chéefe church of the citie, and there ech gaue faith and promiſe to other. The earle himſelfe firſt tooke a corporall oth on his honor, promiſing that incontinent after he ſhuld be poſſeſſed of the crowne and dignitie of the realme of England, he would be conioined in matrimonie with the ladie Elizabeth daughter to king Edward the fourth. Then all the companie ſware to him fealtie, and did to him homage (as though he had béene that time the crowned king, and annointed prince) promiſing faithfullie, and firmelie affirming, that they would not onelie looſe their worldlie ſubſtance; but alſo be depriued of their liues and worldlie felicitie, rather than to ſuffer king Richard that tyrant longer to rule and reigne ouer them.

The Engliſh lords giue faith and promiſe either to other.

The earle of Richmond ſweareth to marrie Elizabeth daughter to Edward the fourth, after poſſeſſion of the crowne.

Which ſolemne oths made and taken, the earle of Richmond declared and communicated all theſe doings to Francis duke of Britaine, deſiring ⁊ moſt heartilie requiring him to aid him with a greater armie to conduct him into his countrie, which ſo ſore longed and looked for his returne, and to the which he was by the more part of the nobilitie and communaltie called and deſired. Which (with Gods aid, and the dukes comfort) he doubted not in ſhort time to obteine; requiring him further to preſt to him a conuenient ſumme of monie; affirming that all ſuch ſummes of monie which he had receiued of his eſpeciall fréends, were ſpent and conſumed in preparation of his laſt iourneie made toward England; which ſummes of monie, after his enterpriſe once atchiued, he in the word of a prince faithfullie promiſed to repaie and reſtore againe. The duke promiſed him aid and helpe. Vpon confidence whereof he rigged his ſhips, and ſet forth a nauie well decked with ordinance, and warlikelie furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, to the intent to ſaile forward ſhortlie, and to looſe no time.

Diuerſe of the earle of Richmonds faction apprehended and executed.

In the meane ſeaſon king Richard apprehended in diuerſe parts of the realme certeine gentlemen of the earle of Richmonds faction, ⁊ confederation, which either intended to ſaile into Britaine toward him, or elſe at his landing to aſſiſt and aid him. Amongſt whome ſir George Browne, ſir Roger Clifford, and foure other were put to execution at London, and ſir Thomas Sentleger which had married the ducheſſe of Exceſter the kings owne ſiſter, and Thomas Rame, and diuerſe other were executed at Exceſter. Beſide theſe perſons, diuerſe of his houſhold ſeruants, whome either he ſuſpected or doubted, were by great crueltie put to ſhamefull death. [By the obſeruation of which mens names, the place, and the action here mentioned, with the computation of time, I find fit occaſion to interlace a note (newlie receiued from the hands of one that is able to ſaie much by record) deliuering a ſummarie (in more ample ſort) of their names, whome king Richard did ſo tyrannicallie perſecute and execute: as followeth.]

Abr.Flem.

King Richard (ſaith he) came this yeare to the citie, John Hooker, alias Vowel.

K. Richard commeth to Excester, and is receiued with preſents.

A propheſie, the memorie whereof did appall the kings ſpirits.

tie, but in verie ſecret maner, whome the maior & his brethren in the beſt maner they could did receiue, and then preſented to him in a purſe two hundred nobles; which he thankefullie accepted. And during his abode here he went about the citie, & viewed the ſeat of the ſame, & at length he came to the caſtell: and when he vnderſtood that it was called Rugemont, ſuddenlie he fell into a dumpe, and (as one aſtonied) ſaid; Well, I ſée my daies be not long. He ſpake this of a propheſie told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he ſhould not long liue after; which fell out in the end to be true, not in reſpect of this caſtle, but in reſpect of Henrie earle of Richmond, who the next yeare following met him at Boſworth field where he was ſlaine. But at his being here, he did find the gentlemen of this countrie not to be beſt affected towards him, and after his departure, did alſo heare that the marqueſſe of Dorſet, the biſhop of Excester, and ſundrie other gentlemen were in a confederacie againſt him for the aſſiſting of the erle of Richmond.

Lord Scrope by the kings commiſſion kept a ſeſſion againſt diuerſe indicted of high treſon.

More than fiue hundred indicted, whereof ſome eſcaped, and ſome were executed.

Wherefore he ſent downe John lord Scrope with a commiſſion to kéepe a ſeſſion; who ſat at Torrington, & then & there were indicted of high treaſon, Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet, Peter biſhop of Excester, Thomas Sentleger, and Thomas Fulford knights as principals, and Robert Willoughbie and Thomas Arundell knights, John Arundell deane of Excester, Dauid Hopton archdeacon of Excester, Oliuer abbat of Buckland, Bartholomew Sentleger, William Chilſon, Thomas Gréenefield, Richard Edgecombe, Robert Burnbie, Walter Courtneie, Thomas Browne, Edward Courtneie, Hugh Lutterell, John Crocker, John Hallewell, and fiue hundred others were indicted as acceſſaries. All which fled and ſhifted for themſelues, ſome into Britaine, and ſome elſe where; ſauing ſir Thomas Sentleger, and one ſir John Rame; who were brought to Excester, and there at the Carefox were beheaded.]

The earle of Richmōd atteinted in parlement, and all other that fled ouer ſea to take his part.

After this, king Richard called a parlement, in the which he atteinted the earle of Richmond and all other perſons which were fled out of the realme for feare, or anie other cauſe, as enimies to him, and to their naturall countrie; & all their lands, goods, & poſſeſſions, were confiſcate and ſeized to the kings vſe. And yet not content with this preie, which no doubt was of no ſmall valour and moment, he laid on the peoples necks a great tax and tallage, and ſuerlie neceſſitie to that act in maner him compelled. For what with purging and declaring his innocencie concerning the murther of his nephues toward the world, and what with coſt to obteine the loue and fauour of the communaltie (which outwardlie gloſed, and openlie diſſembled with him) he gaue prodigallie ſo manie and ſo great rewards, that now both he lacked, and ſcarſe wiſt honeſtlie how to borow.

Anno Reg. 2.

King Richard chargeth the lord Stanleie to kéepe his wife in ſome ſecret place from dealing againſt him.

In this troublous ſeaſon, nothing was more maruelled at, than that the lord Stanleie had not béene taken, and reputed as an enimie to the king; conſidering the working of the ladie Margaret his wife, mother to the earle of Richmond. But forſomuch as the enterpriſe of a woman was of him reputed of no regard or eſtimation; and that the lord Thomas hir husband had purged himſelfe ſufficientlie to be innocent of all doings and attempts by hir perpetrated and committed: it was giuen him in charge to kéepe hir in ſome ſecret place at home, without hauing anie ſeruant or companie: ſo that from thenſe forth ſhe ſhould neuer ſend letter or meſſenger vnto hir ſonne, nor anie of his fréends or confederats, by the which the king might be moleſted or troubled, or anie hurt or preiudice might be attempted againſt his realme and communaltie. Which commandement was a while put in execution and accompliſhed, according to his dreadfull commandement.

Yet the wild worme of vengeance wauering in his head, could not be content with the death of diuerſe gentlemen ſuſpected of treaſon; but alſo he muſt extend his bloudie furie againſt a poore gentleman called Collingborne, for making a ſmall rime of thrée of his vnfortunate councellors, which were the lord Louell, ſir Richard Ratcliffe his miſcheeuous minion, and ſir William Cateſbie his ſecret ſeducer, which méeter or rime was thus framed:

The Cat, the Rat, and Louell our dog,
Rule all England vnder an hog.

Collingborne executed.

Meaning by the hog, the dreadfull wild boare, which was the kings cogniſance. But bicauſe the firſt line ended in dog, the metrician could not (obſeruing the regiments of méeter) end the ſecond verſe in boare, but called the boare an hog. This poeticall ſchoolemaiſter, corrector of bréefs and longs, cauſed Collingborne to be abbreuiated ſhorter by the head, and to be diuided into foure quarters.

Collingbornes indictement.

Collingborne a fauourer of the earle of Richmond.

Here is to be noted, that beſide the rime which is reported by ſome to be the onelie cauſe for which this gentleman ſuffered, I find in a regiſter booke of indictements concerning fellonies and treaſons by ſundrie perſons committed, that the ſaid Collingborne (by the name of William Collingborne) late of Lidyard in the countie of Wilſhire eſquier, and other his aſſociats were indicted in London: for that they about the tenth daie of Julie, in this ſecond yeare of king Richards reigne, in the pariſh of ſaint Botulphes in Portſoken ward had ſolicited and requeſted one Thomas Yate, offering to him for his paines eight pounds, to go ouer into Britaine vnto Henrie erle of Richmond, Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet, John Cheineie eſquier, and others, which in the laſt parlement holden at Weſtminſter had béene atteinted of ſundrie high treaſons by them practiſed within the kings dominion.

Collingbornes purpoſe to aid the erle at his arriuall at Pole in Dorſetſhire.

Beſides this, to declare vnto them that they ſhould do verie well, to returne into England with all ſuch power as they might get before the feaſt of S. Luke the euangeliſt next inſuing; for ſo they might receiue all the whole reuenues of the realme due at the feaſt of ſaint Michaell next before the ſaid feaſt of ſaint Luke. And that if the ſaid earle of Richmond and his partakers, following the counſell of the ſaid Collingborne, would arriue at the hauen of Pole in Dorſetſhire, he the ſaid Collingborne and other his aſſociats would cauſe the people to riſe in armes, and to leuie warre againſt king Richard, taking part with the ſaid earle and his fréends; ſo that all things ſhould be at their commandements. Moreouer, to moue the ſaid earle to ſend the ſaid John Cheineie vnto the French king, to aduertiſe him that his ambaſſadors ſent into England ſhould be dallied with, onelie to driue off the time till the winter ſeaſon were paſt, and that then in the beginning of ſummer king Richard meant to make warre into France, inuading that realme with all puiſſance: and ſo by this meanes to perſuade the French king to aid the earle of Richmond and his partakers, in their quarell againſt king Richard.

Collingborne indicted to be a libeller againſt king Richard.

Further, that the ſaid William Collingborne, being confederate with the ſaid earle and other his adherents, as well within the realme as without, the eightéenth day of Julie, in the ſaid ſecond yeare, within the pariſh of ſaint Gregories in Faringdon ward within, had deuiſed certeine bils and writings in rime, to the end that the ſame being publiſhed, might ſtir the people to a commotion againſt the king. And thoſe bils and writings in rime ſo deuiſed and written, the ſame Collingborne the daie and yeare laſt mentioned, had faſtened and ſet vpon diuerſe doores of the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule, for the more ſpéedie furthering of his intended purpoſe. Thus farre the indictement. But whether he was giltie in part or in all, I haue not to ſaie.

King Richard being thus diſquieted in mind, and doubtfull for the ſuertie of his owne eſtate, called to remembrance that confederations, honeſt bands and pacts of amitie, concluded and had betwixt princes and gouernours, are the efficient cauſe that realmes and common wealths are ſtrengthened with double power, that is, with aid of fréends abroad, and their owne forces at home. Wherevpon he deuiſed how to conclude a league and amitie with his neighbour the king of Scots: who not long before had made diuerſe incurſions and roads into the realme of England. And although he had not much gotten; yet verelie he loſt not much. And now euen as king Richard could haue wiſhed, he of himſelfe made ſute for peace or truce to be had betwixt him and king Richard; who willinglie giuing eare to that ſute, commiſſioners were appointed to méete about the treatie thereof, as in the hiſtorie of Scotland it maie appeare.

Sée Scotland pag. 284,285.

A truce betwixt England ⁊ Scotland with a treatie of aliance.

At length they agréed vpon a truce for thrée yéeres, and withall for a further increaſe of firme fréendſhip and ſure amitie (betwixt him and the king of Scots) king Richard entered into a treatie alſo of aliance for the concluding of a marriage betwixt the duke of Rothſaie (eldeſt ſonne to the king of Scots) and the ladie Anne de la Poole daughter to John duke of Suffolke and the ducheſſe Anne, ſiſter to king Richard: which ſiſter he ſo much fauoured, that ſtudieng by all waies and meanes poſſible how to aduance hir linage, he did not onelie thus ſéeke to preferre hir daughter in marriage; but alſo after the death of his ſonne, he proclamed John earle of Lincolne hir ſonne and his nephue, heire apparant to the crowne of England, diſheriting king Edwards daughters, whoſe brethren (as ye haue heard) he moſt wickedlie had cauſed to be murthered and made awaie.

John earle of Lincolne proclamed heire apparant to the crowne.

The king of Scots ſtanding in néed of fréends, although not ſo greatlie as king Richard, did willinglie conſent to that motion of marriage, firſt broched by king Richard, inſomuch that it tooke effect, and by commiſſioners was paſſed and concluded, in maner as in the hiſtorie of Scotland it likewiſe appeareth. But albeit that by this league and amitie thus couenanted and concluded, it might be thought, that all conſpiracies, coniurations, and confederacies againſt king Richard had béene extinct, eſpeciallie conſidering the duke of Buckingham and his alies were diſpatched out of the waie, ſome by death, and ſome by flight and baniſhment into farre countries: yet king Richard, more doubting than truſting to his owne people and fréends, was continuallie vexed and troubled in mind for feare of the earle of Richmonds returne: which dailie dread and hourelie agonie cauſed him to liue in dolefull miſerie, euer vnquiet, and in maner in continuall calamitie.

A marriage concluded betwixt the prince of Rothſaie ⁊ the duke of Suffolkes daughter.

Wherefore he intending to be reléeued, and to haue an end of all his doubtfull dangers, determined cléerelie to extirpate and plucke vp by the roots all the matter and ground of his feare and doubts. Inſomuch that (after long and deliberate conſultation had) nothing was for his purpoſe and intent thought either more neceſſarie or expedient than once againe with price, praier, and rewards, to attempt the duke of Britaine, in whoſe territorie the earle of Richmond then abode, to deliuer the ſaid earle into his hands: by which onelie meanes he ſhould be diſcharged of all feare and perill, and brought to reſt and quietneſſe both of bodie and mind. Wherefore incontinent he ſent certeine ambaſſadors to the duke of Britaine, which tooke vpon them (beſide the great and ample rewards that they brought with them into Britaine) that king Richard ſhould yearelie paie and anſwer the duke of all the reuenues, rents, and profits of the ſeigniories, lands, and poſſeſſions, as well belonging and apperteining to the erle of Richmond, as to anie other noble or gentleman, which then were in the earles companie; if he after that time would kéepe them in continuall priſon, and reſtraine them from libertie.

King Richard attempteth the duke of Britaine to deliuer the earle of Richmond into his hands.

A great temptation with large offers.

The ambaſſadors (furniſhed with theſe and other inſtructions) arriued in Britaine, and came to the dukes houſe; where with him they could haue no maner of communication concerning their weightie affaires: by reaſon that he being faint and weakened by a long and dailie infirmitie, began a little to wax idle and weake in his wit and remembrance. For which cauſe Peter Landoiſe his chéefe treaſuror, a man both of pregnant wit and great authoritie, ruled and adiudged all things at his pleaſure and commandement, for which cauſe (as men ſet in authoritie be not beſt beloued) he excited ⁊ prouoked againſt him the malice and euill will of the nobilitie of Britaine, which afterward (for diuerſe great offenſes by him during his authoritie perpetrate ⁊ committed) by their meanes was brought to death ⁊ confuſion.

The Engliſh ambaſſadors mooued their meſſage and requeſt to Peter Landoiſe, and to him declared their maiſters commandement, inſtantlie requiring and humblie deſiring him (in whoſe power it laie to doo all things in Britaine) that he would fréendlie aſſent to the requeſt of king Richard: offering to him the ſame rewards and lands, that they ſhould haue offered to the duke. This Peter (which was no leſſe diſdeined than hated almoſt of all the people of Britaine) thought that if he did aſſent ⁊ ſatiſfie king Richards petition and deſire, he ſhould be of power and abilitie ſufficient to withſtand and refell the malicious attempts and diſdeinfull inuentions of his enuious aduerſaries. Wherefore he faithfullie promiſed to accompliſh king Richards requeſt ⁊ deſire: ſo that he kept promiſe with him, that he might be able to withſtand the cankered malice of his ſecret enimies.

Peter Landoiſe is mooued by the ambaſſadors of king Richard in their ſute.

Note what loue of lucre or gréedie gaping after rewards dooth.

This act that he promiſed to doo, was not for anie grudge or malice that he bare vnto the erle of Richmond: for (as you haue heard before) he deliuered him from the perill of death at ſaint Malos, when he was in great doubt of life, and ieopardie. But as cauſe ariſeth we euer offend, and that curſſed hunger of gold, and execrable thirſt of lucre, and inward feare of loſſe of authoritie, driueth the blind minds of couetous men, ⁊ ambitious perſons to euils and miſchéefs innumerable, not remembring loſſe of good name, obloquie of the people, nor in concluſion the puniſhment of God for their merits and deſerts. [Which vengeance of God for ſuch falſhood was more to be feared, than the gaie offers of the king to be deſired; for the one was ſure to fall, the other was likelie to faile. Wherefore it is wiſedome to make choiſe of a fréend, by the rule of the wiſeman to be obſerued in wine, which is drunke with pleaſure when it is old. Neither dooth it ſtand with a mans ſafetie to truſt a fréend too farre: for occaſions maie fall out wherby he ſhall become an enimie, as the poet ſaith:

Hoſtis erit forſan qui tuus hoſpes erat.]

Abr. Fl.

But fortune was ſo fauourable to the publike wealth of the realme of England, that this deadlie and dolorous compact tooke none effect or place. For while poſts ran, and letters were ſent to and fro for the finiſhing of this great enterpriſe betwéene king Richard and Peter Landoiſe, John Morton biſhop of Elie (ſoiourning then in Flanders) was of all this craftie conueiance certified by his ſecret and ſure fréends. Wherefore he ſent Chriſtopher Urſwike (which at that verie ſeaſon was come out of Britaine into Flanders) to declare to the earle of Richmond how all the deceit and craftie working was conueied and compaſſed, giuing him charge to counſell and aduiſe the earle in all haſt poſſible with all his companie to retire out of Britaine into France.

When theſe newes were brought to the earle, he then kept houſe in Vannes, and incontinent diſpatched againe Chriſtopher Vrſwike vnto Charles the French king, requiring him that he and his might ſafelie paſſe into France. Which deſire being obteined, the meſſenger ſhortlie returned to his lord and prince. The earle, well perceiuing that it was expedient and neceſſarie, with all ſpéed and diligence to looke to this weightie matter, calling verie few to counſell, he made inquirie and ſearch of all ſecret & by-waies, & ſent before all his noble men, as though for a certeine familiaritie and kindneſſe they ſhould viſit and comfort the duke, which then (for recreation and change of aire) laie on the borders and confines of France. And ſecretlie he gaue charge to the earle of Penbroke, which was the leader and conductor of his companie, that when they approched the marches and limits of Britaine, they ſhould diuert and take the next waie into France.

The earle of Penbroke cõductor of the earle of Richmonds companie.

The noble men ſomewhat ſuſpicious of things newlie imagined without any tarieng, ſcowring the waies as faſt as their horſſes could runne, came out of the duchie of Britaine into the duchie of Aniou in the dominion of France, where they taried the erles comming, which two daies after departed out of Vannes, onelie accompanied with fiue ſeruitors, as though he had gone ſecretlie to viſit a familiar friend of his, in a ſmall village adioining. No man ſuſpected that he would depart, conſidering that a great multitude of Engliſhmen were left and continued in the citie. But after that he had paſſed directlie fiue miles forward, he ſuddenlie turned into a ſolitarie wood next adioining, where clothing himſelfe in the ſimple coat of his poore ſeruant, made and appointed his ſaid miniſter leader and maiſter of his ſmall companie, & he as an humble page diligentlie followed and ſerued his counterfeit gouernor, neither reſting nor refreſhing themſelues, except the baiting of their horſſes, till they by waies vnknowne, now this way, now turning that way, came to their companie abiding them in Angiers.

The earles ſmall traine for a policie.

The earle apparelled like a page attẽdeth vpõ one of his men as his maiſter.

The fourth day after the earle of Richmond was thus departed, that craftie merchant Peter Landoiſe, thirſting ſtill after his preie promiſed by king Richard, was readie to ſet forward his crew of ſouldiers, which he priuilie had conſigned, with certeine truſtie capteins for that onelie purpoſe appointed and elected, to performe and atchiue his pretended enterpriſe; diſſembling and feining them to be conducted and hired by him to ſerue the earle of Richmond, and him to conduct in his returne toward his natiue countrie: meaning no other thing but to apprehend him, and the other noble men in his retinue, which no ſuch fraud ſuſpected, nor yet anie treaſon imagined, vnware and vnprouided, and deſtitute of all aid, and them to caſt and commit ſuddenlie into continuall captiuitie and bondage, to the intent that by this his wretched and naughtie act, he might ſatiſfie the charitable requeſt and louing deſire of good king Richard, more for his owne profit than king Richards gaine.

Peter Landoiſe his expectation diſappointed by the priuie and vnknowne departing of the earle.

But when this craftie diſſembler Peter Landoiſe, which was no wilier than an old fox, perceiued that the earle was departed (thinking that to be true that he imagined) Lord how currors ran into euerie coaſt! how light horſſemen galloped in euerie ſtréet to follow and deteine him, if by anie poſſibilitie hée could be met with and ouertaken, and him to apprehend and bring captiue into the citie of Vannes. The horſſemen made ſuch diligence, and with ſuch celeritie ſet forward their iournie, that nothing was more likelie than they to haue obteined, yea and ſeized their preie. For the earle of Richmond was not entered into the realme of France ſcarſe one houre, but the followers came to the limits and confines of Britaine, and durſt aduenture no further, but vainlie (without their deſire) ſorowfullie returned.

At which ſeaſon were left at Vannes about the number of thrée hundred Engliſhmen, which not being called to counſell, and vnware of this enterpriſe, but knowing of the earles ſudden departure, were ſo incontinentlie aſtonied, that in maner they were all in deſpaire, both of him, and their owne ſuertie and ſafegard. But fortune turned hir ſaile, and otherwiſe it happened than their feare them incumbered. For the duke of Britaine, now being ſomewhat recouered, was ſore diſpleaſed, and nothing contented, that the earle of Richmond was in his dominion ſo vncourteouſlie vſed and intreated, that he ſhould be by fraud and vntruth compelled to leaue and flie out of his duchie and countrie, contrarie to his honour. Wherfore he tooke verie great diſpleaſure with Peter Landoiſe his treaſuror, to whome (although he knew not, and was ignorant that all the drift was driuen and deuiſed by him) he laid the fault, and imputed the crime.

The duke of Britains to the earle of Richmond, & the care of his ſafetie.

Herevpon he ſent for Edward Wooduile, and Edward Poinings, valiant eſquiers of England, and deliuered vnto them monie ſufficient for their conduct, willing them to conueie the reſt of the Engliſhmen being in Britaine, to the erle of Richmonds preſence. When the earle was thus furniſhed, and appointed with his truſtie companie, and was eſcaped all the dangers, labirinths, and ſnares that were ſet for him: no maruell though he were iocund and glad of the proſperous ſucceſſe that happened in his affaires. Wherefore, leaſt he ſhould ſéeme to be blotted with the note of ingratitude, he ſent diuerſe of his gentlemen to the duke of Britaine, the which ſhould publiſh and declare to him on the behalfe of the earle, that he and his were onelie by his benefit and fauour conſerued and deliuered from the imminent danger that they were like to be trapped in. Wherefore at that time he rendered vnto him his moſt hartie thanks in words, truſting and not doubting, but in time to come liberallie to recompenſe him with acts and déeds.

Edw. Wooduile & Edward Poinings receiue monie of the duke to the earles conduct and his companie.

After this, the earle tooke his iournie to Charles the French king, lieng then at Langes vpon the riuer of Loire, to whome (after great thanks giuen for manifold pleaſures by him to the earle ſhewed) hée diſcloſed and manifeſted the cauſe and occaſion of his acceſſe and repaire to his perſon. After that, hée required of him helpe and ſuccour, to the intent that by his immortall benefit to him at that time ſhewed, hée might ſafelie returne vnto the nobilitie of his realme; of whome he was generallie called to take vpon him the crown & ſcepter of the realme, ſith they much hated and abhorred the tyrannie of king Richard. King Charles promiſed him aid and comfort, and bade him be of good courage, and make good cheare; for he aſſured him that he would gladlie ſhew to him his beneuolent mind and bountifull liberalitie. Which king from thence remoued to Mountargis, leading with him the earle of Richmond, and all the noble perſonages of his retinue and faction.

The earle of Richmond goeth to the French king, and telleth him the cauſe of his comming.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. page 13.

¶ This is that Charles the French K. in whoſe time France was all aflant, for the ſtate of that realme is ſaid, that then it was verie populous in multitudes of men, for wealth and riches euerie particular region moſt fertile and plentifull, for glorie in armes moſt floriſhing & a renowmed, policie well directed, diſcipline adminiſtred, an authoritie dreadfull, and in opinion and hope moſt mightie; laſtlie their generall conditions and faculties ſo well furniſhed, as perhaps it was not more happie in theſe mortall felicities ſince the daies of Charlemaine. It was newlie amplified in euerie one of the thrée parts wherein all Gall ſtood diuided by the ancients: for fortie yéers before vnder Charles the ſeuenth (a prince for his victories obteined with great dangers called Happie) Normandie and the duchie of Guien, holden by the Engliſhmen, were reduced to the obedience of the French crowne. And in the laſt daies of Lewes the eleuenth, the earldome of Prouince, the dukedome of Burgognie, almoſt all Picardie, togither with the duchie of Britaine, were by a new mariage inueſted in the power of Charles the eight.]

Sir John Vere earle of Oxford getteth out of priſon, & he with others go to the earle of Richmond.

While the earle was thus attendant in the French court, John Vere earle of Oxford, which (as you haue heard before) was by king Edward kept in priſon within the caſtell of Hammes, ſo perſuaded James Blunt capteine of the ſame fortreſſe, and ſir John Forteſcue porter of the towne of Calis, that he himſelfe was not onelie diſmiſſed and ſet at libertie; but they alſo abandoning and leauing their fruitfull offices, did condeſcend to go with him into France to the earle of Richmond, and to take his part. But James Blunt, like a wiſe capteine, bicauſe he left his wife remaining in the caſtell before his departure, did fortifie the ſame both with new munitions, and freſh ſouldiers. [And here bicauſe the names of Vere and Forteſcue are remembred, it ſhall not be amiſſe, ſomewhat out of due place, yet better a little out of order than altogither to omit the ſame, to adde a ſupplement for the further perfecting of a report recorded in page 693, and adding ſome light alſo to this preſent place touching the ſaid perſons, with others.]

Abr. Fl. ex I.S. pag. 733.

¶Know you therefore, that this ſir John Vere earle of Oxford (that withdrew himſelfe from Barnet field, and with all ſpéed fled into Scotland) in the yere 1473, and the thirtéenth of Edward the fourth, did (after he had ſometime ſoiourned there) ſaile into France, about the borders whereof he was continuallie houering, as hoping to win ſome preie (to ſupport his eſtate) of ſuch paſſengers as for merchandize cauſe or otherwiſe muſt kéepe their courſe a long the ſea. Whoſe good ſucceſſe therein did not deceiue his mind. For in the end (what of one and other) hée got ſuch riches and other furniture, as he was able to ſupport a choſen number of followers. Wherwith he (being reléeued and incouraged to aduenture to ſet foot in his countrie in deſpite of king Edward) did with his companie of 397 perſons, and with his ſaile of ſhips land in the weſt countrie the laſt of ſeptember, where (partlie by force of his, and partlie through feare of the inhabitants, but moſtlie by a ſubtill ſhift) he gat and entered the caſtell of ſaint Michaels mount, a place of ſtrength, and ſuch an harborough, as he determined to kéepe the ſame againſt all aſſailants. During the time of his remaine there, he would with his companie manie times deſcend the hill, and come abrode in the countrie, where (for his loue, for his honour, and for the hatred they bare to king Edward) he was well interteined of manie gentlemen and others of the countrie.

The earle of Oxford leuieth a power and commeth into England.

But this matter vnpoſſible long to be kept in ſecret, was at the length brought to the knowledge of king Edward; who being ſomewhat moued, thought in the beginning to withſtand ſuch miſchéefe, leaſt ſuffering too long, & the earle growing to ſtrength, he might be put to as great plunge for the crowne as he had bene twiſe before: wherwith ſéeing he was poſſeſſed, he grew reſolute to kéepe it both by policie and puiſſance, maugre the open violence and priuie practiſes as well of his profeſſed as ſecret enimies. For he ran through the pikes yer he could obteine it, and offered his bodie to manie deſperate perils in hope to get it: which if he had either feared or ſhunned, it is a matter of demand whether he had euer had it. For pretious things, as principalities and ſuch like, vnleſſe they be hereditarie, as they are hardlie kept, ſo are they not eaſilie gotten: for he that deſireth to gather a roſe, muſt not be tender ouer his fingers bicauſe of thornes; and he that would taſt honie freſh out of the hiue, muſt not be ſcared with the ſtinging of bées, as the poet verie ſwéetlie noteth:

Non quiſquam fruitur veris odoribus,
Hyblæos latebris nec ſpoliat fauos,
Si fronti caueat ſi timeat rubos,
Armat ſpina roſas, mella tegunt apes.

Shiriffe Bodringham beſiegeth the mount that the earle had taken.

Wherefore king Edward gaue in charge to Bodringham, ruler or ſhiriffe of Cornewall, to aſſemble ſuch power as he could; and beſieging the mount, he ſhould either take or kill the earle of Oxford. The which the ſhiriffe did accordinglie, but that ſo feintlie and fauourablie, as he permitted the earle of Oxford (now in diſtreſſe) to reuittell the mount, knowing that there was no waie to expell the earle from thence but by famine. Theſe things thus doone (the king not pleaſed, and the earle not diſpleaſed) one Forteſcue (which ſurname is deduced from the ſtrength of his ſhield, whereof that familie had firſt originall) was with a ſtronger and faithfuller companie ſent by king Edward to laie ſiege to the caſtell; which he did, and long continued. For it was not eaſie to be had, being (of it ſelfe) by nature ſtronglie ſet, by policie well vittelled, and by manhood valiantlie defended: which moued the king to aſſay an other means therefore, and to ſée if policie might doo that which force could not.

The name of Forteſcue wherevpon it grew.

For which cauſe, as Forteſcue ſtill continued the ſaid ſiege, the K. ſuppoſed it beſt (if poſſiblie he might) to weaken the earles part, by withdrawing the ſtrength and hearts of his people from him: which might not be doone but with rich promiſes and ſtrong pardons. On which conſideration he ſent liberallie pardons to them, and in the end ſo ſecretlie wrought with the earles men: that if the earle (fearing the worſt, and iudging it better to trie the kings mercie, than to hazard the extreamitie of taking, in which reſted nothing but aſſured death) had not wholie ſubmitted himſelfe to king Edward, he had béene by his owne men moſt diſhoneſtlie betraied, and ſuddenlie taken priſoner. Wherevpon the earle comming forth to Forteſcue, did there yéeld himſelfe and the caſtell into the kings hands. At what time (being the fiftéenth of Februarie, which from the firſt entrance of the earle into that caſtell being the laſt of ſeptember, was about foure moneths and fouretéene daies) the ſame Forteſcue entred the mount, & tooke poſſeſſion thereof, finding it yet ſufficientlie vittelled to haue ſuſteined an other ſiege more than one halfe yeare. After all things were thus quieted, the earle, the lord Beaumont, two brothers of the ſaid earle, and Thomas Clifford, were brought vp as priſoners vnto king Edward. And now to our preſent hiſtorie againe.]

Deuiſes to withdraw the earles power from him.

The earle of Oxford ſubmitteth himſelfe & yéeldeth the caſtell into the kings hands.

When the earle of Richmond ſaw the earle of Orenford, he was rauiſhed with an incredible gladneſſe, that he being a man of ſo high nobilitie, of ſuch knowledge and practiſes in feates of warre, and ſo conſtant, truſtie and aſſured (which alwaie had ſtudied for the maintenance and preferment of the houſe of Lancaſter) was now by Gods prouiſion deliuered out of captiuitie and impriſonment; and in time ſo neceſſarie and conuenient come to his aid, ſuccour, and aduancement; in whome more ſurer than anie other he might put his truſt and confidence, and take leſſe paine and trauell in his owne perſon. For it was not hid from him, that ſuch as euer had taken part with king Edward before this time, came to doo him ſeruice, either for malice they bare king Richard, or elſe for feare to liue vnder his cruell rule and tyrannous gouernance.

Not long after, the French king returned againe to Paris, whome the earle of Richmond followed, intending there to ſolicit his matter to the concluſion. Wherevpon he beſought king Charles to take vpon him the whole tuition and defenſe of him and his cauſe, ſo that he and his companie being (by his means) aided and comforted, ſhould confeſſe and ſaie, their wealth, victorie, and aduancement to haue flowed and budded forth of his bountifulneſſe and liberalitie, which they would (God willing) ſhortlie acquite. In the meane ſeaſon, diuerſe Engliſhmen, which either fled out of England for feare, or were at Paris to learne and ſtudie good literature and vertuous doctrine, came voluntarilie and ſubmitted themſelues to the earle of Richmond, and vowed & ſware to take his part. Amongſt whom was Richard Fox a prieſt, a man of great wit and no leſſe learning, whome the earle incontinent receiued into ſecret familiaritie, and in breefe time erected and aduanced him to high dignities and promotions, and in concluſion made him biſhop of Wincheſter.

Diuers Engliſh doo voluntarilie ſubmit themſelues to the earle of Richmond in France.

In the meane ſeaſon, king Richard was credible aduertiſed, what promiſes and oths the earle and his confederates had made and ſworne togither at Reimes, and how by the earles means all the Engliſhmen were paſſed out of Britaine into France. Wherefore being ſore diſmaid, and in a maner deſperate, bicauſe his craftie chieuance tooke none effect in Britaine, he imagined & deuiſed how to infringe and diſturbe the earles purpoſe by an other meane; ſo that by the marriage of ladie Elizabeth his neece, he ſhould pretend no claime nor title to the crowne. For he thought if that marriage failed, the earles cheefe combe had beene clearlie cut. And bicauſe that he being blinded with the ambitious deſire of rule before this time in obteining the kingdome, had committed and doone manie curſſed acts, and deteſtable tyranies, yet according to the old prouerbe; Let him take the bull that ſtale awaie the calfe: he thought all facts by him committed in times paſſed to be but of ſmall moment, and not to be regarded in compariſon of that miſcheeuous imagination, which he now newlie began and attempted.

K. Richards deuiſe to infringe and defeat the earle of Richmōds purpoſe.

There came into his vngratious mind a thing not onelie deteſtable to be ſpoken of in the remembrance of man, but much more cruell and abhominable to be put in execution. For when he reuolued in his wauering mind, how great a founteine of miſcheefe toward him ſhould ſpring, if the earle of Richmond ſhould be aduanced to the marriage of his neece: which thing he heard ſaie by the rumor of the people, that no ſmall number of wiſe and wittie perſonages enterpriſed to compaſſe and bring to concluſion; he cleerelie determined to reconcile to his fauour his brothers wife queene Elizabeth, either by faire words, or liberall promiſes; firmelie beleeuing hir fauour once obteined, that ſhe would not ſticke to commit (and louinglie credit) to him the rule and gouernance both of hir and hir daughters, and ſo by that meanes the earle of Richmond of the affinitie of his neece ſhould be vtterlie defrauded and beguiled.

A ſubtill and lewd practiſe of king Richard to beguile the earle of Richmond.

And if no ingenious remedie could be otherwiſe inuented, to ſaue the innumerable miſcheefes which were euen at hand, and like to fall, if it ſhould happen queene Anne his wife to depart out of this preſent life, then he himſelfe would rather take to wife his couſine and neece the ladie Elizabeth; than for lacke of that affinitie the whole realme ſhould run to ruine, as who ſaid, that if he once fell from his eſtate and dignitie, the ruine of the relme muſt needs ſhortlie inſue and follow. Wherefore he ſent to the queene (being in ſanctuarie) diuerſe and often meſſengers, which firſt ſhould excuſe and purge him of all things before againſt hir attempted or procured, and after ſhould ſo largelie promiſe promotions innumerable, and benefits, not onelie to hir, but alſo to hir ſonne lord Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, that they ſhould bring hir (if it were poſſible) into ſome wanhope, or (as men ſaie) into a fooles paradiſe.

The meſſengers, being men both of wit and grauitie, ſo perſuaded the queene with great and pregnant reaſons, & what with faire and large promiſes, that ſhe began ſomewhat to relent, and to giue to them no deafe eare; inſomuch that ſhe faithfullie promiſed to ſubmit and yeeld hir ſelfe fullie and frankelie to the kings will and pleaſure. And ſo ſhe putting in obliuion the murther of hir innocent children, the infamie and diſhonour ſpoken by the king hir huſband, the liuing in adulterie laid to hir charge, the baſtarding of hir daughters; forgetting alſo the faithfull promiſe and open oth made to the counteſſe of Richmond mother to the earle Henrie, blinded by auaricious affection, & ſeduced by flattering words, firſt deliuered into king Richards hands hir fiue daughters, as lambs once againe committed to the cuſtodie of the rauenous woolfe.

The inconſtancie of Q. Elizabeth.

After ſhe ſent letters to the marqueſſe hir ſonne, being then at Paris with the earle of Richmond, willing him in anie wiſe to leaue the earle, and without delaie to repaire into England, where for him were prouided great honours, and honourable promotions; aſcerteining him further, that all offenſes on both parts were forgotten and forgiuen, and both he and ſhe highlie incorporated in the kings heart. Suerlie the inconſtancie of this woman were much to be maruelled at, if all women had beene found conſtant; but let men ſpeake, yet women of the verie bond of nature will follow their owne ſex. [But it was no ſmall allurement that king Richard vſed to ouercome hir (for we know by experience that women are of a proud diſpoſition, and that the waie to win them is by promiſes of preferment) and therefore it is the leſſe maruell that he by his wilie wit had made conqueſt of hir wauering will. Beſides that, it is to be preſumed that ſhe ſtood in feare to impugne his demands by denials, leaſt he in his malicious mood might take occaſion to deale roughlie with hir, being a weake woman, and of a timorous ſpirit.]

Queene Elizabeth allureth hir ſonne the marqueſſe Dorſet home out of France.

Now when king Richard had thus with glorious promiſes, and flattering words, pleaſed and appeaſed the mutable mind of queene Elizabeth, which knew nothing leſſe than that he moſt intended; he cauſed all his brothers daughters to be conueied into his palace with ſolemne receiuing: as though with his new familiar and louing interteinment they ſhould forget, and in their minds blot out the old committed iniurie, and late executed tyrannie. Now nothing was contrarie and againſt his diuelliſh purpoſe, but that his manſion was not void of his wife, which thing he in any wiſe adiudged neceſſarie to be doone. But there was one thing that ſo much feared and ſtaied him from committing this abhominable murther, bicauſe (as you haue heard before) he began to counterfet the image of a good and well diſpoſed perſon: and therefore he was afeard leaſt the ſudden death of his wife once openlie knowne, he ſhould looſe the good and credible opinion which the people had of him, without anie deſert, conceiued and reported.

But in concluſion, euill counſell preuailed in a wit latelie minded to miſcheefe, and turned from all goodneſſe. So that his vngratious deſire ouercame his honeſt feare. And firſt to enter into the gates of his imagined enterpriſe, he abſteined both from the bed and companie of his wife. Then he complained to diuerſe noble men of the realme, of the infortunate ſterilitie and barenneſſe of his wife, bicauſe ſhe brought forth no fruit and generation of hir bodie. And in eſpeciall he recounted to Thomas Rotheram archbiſhop of Yorke (whome latelie he had deliuered out of ward and captiuitie) theſe impediments of his queene, and diuerſe other, thinking that he would reueale to hir all theſe things, truſting the ſequele hereof to take due effect, that ſhe hearing this grudge of hir huſband, & taking therefore an inward thought, would not long liue in this world.

A forged cōplaint of king Richard againſt his wife to be rid of hir.

Of this the biſhop gathered (which well knew the complexion and vſage of the king) that the queenes daies were ſhort, and that he declared to certeine of his ſecret freends. After this he procured a common rumor (but he would not haue the author knowne) to be publiſhed and ſpred abroad among the common people, that the queene was dead; to the intent that ſhe taking ſome conceit of this ſtrange fame, ſhould fall into ſome ſudden ſickneſſe or greeuous maladie: and to proue if afterwards ſhe ſhould fortune by that or anie other waies to leaſe hir life, whether the people would impute hir death to the thought or ſickneſſe, or thereof would laie the blame to him. Now when the queene heard tell that ſo horrible a rumor of hir death was ſprung amongſt the communaltie, ſhe ſore ſuſpected and iudged the world to be almoſt at an end with hir. And in that ſorowfull agonie ſhe with lamentable countenance and ſorowfull cheare, repaired to the preſence of the king hir huſband, demanding of him what it ſhould meane, that he had iudged hir worthie to die.

A rumor ſpred abroad of the queenes death at the procurement of king Richard.

The king anſwered hir with faire words, and with ſmiling and flattering leaſings comforted hir, and bid hir be of good cheere, for (to his knowledge) ſhe ſhould haue no other cauſe. But howſoeuer that it fortuned, either by inward thought and penſiueneſſe of hart, or by infection of poiſon (which is affirmed to be moſt likelie) within few daies after the queene departed out of this tranſitorie life, and was with due ſolemnitie buried in the church of S. Peter at Weſtminſter. This is the ſame Anne, one of the daughters of the earle of Warwike, which (as you haue heard before) at the requeſt of Lewes the French king was maried to prince Edward, ſonne to king Henrie the ſixt. The king thus (according to his long deſire) loſed out of the bonds of matrimonie, began to caſt a fooliſh fantaſie to ladie Elizabeth his neece, making much ſute to haue hir ioined with him in lawfull matrimonie.

The queene wife to king Richard the third ſuddenlie dead.

K. Richard caſteth his loue on his neece purpoſing to marie hir.

But bicauſe all men and the maiden hirſelfe moſt of all deteſted and abhorred this vnlawfull, and in maner vnnaturall copulation; he determined to prolong and defer the matter, till he were in a more quietneſſe. For all that verie ſeaſon he was oppreſſed with great, weightie, and vrgent cauſes, and buſineſſes on euerie ſide; conſidering that dailie, part of the nobilitie failed into France to the earle of Richmond: other priuilie fauoured and aided certeine of the coniuration, ſo that of his ſhort end few or none were in doubt. And the common people (for the moſt part) were brought to ſuch deſperation, that manie of them had rather be reputed and taken of him in the number of his enimies, than to abide the chance and hazard to haue their goods taken as a ſpoile of victorie, by his enimies. [In ſuch hatred they had the wretch, wiſhing his hart in their hands with the hazard of their heads. For how can people ſaie well or thinke well of tyrants, whoſe propertie it is to teare them in peeces with their clawes, like a woolfe let looſe among a fold of ſheepe? Whereto Homer had an eie when he ſaid in pithie ſenſe as here followeth:

Quiſquis inhumanis ſtudet inteſtabilis vti
Moribus, huic omnes viuo clàm dira precantur:
Huic omnes credunt fas inſultare perempto.]

Hom. Odyſſ. lib. 19.

Amongſt the noble men whome he moſt miſtruſted, theſe were the principall. Thomas lord Stanleie, ſir William Stanleie his brother, Gilbert Talbot, and ſix hundred other: of whoſe purpoſes although king Richard were not ignorant, yet he gaue neither confidence nor credence to anie one of them; and leaſt of all to the lord Stanleie, bicauſe he was ioined in matrimonie with the ladie Margaret, mother to the earle of Richmond, as afterward apparantlie yee may perceiue. For when the ſaid lord Stanleie would haue departed into his countrie to viſit his familie, and to recreate and refreſh his ſpirits (as he openlie ſaid, but the truth was, to the intent to be in a perfect readineſſe to receiue the earle of Richmond at his firſt arriuall in England) the king in no wiſe would ſuffer him to depart, before he had left as an hoſtage in the court George Stanleie lord Strange, his firſt begotten ſonne and heire.

What noble men K. Richard moſt miſtruſted.

Anno Reg. 3.

While king Richard was thus troubled and vexed with imaginations of the troublous time that was like to come: lo, euen ſuddenlie he heard newes, that fire was ſprung out of the ſmoke, and the war freſhlie begun; and that the caſtell of Hammes was deliuered into the hands of the earle of Richmond, by the meanes of the earle of Oxford; and that not onlie he, but alſo James Blunt capteine of the caſtell, were fled into France to aid the earle Henrie. Wherefore he, thinking it great policie to withſtand the firſt brunt, ſent the moſt part of the garriſon of Calis, to recouer againe by force the caſtell of Hammes. They which were in the caſtell, perceiuing their aduerſaries to approch, prepared munitions and engines for their defenſe, and ſent alſo to the earle of Richmond, to aduertiſe him of their ſudden inuaſion, requiring him of haſtie aid and ſpeedie ſuccour.

The caſtell of Hammes deliuered vnto the earle of Richmond.

The earle ſleeping not this firſt begun aſſault, ſent the earle of Oxford with an elected companie of ſouldiers to raiſe the ſiege, and reſcue the caſtell: which at their firſt arriuing pitched their campe not far from their enimies. Now while king Richards men gaue vigilant eie, waiting leaſt the earle of Oxford ſhould take anie aduantage of them that laie on that ſide of the caſtell; Thomas Brandon with thirtie approued men of war by a mariſh, which laie on the other ſide, entered into the caſtell. The ſouldiers within greatlie incouraged, & much comforted by this new ſuccour and aid, grieued the enimies, by ſhooting from the walles more than they were accuſtomed to doo. Then they of the caſtell vexed their enimies on the fore part: and the earle of Oxford no leſſe moleſted & vnquieted them on the other part. Which was the occaſion that king Richards men offered (of their owne meere motion) licence to all being within the caſtell to depart in ſafetie, with bag and baggage, nothing excepted.

Thomas Brandon entereth the caſtell.

Why king Richard gaue licence to all in the caſtell to depart in ſafetie with bag and baggage.

Which condition the earle of Oxford, comming onelie for that purpoſe to deliuer his louing freends out of all perill and danger, and chieflie of all, his old hoſteſſe Jane Blunt, wife to James Blunt the capteine, would in no wiſe forſake or refuſe: and ſo leauing the caſtell bare and vngarniſhed both of vittels and artillerie, came ſafelie to the earle of Richmond ſoiourning in Paris. During this time, king Richard was credible informed of his inquiſitors and eſpials, that the earle of Richmond was with long ſute in the court of France ſore wearied; and deſiring great aid, could obteine ſmall reliefe: in ſomuch that all things went ſo farre backwards, that ſuch things as were with great diligence (and no leſſe deliberation) purpoſed and determined to be ſet forward, were now daſhed and ouerthrowne to the ground.

K. Richard calleth home his ſhips of warre from the narrow ſeas.

King Richard either being too light of credence, or ſeduced and deluded by his craftie taletellers, greatlie reioiſed, as though he had obteined the ouer hand of his enimies with triumphant victorie, and thought himſelfe neuer ſo ſuerlie deliuered of all feare and dreadfull imaginations: ſo that he néeded now no more once for that cauſe either to wake, or to breake his golden ſléepe. Wherefore he called home againe his ſhips of warre, which he had appointed to kéepe the narrow ſeas, and diſpatched all ſuch ſouldiers as he had deputed to kéepe certeine garriſons, and to ſtop certeine paſſages (as you haue heard before.) Yet leaſt he might for lacke of prouiſion be ſuddenlie trapped, he ſtreightlie charged and gaue in commandement to all noblemen, and eſpeciallie ſuch as inhabited néere the ſea coaſt, and on the frontiers of Wales, that (according to the vſage of the countrie) they ſhould kéepe diligent watch and ſtrong ward, to the intent that his aduerſaries in no wiſe ſhould haue anie place opportune eaſilie to take land, without defenſe or rebutting backe.

The vſe of beacons in countries néere the ſea coaſts.

For the cuſtome of the countries adioining néere to the ſea is (eſpeciallie in the time of warre) on euerie hill or high place to erect a beacon with a great lanterne in the top, which may be ſéene and diſcerned a great ſpace off. And when the noiſe is once bruted that the enimies approch néere the land, they ſuddenlie put fire in the lanternes, and make ſhouts and outcries from towne to towne, and from village to village. Some run in poſt from place to place, admoniſhing the people to be readie to reſiſt the ieopardie, and defend the perill. And by this policie the fame is ſoone blowne to euerie citie and towne, in ſomuch that aſwell the citizens as the rurall people be in ſhort ſpace aſſembled and armed, to repell and put backe the new arriued enimies. [Whereas if the neceſſarie vſe of this viſible warning were neglected, the policie of the enimie might priuilie ſo preuaile, as that the people ſhould ſooner fall into perill irrecouerable, than they could thinke on (much leſſe prouide) meanes to auoid it.]

But now to returne to our purpoſe. King Richard thus ſomewhat eaſed of his accuſtomed penſiueneſſe, began to be a little more merrie, & tooke leſſe thought and care for outward enimies than he was woont to doo; as who ſay, that he with politike prouiſion ſhould withſtand the deſtinie which hoong ouer his head, and was ordeined in briefe time ſuddenlie to fall. Such is the force and puiſſance of diuine iuſtice, that euerie man ſhall leſſe regard, leſſe prouide, leſſe be in doubt of all things, when he is moſt néereſt puniſhment, and next to his miſchance for his offenſes & crimes. [For though God did forbeare him a while, yet was that forbearance no acquittance, but rather a time of preparing & making vp that which wanted of the plagues that God had purpoſed in iuſtice to powre vpon and ouerwhelme him for his fowle offenſes, which could not ſcape heauie iudgment & vengeance:

Nam ſcelus admiſſum pœna ſeuera premit.]

Diſſention among the péeres of France made the earle of Richmond renew his ſute and put him to his ſhifts.

About this ſeaſon, while the earle of Richmond was deſiring aid of the French king, certeine noble men were appointed to rule the realme of France, during the minoritie of king Charles, which amongſt themſelues were not of one opinion. Of which diſſention, Lewes duke of Orleance was the chiefe ſtirrer, who bicauſe he had maried ladie Ioane ſiſter to the French king, tooke vpon him aboue other the rule and adminiſtration of the whole realme. By reaſon of which controuerſie, no one man was ſuffered to rule all. Wherefore the earle of Richmond was compelled to make ſute to euerie one of the councell ſeuerallie one after another, requiring and deſiring them of aid and reliefe in his weightie buſineſſe, and ſo his cauſe was prolonged and deferred. During which time, Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet, which was (as you haue heard) intiſed by his mother to returne againe into England, partlie deſpairing in the good ſucceſſe of the earle of Richmond, and partlie ouercome and vanquiſhed with the faire gloſing promiſes of king Richard: ſecretlie in the night ſeaſon ſtale out of Paris, and with all diligent expedition tooke his iournie toward Flanders.

The marques Dorſet forſaketh the earle.

When relation of his departure was made to the earle of Richmond, and the other noble men, no maruell though they were aſtonied and greatlie amazed. Yet that notwithſtanding, they required of the French king, that it might be lawfull for them in his name, and by his commandement, to take and ſtaie their companion, confederate, and partaker of all their counſell, in what place within his realme and territorie ſo euer they could find him. Which petition once obteined, they ſent out currors into euerie part, amongſt whom Humfreie Cheinie (plaieng the part of a good bloudhound) followed the tract of the fleer ſo euen by the ſent, that he ouertooke and apprehended him not far from Campeigne; and ſo what with reaſon, and what with faire promiſes, being perſuaded, he returned againe to his companions.

The earle of Richmond vnburdened of this miſaduenture, leaſt by lingering of daies, and prolonging of time, he might looſe the great opportunitie of things to him offered and miniſtred: alſo leaſt he ſhould further wound and moleſt the minds of his faithfull and aſſured fréends, which dailie did expect and tarie for his comming, determined no longer to protract and deferre the time; but with all diligence and celeritie attempted his begun enterpriſe. And ſo obteining of king Charles a ſmall crew of men, and borrowing certeine ſummes of monie of him, and of diuerſe other his priuate fréends, for the which he left as debter (or more likelie as a pledge or hoſtage) lord Thomas marqueſſe Dorſet (whome he halfe miſtruſted) and ſir Iohn Bourchier, he departed from the French court, and came to the citie of Rone.

The earle of Richmond hath men and monie of the French king for hoſtages.

While he taried there, making prouiſion at Harfléet in the mouth of the riuer of Sene for all things neceſſarie for his nauie, tidings were brought to him that king Richard (being without children, & now a widower) intended ſhortlie to marie the ladie Elizabeth his brothers daughter; and to prefer the ladie Cicilie hir ſiſter to a man found in a cloud, and of an vnknowne linage and familie. He tooke theſe newes as a matter of no ſmall moment; and ſo (all things conſidered) it was of no leſſe importance than he tooke it for. For this thing onelie tooke awaie from him and all his companions their hope and courage, that they had to obteine an happie enterpriſe. And therefore no maruell though it nipped him at the verie ſtomach: when he thought, that by no poſſibilitie he might atteine the mariage of any of K. Edwards daughters, which was the ſtrongeſt foundation of his building; by reaſon whereof he iudged that all his fréends in England would abandon and ſhrinke from him.

The earle is gréeued at the newes of king Richards intended mariage with his néece.

Wherefore, making not manie of his counſell, after diuerſe conſultations, he determined not yet to ſet forward: but to tarie and attempt how to get more aid, more fréends, and more ſtronger ſuccours. And amongſt all other, it was thought moſt expedient to allure by affinitie in his aid, as a companion in armes, ſir Walter Herbert, a man of an ancient ſtocke, & of great power among the Welſh, who had with him a faire ladie to his ſiſter, of age ripe to be coupled with him in matrimonie. And for the atchiuing of this purpoſe, meſſengers were ſecretlie ſent to Henrie earle of Northumberland (which had before maried another ſiſter of ſir Walter Herberts) to the intent that he ſhould ſet forward all this deuiſe and purpoſe: but the waies were ſo narowlie watched, and ſo manie ſpies laid, that the meſſenger procéeded not in his iournie and buſineſſe.

But in the meane ſeaſon, there came to the earle a more ioifull meſſage from Morgan Kidwellie, learned in the temporall law, which declared that Rice ap Thomas, a man of no leſſe valiantneſſe than actiuitie, and Iohn Sauage an approoued capteine, would with all their power be partaker of his quarell. And that Reginald Breie had collected and gotten togither no ſmall ſumme of monie for the paiment of the wages to the ſouldiers and men of warre: admoniſhing him alſo to make quicke expedition, and to take his courſe directlie into Wales. The earle of Richmond, bicauſe he would no longer linger and wearie his fréends, liuing continuallie betwéene hope and feare, determined in all conuenient haſt to ſet forward, and caried to his ſhips armor, weapons, vittels, and all other ordinances expedient for warre.

The welſhmen offer to aid the earle of Richmond.

After that all things were in readineſſe, the earle being accompanied onelie with two thouſand men, and a ſmall number of ſhips, weied vp his anchors, and halſed vp his ſailes in the moneth of Auguſt, and ſailed from Harfléet with ſo proſperous a wind, that the ſeuenth daie after his departure, he arriued in Wales in the euening, at a place called Milford hauen, and incontinent tooke land, and came to a place called Dalle; where he heard ſaie that a certeine companie of his aduerſaries were laid in gariſon to defend his arriuall all the laſt winter. And the earle at the ſunne riſing remooued to Hereford weſt, being diſtant from Dalle not full ten miles, where he was ioifullie receiued of the people, and he arriued there ſo ſuddenlie, that he was come and entered the towne at the ſame time when the citizens had but knowledge of his comming.

The earle arriueth at Milford hauen.

A falſe rumor ſtill newes.

Here he heard newes, which were as vntrue as they trulie were reported to him in Normandie; that Rice ap Thomas, and Iohn Sauage, with bodie and goods, were determined to aid king Richard. While he and his companie were ſome what aſtonied at theſe new tidings, there came ſuch meſſage from the inhabitants of the towne of Penbroke, that refreſhed and reuiued their froſen harts and daunted courages. For Arnold Butler a valiant capteine, which firſt aſked pardon for his offenſes before time committed againſt the earle of Richmond, and that obteined, declared to him that the Penbrochians were readie to ſerue and giue their attendance on their naturall and immediat lord Iaſper earle of Penbroke. The earle of Richmond, hauing his armie thus increaſed, departed from Hereford weſt to the towne of Cardigan, being fiue miles diſtant from thence.

While the ſouldiers were refreſhing and trimming themſelues in their campe, ſtrange tidings ſprong among them without anie certeine author; that ſir Walter Herbert, which laie with a great crue of men at Carmarden, was now with a great armie readie to approch and bid them battell. With which newes the armie was ſore troubled, and euery man aſſaied his armour and prooued his weapon, and were preſt to defend their enimies. And as they were in this fearfull doubt, certeine horſſemen, which the earle had ſent to make inquirie and ſearch, returned and reported all the countrie to be quiet, and no let nor impediment to be laid or caſt in their iournie. And euen at the ſame time, the whole armie was greatlie recomforted, by reaſon that the comming of Richard Griffith, a man of great nobilitie, the which notwithſtanding that he was confederate with ſir Walter Herbert, and Richard ap Thomas; yet at that verie inſtant he came to the earle of Richmond with all his companie; which were of no great number. After him the ſame daie came Iohn Morgan with his men.

The earle of Richmonds power made ſtronger by acceſſe of confederats.

Then the earle aduanced forward in good haſt, making no repoſe or abode in anie one place. And to the intent to paſſe forward with ſure and ſhort expedition, he aſſaulted euerie place where his enimies had ſet anie men of warre; which with ſmall force, and leſſe difficultie, he brieflie did ouercome & vanquiſh. And ſuddenlie he was by his eſpials aſcerteined, that ſir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas were in harneſſe before him, readie to incounter with his armie, and to ſtop their paſſage. Wherefore like a valiant capteine he firſt determined to ſet on them, and either to deſtroie or to take them into his fauour, and after with all his power and puiſſance to giue battell to his mortall enimie king Richard. But to the intent his fréends ſhould know in what readineſſe he was, and how he procéeded forward; he ſent of his moſt ſecret and faithfull ſeruants with letters and inſtructions to the ladie Margaret his mother, to the lord Stanleie and his brother, to ſir Gilbert Talbot, and to other his truſtie fréends; declaring to them that he being ſuccoured and holpen with the aid and reliefe of his fréends, intended to paſſe ouer the riuer of Seuerne at Shreweſburie, and ſo to paſſe directlie to the citie of London.

The erle ſendeth ſecret word to his mother and other his fréends that he meant a direct paſſage to London & their conference.

Wherefore he required them, as his ſpeciall truſt and confidence was fixed in the hope of their fidelitie, that they would méet him by the waie with all diligent preparation; to the intent that he and they, at time and place conuenient, might communicate togither the déepeneſſe of all his doubtfull and weightie buſineſſe. When the meſſengers were diſpatched with theſe commandements and admonitions, he marched forward toward Shreweſburie: and in his paſſing, there met and ſaluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodlie band of Welſhmen, which making an oth and promiſe to the earle, ſubmitted himſelfe wholie to his order and commandement. For the earle of Richmond two daies before made to him promiſe, that if he would ſweare to take his part and be obedient to him, he would make him chiefe gouernour of Wales: which part as he faithfullie promiſed and granted, ſo (after that he had obteined and poſſeſſed the realme and diademe) he liberallie performed and accompliſhed the ſame.

Rice ap Thomas ſweareth fealtie and ſeruice to the earle of Richmond.

In the meane time the meſſengers, that were ſent, diligentlie executed their charge, and laden with rewards of them to whom they were ſent, returned to him the ſame day that he entered into Shreweſburie: and made relation to him that his fréends were readie in all points to doo all things for him, which either they ought or might doo. The earle Henrie brought in good hope with this pleaſant meſſage, continued forth his intended iournie, and came to a little towne called Newport, and pitching his campe on a little hill adioining, repoſed himſelfe there that night. In the euening the ſame daie came to him ſir Gilbert Talbot, with the whole power of the yoong earle of Shreweſburie, then being in ward, which were accounted to the number of two thouſand men. And thus his power increaſing, he arriued at the towne of Stafford, and there pauſed.

There alſo came ſir William Stanleie accompanied with a few perſons. And after that the earle and he had communed no long time togither; he reuerted to his ſouldiors, whom he had aſſembled togither to ſerue the earle: which from thence departed to Lichfield, and lay without the walles in his campe all the night. The next morning he entered into the towne, and was with all honor like a prince receiued. A daie or two before, the lord Stanleie, hauing in his band almoſt fiue thouſand men, lodged in ſame towne. But hearing that the erle of Richmond was marching thitherward, gaue to him place, diſlodging him and his, and repaired to a towne called Aderſtone, there abiding the comming of the earle. And this wilie fox did this act, to auoid all ſuſpicion on king Richards part.

For the lord Stanleie was afraid, leaſt if he ſhould ſéeme openlie to be a fautor or aider to the earle his ſonne in law, before the day of the battell, that king Richard, which yet vtterlie did not put in him diffidence and miſtruſt, would put to ſome cruell death his ſonne and heire apparant George lord Strange, whome king Richard (as you haue heard before) kept with him as a pledge or hoſtage, to the intent that the lord Stanleie his father ſhould attempt nothing preiudiciall to him. King Richard at this ſeaſon kéeping his houſe in the caſtle of Notingham, was informed that the earle of Richmond, with ſuch baniſhed men as were fled out of England to him, were now arriued in Wales, and that all things neceſſarie to his enterpriſe were vnprouided, vnpurueied, and verie weake, nothing méet to withſtand the power of ſuch as the king had appointed to méet him.

K. Richard contemneth the earle and his power.

This rumor ſo inflated his mind, that in maner diſdeining to heare ſpeake of ſo ſmall a companie, he determined at the firſt to take little or no regard to this ſo ſmall a ſparkle, declaring the earle to be innocent and vnwiſe, bicauſe that he raſhly attempted ſuch a great enterpriſe with ſo ſmall and thin a number of warlike perſons: and therefore he gaue a definitiue ſentence, that when he came to that point that he ſhould be compelled to fight againſt his will, hée either ſhould be apprehended aliue, or elſe by all likelihood he ſhould of neceſſitie come to a ſhamefull confuſion: and that he truſted to be ſhortlie done by ſir Walter Herbert, and Rice ap Thomas, which then ruled Wales with equall power and like authoritie.

But yet reuoluing and caſting in his mind, that a ſmall war begun and winked at, and not regarded, maie turne to a great broile and trouble; and that it was prudent policie not to contemne and diſdeine the little power and ſmall weakeneſſe of the enimie (be it neuer ſo ſmall) thought it neceſſarie to prouide for afterclaps that might happen & chance. [For victorie doth not alwaies follow the greateſt multitude, neither is it a neceſſarie conſequent, that the biggeſt bodie is indued with moſt force. For we ſee that the ſmall viper is the huge buls deadlie bane, and a little curre doth catch a bore boiſterous and big; as the poet properlie (and to the purpoſe) verie well ſaith:

Ouid.

Parua necat morſu ſpatioſum vipera taurum,
A cane non magno ſæpè tenetur aper.

The king ſendeth to his friends for a choſen power of men.

Wherefore he ſent to Iohn duke of Norffolke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas earle of Surrie, and to other of his eſpeciall & truſtie friends of the nobilitie, which he iudged more to preferre and eſtéeme his wealth and honour, than their owne riches and priuate commoditie; willing them to muſter and view all their ſeruants and tenants, and to elect and chooſe the moſt couragious and actiue perſons of the whole number, and with them to repaire to his preſence with all ſpéed and diligence. Alſo hée wrote to Robert Brakenberie lieutenant of the Tower, commanding him with his power to come to his armie, and to bring with him (as fellowes in armes) ſir Thomas Bourchier, & ſir Walter Hungerford, and diuerſe other knights and eſquiers, in whom he caſt no ſmall ſuſpicion.

Now while he was thus ordering his affaires, tidings came that the earle of Richmond was paſſed Seuerne, & come to Shrewesburie without anie detriment or incumbrance. At which meſſage he was ſore moued and broiled with melancholie and dolor, crieng out, & asking vengeance of them that (againſt their oth and promiſe) had ſo deceiued him. For which cauſe he began to haue diffidence in other, inſomuch that he determined himſelfe out of hand the ſame daie to méet with and reſiſt his aduerſaries: and in all haſte ſent out eſpials to view and eſpie what waie his enimies kept and paſſed. They diligentlie doing their dutie, ſhortlie after returned, declaring to the king that the earle was incamped at the towne of Lichfield.

The earle is incamped at Lichfield.

The ordering of king Richards armie.

When he had perfect knowledge where the earle with his armie was ſoiourning, he hauing continuall repaire of his ſubiects to him, began incontinentlie without delaie to marſhall and put in order his battels (like a valiant capteine and politike leder) and firſt he made his battels to ſet forward, fiue and fiue in a ranke, marching toward that way where his enimies (as was to him reported) intended to paſſe. In the middle part of the armie, he appointed the traffike and cariage perteining to the armie. Then he (inuironed with his gard) with a frowning countenance and cruell viſage, mounted on a great white courſer, and followed with his footmen, the wings of horſſemen coaſting and ranging on euerie ſide: and kéeping this arraie, he with great pompe entered the towne of Leiceſter after the ſunne ſet [full of indignation & malice, which vttered it ſelfe from the inward hart by the mouth, out of which flowed ſpeaches of horrible heate, tempered with cruell threatnings, equall to his of whome it was thus ſaid long ago:

Horrebant ſæuis omnia verba minis.]

The earle of Richmond remoueth his power to Tamworth.

The earle of Richmond raiſed his campe, and departed from Lichfield to the towne of Tamworth thereto néere adioining, and in the mid way paſſing, there ſaluted him ſir Walter Hungerford, and ſir Thomas Bourchier knights, and diuerſe other which yéelded and ſubmitted themſelues to his pleaſure. For they, being aduertiſed that king Richard had them in ſuſpicion and gelouſie, a little beyond Stonie Stratford left and forſooke priuilie their capteine Robert Brakenberie; and wandering by night, and in maner by vnknowne paths, and vncerteine waies ſearching, at the laſt came to earle Henrie. Diuerſe other noble perſonages, which inwardlie hated king Richard worſe than a tode or a ſerpent, did likewiſe reſort to him with all their power and ſtrength, wiſhing and working his deſtruction, who otherwiſe would haue béene the inſtrument of their caſting away.

A ſtrange chance that happened to the earle of Richmond.

There happened in this progreſſion to the earle of Richmond a ſtrange chance worthie to be noted. For albeit he was a man of valiant courage, & that his armie increaſed, and dailie more and more he waxed mightier and ſtronger; yet he was not a little afeard, bicauſe he could in no wiſe be aſſured of his father in law Thomas lord Stanleie, which for feare of the deſtruction of the lord Strange his ſonne (as you haue heard) as yet inclined to neither partie. For if he had gone to the earle, and that notified to king Richard, his ſonne had béene ſhortlie executed. Wherefore he accompanied with twentie light horſſemen lingered in his iournie, as a man muſing & imagining what was beſt to be doone. And the more to aggrauate his penſiueneſſe, it was ſhewed him, that king Richard was at hand with a ſtrong power & a great armie.

The earle of Richmond put to a hard ſhift.

While he thus heauilie dragged behind his hoſt, the whole armie came before the towne of Tamworth; and when he for the déepe darkneſſe could not perceiue the ſteps of them that paſſed on before, and had wandered hither & thither, ſéeking after his companie, and yet not once hearing anie noiſe or whiſpering of them; he turned to a verie little village, being about thrée miles from his armie, taking great thought, and much fearing leaſt he ſhould be eſpied, and ſo trapped by king Richards ſcoutwatch. There he taried all night, not once aduenturing to aſke or demand a queſtion of any creature, he being no more amazed with the ieopardie & perill that was paſſed, than with this preſent chance, ſore feared that it ſhuld be a prognoſtication or ſigne of ſome infortunate plage afterward to ſucceed. As he was not merie being abſent from his armie, ſo likewiſe his armie much maruelled, and no leſſe mourned for his ſudden abſence.

The next morning earlie in the dawning of the day he returned, and by the conduct of good fortune, eſpied and came to his armie, excuſing himſelfe not to haue gone out of the way by ignorance: but that for a policie (deuiſed for the nonce) he went from his campe to receiue ſome glad meſſage from certeine of his priuie freends and ſecret alies. This excuſe made, he priuilie departed againe from his hoſt to the towne of Aderſton, where the lord Stanleie and ſir William his brother with their bands were abiding. There the erle came firſt to his father in law, in a litle cloſe, where he ſaluted him, and ſir William his brother: and after diuerſe and freendlie imbracings, each reioiſed of the ſtate of other, and ſuddenlie were ſurpriſed with great ioy, comfort, and hope of fortunate ſucceſſe in all their affaires and doings. Afterward they conſulted togither how to giue battell to king Richard if he would abide, whome they knew not to be farre off with an huge hoſt.

The lord Stanleie, the earle of Richmond, & others meet, embrace, and conſult.

In the euening of the ſame day, ſir Iohn Sauage, ſir Brian Sanford, ſir Simon Digbie, and manie other, leauing king Richard, turned and came to the part of the earle of Richmond, with an elect companie of men. Which refuſall of king Richards part, by men of ſuch experience, did augment and increaſe both the good hope, and the puiſſance of the earle of Richmond. In the meane ſeaſon, king Richard which was appointed now to finiſh his laſt labor by the very diuine iuſtice & prouidence of God (which called him to condigne puniſhment for his miſchiefous deſerts) marched to a place meet for two battels to incounter, by a village called Boſworth, not farre from Leiceſter: and there he pitched his field on a hill called Anne Beame, refreſhed his ſouldiers, and tooke his reſt.

The principals of K. Richards power fall from him.

The fame went, that he had the ſame night a dreadfull and terrible dreame: for it ſeemed to him being aſleepe, that he did ſee diuerſe images like terrible diuels, which pulled and haled him, not ſuffering him to take anie quiet or reſt. The which ſtrange viſion not ſo ſuddenlie ſtrake his heart with a ſudden feare, but it ſtuffed his head and troubled his mind with manie buſie and dreadfull imaginations. For incontinent after, his heart being almoſt damped, he prognoſticated before the doubtfull chance of the battell to come; not vſing the alacritie and mirth of mind and countenance as he was accuſtomed to doo before he came toward the battell. And leaſt that it might be ſuſpected that he was abaſhed for feare of his enimies, and for that cauſe looked ſo pitiouſlie; he recited and declared to his familiar freends in the morning his wonderfull viſion and fearefull dreame.

The dreame of king Richard the third foretelling him of his end.

But I thinke this was no dreame, but a punction and pricke of his ſinfull conſcience: for the conſcience is ſo much more charged and aggreeued, as the offenſe is greater & more heinous in degree. [So that king Richard, by this reckoning, muſt needs haue a wonderfull troubled mind, becauſe the deeds that he had doone, as they were heinous and vnnaturall, ſo did they excite and ſtirre vp extraordinarie motions of trouble and vexations in his conſcience.] Which ſting of conſcience, although it ſtrike not alwaie; yet at the laſt daie of extreame life, it is wont to ſhew and repreſent to vs our faults and offenſes, and the paines and puniſhments which hang ouer our heads for the committing of the ſame, to the intent that at that inſtant, we for our deſerts being penitent and repentant, maie be compelled (lamenting and bewailing our ſinnes like forſakers of this world) iocund to depart out of this miſcheefe life.

Now to returne againe to our purpoſe. The next daie after, king Richard being furniſhed with men & all ablements of warre, bringing all his men out of their campe into the plaine, ordered his fore-ward in a maruellous length, in which he appointed both horſmen and footmen, to the intent to imprint in the hearts of them that looked a farre off, a ſudden terror and deadlie feare, for the great multitude of the armed ſouldiers: and in the fore-front he placed the archers like a ſtrong fortified trench or bulworke. Ouer this battell was capteine, Iohn duke of Norffolke, with whome was Thomas earle of Surrie his ſonne. After this long vant-gard, followed king Richard himſelfe with a ſtrong companie of choſen and approoued men of warre, hauing horſſemen for wings on both ſides of his battell.

King Richard bringeth all his men into the plaine.

The duke of Norffolke and the earle of Surrie on K. Richards ſide.

After that the earle of Richmond was departed from the communication of his freends (as you haue heard before) he began to be of a better ſtomach, and of a more valiant courage, and with all diligence pitched his field iuſt by the campe of his enimies, and there he lodged that night. In the morning betimes, he cauſed his men to put on their armour, and apparell themſelues readie to fight and giue battell; and ſent vnto the lord Stanleie (which was now come with his band into a place indifferent betweene both the armies) requiring him with his men to approch neere to his armie, and to helpe to ſet the ſouldiers in arraie. But he anſwered that the earle ſhould ſet his owne men in good order of battell, while he would arraie his companie, and come to him in time conuenient. Which anſwer made otherwiſe than the earle thought or would haue iudged, conſidering the opportunitie of the time & the weight of the buſineſſe. And although he was therwithall a little vexed, & began ſomewhat to hang the head; yet he without anie time delaieng, compelled of neceſſitie, after this maner inſtructed and ordered his men.

The lord Stanleie refuſeth to ſet the earles men in battell raie.

He made his fore-ward ſomewhat ſingle and ſlender, according to the ſmall number of his people. In the front he placed the archers, of whome he made capteine Iohn earle of Oxenford. To the right wing of the battell he appointed ſir Gilbert Talbot to be the leader. To the left wing, he aſſigned ſir Iohn Sauage, who had brought thither with him a crue of right able perſonages, clad in white coats and hoods, which muſtered in the eies of their aduerſaries right brimlie. The earle of Richmond himſelfe, with aid of the lord Stanleie, gouerned the battell, accompanied with the earle of Penbroke, hauing a good companie of horſſemen, and a ſmall number of footmen. For all his whole number exceeded not fiue thouſand men, beſide the power of the Stanleies, wherof three thouſand were in the field, vnder the ſtandard of ſir William Stanleie. The kings number was double ſo much and more. When both theſe armies were thus ordered, and all men readie to ſet forward, king Richard called his chiefteins togither, and to them ſaid as followeth.

The earle ſetteth his men in order and appointeth cheefteins.

The oration of king Richard the third to the chiefteins of his armie.

My moſt faithfull and aſſured fellowes, moſt truſtie & welbeloued freends, & elected capteins, by whoſe wiſedome and policie I haue obteined the crowne, and type of this famous realme, and noble region: by whoſe puiſſance & valiantneſſe I haue inioid and poſſeſſed the ſtate roiall & dignitie of the ſame, maugre the ill will and ſeditious attempts of all my cankered enimies, and inſidious aduerſaries: by whoſe prudent & politike counſell I haue ſo gouerned my realme, people, & ſubiects, that I haue omitted nothing apperteining to the office of a iuſt prince; nor you haue pretermitted nothing belonging to the dutie of wiſe and ſage councellors. So that I maie ſaie, and trulie affirme, that your approoued fidelitie & tried conſtancie, maketh me to beleeue firmelie, and thinke that I am an vndoubted king, and an indubitate prince.

King Richard iuſtifieth himſelfe and his gouernement.

And although in the adeption and obteining of the garland, I being ſeduced, and prouoked by ſiniſter counſell, and diabolicall temptation, did commit a wicked and deteſtable act: yet I haue with ſtreict penance and ſalt tears (as I truſt) expiated & cleerelie purged the ſame offenſe: which abhominable crime I require you of frendſhip as cleerelie to forget, as I dailie remember to deplore and lament the ſame. If ye will euen now diligentlie call to remembrance in what caſe and perplexitie we doo ſtand; and in what doubtfull perill we be all intrapped; I doubt not but you in heart will thinke, and with mouth confeſſe, that if euer amitie and faith preuailed betweene prince and ſubiects, or betweene ſubiect and ſubiect; or if euer bond of alegiance obliged the vaſſall to loue and ſerue his naturall ſoueraigne lord; or if anie obligation of dutie bound anie prince to aid & defend his ſubiects; all theſe loues, bonds, and duties of neceſſitie are now this day to be tried, ſhewed, and put in experience.

For if wiſe men ſaie true (as they doo not lie) there is ſome policie in getting, but much more in keeping; the one being but fortunes chance, & the other high wit and policie. For which cauſe, I with you, and you with me, muſt needs this day take labour and paine, to keepe and defend with force, that preheminence and poſſeſſion, which by your prudent deuiſes I haue gotten & obteined. I doubt not but you know how the diuell (continuall enimie to humane nature, diſturber of concord, & ſower of ſedition) hath entered into the heart of an vnknowne Welſhman (whoſe father I neuer knew, nor him perſonallie ſaw) exciting him to aſpire and couet our realme, crowne, and dignitie, and thereof cleerelie to depriue and ſpoile vs and our poſteritie. Ye ſee further, how a companie of traitors, theeues, outlawes, and runnagates of our owne nation, be aiders and partakers of his feat and enterpriſe, readie at hand to ouercome and oppreſſe vs.

He ſpeaketh opprobriouſlie of the earle of Richmond.

You ſee alſo, what a number of beggerlie Britans and faint-hearted Frenchmen be with him arriued to deſtroie vs, our wiues and children. Which imminent miſcheefs and apparant inconueniences, if we will withſtand & refell, we muſt liue togither as brethren, fight togither like lions, & feare not to die togither like men. And obſeruing and keeping this rule and precept, beleeue me, the fearefull hare neuer fled faſter before the greedie greihound, nor the ſillie larke before the ſparrowhawke, nor yet the ſimple ſheepe before the rauenous woolfe; than your proud bragging aduerſaries, aſtonied and amazed with the onelie ſight of your manlie viſages, will flee, run, and ſkir out of the field. For if you conſider and wiſelie ponder all things in your mind, you ſhall perceiue, that we haue manifeſt cauſes, and apparant tokens of triumph and victorie.

And to begin with the erle of Richmond capteine of this rebellion, he is a Welſh milkeſop, a man of ſmall courage, and of leſſe experience in martiall acts and feats of warre, brought vp by my mothers meanes, and mine, like a captiue in a cloſe cage in the court of Francis duke of Britaine; and neuer ſaw armie, nor was exerciſed in martiall affaires: by reaſon wherof he neither can, nor is able by his owne will or experience to guide or rule an hoaſt. For in the wit and policie of the capteine conſiſteth the cheefe adeption of the victorie, and ouerthrow of the enimies. Secondarilie feare not, but put awaie all doubts; for when the traitors and runnagates of our realme, ſhall ſee vs with banner diſplaied come againſt them, remembring their oth, promiſe, and fidelitie made vnto vs, as to their ſoueraigne lord and annointed king; they ſhall be ſo pricked and ſtoong in the bottome of their ſcrupulous conſciences, that they for verie remorſe and dread of the diuine plague, will either ſhamefullie flee, or humblie ſubmit themſelues to our grace and mercie.

The K. ſeeketh perſuade his capteins that the earle of Richmond is no warrior.

And as for the Frenchmen and Britans, their valiantneſſe is ſuch, that our noble progenitors, and your valiant parts haue them oftener vanquiſhed and ouercome in one moneth, than they in the beginning imagined poſſiblie to compaſſe and finiſh in a whole yeare. What will you make of them? braggers without audacitie, drunckards without diſcretion, ribalds without reaſon, cowards without reſiſting, and in concluſion, the moſt effeminate and laſciuious people that euer ſhewed themſelues in front of battell; ten times more couragious to flee & eſcape, than once to aſſault the breaſt of our ſtrong & populous armie. Wherefore conſidering all theſe aduantages, expell out of your thoughts all douts, auoid out of your minds all feare; and like valiant champions aduance foorth your ſtandards, & aſſaie whether your enimies can decide and trie the title of battell by dint of ſword. Aduance (I ſay againe) forward my capteins, in whome lacketh neither policie, wiſedome, nor yet puiſſance. Euerie one giue but one ſure ſtripe, & ſuerlie the iournie is ours. What preuaileth a handfull to a whole realme?

Frenchmen & Britans great boſters ſmall roſters.

Deſiring you (for the loue that you beare to me) and the affection that you haue to your natiue and naturall countrie, and to the ſafegard of your prince & your ſelues, that you will this daie take to you your accuſtomed courage and couragious ſpirits, for the defenſe and ſafegard of vs all. And as for me, I aſſure you, this daie I will triumph by glorious victorie, or ſuffer death for immortall fame. For they be maimed and out of the palace of fame diſgraded, dieng without renowme, which doo not aſmuch prefer and exalt the perpetuall honour of their natiue countrie, as their owne mortall and tranſitorie life. Now ſaint George to borow, let vs ſet forward, and remember well, that I am he which ſhall with high aduancements reward and preferre the valiant and hardie champions, and puniſh and torment the ſhamefull cowards, and dreadfull daſtards.

K. Richards vaine confidence and bootleſſe courage.

This exhortation incouraged all ſuch as fauoured him; but ſuch as were preſent (more for dread than loue) kiſſed them openlie, whome they inwardlie hated. Other ſware outwardlie to take part with ſuch, whoſe death they ſecretlie compaſſed, and inwardlie imagined. Other promiſed to inuade the kings enimies, which fled and fought with fierce courage againſt the king. Other ſtood ſtill and looked on, intending to take part with the victors and ouercommers. So was his people to him vnſure and vnfaithfull at his end, as he was to his nephues vntrue and vnnaturall in his beginning. [How then was it poſſible that this princes regiment could long ſtand, ſeeing the preſeruation and prorogation of his reigne conſiſted not in the loue of his ſubiects? In place whereof bicauſe feare (yea ſeruile and forced feare ſucceeded) he was the ſooner forſaken of his people, whoſe harts fell from him as iſicles from a penthouſe in a ſunnie daie; and in this caſe the poet ſaith truelie, and was well worthie of credit when he craued it, ſaieng:

Credite quem metuit quiſq; perire cupit.]

When the earle of Richmond knew by his foreriders that the king was ſo neere imbatelled, he rode about his armie from ranke to ranke, & from wing to wing, giuing comfortable words to all men, and that finiſhed (being armed at all peeces, ſauing his helmet) mounted on a little hill, ſo that all his people might ſee and behold him perfectlie, to their great reioiſing. For he was a man of no great ſtature, but ſo formed and decorated with all gifts and lineaments of nature, that he ſeemed more an angelicall creature, than a terreſtriall perſonage. His countenance and aſpect was cheerefull and couragious, his haire yellow like the burniſhed gold, his eies graie ſhining and quicke; prompt and readie in anſwering, but of ſuch ſobrietie, that it could neuer be iudged whether he were more dull than quicke in ſpeaking (ſuch was his temperance.) Now when he had ouerlooked his armie ouer euerie ſide, he pauſed awhile, and after with a lowd voice and bold ſpirit ſpake to his companions theſe, or the like words following.

The perſon of the earle of Richmond deſcribed.

The oration of king Henrie the seauenth to his armie.

If euer God gaue victorie to men fighting in a iuſt quarrell, or if he euer aided ſuch as made warre for the wealth & tuition of their owne naturall and nutritiue countrie, or if he euer ſuccoured them which aduentured their liues for the releefe of innocents, ſuppreſſing of malefactors and apparant offendors; no doubt my fellowes & freends, but he of his bountifull goodneſſe will this daie ſend vs triumphant victorie, and a luckie iournie ouer our proud enimies, and arrogant aduerſaries: for if you remember and conſider the verie cauſe of our iuſt quarell, you ſhall apparantlie perceiue the ſame to be true, godlie, and vertuous. In the which I doubt not, but God will rather aid vs (yea and fight for vs) than ſee vs vanquiſhed and ouerthrowne by ſuch as neither feare him nor his laws, nor yet regard iuſtice or honeſtie.

The earles cauſe iuſt and right, & therefore likelie of good ſucceſſe.

Our cauſe is ſo iuſt, that no enterpriſe can be of more vertue, both by the lawes diuine & ciuill. For what can be a more honeſt, goodlie, or godlie quarrell, than to fight againſt a capteine, being an homicide and murtherer of his owne bloud or progenie, an extreame deſtroier of his nobilitie, and to his and our countrie and the poore ſubiects of the ſame a deadlie mallet, a firie brand, and a burthen intollerable? Beſide him, conſider who be of his band and companie: ſuch as by murther and vntrueth committed againſt their owne kin and linage, yea againſt their prince and ſoueraigne lord, haue diſherited me and you, and wrongfullie deteine and vſurpe our lawfull patrimonie & lineall inheritance. For he that calleth himſelfe king, keepeth from me the crowne and regiment of this noble realme and countrie, contrarie to all iuſtice and equitie.

A great motiue to the nobles & gentles aſſiſting the earle.

Likewiſe, his mates and friends occupie your lands, cut downe your woods, and deſtroie your manors, letting your wiues and children range abroade for their liuing: which perſons for their penance and puniſhment I doubt not, but God of his goodnes will ether deliuer into our hands, as a great gaine and bootie; or cauſe them (being greeued and compuncted with the pricke of their corrupt conſciences) cowardlie to flie, and not abide the battell. Beſide this I aſſure you, that there be yonder in the great battell, men brought thither for feare, and not for loue; ſouldiers by force compelled, and not with good will aſſembled; perſons which deſire rather the deſtruction than ſaluation of their maiſter and capteine: and finallie, a multitude, whereof the moſt part will be our friends, and the leaſt part our enimies.

For truelie I doubt which is greater, the malice of the ſoldiors toward their capteine; or the feare of him conceiued of his people. For ſuerlie this rule is infallible, that as ill men dailie couet to deſtroie the good; ſo God appointeth the good men to confound the ill. And of all worldlie goods the greateſt is to ſuppreſſe tyrants, and releeue innocents; whereof the one is as much hated, as the other is beloued. If this be true (as clearkes preach) who will ſpare yonder tyrant Richard duke of Gloceſter, vntruelie calling himſelfe king, conſidering that he hath violated and broken both the lawes of God and man? What vertue is in him which was the confuſion of his brother, and murtherer of his nephues? What mercie is in him that ſleieth his truſtie freends as well as his extreame enimies? Who can haue confidence in him which putteth diffidence in all men?

K. Richards offenſes and ill qualities ſummarilie touched by the earle.

If you haue not read, I haue heard good clearkes ſaie, that Tarquine the proud for the vice of the bodie loſt the kingdome of Rome; and the name of Tarquine baniſhed the citie for euer: yet was not his fault ſo deteſtable as the fact of cruell Nero, which ſlue his own mother, and opened hir entrailes, to behold the place of his conception. Behold yonder Richard, which is both Tarquine and Nero: yea a tyrant more than Nero, for he hath not onlie murthered his nephue being his king and ſoueraigne lord, baſtarded his noble brethren, and defamed the wombe of his vertuous and womanlie mother; but alſo compaſſed all the meanes and waies that he could inuent, how to defile and carnallie know his owne neece, vnder the pretenſe of a cloked matrimonie, which ladie I haue ſworne and promiſed to take to my make and wife, as you all know and beleeue.

K. Richard a notorious tyrant.

If this cauſe be not iuſt, and this quarell godlie; let God (the giuer of victorie) iudge and determine. We haue (thanks be giuen to Chriſt) eſcaped the ſecret treaſons in Britaine, and auoided the ſubtill ſnares of our fraudulent enimies there, paſſed the troublous ſeas in good and quiet ſafegard, and without reſiſtance haue ouergone the ample region & large countrie of Wales, and are now come to the place which we ſo much deſired: for long we haue ſought the furious bore, and now we haue found him. Wherefore let vs not feare to enter into the toile, where we may ſuerlie ſleie him; for God knoweth that we haue liued in the vales of miſerie, toſſing our ſhips in dangerous ſtormes: let vs not now dread to ſet vp our full ſailes in faire weather, hauing with vs both God and good fortune.

Incouragements to his armie to plaie the men in a iuſt cauſe.

If we had come to conquer Wales and had atchiued it, our praiſe had beene great, and our gaine more: but if we win this battell, the whole rich realme of England, with the lords and rulers of the ſame, ſhall be ours; the profit ſhall be ours, and the honour ſhall be ours. Therefore labour for your gaine, & ſweat for your right. While we were in Britaine, we had ſmall liuings and little plentie of wealth or welfare; now is the time come to get aboundance of riches, and copie of profit; which is the reward of your ſeruice, and merit of your paines. And this remember with your ſelues, that before vs be our enimies; and on either ſide of vs be ſuch, as I neither ſuerlie truſt, nor greatlie beleeue; backeward we cannot flee; ſo that heere we ſtand like ſheepe in a fold, circumuented and compaſſed betweene our enimies and our doutfull friends.

Therefore let all feare be ſet aſide, and like ſworne brethren let vs ioine in one; for this daie ſhall be the end of our trauell, and the gaine of our labour, either by honorable death or famous victorie: and as I truſt, the battell ſhall not be ſo ſowre, as the profit ſhall be ſweet. Remember that victorie is not gotten with the multitudes of men, but with the courages of hearts, and valiantneſſe of minds. The ſmaller that our number is, the more glorie is to vs if we vanquiſh: if we be ouercome, yet no laud is to be attributed to the victors, conſidering that ten men fought againſt one. And if we die ſo glorious a death in ſo good a quarell, neither fretting time, nor cancarding obliuion, ſhall be able to darken or raſe out of the booke of fame either our names, or our godlie attempt. And this one thing I aſſure you, that in ſo iuſt and good a cauſe, and ſo notable a quarrell, you ſhall find me this daie rather a dead carrion vpon the cold ground, than a free priſoner on a carpet in a ladies chamber.

Victorie conſiſteth not in multitude but in manlineſſe.

Let vs therefore fight like inuincible giants, and ſet on our enimies like vntimorous tigers, & baniſh all feare like ramping lions. And now aduance forward true men againſt traitors, pitifull perſons againſt murtherers, true inheritors againſt vſurpers, the ſcourges of God againſt tyrants. Diſplaie my banner with a good courage, march forth like ſtrong and robuſtious champions, and begin the battell like hardie conquerors. The battell is at hand, and the victorie approcheth; and if we ſhamefullie recule, or cowardlie flee; we and all our ſequele be deſtroied, and diſhonored for euer. This is the daie of gaine, and this is the time of loſſe; get this daie victorie, and be conquerors: and leeſe this daies battell, and be villaines. And therefore in the name of God and S. George, let euerie man couragiouſlie aduance forth his ſtandard.

Theſe chéerefull words he ſet forth with ſuch geſture of his bodie, & ſmiling countenance, as though alreadie he had vanquiſhed his enimies, and gotten the ſpoile. He had ſcantlie finiſhed his ſaieng, but the one armie ſpied the other. Lord how haſtilie the ſoldiers buckled their healmes, how quicklie the archers bent their bowes and fruſhed their feathers, how readilie the bilmen ſhooke their billes, and prooued their ſtaues, readie to approach and ioine, when the terrible trumpet ſhould ſound the bloudie blaſt to victorie or death! Betwéene both armies there was a great mariſh then (but at this preſent, by reaſon of diches caſt, it is growne to be firme ground) which the earle of Richmond left on his right hand; for this intent, that it ſhould be on that ſide a defenſe for his part, and in ſo dooing he had the ſunne at his backe, and in the faces of his enimies. When king Richard ſaw the earles companie was paſſed the mariſh; he did command with all haſt to ſet vpon them. Then the trumpets ſounded, and the ſouldiers ſhouted, and the kings archers couragiouſlie let flie their arrowes. The earles bowmen ſtood not ſtill, but paied them home againe.

The earle of Oxfords charge to his band of men.

The terrible ſhot once paſſed, the armies ioined and came to hand-ſtrokes, where neither ſword nor bill was ſpared. At which incounter, the lord Stanleie ioined with the earle. The earle of Oxford in the meane ſeaſon, fearing leaſt while his companie was fighting, they ſhould be compaſſed and circumuented with the multitude of the enimies, gaue commandement in euerie ranke, that no man ſhould be ſo hardie, as to go aboue ten foot from the ſtandard. Which commandment once knowne, they knit themſelues togither, and ceaſſed a little from fighting. The aduerſaries ſuddenlie abaſhed at the matter, and miſtruſting ſome fraud and deceit, began alſo to pauſe and left ſtriking; and not againſt the wils of manie, which had rather had the king deſtroied, than ſaued, and therefore they fought verie faintlie, or ſtood ſtill.

The earle of Oxfords valiancie.

The earle of Oxford, bringing all his band togither on the one part, ſet on his enimies freſhlie againe. The aduerſaries perceiuing that, placed their men ſlender and thin before, but thicke and broad behind, beginning againe hardilie the battell. While the two fore-wards thus mortallie fought, ech intending to vanquiſh and conuince the other; king Richard was admoniſhed by his explorators and eſpials, that the earle of Richmond (accompanied with a ſmall number of men of armes) was not far off. And as he approched and marched toward him, he perfectlie knew his perſonage by certeine demonſtrations and tokens, which he had learned and knowen of others that were able to giue him full information. Now being inflamed with ire, and vexed with outragious malice, he put his ſpurres to his horſſe, and rode out of the ſide of the range of his battell, leauing the vant-gard fighting; and like a hungrie lion ran with ſpeare in reſt toward him. The earle of Richmond perceiued well the king furiouſlie comming toward him, and bicauſe the whole hope of his wealth and purpoſe was to be determined by battell, he gladlie proffered to incounter with him bodie to bodie, and man to man.

The earle of Richmond proffereth to incounter K. Richard bodie to bodie.

Sir William Brandon ſlaine.

King Richard ſet on ſo ſharplie at the firſt brunt, that he ouerthrew the earles ſtandard, and ſlue ſir William Brandon his ſtandard-bearer (which was father to ſir Charles Brandon by king Henrie the eight created duke of Suffolke) and matched hand to hand with ſir Iohn Cheinie, a man of great force and ſtrength, which would haue reſiſted him: but the ſaid Iohn was by him manfullie ouerthrowen. And ſo he making open paſſage by dint of ſword as he went forward, the earle of Richmond withſtood his violence, and kept him at the ſwords point without aduantage, longer than his companions either thought or iudged: which being almoſt in deſpaire of victorie, were ſuddenlie recomforted by ſir William Stanleie, which came to his ſuccors with three thouſand tall men. At which verie inſtant, king Richards men were driuen backe and fled, & he himſelfe manfullie fighting in the middle of his enimies, was ſlaine, and (as he worthilie had deſerued) came to a bloudie death, as he had lead a bloudie life.

The kings armie fleeth.

In the meane ſeaſon, the earle of Oxford with the aid of the lord Stanleie, after no long fight, diſcomfited the fore-ward of king Richard, whereof a great number were ſlaine in the chaſe and fight: but the greateſt number which (compelled by feare of the king, and not of their meere voluntarie motion) came to the field, gaue neuer a ſtroke, and hauing no harme nor damage, ſafelie departed, which came not thither in hope to ſee the king proſper and preuaile, but to heare that he ſhould be ſhamefullie confounded and brought to ruine. In this battell died few aboue the number of a thouſand perſons: and of the nobilitie were ſlaine Iohn duke of Norffolke, which was warned by diuerſe to reſtraine from the field, in ſo much that the night before he ſhould ſet forward toward the king, one wrote this rime vpon his gate:

Duke of Norffolke ſlaine in the field.

Iacke of Norffolke be not too bold,
For *Dikon thy maiſter is bought and ſold.

*Richard.

Yet all this notwithſtanding, he regarded more his oth, his honor, and promiſe made to king Richard, like a gentleman; and as a faithfull ſubiect to his prince, abſented not himſelfe from his maiſter; but as he faithfullie liued vnder him, ſo he manfullie died with him, to his great fame and laud. [And therfore, though his ſeruice was ill imploied in aid of a tyrant (whome it had beene more honorable to haue ſuppreſſed than ſupported) yet bicauſe he had vpon his fealtie vndertaken to fight in his quarell, he thought it leſſe loſſe of life and liuing than of glorie & honour: ſo that he might haue ſaid, in reſpect of his loialtie & promiſed truth teſtified with conſtancie to the death:

Eſt mihi ſupplicium cauſa fuiſſe pium.

Ouid.

What perſons of name were ſlaine on king Richards ſide.

There were ſlaine beſide him, Walter lord Ferrers of Chartleie, ſir Richard Radcliffe, and Robert Brakenberie lieutenant of the Tower, and not manie gentlemen more. Sir William Cateſbie learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the cheefe councellors to the late king, with diuerſe other, were two daies after beheaded at Leiceſter. Amongſt them that ran awaie, were ſir Francis vicount Louell, and Humfreie Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother, which tooke ſanctuarie in ſaint Iohns at Gloceſter. Of captiues and priſoners there were a great number. For after the death of king Richard was knowne and publiſhed, euerie man in manner vnarming himſelfe, & caſting awaie his abiliments of warre, meekelie ſubmitted themſelues to the obeiſance and rule of the earle of Richmond: of the which the more part had gladlie ſo doone in the beginning, if they might haue conuenientlie eſcaped from king Richards eſpials, which hauing as cleere eies as Lynx, and open eares as Midas, ranged & ſearched in euerie quarter.

Amongſt theſe was Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, which (whether it was by the commandement of king Richard, putting diffidence in him; or he did it for the loue and fauour that he bare vnto the earle) ſtood ſtill with a great companie, and intermitted not in the battell, which was incontinentlie receiued into fauour and made of the councell. But Thomas Howard earle of Surreie, which ſubmitted himſelfe there, was not taken to grace; bicauſe his father was chiefe councellor, and he greatlie familiar with king Richard, but committed to the Tower of London, where he long remained; and in concluſion deliuered, was for his truth and fidelitie after promoted to high honors, offices and dignities. On the earle of Richmonds part were ſlaine ſcarſe one hundred perſons, among whome the principall was ſir William Brandon his ſtandard-bearer. This battell was fought at Boſworth in Leiceſterſhire, the two and twentith daie of Auguſt, in the yeare of our redemption 1485. The whole conflict indured litle aboue two houres.

Erle of Surreie cōmitted to the Tower notwithſtanding his ſubmiſſion.

How king Richard might haue eſcaped.

King Richard (as the fame went) might haue eſcaped and gotten ſafegard by fleeing. For when they, which were next about his perſon, ſaw and perceiued at the firſt ioining of the battell the ſouldiers faintlie and nothing couragiouſlie to ſet on their enimies; and not onlie that, but alſo that ſome withdrew themſelues priuilie out of the preaſe and departed; they began to ſuſpect fraud and to ſmell treaſon; and not onelie exhorted, but determinatlie aduiſed him to ſaue himſelfe by flight. And when the loſſe of the battell was imminent and apparant, they brought to him a ſwift and a light horſſe, to conueie him awaie. He which was not ignorant of the grudge and ill will that the common people bare toward him, caſting awaie all hope of fortunate ſucceſſe and happie chance to come, anſwered (as men ſaie) that on that daie he would make an end of all battels, or elſe there finiſh his life. Such a great audacitie and ſuch a ſtomach reigned in his bodie.

For ſuerlie he knew that to be the daie, in the which it ſhould be decided and determined whether he ſhould peaceablie obteine and inioy his kingdome during his life, or elſe vtterlie forgo and be depriued of the ſame. With which too much hardines he being ouercome, haſtilie cloſed his helmet, and entered fiercelie into the hard battell, to the intent to obteine that daie a quiet reigne and regiment; or elſe to finiſh there his vnquiet life, and vnfortunat gouernance. And ſo this miſer at the ſame verie point had like chance and fortune, as happeneth to ſuch which in place of right iuſtice and honeſtie, following their ſenſuall appetite, loue, and vſe to imbrace miſchiefe, tyrannie, and vnthriftineſſe. Suerlie theſe be examples of more vehemencie, than mans toong can expreſſe, to feare and aſtoniſh ſuch euill perſons, as will not liue one houre vacant from dooing and exerciſing crueltie, miſchiefe, or outragious liuing.

The deuout behauiour of the earle of Richmond after the victorie.

When the earle had thus obteined victorie, and ſlaine his mortall enimie, he kneeled downe and rendred to almightie God his hartie thanks, with deuout and godlie oriſons; beſeeching his goodneſſe to ſend him grace to aduance and defend the catholike faith; and to mainteine iuſtice and concord amongſt his ſubiects and people, by God now to his gouernance committed & aſſigned. Which praier finiſhed, he repleniſhed with incomparable gladneſſe aſcended vp to the top of a little mounteine, where he not onelie praiſed and lauded his valiant ſouldiers; but alſo gaue vnto them his hartie thanks, with promiſe of condigne recompenſe for their fidelitie and valiant facts, willing and commanding all the hurt and wounded perſons to be cured, and the dead carcaſſes to be deliuered to the ſepulture. Then the people reioiſed, and clapped their hands, crieng vp to heauen; King Henrie, king Henrie.

The lord Stanleie ſetteth yͤ crowne on king Henries head.

When the lord Stanleie ſaw the good will and gladneſſe of the people, he tooke the crowne of king Richard which was found amongſt the ſpoile in the field, and ſet it on the earles head; as though he had beene elected king by the voice of the people, as in ancient times paſt in diuerſe realmes it hath beene accuſtomed: and this was the firſt ſigne and token of his good lucke and felicitie. ¶I muſt put you here in remembrance, how that king Richard (putting ſome diffidence in the lord Stanleie) had with him as an hoſtage the lord Strange, his eldeſt ſonne, which lord Stanleie (as ye haue heard before) ioined not at the firſt with his ſonne in lawes armie, for feare the king would haue ſlaine the lord Strange his heire.

The lord Stanlies bold anſwer to K. Richards purſeuant.

When king Richard was come to Boſworth, he ſent a purſeuant to the lord Stanleie, commanding him to aduance forward with his companie, and to come to his preſence; which thing if he refuſed to doo, he ſware by Chriſtes paſſion, that he would ſtrike off his ſonnes head before he dined. The lord Stanleie anſwered the purſeuant that if the king did ſo, he had more ſonnes aliue; and as to come to him, he was not then ſo determined. When king Richard heard this anſwer, he commanded the lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded; which was at that verie ſame ſeaſon, when both the armies had ſight ech of other. But the councellors of king Richard pondered the time and cauſe, knowing alſo the lord Strange to be innocent of his fathers offenſe, & perſuaded the king that it was now time to fight, & no time to execute.

Beſides that, they aduiſed him to keepe the lord Strange as priſoner till the battell were ended, and then at leiſure his pleaſure might be accompliſhed. So (as God would) king Richard brake his holie oth, and the lord was deliuered to the keepers of the kings tents, to be kept as priſoner. Which, when the field was doone, and their maiſter ſlaine, and proclamation made to know where the child was, they ſubmitted themſelues as priſoners to the lord Strange, and he gentlie receiued them, and brought them to the new proclamed king; where, of him and of his father he was receiued with great ioy. After this the whole campe remooued with bag and baggage.

Proclam made to in the lo Strange.

The ſame night in the euening, king Henrie with great pompe came to the towne of Leiceſter; where as well for the refreſhing of his people & ſouldiers, as for preparing all things neceſſarie for his iournie toward London, he reſted and repoſed himſelfe two daies. In the meane ſeaſon the dead corps of king Richard was as ſhamefullie caried to the towne of Leiceſter, as he gorgeouſlie (the day before) with pompe and pride departed out of the ſame towne. For his bodie was naked and deſpoiled to the ſkin, and nothing left about him, not ſo much as a clout to couer his priuie members, and was truſſed behind a purſeuant of arms, one Blanch Senglier, or White bore, like a hog or calfe, his head and armes hanging on the one ſide of the horſſe, and his legs on the other ſide, and all beſprinkled with mire and bloud he was brought to the graie friers church within the towne, and there laie like a miſerable ſpectacle.

The sham full cariag K. Richar bodie to Le ceſter.

But ſuerlie conſidering his miſchiefous acts and vngratious doings, men maie wonder at ſuch a caitife, who although he deſerued no buriall place either in church or churchyard, chappell or chancell, but otherwiſe to haue bin beſtowed: yet in the ſaid church he was with no leſſe funerall pompe & ſolemnitie interred, than he would to be doone at the buriall of his innocent nephues, whome he cauſed cruellie to be murthered, and vnnaturallie killed. Now when his death was knowne, few lamented, and manie reioiced. The proud bragging white bore (which was his badge) was violentlie raſed & plucked downe from euerie ſigne and place where it might be eſpied: ſo ill was his life, that men wiſhed the memorie of him to be buried with his carren corps. He reigned two yeers, two moneths, and one daie [too long by ſix and twentie moneths, and foure and twentie houres in moſt mens opinions, to whome his name and preſence was as ſweet and delectable, as his doings princelie, and his perſon amiable.]

K. Richar badge and cognisanc euerie wher defaced.

As he was ſmall and little of ſtature, ſo was he of bodie greatlie deformed; the one ſhoulder higher than the other; his face was ſmall, but his countenance cruell, and ſuch, that at the firſt aſpect a man would iudge it to ſauour and ſmell of malice, fraud, and deceit. When he ſtood muſing, he would bite and chaw buſilie his nether lip; as who ſaid, that his fierce nature in his cruell bodie alwaies chafed, ſtirred, and was euer vnquiet: beſide that, the dagger which he ware, he would (when he ſtudied) with his hand plucke vp & downe in the ſheath to the midſt, neuer drawing it fullie out: he was of a readie, pregnant, and quicke wit, wilie to feine, and apt to diſſemble: he had a proud mind, and an arrogant ſtomach, the which accompanied him euen to his death, rather chooſing to ſuffer the ſame by dint of ſword, than being forſaken and left helpeleſſe of his vnfaithfull companions, to preſerue by cowardlie flight ſuch a fraile and vncerteine life, which by malice, ſickneſſe, or condigne puniſhment was like ſhortlie to come to confuſion.

The deſcrip tion of king Richard.

Thus ended this prince his mortall life with infamie and diſhonor, which neuer preferred fame or honeſtie before ambition, tyrannie and miſchiefe. And if he had continued ſtill protector, and ſuffered his nephues to haue liued and reigned, no doubt but the realme had proſpered, & he as much praiſed & loued as he is now had in hatred: but to God, which knew his inward thoughts at the houre of his death, I remit the puniſhment of his offenſes commited in his life; [which if the one be as manifold as the other, Gods iuſtice were not to be charged with crueltie. For by nature he is mercifull, ſlow to anger, and loth to ſmite: but yet euerie ſinne (in reſpect of his righteouſneſſe) being deadlie (much more heinous and horrible) how can he but by iuſtice (which is an eſſentiall vertue in him) puniſh it ſeuerelie? And if he did it with ten thouſand torments, who ſhall be ſo hardie as to expoſtulate and reaſon why he ſo dooth?]

Sée pag.690, 691.

But to leaue the tyrant as he died, you ſhall vnderſtand that K. Henrie the ſeuenth cauſed a toome to be made and ſet vp ouer the place where he was buried, in the church of the graie friers at Leiceſter, with a picture of alabaſter repreſenting his perſon, dooing that honour to his enimie, vpon a princelie regard and pitifull zeale, which king Richard (mooued of an hypocriticall ſhew of counterfeit pitie) did to king Henrie the ſixt, whom he had firſt cruellie murthered, and after in the ſecond yeare of his vſurped reigne, cauſed his corps to be remooued from Chertſeie vnto Windſore, and there ſolemnlie interred. And now to conclude with this cruell tyrant king Richard, we may conſider in what ſort the ambitious deſire to rule and gouerne in the houſe of Yorke, was puniſhed by Gods iuſt prouidence.

Sée pag. 659.

Sée pag.703.

For although that the right might ſéeme to remaine in the perſon of Richard duke of Yorke, ſlaine at Wakefield: yet maie there be a fault worthilie reputed in him, ſo to ſéeke to preuent the time appointed him by authoritie of parlement to atteine to the crowne intailed to him and his iſſue; in whome alſo, and not onelie in himſelfe, that offenſe (as maie bée thought) was dulie puniſhed. For although his eldeſt ſonne Edward the fourth, béeing a prince right prouident and circumſpect for the ſuertie of his owne eſtate and his children, inſomuch that not content to cut off all his armed and apparant enimies, he alſo of a gealous feare, made awaie his brother the duke of Clarence, and ſo thought to make all ſure: yet Gods vengeance might not be diſappointed, for (as ye haue partlie heard) he did but further thereby the deſtruction of his iſſue, in taking awaie him that onlie might haue ſtaied the crueltie of his brother of Gloceſter, who inraged for deſire of the kingdome, bereft his innocent nephues of their liues & eſtates.

And as it thus well appeared, that the houſe of Yorke ſhewed it ſelfe more bloudie in ſéeking to obteine the kingdome, than that of Lancaſter in vſurping it: ſo it came to paſſe, that the Lords vengeance appeared more heauie towards the ſame than towards the other, not ceaſſing till the whole iſſue male of the ſaid Richard duke of Yorke was extinguiſhed. For ſuch is Gods iuſtice, to leaue no vnrepentant wickedneſſe vnpuniſhed, as eſpeciallie in this caitife Richard the third, not deſeruing ſo much as the name of a man, much leſſe of a king, moſt manifeſtlie appeareth. [At whom we will end, with a compariſon of the like practiſe in Lodowike Sforce, aſpiring to the dukedome of Millane, the name, armes and title thereof he tooke vpon him, hauing ſecretlie proteſted before, that he receiued them as apperteining to him by the inueſtiture of the king of Romans.

Lodowike Sforce duke of Millan by vſurpation.

It was publiſhed that the death of Galeas (his late predeceſſor) happened by immoderate cohabitation, but the vniuerſall iudgment of Italie was, that he died not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinencie, but by poiſon and violent compulſion. Wherof Theodor de Pauia, one of the phyſicians, aſſiſting when the king viſited him, aſſured the king to ſée moſt apparant and manifeſt ſignes: and if hée were diſpatched by poiſon, there was none that doubted that his vncle was innocent, either directlie or indirectlie; as he, who not content with an abſolute power to be gouernor of the ſtate, but aſpiring according to the common deſires of great men, to make themſelues glorious with titles and honors; and ſpeciallie he iudged, that both for his proper ſuertie and the ſucceſſion of his children, the death of the lawfull prince was neceſſarie, and therefore thought to eſtabliſh in himſelfe the power and name of duke. Wherein ambition and couetouſneſſe preuailed aboue conſcience and law of nature, and the gealous deſire of dominion inforced his diſpoſition (otherwiſe abhorring bloud) to that vile action.

But to end with king Richard ſometimes duke of Gloceſter, a title of dignitie ioined with miſfortune and vnluckineſſe (as is noted * before.) So that for infelicitie it might well be compared vnto the name of Ione, a name vnhappie and much accurſſed for the kingdome of Naples. As for king Richard, better had it béene for him to haue contented his heart with the protectorſhip, than to haue caſt vp his ſnout, or lifted vp his hornes of ambition ſo high (and that with a ſetled intent) as to hacke and hew downe by violent blowes all likelie impediments betwixt him and home. Better (I ſay) had it béene for him to haue dwelt vpon his firſt honor, than to haue wandered in princelineſſe; and better had it béene for him neuer to haue inioied the flattering proſperitie of a king, than afterwards to fall, and neuer to recouer loſſe or ruine, as is noted by the poet, ſaieng:

Eſt melius nunquam felicia tempora noſſe,
Quàm poſt blanditias fortunæ, fata maligna
Nec reparanda pati infortunia ſortis iniquæ.]

The death of of William Dudleie, biſhop of Durham, deſcended of the honorable houſe of the Dudleies.

¶In this yere 1483 died William Dudleie who (by the tranſlation of Laurence Booth biſhop of Durham and chancellor of England from the ſée of Durham to the citie of Yorke) was made biſhop of Durham (in place of the ſaid Laurence) by the popes bulles. For by vertue thereof, Edward the fourth in the ſixtéenth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of Chriſt 1476, directed his letters patents to the knights and other frée men of that biſhoprike, with all ſolemnitie to inſtall the ſaid William Dudleie (borne of the honorable houſe of the lords Dudleies) in the ſaid biſhoprike of Durham, and to deliuer him quiet poſſeſſion therof, who was conſecrated thereunto in the yeare of Chriſt 1477, in which he worthilie gouerned ſix yeares, and died in this yeare, as before.]

Now of learned men that liued, and wrote in the daies of this vſurper and his nephue king Edward the fift, theſe we find recorded by Iohn Bale. Firſt, Iohn Penketh an Auguſtine frier of Warington in Lancaſhire, a right ſubtill fellow in diſputation, following the footſteps of his maſter Iohn Duns, whome he chieflie ſtudied, he wrote diuers treatiſes, and made that infamous ſermon at Paules croſſe, in fauour of the duke of Gloceſter then protector, to the diſheriting of Edward the fift, his lawfull king and gouernor; Iohn Kent or Caileie borne in Southwales; George Ripleie, firſt a chanon of Bridlington, and after a Carmelit frier in Boſton, a great mathematician, rhetorician, and poet; Iohn Spine a Carmelit frier of Briſtow, that procéeded doctor of diuinitie in Cambridge: and ſuch like.

Thus farre Richard the vſurper, vnnaturall vncle to Edward the fift and Richard duke of Yorke, brethren.

Henrie the ſeauenth, ſonne to Edmund earle of Richmond, which Edmund was brother by the moothers ſide to Henrie the ſixt.

Anno Reg. 1.

KIng Henrie hauing thus got the victorie at Boſworth, and ſlaine his mortall enimie there in the field, did ſend before his departure from Leiceſter, ſir Robert Willoughbie knight, to the manour of Sheriffehuton in the countie of Yorke, for Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwike, ſonne and heire to George duke of Clarence then being of the age of fiftéene yeares; whome king Richard had kept there as priſoner during the time of his vſurped reigne. Sir Robert Willoughbie receiuing the yoong earle of the conſtable of that caſtell conueied him to London, where he was ſhut vp in the Tower, for doubt leaſt ſome vnquiet and euill diſpoſed perſons might inuent ſome occaſion of new trouble by this yoong gentleman: and therefore king Henrie thought good to haue him ſure.

Edward Plantagenet earle of Warwike ſonne and heire to George duke of Clarence committed to the Tower.

There was beſide him in the caſtell of Sheriffehuton the ladie Elizabeth eldeſt daughter to king Edward the fourth, whome king Richard (as ye haue heard) meant to haue married: but God otherwiſe ordeined for hir, and preſerued hir from that vnlawfull copulation and inceſtuous bed. Shortlie after, ſhe being accompanied with a great number as well of noblemen, as honourable matrons, was with good ſpéed conueied to London, and brought to hir mother. In the meane ſeaſon king Henrie remooued forward by ſoft iournies towards London, the people comming in from all ſides to behold him, and excéedinglie reioiſing at his preſence, as by their voices and geſtures it well appeared.

King Henrie commeth to London.

At his approching néere to the citie, the maior and his brethren, with other worſhipfull citizens, being clothed in violet, met him at Shordich, and reuerentlie ſaluted him: and ſo with great pompe and triumph he rode thorough the citie to the cathedrall church of S. Paule, where he offered thrée ſtandards. In the one was the image of ſaint George, in an other was a red fierie dragon beaten vpon white and gréene ſarcenet, and in the third was painted a dun cow vpon yellow tarterne. After his praiers ſaid, and Te Deum ſoong, he departed to the biſhops palace, and there ſoiourned a ſeaſon. Anon after, he aſſembled togither the ſage councellors of the realme, in which councell like a prince of iuſt faith, and true of promiſe, to auoid all ciuill diſcord, he appointed a daie to ioine in marriage with the ladie Elizabeth, heire of the houſe of Yorke; with his noble perſonage, heire to the line of Lancaſter. Which thing not onelie reioiſed the hearts of the nobles and gentlemen of the realme, but alſo gained the fauours and good wils of all the commons.

After this, with great pompe he rowed vnto Weſtminſter, & there the thirtith daie of October he was with all ceremonies accuſtomed, annointed, & crowned king, by the whole aſſent as well of the commons as of the nobilitie, and called Henrie the ſeauenth of that name: which was in the yeare of the world 5452, and after the birth of our Lord 1485, in the fortie and ſixt yeare of Frederike the third then emperour of Almaine, Maximilian his ſonne being newlie elected king of the Romans, in the ſecond yeare of Charles the eight then king of France, and in the fiue and twentith of king Iames then ruling the realme of Scotland. For the eſtabliſhing of all things, as well touching the preſeruation of his owne eſtate, as the commendable adminiſtration of iuſtice and preferrement of the common wealth of his realme, he called his high court of parlement at Weſtminſter the ſeauenth daie of Nouember, wherein was atteinted Richard late duke of Glouceſter, calling and naming himſelfe by vſurpation, king Richard the third.

Henrie the ſeuenth crowned king.

A parlement at Weſtminſter, with an atteindor and a pardon generall.

Likewiſe there was atteinted as chéefe aiders and aſſiſtants to him in the battell at Boſworth, aduanced againſt the preſent king, Iohn late duke of Norfolke, Thomas earle of Surrie, Francis Louell knight vicount Louell, Walter Deuereux knight late lord Ferrers, Iohn lord Zouch, Robert Harrington, Richard Charleton, Richard Ratcliffe, William Berkeleie of Weleie, Robert Middleton, Iames Harrington, Robert Brakenberie, Thomas Pilkington, Walter Hopton, William Cateſbie, Roger Wake, William Sapcote of the countie of Huntington, Humfrie Stafford, William Clerke of Wenlocke, Geffrie ſaint Germaine, Richard Watkins herald of armes, Richard Reuell of Derbiſhire, Thomas Pulter of the countie of Kent, Iohn Welſh otherwiſe called Haſtings, Iohn Kendall late ſecretarie to the ſaid Richard late duke of Glouceſter, Iohn Bucke, Andrew Rat, and William Brampton of Burford.

In which atteindor neuertheleſſe there were diuerſe clauſes and prouiſos for the benefit of their wiues and other perſons, that had or might claime anie right, title, or intereſt lawfullie vnto anie caſtels, manours, lordſhips, townes, towneſhips, honours, lands, tenements, rents, ſeruices, fée farmes, annuities, knights fées, aduouſons, reuerſions, remainders, and other hereditaments; whereof the ſaid perſons atteinted were poſſeſſed or ſeized to the vſes of ſuch other perſons: with a ſpeciall prouiſo alſo, that the ſaid atteindor ſhould not be preiudiciall to Iohn Cateſbie knight, Thomas Reuell, and William Aſhbie eſquiers, in, of, & vpon the manour of Kirkebie vpon Wretheke in the countie of Leiceſter, nor in, of, and vpon anie other lands and tenements in Kirkebie aforeſaid, Melton, Somerbie, Thropſeghfield, and Godebie, which they had of the gift & feoffement of Thomas Dauers, & Iohn Lie. And further, notwithſtanding this atteindor, diuerſe of the ſaid perſons afterwards were not onelie by the king pardoned, but alſo reſtored to their lands and liuings.

Moreouer, in this preſent parlement, he cauſed proclamation to be made, that all men were pardoned and acquited of their offenſes, which would ſubmit themſelues to his mercie, and receiue an oth to be true and faithfull vnto him: whereupon manie that came out of ſanctuaries and other places were receiued to grace, and admitted for his ſubiects. After this, he began to remember his ſpeciall fréends, of whome ſome he aduanced to honour and dignitie, and ſome he inriched with goods and poſſeſſions, euerie man according to his deſerts and merits. And to begin, his vncle Iaſper earle of Penbroke, he created duke of Bedford; Thomas lord Stanleie was created earle of Derbie; and the lord Chendew of Britaine his eſpeciall fréend, he made earle of Bath; ſir Giles Daubeneie was made lord Daubeneie; ſir Robert Willoughbie was made lord Broke. And Edward Stafford eldeſt ſonne to Henrie late duke of Buckingham, he reſtored to his name, dignitie, & poſſeſſions, which by king Richard were confiſcat and atteinted. Beſide this, in this parlement was this notable act aſſented to and concluded as followeth; to the pleaſure of almightie God, wealth, proſperitie, and ſuertie of this realme of England, and to the ſingular comfort of all the kings ſubiects of the ſame, in auoiding all ambiguities and queſtions.

The king aduanceth his fréends.

An act for the eſtabliſhing of the crowne in the line of Henrie the ſeauenth.

BE it ordeined, eſtabliſhed, and enacted by this preſent parlement, that the inheritance of the crowne of this realme of England, & alſo of France, with all the preheminence, and dignitie roiall to the ſame apperteining, all other ſeigniories to the king belonging beyond the ſea, with the appurtenances thereto in anie wiſe due or apperteining, ſhall reſt, remaine, and abide, in the moſt roiall perſon of our now ſoureigne lord king Henrie the ſeuenth, and in the heires of his bodie lawfullie comming, perpetuallie, with the grace of God ſo to indure, and in none other.

Beſide this act, all atteindors of this king enacted by king Edward and king Richard were adnihilated, and the record of the ſame iudged to be defaced; and all perſons atteinted for his cauſe and occaſion were reſtored to their goods, lands, and poſſeſſions. Diuerſe acts alſo made in the time of king Edward and king Richard were reuoked, and other adiudged more expedient for the common wealth were put in their places and concluded. After the diſſolution of this parlement, the king remembring his fréends left in hoſtage beyond the ſeas, that is to wit, the marqueſſe Dorſet, & ſir Iohn Bourchier, he with all conuenient ſpéed redéemed them, and ſent alſo into Flanders for Iohn Morton biſhop of Elie. Theſe acts performed, he choſe to be of his councell a conuenient number of right graue and wiſe councellors.

The king redemeth his hoſtages.

¶ This did he, that he might the more roiallie gouerne his kingdome, which he obteined and inioied as a thing by God elected and prouided, and by his eſpeciall fauour and gratious aſpect compaſſed and atchiued. Inſomuch that men commonlie report that ſeauen hundred nintie & ſeauen yéeres paſſed, it was by a heauenlie voice reuealed to Cadwalader laſt king of Britains, that his ſtocke & progenie ſhould reigne in this land & beare dominion againe. Whervpon moſt men were perſuaded in their owne opinion, that by this heauenlie voice he was prouided & ordeined long before to inioy & obteine this kingdome. Which thing K. Henrie the ſixt did alſo ſhew before, as it were by propheticall inſpiration, at ſuch time as the earle of Penbroke preſented the ſaid Henrie (at that time a proper child) vnto Henrie the ſixt, whome after he had beheld, and a good while viewed the comelineſſe of his countenance, and orderlie lineaments of his bodie, he ſaid to ſuch péeres as ſtood about him: Lo, ſuerlie this is he, to whome both we and our aduerſaries, leauing the poſſeſſion of all things, ſhall hereafter giue roome and place: & ſo it came to paſſe by the appointment of God, to whoſe gouernement, gift, and diſpoſing, all realmes and all dominions are ſubiect, as king Dauid confeſſeth, ſaieng:

Omnia ſunt regno ſubdita regna Deo.]

Now although by this meanes all things ſéemed to be brought in good and perfect order, yet there lacked a wreſt to the harpe, to ſet all the ſtrings in a monocord and perfect tune, which was the matrimonie to be finiſhed betwéene the king and the ladie Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward. Which like a good prince, according to his oth, & promiſe, he did both ſolemnize & conſummate ſhortlie after, that is to ſaie, on the eightéenth daie of Ianuarie. By reaſon of which marriage, peace was thought to deſcend out of heauen into England, conſidering that the lines of Lancaſter and Yorke were now brought into one knot, and connexed togither, of whoſe two bodies one heire might ſucceed to rule and inioie the whole monarchie and realme of England, which before was rent and diuided into factions & partakings, whereby manie a mans life was loſt, great ſpoiles made of peoples goods, waſt of wealth, worſhip, and honor, all which ended in this bleſſed and gratious connexion, authoriſed by God, as our Anglorum prælia ſaith:

Hoc Deus omnipotens pacis confecerat author,
Ciuiliſque habuit talem contentio finem.

King Henrie the ſeuenth taketh to wife Elizabeth eldeſt daughter of Edward the fourth.

In Hen.7.

Shortlie after, for the better preſeruation of his roiall perſon, he conſtituted and ordeined a certeine number, as well of archers, as of diuerſe other perſons, hardie, ſtrong, and actiue to giue dailie attendance on his perſon, whom he named yeomen of his gard, which preſident men thought that he learned of the French king when he was in France. For it is not remembred, that anie king of England before that daie vſed anie ſuch furniture of dailie ſouldiers.

yeomen of the gard firſt brought in.

¶ In this ſame yéere a new kind of ſickenes inuaded ſuddenlie the people of this land, paſſing through the ſame from the one end to the other. It began about the one and twentith of September, and continued vntill the latter end of October, being ſo ſharpe and deadlie, that the like was neuer heard of to anie mans remembrance before that time.

For ſuddenlie a deadlie burning ſweat ſo aſſailed their bodies, and diſtempered their bloud with a moſt ardent heat, that ſcarſe one amongſt an hundred that ſickened did eſcape with life: for all in maner as ſoone as the ſweat tooke them, or within a ſhort time after, yéelded the ghoſt. Beſide the great number which deceaſſed within the citie of London, two maiors ſucceſſiuelie died within eight daies and ſix aldermen. At length, by the diligent obſeruation of thoſe that eſcaped (which marking what things had doone them good, and holpen to their deliuerance, vſed the like againe. When they fell into the ſame diſeaſe, the ſecond or third time, as to diuerſe it chanced, a remedie was found for that mortall maladie, which was this. If a man on the day time were taken with the ſweat, then ſhould he ſtreight lie downe with all his clothes and garments, and continue in his ſweat foure and twentie houres, after ſo moderate a ſort as might be.

If in the night he chanced to be taken, then ſhould he not riſe out of his bed for the ſpace of foure and twentie houres, ſo caſting the clothes that he might in no wiſe prouoke the ſweat, but lie ſo temperatlie, that the water might diſtill out ſoftlie of the owne accord, and to abſteine from all meat if he might ſo long ſuffer hunger, and to take no more drinke neither hot nor cold, than would moderatelie quench and aſſwage his thirſtie appetite. Thus with lukewarme drinke, temperate heate, and meaſurable cloaths manie eſcaped: few which vſed this order (after it was found out) died of that ſweat. Marie one point diligentlie aboue all other in this cure is to be obſerued, that he neuer did put his hand or feet out of the bed to refreſh or coole himſelfe, which to doo is no leſſe ieopardie than ſhort and preſent death. Thus this diſeaſe comming in the firſt yeare of king Henries reigne, was iudged (of ſome) to be a token and ſigne of a troublous reigne of the ſame king, as the proofe partlie afterwards ſhewed it ſelfe.

The king requeſted a preſt of ſix thouſand markes.

The king ſtanding in need of monie to diſcharge ſuch debts, and to mainteine ſuch port as was behouefull, ſent the lord treaſuror with maiſter Reginald Braie, and others, vnto the lord maior of London, requiring of the citie a preſt of ſix thouſand marks. Whervpon the ſaid lord maior and his brethren, with the commons of the citie, granted a preſt of two thouſand pounds, which was leuied of the companies, and not of the wards: and in the yeare next inſuing, it was well and trulie againe repaid euerie penie, to the good contentation and ſatiſfieng of them that diſburſed it. The king conſidering that the ſuertie of his roiall eſtate and defenſe of the realme conſiſted cheefelie in good lawes and ordinances to be had and obſerued among his people, ſummoned eftſoones his high court of parlement, therein to deuiſe and eſtabliſh ſome profitable acts and ſtatutes, for the wealth and commoditie of his people.

A parlement ſummoned & new lawes for the commonwealth enacted.

The king goeth into the North.

After this, hauing ſet things in quiet about London, he tooke his iournie into the North parts, there to purge all the dregs of malicious treſon that might reſt in the hearts of vnquiet perſons, and namelie in Yorkeſhire, where the people bare more fauour vnto king Richard in his life time, than thoſe of anie other part of the realme had commonlie doone. He kept the feaſt of Eaſter at Lincolne; where he was certified that the lord Louell and Humfrie Stafford, and Thomas Stafford, his brother, were departed out of the ſanctuarie at Colcheſter, to what place or whither, no man as yet could tell. The king little regarding the matter, kept on his iournie, and came to Yorke, where as ſoone as he was once ſetled, it was openlie ſhewed and declared for a truth to the king himſelfe, that Francis lord Louell was at hand with a ſtrong and mightie power of men, and would with all diligence inuade the citie.

A rebellion made by the lord Louell and others.

Humfrie Stafford. Thomas Stafford.

It was alſo told him, that the forenamed Staffords were in Worceſterſhire, and had raiſed a great band of the countrie people and commons there, and had caſt lots what part ſhould aſſault the gates, what men ſhould ſcale the wals of the citie of Worceſter, and who ſhould let the paſſages for letting of reſcues and aiders. The king could not beleeue this report to be true at the firſt, but after that, by letters of credence ſent from his freends, he was fullie perſuaded that it was too true, he was put in no ſmall feare, and not without great cauſe. For he wiſelie conſidered, that he neither had anie competent armie readie, nor conuenient furniture to arme them that were preſent; and alſo he was in ſuch place, where he could not aſſemble anie power, but of thoſe whome he ſore miſtruſted, as freends to them that were moſt his enimies; the memorie of king Richard as yet being not amongſt them forgotten nor worne out of mind.

The duke of Bedford againſt the lord Louell in armes.

But bicauſe the matter required quicke expedition, he appointed the duke of Bedford with three thouſand men not altogither the beſt armed (for their breſt plates for the moſt part were of tanned leather) to march forth againſt the lord Louell, and to ſet vpon him without anie lingering of time. The duke haſting forward, approched to the campe of his enimies, & before he would aſſaile them, he cauſed the heralds to make proclamation, that all thoſe that would depart from their armour, and ſubmit themſelues as ſubiects vnto their naturall prince and ſoucreigne lord, ſhould be pardoned of all former offenſes. The lord Louell vpon this proclamation, either putting miſtruſt in his ſouldiers, or fearing himſelfe in his owne behalfe, fled priuilie in a night from his companie, and left them as a flocke of ſheepe without a ſheepeheard.

The lord Louell eſcapeth.

Which departure of the lord when his armie vnderſtood, it put the ſoldiours in ſuch deſpaire of atchiuing anie further enterpriſe, that they immediatlie put off their armour, and came directlie vnto the duke, euerie man humblie ſubmitting himſelfe, and deſiring pardon of his offenſes. So in this wiſe was that dangerous ſtorme and cruell rage of thoſe furious rebels appeaſed, which was doubted would haue growne to the deſtruction of manie a man. The lord Louell the procurer of this buſineſſe, eſcaping awaie got him into Lancaſhire, and there for a certeine ſpace lay lurking in ſecret with ſir Thomas Broughton knight, which in thoſe parties was a man of no ſmall authoritie and power.

Sir Humfrie Stafford taken out of Colnham ſanctuarie, and executed.

Sir Humfreie Stafford alſo, hearing what had happened to the lord Louell, in great diſpleaſure and ſorrowe, and for feare leſt his enterpriſe, and in like manner fled, and tooke ſanctuarie at Colnham, a village not paſt two miles from Abindon. But bicauſe that ſanctuarie was not a ſufficient defenſe (as was prooued before the iuſtices of the kings Bench) for traitours, he was taken from that place, & brought to the Tower, & after put to execution at Tiborne: but his brother Thomas that was with him, was pardoned, bicauſe he was thought not to haue attempted anie thing of himſelfe otherwiſe than by the euill counſell and perſuaſion of his elder brother. After that the king had quieted all theſe commotions and tumults, and reformed the rude and brabling people of the North parts, he returned to London.

Anno Reg. 2.

Abr. Fl. ex epitome Rich. Grafton.

One of the maiors officers choſen ſhiriffe of London and lord maior.

¶In this yeare Iohn Perſiuall, one of the maior of Londons officers, and his caruer, was choſen one of the ſhiriffes of London. For when the maior (as the cuſtome of London is) dooth elect one of the ſhiriffes of London for the yeare inſuing, by taking and drinking a cup of wine to ſuch a one as he luſt to name ſhiriffe; the maior for the time being, whoſe name was ſir Henrie Collet, tooke the cup of wine, and dranke vnto the aforeſaid Iohn Perſiuall his caruer ſtanding bareheaded before him, and waiting vpon his boord, and called him ſhiriffe of London for the yeare inſuing: and forthwith the ſaid maior cauſed the ſame Perſiuall to ſit downe at his owne table, and to couer his head. And the ſame Perſiuall tooke vpon him the office of ſhirialtie, and after was maior of London, and was made knight.]

In this meane time, of a ſmall matter, and the ſame altogither falſe and fained, there was an open path made and beaten forth, for a greater inconuenience to inſue. The which matter might ſeeme verie ſtrange, how ſuch trouble and miſcheefe ſhould grow thereof, if the time were not conſidered, in which it happened. For in thoſe daies manie perſons, either borne in the wombe of continuall diſſention, or nouriſhed with the milke of ciuill ſedition, could not forbeare their vſuall cuſtome of mouing ſtrife, and ſowing debate, euer glad to haue anie occaſion, though neuer ſo ſmall, to ſtirre vprores of warre, and ſlaughter of people. Which men if they knew (a matter of weightie conceipt) the hurts thereof, they would be as earneſt in ſeeking after peace as they are greedie in purſuit of warre, ſpeciallie ciuill warre: but the cauſe whie they are defectiue therein, is the want of meekeneſſe and humilitie, as the wiſeman ſaith:

Mite cor horribili ſeditione vacat.

Sir Richard Simond a fraudulent preeſt.

Lambert Simenell the counterfeit earle of Warwike.

Amongſt other ſuch monſters and limmes of the diuell, there was one ſir Richard Simond preeſt, a man of baſe birth, and yet well learned, but not ſo learned as wilie, nor ſo wilie as vngratious, delighting in fraud & deceit, euen from his youth. He had a ſcholer called Lambert Simenell, one of a gentle nature and pregnant wit, to be the organe and cheefe inſtrument, by the which he might conueie and bring to paſſe his miſcheeuous attempt. The diuell cheefe maſter of ſuch practiſes, put in the venemous braine of this diſloiall and traitorous preeſt, to deuiſe how he might make his ſcholer the foreſaid Lambert to be reputed as right inheritour to the crowne of this realme: namelie, for that the fame went that king Edwards children were not dead, but fled ſecretlie into ſome ſtrange place, and there to be liuing: and that Edward earle of Warwike, ſonne and heire to the duke of Clarence, either was, or ſhortlie ſhould be put to death.

Theſe rumors though they ſeemed not to be grounded of anie likelihood to the wiſer ſort of men, yet incouraged this peeuiſh prieſt to thinke the time come, that his ſcholer Lambert might take vpon him the perſon and name of one of king Edwards children. And herevpon at Oxford, where their abiding was, the ſaid preeſt inſtructed his pupill both with princelie behauiour, ciuill maners, and good literature, declaring to him of what linage he ſhould affirme himſelfe to be deſcended, and omitted nothing that might ſerue for his purpoſe. Soone after, the rumor was blowne abroad, that the earle of Warwike was broken out of priſon. And when the preeſt ſir Richard Simond heard of this, he ſtreight intended now by that occaſion to bring his inuented purpoſe to paſſe, and changing the childes name of baptiſme, called him Edward, after the name of the yoong earle of Warwike, the which were both of like yeares, and of like ſtature.

Thomas Gerardine chancellor of Ireland interteineth the counterfeit earle verie honorablie.

Then he with his ſcholer ſailed into Ireland, where he ſo ſet forth the matter vnto the nobilitie of that countrie, that not onelie the lord Thomas Gerardine chancellor of that land deceiued through his craftie tale, receiued the counterfeit earle into his caſtell with all honour and reuerence; but alſo manie other noble men determined to aid him (with all their powers) as one deſcended of the bloud roiall, and lineallie come of the houſe of Yorke, which the Iriſh people euermore highlie fauoured, honoured, and loued aboue all other. By this meanes euerie man throughout all Ireland was willing and readie to take his part, and to ſubmit themſelues to him; alreadie reputing and calling him of all hands king. So that now they of this ſect (by the aduiſe of the preeſt) ſent into England certeine priuie meſſengers to get freends heere.

Margaret ducheſſe of Burgognie ſiſter to king Edward the fourth, hir malicious mind to Lancaſter houſe.

Alſo they ſent into Flanders to the ladie Margaret, ſiſter to king Edward, & late wife to Charles duke of Burgognie, to purchaſe aid and helpe at hir hands. This ladie Margaret bare no ſmall rule in the low countries, and in verie deed ſore grudged in hir heart, that king Henrie (being deſcended of the houſe of Lancaſter) ſhould reigne and gouerne the realme of England: and therefore, though ſhe well vnderſtood that this was but a coloured matter; yet to worke hir malicious intention againſt king Henrie, ſhe was glad to haue ſo fit an occaſion: and therefore promiſed the meſſengers all the aid that ſhe ſhould be able to make in furtherance of the quarell; and alſo to procure all the freends ſhe could in other places, to be aiders and partakers of the ſame conſpiracie.

A generall pardon excepting no offenſe.

Order taken that the yoong earle of Warwike ſhould be ſhewed abroad.

King Henrie aduertiſed of all theſe doings, was greatlie vexed therewith: and therefore to haue good aduiſe in the matter, he called togither his councell at the Charterhouſe beſide his manor of Richmond, and there conſulted with them, by which means beſt this begun conſpiracie might be appeaſed and diſappointed without more diſturbance. It was therefore determined, that a generall pardon ſhould be publiſhed to all offendors that were content to receiue the ſame. This pardon was ſo freelie granted, that no offenſe was excepted, no not ſo much as high treaſon committed againſt the kings roiall perſon. It was further agreed in the ſame councell for the time then preſent, that the earle of Warwike ſhould perſonallie be ſhewed abroad in the citie, and other publike places: whereby the vntrue report falſelie ſpred abroad, that he ſhould be in Ireland, might be among the communaltie proued and knowne for a vaine imagined lie.

Ladie Elizabeth late wife to king Edward the fourth, adiudged to forfeit all hir lands, for promiſe-breaking.

In this ſolemne councell, diuerſe & manie things for the wealth of the realme were debated and concluded. And among other it was determined, that the ladie Elizabeth wife to king Edward the fourth, ſhould looſe and forfeit all hir lands and poſſeſſions, bicauſe ſhe had voluntarilie ſubmitted hir ſelfe and hir daughters wholie to the hands of king Richard, contrarie to hir promiſe made to the lords and nobles of this realme in the beginning of the conſpiracie made againſt king Richard, whereby ſhe did inough to haue quailed all the purpoſe of them that ioined with hir in that matter. But though hir fault was greeuous, yet was it iudged by ſome men that ſhe deſerued not by equitie of iuſtice ſo great a loſſe and puniſhment. Howbeit, this iudgement was altogither affectionate and parciall in hir behalfe; beſides that it was reaſonable in great meaſure (all circumſtances conſidered) for ſhe was not lightlie induced to doo as ſhe did, neither ſtood it with the frailtie of a woman to withſtand the temptations of a mightie man, or rather a reaching tyrant.

Queenes colledge in Cambridge founded by the ladie Elizabeth king Edward the fourth his wife.

But ſuch was hir chance by hir lightneſſe and inconſtancie, that ſhe wan the diſpleaſure of manie men, and for that cauſe liued after in the abbeie of Bermondſeie beſide Southwarke a wretched and a miſerable life, where not manie yeares after ſhe deceaſſed, and is buried with hir huſband at Windſore. Though fortune thus ruleth manie things at hir pleſure, yet one worke that this queene accompliſhed cannot be forgotten; for in the life time of hir huſband king Edward the fourth, ſhe founded and erected a notable colledge in the vniuerſitie of Cambridge, for the finding of ſcholers and ſtudents of the ſame vniuerſitie, and endowed it with ſufficient poſſeſſions for the long maintenance of the ſame, which at this daie is called the Queenes colledge.

When all things in this counſell were ſagelie concluded and agreed to the kings mind, he returned to London; giuing in commandement, that the next ſundaie inſuing, Edward the yoong earle of Warwike wike ſhould be brought from the Tower through the moſt publike ſtreets in all London, to the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule, where he went openlie in proceſſion, that euerie man might ſée him, hauing communication with manie noble men, and with them eſpeciallie that were ſuſpected to be partakers of the late begun conſpiracie; that they might perceiue how the Iriſhmen vpon a vaine ſhadowe mooued warre againſt the king and his realme. But this medicine little auailed euill diſpoſed perſons. For the earle of Lincolne ſonne to Iohn de la Poole duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth ſiſter to king Edward the fourth, thought it not méet to neglect and omit ſo readie an occaſion of new trouble.

An ill matter followed to the prooſe.

Wherefore they determined to vphold the enterpriſe of the Iriſhmen, and other complices of this conſpiracie: ſo that conſulting with ſir Thomas Broughton, and certeine other of his moſt truſtie freends, he purpoſed to ſaile into Flanders to his aunt the ladie Margaret ducheſſe of Burgognie, truſting by hir helpe to make a puiſſant armie, and to ioine with the companions of the new raiſed ſedition. Therefore after the diſſolution of the parlement which then was holden, he fled ſecretlie into Flanders vnto the ſaid ladie Margaret; where Francis lord Louell landed certeine daies before. Héere after long conſultation had how to proceed in their buſineſſe, it was agreed, that the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louell ſhould go into Ireland; and there to attend vpon the ducheſſe hir counterfeit nephue, and to honor him as a king, and with the power of the Iriſhmen to bring him into England.

The earle of Lincolnes flight into Flanders doubted of king Henrie.

Now they concluded, that if their dooings had ſucceſſe, then the foreſaid Lambert (miſnamed the earle of Warwike) ſhould by conſent of the councell be depoſed, and Edward the true earle of Warwike deliuered out of priſon and annointed king. King Henrie ſuppoſing that no man would haue béene ſo mad as to haue attempted anie further enterpriſe in the name of that new found & counterfeit earle, he onelie ſtudied how to ſubdue the ſeditious conſpiracie of the Iriſhmen. But hearing that the earle of Lincolne was fled into Flanders, he was ſomwhat mooued therewith, and cauſed ſoldiors to be put in a readineſſe out of euerie part of his realme, and to bring them into one place aſſigned, that when his aduerſaries ſhould appeare, he might ſuddenlie ſet vpon them, vanquiſh and ouercome them.

The marques Dorſet committed to the Tower.

Thus diſpoſing things for his ſuertie, he went towards S. Edmunds burie, and being certified that the marqueſſe Dorſet was comming towards his maieſtie, to excuſe himſelfe of things that he was ſuſpected to haue doone when he was in France, he ſent the earle of Oxford to arreſt the ſaid marqueſſe by the waie, and to conueie him to the Tower of London, there to remaine till his truth might be tried. From thence the K. went forth to Norwich, and tarrieng there Chriſtmaſſe daie, he departed after to Walſingham, where he offered to the image of our ladie, and then by Cambridge he ſhortlie returned to London. In which meane time, the earle of Lincolne had gotten togither by the aid of the ladie Margaret about two thouſand Almains, with one Martine Sward, a valiant and noble capteine to lead them.

Martin Sward a valiant capteine of ỹ Almains, aſſiſtant to the earle of Lincolne.

The counterfeit earle of Warwike with all his adherents landeth in England.

With this power the earle of Lincolne ſailed into Ireland, and at the citie of Diuelin cauſed yoong Lambert to be proclaimed and named king of England, after the moſt ſolemne faſhion, as though he were the verie heire of the bloud roiall lineallie borne and deſcended. And ſo with a great multitude of beggerlie Iriſhmen, almoſt all naked and vnarmed, ſauing ſkains and mantels, of whome the lord Thomas Gerardine was capteine and conductor, they ſailed into England with this new found king, and landed for a purpoſe at the pile of Fowdreie, within a little of Lancaſter, truſting there to find aid by the means of ſir Thomas Broughton, one of the chéefe companions of the conſpiracie.

The king had knowledge of the enimies intent before their arriuall, and therefore hauing aſſembled a great armie (ouer the which the duke of Bedford, and the earle of Oxenford were chéefe capteins) he went to Couentrie, where he was aduertiſed, that the earle of Lincolne was landed at Lancaſter with his new king. Héere he tooke aduiſe of his councellors what was beſt to be doone, whether to ſet on the enimies without further delaie, or to protract time a while. But at length it was thought beſt to delaie no time, but to giue them battell, before they ſhould increaſe their power, and thervpon he remooued to Notingham, & there by a little wood called Bowres, he pitched his field.

K. Henries power ſoone increaſed.

The earle of Lincolne entreth Yorkeſhire.

Shortlie after this came to him the lord George Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, the lord Strange, ſir Iohn Cheinie, right valiant capteins, with manie other noble and expert men of warre, namelie of the countries neere adioining; ſo that the kings armie was woonderfullie increaſed. In this ſpace the earle of Lincolne being entered into Yorkeſhire, paſſed ſoftlie on his iournie without ſpoiling or hurting of anie man, truſting thereby to haue ſome companie of people reſort vnto him. But after he perceiued few or none to follow him, and that it was too late now to returne backe, he determined to trie the matter by dint of ſword, and herevpon directed his waie from Yorke to Newarke vpon Trent.

The battell of Stoke.

But before he came there, king Henrie knowing all his enimies purpoſes, came the night before the daie of the battell to Newarke; and tarrieng there a little, went thrée miles further, and pitching his field, lodged there that night. The earle of Lincolne certified of his comming, was nothing abaſhed, but kept ſtill on his iournie; and at a little village called Stoke, nigh to the king and his armie, ſet downe his campe. The next daie the king diuided his whole power into thrée battels, and after in good arraie approached nigh to the towne of Stoke. The earle likewiſe ſet forth his armie, and incountring with the kings people in a faire plaine there, meet for the triall of ſuch a conflict, ſet vpon them with a manlie courage, deſiring his ſoldiors to remember his honour and their owne liues.

The armies ioine.

Martine Sward a péerleſſe warrior.

Then both the armies ioined and fought verie earneſtlie, in ſo much that the Almains, being tried and expert men of warre, were in all things, as well in ſtrength as policie, equals and matches to the Engliſhmen. But as for Martine Sward their coronell, few of the Engliſhmen, either in valiant courage, or ſtrength, and nimbleneſſe of bodie was to him comparable. On the other ſide, the Iriſhmen, although they fought manfullie, and ſtucke to it valiantlie; yet bicauſe they were (after the maner of their countrie) almoſt naked, without anie conuenable furniture of armour, they were ſtriken downe and ſlaine like dull & brute beaſts, which was a great diſcouragement to the reſidue of the companie. Thus they fought for a ſpace ſo ſore and ſo egerlie on both parts, that no man could well iudge to whome the victorie was like to incline.

The kings power ouercommeth.

But at length the kings fore-ward being full of people, and well fortified with wings, which onelie both began and continued the fight, ſet vpon the aduerſaries with ſuch force and violence, that firſt they oppreſſed and killed ſuch capiteins, one by one, as reſiſted their might and puiſſance: and after that, put all the other to flight, the which were either apprehended as priſoners in their running awaie, or elſe ſlaine and brought vnto confuſion in a ſmall moment. Now when this battell was ended, and fought out to the extremitie, then it well appeared, what high proweſſe, what manfull ſtomachs, what hardie and couragious hearts reſted in the kings aduerſaries. For there the cheefe capteins, the earle of Lincolne, and the lord Louell, ſir Thomas Broughton, Martine Sward, and the lord Gerardine capteine of the Iriſhmen were ſlaine, and found dead in the verie places which they had choſen aliue to fight in, not giuing one foot of ground to their aduerſaries.

All the capteins of the aduerſe part againſt the king ſlaine.

Howbeit ſome affirme, that the lord Louell tooke his horſſe, and would haue fled ouer Trent, but was not able to recouer the further ſide for the highneſſe of the banke, and ſo was drowned in the riuer. There were killed at that battell, with their fiue capteins before reherſed, of that partie about foure thouſand. Of the kings part there were not halfe of them which fought in the fore-ward, and gaue the onſet ſlaine or hurt. Then was Lambert the yoongling, which was falſlie reported to be the ſonne of the duke of Clarence, and his maiſter ſir Richard Simond prieſt both taken, but neither of them put to death; bicauſe that Lambert was but an innocent, and of yeares inſufficient of himſelfe to doo any ſuch enterpriſe; and the other was pardoned of life, bicauſe he was a prieſt, and annointed man; but yet was committed to perpetuall priſon.

The number of the ſlaine that were againſt the king.

Lambert and his maiſter Simond takē.

Lambert was at length made one of the kings falconers, after that he had béene a turnebroch for a ſpace in the kings kitchen. This battell was fought on a ſaturdaie being the ſixteenth daie of Iune, in this ſecond yeere of his reigne. In this yéere died Thomas Bourchier archbiſhop of Canturburie: and Iohn Morton biſhop of Elie, a man of excellent learning, vertue and policie, ſucceeded in his place, whom Alexander pope of Rome, the ſixt of that name, created a cardinall, and the king created him alſo chancellor of England. Of which pope (hauing ſo conuenient a place to ſpeake) it were a fault to omit the ambition, accompanied with other diſorders vnbeſéeming a ſucceſſor of Peter (but neither perſonallie nor locallie) as all the brood of them brag of themſelues, & will be intituled with a primaſie, vſurped.

Morton biſhop of Elie made archbiſhop of Canturburie and chancellor of England.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag 4, 5.

Creation of pope Alexander the ſixt, Otherwiſe called Roderike Borgia borne at Venice.

¶ This Alexander the ſixt pope of that name, was ſometime an ancient cardinall, and one of the greateſt in all the court of Rome. One meane that raiſed him to the ſeat of the pope, was the difference betweene the cardinals Aſcanius Sforce, and Iulian S. Petri ad Vincula: but the chiefeſt thing that accompliſhed his election, was, that with a new example for that time, he bought by the conſent and knowledge of euerie one, partlie for monie, and partlie with promiſes of offices and great dignities, manie voices of the cardinals, who reiecting the inſtruction of the goſpell, were not aſhamed to paſſe to him by ſale, an authoritie and power to make merchandize of the holie treſures, & that with the name of the celeſtiall authoritie in the moſt high part of the temple.

Corruption of Cardinals in the election of the pope.

To which abhominable & too too prophane negotiation manie of them were induced by the cardinall Aſcanius, but that was not more with perſuaſions and ſutes, than with his example: for that being corrupted with the infinit deſire of riches, he made the pope promiſe him for his hire and recompenſe of ſo great wickedneſſe, the office of vicechancellorſhip (the principalleſt place in the court of Rome) togither with benefices, caſtels, and his palace of Rome full of mooueables of great valour. But the pope for all this could not auoid; neither for the time to come, the iudgment and iuſtice of God; nor for the preſent, the infamie and iuſt hate of men, in whom for this election was no ſmall impreſſions of aſtoniſhment and horror, not onelie for that it was intangled with meanes diſhoneſt, but alſo bicauſe the natures and conditions of the man choſen, were (for the greateſt part) knowen to manie.

Manie ſentences and coniectures were made of his ſucceſſe. And amongſt other, Ferdinand king of Naples, diſſembling openlie the griefe he had of that election, ſignified to the quéene his wife with teares (which he was woont to forbeare euen in the death of his children) that there was created a pope who wold be moſt hurtfull to Italie, and the whole common weale of chriſtendome. A iudgement not vnworthie of the wiſedome of ſuch a prince: for that in Alexander the ſixt (for ſo would this new pope be called) was a ſubtiltie, ſharpeneſſe, and expedition of wit moſt ſingular, a counſell excellent, a woonderfull efficacie in perſuaſion, and in all great affaires a iudgement and care incredible. But theſe vertues were maruellouſlie defaced by his vices, for touching his maners and cuſtomes, they were verie diſhoneſt, in his adminiſtrations he expreſſed little ſinceritie, in his countenance no ſhame, in his words ſmall truth, in his heart little faith, and in his opinion leſſe religion. Of the contrarie, all his actions were defiled with an inſatiable couetouſneſſe, and immoderate ambition, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning deſire to raiſe and make great (by what meanes ſoeuer) his children, who were manie in number; and amongſt others, one no leſſe deteſtable than the father, to whoſe curſed counſels he became a wicked inſtrument. Thus much (by waie of digreſſion) of Alexander, a pope (as you heare) well qualified, and therefore forward enough to creat cardinals both in England and elſewhere of like diſpoſition. But to returne to the ſtorie.]

Pope Alexander the ſixt corrupted with manie vices.

After that the king had got the vpper hand of his enimies, he remooued to Lincolne, and there taried thrée dais, cauſing euerie of the ſame daies ſolemne proceſſions to be made in rendering thanks to God for his fortunate victorie. Then cauſed he execution to be done, of ſuch rebels & traitors as were taken in the field, either at the battell, or in the chaſe. And ſhortlie after he went into Yorkſhire, & there coaſted the countrie ouerthwart, ſearching out ſuch as had aided his enimies, and were thought to be ſeditious perſons, whome he puniſhed, ſome by impriſonment, ſome by fines, and ſome by death: according to the qualitie of their offenſes, and as was thought moſt expedient [not by extremitie of rigor inclining to tyrannie, but by due moderation of iuſtice tempering execution with clemencie; according to the good rule of iuſtice preſcribed by the wiſe mans, ſaieng:

Thanks giuen to God after victorie.

Execution vpon the offendors.

Sobria commiſſum plectat clementia crimen,
Parua negat pœnam culpa ſubire grauem.]

Gu. Ha. in eccle. cap. 10.

Anno. Reg. 3.

About the middeſt of Auguſt entering into the third yere of his reigne, he came to Newcaſtell vpon Tine, and from thence ſent in ambaſſage into Scotland Richard Fox, latelie before made biſhop of Exceſter, and with him Richard Edgecombe knight, controller of his houſe, to conclude ſome peace or truce with king Iames of Scotland. The Engliſh ambaſſadors were honorablie receiued, and louinglie interteined of the ſaid king, who gladlie would haue concluded a perpetuall peace with the king of England, if he might haue bene licenced ſo to haue doone: but his people being ſtedfaſt in their old accuſtomed vſage, would not agrée to anie peace, but yet were contented to gratifie their king, that he ſhould take truce with England for the tearme of ſeuen yeares, which was concluded.

Fox biſhop of Exceſter ſent ambaſſador into Scotland.

A truce with Scotland for ſeuen yeares.

Then was ſecret promiſe made by king Iames, that he would not onlie obſerue peace, & continue in perfect amitie with the king of England during his life, but alſo would renew againe this truce new taken for other ſeuen yeers, before the firſt ſeuen yeers were fullie expired. The king of Scots indéed was as deſirous of the king of Englands friendſhip, as the king of England was of his: bicauſe that his ſubiects bare him much euill will, miſliking with all things that either he could doo or ſaie. [So that his regiment was no longer liked, than they were in a good mood, which was when they were well minded; and that was neuer: for that if by gentleneſſe he allured them, they eſteemed him a flatterer; if by ſeueritie, a tyrant. And therefore it ſtood him vpon to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt ſuch a people, of whoſe pleaſure & diſpleaſure depended his eſtate.]

King Henrie returneth out of the north countrie.

K. Henrie after the returne of his ambaſſadors out of Scotland, came from Newcaſtell to Yorke, and ſo toward London, and in the way being at Leiceſter, there came to him ambaſſadors from Charles the French king, which declared both the recouerie of certeine townes out of the hands of Maximilian king of Romans, which he had wrongfullie deteined from the crowne of France before that time; and alſo that their maiſter king Charles had now wars in hand againſt Francis duke of Britaine, bicauſe that he ſuccoured and mainteined diuers noble men, as the duke of Orleance and others, that were rebels and traitors, againſt him and the realme of France. Wherefore his requeſt was, that for the old familiaritie that had bene betwixt them, he would either aſſiſt and helpe him, or elſe ſtand neuter betwixt them, neither helping nor yet hurting the one nor the other.

The French kings requeſt for aid againſt Frãcis duke of Britaine.

Vpon good and deliberate aduiſe taken in this matter, bicauſe it was iudged weightie, the king for anſwer told the French ambaſſadors, that he would neither ſpare paine nor coſt, to ſet ſome reaſonable ſtaie betwixt their ſoueraigne lord king Charles, and the duke of Britaine: ſo that a finall end and ſome perfect concluſion of friendſhip might be had betwixt them. And ſo as ſoone as the French ambaſſadors were returned home, the king ſent his chapleine Chriſtopher Vrſwike ouer into France to king Charles, as well to ſhew that he was glad of the victorie which he had againſt Maximilian; as to declare what a tempeſtuous ſtorme of ciuill rebellion himſelfe had eſcaped & ouercome heere in England.

King Henries offer to make an attonement betwixt the French king and the duke.

But the chiefeſt point of Vrſwikes errand conſiſted in this, that he ſhould intimate to the French king, how his maiſter king Henrie offered himſelfe as a mediator betwixt him and the duke of Britaine, to make them friends: and if he perceiued that the French king gaue eare hereunto, then ſhould he go into Britaine, to mooue the duke there to be contented, that ſome reaſonable order might be taken for a quietneſſe to be had betwixt the French king and him. Whileſt Vrſwike was trauelling in this matter (according to his commiſſion) the king came backe againe to London, where he was receiued of the citizens with great ioy and triumph, they being heartilie glad and greatlie reioiſing that he with ſuch good ſucceſſe had ſubdued his enimies.

Chriſtopher Vrſwike.

The marques Dorſet deliuered out of the Tower.

The kings loue to his wife queene Elizabeth.

Shortlie after, he deliuered the lord Thomas marques Dorſet out of the Tower, receiuing him againe to his former fauor and old familiaritie: bicauſe his truth and loialtie by diuers aſſaies and ſundrie arguments had beene throughlie tried, and ſufficientlie prooued. In which meane time, the king for the great loue that he bare to his wife queene Elizabeth, cauſed hir to be crowned and anointed queene on ſaint Katharins day in Nouember, with all ſolemnitie, as in ſuch caſes apperteineth. In the meane ſeaſon Chriſtopher Vrſwike (according to his commiſſion) trauelled betweene the French king and the duke of Britaine in the king of Englands name, to make them friends. But although the French king ſeemed willing enough to haue peace, yet meant he nothing leſſe. For he had as manie ſubtilties in his heart, as there be faces in the world, according to the poet:

Pectoribus fraudes tot ſunt quot in orbe figuræ.

For whileſt he went about with faire words, courteous letters, and ſweet promiſes to beare the king of England in hand to labour a peace betwixt him and the Britains, he inforced his whole puiſſance to ſubdue them, and beſieged the citie of Nants. And on the other part, the duke of Orleance being withdrawne to the duke of Britaine, and one that ruled moſt about him, had no liking to heare of peace, but did what he could to hinder it. The Engliſh ambaſſador Chriſtopher Vrſwike (hauing thus paſſed from the French king to the duke of Britaine, and backe againe to the French king) returned ſhortlie after into England, and ſhewed vnto king Henrie what he had doone betwixt them.

The duke of Orleance partaker with the duke of Britaine.

Immediatlie after came to the French king the lord Bernard Daubeneie a Scot borne, which on the French kings behalfe required K. Henrie to make ſome maner of end of thoſe Brittiſh warres, whatſoeuer it were. King Henrie being deſirous of the ſame, ſent ouer againe into France, Iohn the abbat of Abingdon, ſir Richard Edgecombe knight, and the forenamed Chriſtopher Vrſwike, with full and perfect commiſſion & long inſtructions how to proceed, in driuing of ſome agreement betwixt the Frenchmen and the Britons. Theſe orators (according as they had in commandement) firſt went vnto the French king, and after they had communed with him, ſir Richard Edgecombe, and Chriſtopher Vrſwike departed ſtreight to the duke of Britaine, in full hope to conclude a peace, vpon ſuch offers and articles as they had to propone vnto him.

But all their hope was vaine, for the duke refuſed to agree vpon anie ſuch articles and conditions as they offered; and ſo without concluding anie thing with the duke, they returned backe into France; and from thence ſignified to the king of England by letters all that they knew, or had doone. But in the meane time, Edward lord Woduile, vncle to the queene, ſued to king Henrie that he might haue a power of men appointed to him, with the which he would ſteale priuilie ouer without licence or paſſeport, ſo that euerie man ſhould thinke that he was fled the realme, without knowledge of the king, for that no warre ſhould ariſe by his meanes betwixt the realmes of France and England, and yet ſhould the duke of Britaine be aided againſt the power of the Frenchmen, which ſought to vanquiſh him, that they might ioine his countrie vnto the dominion of France: which in no wiſe ought to be ſuffered, conſidering what annoiance & hurt the ſame might bring to the realme of England in time to come.

Edward lord Woduile aideth the duke of Britaine without the kings conſent.

Although this requeſt was vtterlie denied, and that the lord Woduile was ſtreightlie commanded by the king to make no ſuch attempt; yet could not all that ſtaie him, but that withdrawing him into the Ile of Wight, whereof he was made ruler and capteine, he there gathered togither a crue of tall & hardie perſonages, to the number of 400, & with proſperous wind & weather arriued in Britaine, and ioined himſelfe with the Britons againſt the Frenchmen. The French king aduertiſed herof, was not well pleaſed in his mind towards the king of England; till K. Henrie by new meſſengers informed him how guiltleſſe he was in the matter, and that by plaine and euident proofes. With the which excuſe the French king ſeemed to be the better pacified, and was content to diſſemble the matter.

Lord Woduile gathereth a power in the Ile of Wight.

Then the Engliſh ambaſſadors, renewing the league and amitie betwixt king Henrie & the French king, for the ſpace of twelue moneths, they returned into England, and ſhewed the king all things that they had either heard or ſeene; ſo that he perceiued that the French king dealt craftilie in this matter of Britaine,

The league renewed betweene England and France.

The king calleth a parlement.

Britaine, ſtill motioning peace when he meant nothing elſe but warre. He therefore called his high court of parlement, in the which it was not onelie determined that the duke of Britaine ſhould be aided with a power of men againſt the wrongfull inuaſions of the Frenchmen, but alſo there were diuerſe ſummes of monie granted to the furniſhing forth and maintenance of the ſame. And immediatlie herevpon, the king ſent his ambaſſadors into France to certifie the French king what the eſtates aſſembled in parlement here in England had decreed.

A peremptorie ambaſſage out of England into France.

Wherefore he required him either to ſurceaſſe the warres which he had in hand againſt the Britons, or elſe not to be greeued though he condeſcended to the iudgement and determination of the lords both ſpirituall and temporall, and commons of his realme, in taking vpon him the defenſe of the duke of Britaine; promiſing neuertheleſſe that the Engliſh armie ſhould onelie take land within the duchie of Britaine, and ſeeke to defend the ſame againſt all thoſe that did inuade it, and not to make anie warre within the French dominions. This meſſage was nothing regarded of the French king, in ſo much that the French armie proceeded in oppreſſing the Britons, deſtroieng the countrie, and beſieging townes.

The battell of ſaint Aulbin in Britaine, betweene the duke of Britaine and the French king.

Lord Wooduile ſlaine.

At length on the ſeuen and twentith, or (as the chronicles of Anion haue) the eight and twentith daie of Iulie, the duke of Britains armie gaue battell to the French hoſt neere to a towne called ſaint Aulbin, hauing apparelled a thouſand and ſeuen hundred of the Britons in coates with red croſſes, after the Engliſh faſhion, to make the Frenchmen beleeue that they had a great number of Engliſhmen, although they had but foure hundred onelie with the lord Wooduile. The victorie in this battell fell to the Frenchmen, ſo that almoſt all the Engliſhmen were ſlaine with the lord Wooduile, beſide ſix thouſand Britons. The duke of Orleance and the prince of Orainge were taken priſoners, which were there on the Britons part. The Frenchmen loſt twelue hundred men, and amongſt other, that valiant Italian capteine Iames Galeot.

King Henrie ſendeth foorth his armie againſt the French.

Theſe newes being brought into England, cauſed king Henrie to make haſt in ſending forth his armie, and therefore was the lord Brooke, with ſir Iohn Cheinie, ſir Iohn Middleton, ſir Rafe Hilton, ſir Richard Corbet, ſir Thomas Leighton, ſir Richard Laton, and ſir Edmund Cornewall ſent ouer into Britaine with all conuenient ſpeed, hauing with them an eight thouſand men, well armed and furniſhed in warlike wiſe, to aid the duke of Britaine againſt the Frenchmen. Theſe luſtie capteins being arriued in Britaine, after they had a little refreſhed them, marched forward, and comming neere to their enimies, pitched downe their field, not farre from the Frenchmens campe.

When the French be inuincible.

Francis duke of Britaine dieth.

The Frenchmen by experience knowing the Engliſhmen (ſo long as they be freſh and luſtie) in maner to be inuincible, thought not good to match with them in open battell, till they were ſomewhat wearied with lieng and lingering abroad in the field. And therefore at the firſt they ſought to wearie them with light ſkirmiſhes, appointing their horſſemen to giue them alarmes, & ſome ſkirmiſhes; in the which the Frenchmen, by reaſon of the Engliſh archers (which galled both men and horſſes) were euer put to the worſſe. But behold the mutabilitie of worldlie chances! Whiles this warre was thus ſet forward, Francis duke of Britaine departed this life, & then the cheefe rulers of Britain, falling at diſſention among themſelues, tendered not the defenſe of their countrie, but rather minded the deſtruction thereof.

Herevpon the Engliſhmen, perceiuing in what danger they were, and conſidering that it was in the middeſt of winter, a time not meet for men of warre to lie in the cold and froſtie fields, they returned into England, within fiue monethes after their firſt ſetting forth. So that finallie the French king got the vpper hand of the Britons, and did incorporate that duchie to his realme and crowne of France, as in the hiſtorie of France it may appeere at large. ¶ In Iulie this yeere was a preſt leuied for the king in the citie of London, of foure thouſand pounds, which was repaied the yeare next following. In September, the queene was deliuered at Wincheſter of hir firſt ſonne, named prince Arthur; and the fiue and twentith of Nouember (next inſuing) ſhe was crowned at Weſtminſter with all due ſolemnitie.

The duchie of Britaine incorporated to the realme of France.

Anno Reg. 4.

Yee haue heard, how there was in the laſt parlement monie granted for the furniſhing forth of the armie into Britaine; that is to wit, it was agreed, that euerie man ſhould be taxed after the rate of his ſubſtance, to paie the tenth penie of his goods. Which monie the moſt part of them that dwelled in the biſhoprike of Durham, and in the parties of Yorkeſhire refuſed vtterlie to paie: either for that they thought themſelues ouercharged with the ſame; or were procured to ſhew themſelues diſobedient, thorough the euill counſell of ſome ſeditious perſons, which conſpired againſt the king, to put him to new trouble. Therefore ſuch as were appointed collectors, after that they could not get the monie, according to their extract deliuered to them by the commiſſioners, they made their complaint priuilie to Henrie the fourth earle of Northumberland, chiefe ruler of the North parts.

The collectors of the ſubſidie complaine to the earle of Northumberland that they cannot get in the tax monie.

The earle forthwith ſignified to the king all that matter, and the king not willing to pardon them of anie one penie (leaſt the example might doo hurt by incouraging others to ſhew the like ſtubbornes in other parts of the realme) cõmanded the earle either by diſtreſſe or otherwiſe, to leuie the monie as he ſhould thinke moſt meet. The rude and beaſtlie people hearing of this anſwer from the king, by and by with great violence ſet vpon the earle by the exciting of a ſimple fellow named Iohn a Chamber, whome the erle with faire words ſought to appeaſe. But they like vnreaſonable villaines, alledging all the fault to be in him, as chiefe author of the tax, furiouſlie and cruellie murthered both him and diuerſe of his houſhold ſeruants. Diuerſe affirme that the Northerne men bare againſt this earle continuall grudge euer ſince the death of king Richard, whome they entirelie fauoured.

The earle of Northumberland murthered by the northerne rebels at the inſtigation and ſetting on of Iohn a Chamber.

Sir Iohn Egremond capteine rebell.

Although this offenſe was great and heinous; yet there ſucceeded a more miſchiefe: for incontinentlie (to cloke this preſumptuous murther) the Northerne men got them to armour, and aſſembling togither, choſe them a capteine, no leſſe ſeditious than deſirous of trouble, called ſir Iohn Egremond knight; and paſſing by the countries, they publiſhed and declared that they would bid the king battell onlie in defenſe of their liberties & common freedome, of the which he went about to bereaue them. But when the matter ſhould come to be tried with blowes, their harts ſo fainted that they ſcattered awaie, euerie man ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight: but that little auailed them.

Thomas erle of Surrie ſent with a power againſt the north rebels.

For the king hearing of this buſineſſe, ſent forth Thomas earle of Surreie (whome not long before he had deliuered out of the Tower, and receiued to his ſpeciall fauour) with a crue of men, to chaſtiſe thoſe rebels of the north parts, who ſkirmiſhed with a certeine companie of them, and them diſcomfited, and tooke aliue Iohn a Chamber, the firſt beginner of this rebellion. The king himſelfe road after into Yorkeſhire, of whoſe comming the ſturdie rebels were ſo abaſhed and afraid, that they fled more and leſſe: which afterward were apprehended, and puni-

For John a Chamber was hanged at Yorke on a gibbet ſet vpon a ſquare paire of gallowes like an archtraitor, and his complices and lewd diſciples were hanged on the lower gallowes round about their maiſter, to the terrible example of other.

Sir John Egremond flieth into Flanders.

But ſir John Egremond fled into Flanders to the ladie Margaret ducheſſe of Burgognie, that euer enuied the proſperitie of king Henrie. After this the king returned to London, leauing the earle of Surreie to rule the north parts, and appointed ſir Richard Tunſtall, a man of great wit and policie, to gather the ſubſidie to him due of the people. This yeare the king borrowed of euerie alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thouſand eightie two pounds ſeuenteene ſhillings foure pence; which he repaied againe to the vttermoſt, with great equitie and thankefulnes. [A vertue verie laudable in this good king, and ſo much the more noteworthie as it is rare; ſpeciallie in mightie men and great eſtates of the world, that count what ſoeuer they can catch their owne, as though the purſſes of the people were theirs to poſſeſſe at pleaſure & vſe at luſt, without conſcience or care of reſtitution. A rebellion in Flanders.

Maximilian king of Romans impriſoned at Bruges by the townesmen.

In this ſeaſon, the emperour Frederike made warre againſt the Flemings, namelie againſt Bruges and certeine townes of Flanders, which had rebelled againſt his ſonne Maximilian king of Romans, their liege and ſouereigne lord; in ſo much that they of Bruges had not onelie ſlaine his officers but impriſoned him within their towne, till they had cauſed him to pardon all their offenſes, and alſo to ſweare neuer to remember, nor reuenge the ſame in time to come. But his father Frederike the emperour could not ſuffer ſuch a reproch & diſhonour doone to his ſonne (whoſe fame & princelie eſtate as he tendered and had in geloſie; ſo was it his hart greefe and immoderat vexation that he ſhould be abuſed of open contemners, in ſuch villanous ſort as tended highlie to the indignitie of his perſon, and the aggrauating of their offenſe and puniſhment) to paſſe vnreuenged, & therefore ſcourged the countrie of Flanders with ſharpe and cruell warre.

The lord of Rauenſteine being driuen to take the ſame oth, that his maſter Maximilian tooke at Bruges, to ſhew that the warre was not begun with his aſſent, forſooke Maximilian his lord, and tooke the townes of Ipre and Sluis, with both the caſtels of the ſame hauen, and further did not onelie ſtir the Gantois, Brugeans, and other towns of Flanders, to rebell againſt their ſouereigne lord; but alſo ſent to the French kings lieutenant in Picardie, the lord Cordes, to aid him to conquer ſuch townes of Flanders, as were not of his opinion. The lord Cordes, otherwiſe called monſieur de Querdes, was glad to haue ſo good occaſion to ſet foot in Flanders, as he that had ſufficient inſtructions of his maiſter the French king, vpon anie ſuch offred occaſion ſo to doo, ſent forthwith to the aid of the Flemings eight thouſand Frenchmen, commanding them to conquer ſuch townes, as were in the waie betwixt France and Bruges.

The lord Cordes maketh aduantage of occaſion.

The capteins, according to his deuiſe, beſieged a little walled towne called Dixmew, to whome came foure thouſand Flemings with vittels and artillerie, ſent from the lord of Rauenſtein. They laid ſiege on the north ſide of the towne, in a mariſh ground then being drie, and ſo deepelie ditched and rampired their campe about (on which rampire they laid their ordinance) that it was in maner impoſſible to enter their campe, or doo them anie diſpleaſure or damage. The K. of England was dailie aduertiſed of theſe doings, which nothing leſſe deſired than to haue the Engliſh pale inuironed with French fortreſſes. Wherefore to preuent that miſchiefe in time, with all expedition he ſent ouer to the lord Daubeneie, then his deputie of Calis, the lord Morleie, with a crue of valiant archers & ſouldiers, to the number of a thouſand men, with priuie inſtructions what they ſhould doo.

King Henrie ſendeth the lord Daubeneie and the lord Morleie againſt the French.

At their comming ouer it was bruted abroad, that they were ſent onelie to defend the Engliſh pale, againſt all attempts that might vpon the ſudden in anie wiſe be made by the Frenchmen, or Flemings: but their enterpriſe was all otherwiſe. For on a tueſdaie at the ſhutting of the gates at night, the lord Daubneie chiefeteine of the armie, the lord Morleie, ſir James Tirrell capteine of Guiſnes, ſir Henrie Willoughbie, ſir Gilbert Talbot, and ſir Humfreie Talbot marſhall of Calis, with diuerſe other knights, and eſquiers, and other of the gariſons of Hammes, Guiſnes, and Calis, to the number of two thouſand men or thereabouts, iſſued priuilie out of Calis, & paſſed the water of Graueling in the morning betimes; and left there for a ſtale, and to keepe the paſſage, ſir Humfreie Talbot, with ſix ſcore archers, and came to Newport, where they found the ſouereigne of Flanders with ſix hundred Almaines, and there they ſtaied that night.

Sir Humfreie Talbot with his ſix ſcore archers.

The good ſeruice of a wretch that ſhould haue beene hanged

On the next daie they went toward Dixmew, and by the guiding of a priſoner, that ſhould haue beene hanged on the next morning, they iſſued out of the ſouth gate of the towne of Dixmew, and were conueied by their ſaid guide by an high banke ſet with willowes; ſo that the Gantois could not well eſpie them, and ſo ſecretlie gat to the end of their enimies campe, and there pauſed. The lord Daubeneie commanded all men to ſend their horſſes and wagons backe, but the lord Morleie ſaid he would ride till he came to hand ſtrokes. Thus they marched forth till they came to a low banke, and no deepe ditch, where the ordinance laie; and there the archers ſhot altogither, euerie man an arrow, and ſo fell proſtrate to the ground. The enimies herewith diſcharged their ordinance, and ouerſhot them.

A policie.

The Almains lept ouer the ditch with their morice pikes. The Engliſhmen in the fore-front waded the ditch, and were holpen vp by the Almains, and ſet on their enimies, and tooke manie priſoners. The other Engliſhmen haſted by the cauſie to enter in at the north gate of the campe, where the lord Morleie being on horſſebacke in a rich coate, was ſlaine with a gun. When his death was knowen, euerie man killed his priſoner, and ſlue all ſuch as did withſtand them, to the number of eight thouſand men; in ſo much that of two thouſand that came out of Bruges (as the Flemiſh chronicle reporteth) there came not home one hundred. On the Engliſh part was ſlaine the lord Morleie, and not an hundred more.

The lord Morleie ſlaine.

The Engliſhmen tooke their ordinance and ſent it to Newport, with all the ſpoile and great horſſes. And by the waie hearing certeine Frenchmen to be at Oſtend, they made thitherward: but the Frenchmen fled, and ſo they burned part of the towne, and came againe to Newport, where the lord Daubeneie left all the Engliſhmen that were hurt and returned to Calis, where he buried the bodie of the lord Morleie. The Engliſhmen got great riches at this field, for they that went forth in cloth, came home in ſilke, and thoſe that went out on foot, came home on great horſſes. The lord Cordes being at Ipre with twentie thouſand men, was ſore diſpleaſed with this ouerthrow; & therefore thinking to be reuenged, beſieged Engliſh archers.

But the Engliſhmen that were hurt at Dixmew field before, and might either ſtand or draw bowe, neuer came from the wals. On a daie the Frenchmen gaue a great aſſault to a tower, and perforce entered it, and ſet vp the banner of the lord Cordes. But ſée the chance! During the time of the aſſault, there arriued a barke with foure ſcore freſh Engliſh archers, which came ſtreight to the tower, and did ſo much, that what with the helpe of ſuch as before were wounded and hurtmen, and of the couragious harts of the new come archers incouraged greatlie by the women of the towne, crieng; Shoot Engliſhmen, ſhoot: the tower was regained out of the Frenchmens hands, and the banner of the lord Cordes rent in péeces, and in place thereof the penon of ſaint George ſet vp. Then the Frenchmen, ſuppoſing a great aid of Engliſhmen to haue béene come to the towne by ſea, left the aſſault.

The malicious and foliſh words of the lord Cordes.

James king of Scots ſlaine by his owne ſubiects.

And the night following, the enuious lord Cordes (which ſo ſore longed for Calis, that he would commonlie ſaie, that he could be content to lie ſeuen yeares in hell, ſo that Calis were in poſſeſſion of the Frenchmen) brake vp his ſiege, and returned to Helding with ſhame. And the Engliſhmen glad of this victorie returned to Calis. This yeare James the third of that name king of Scots was ſlaine by his owne ſubiects, after they had vanquiſhed him in a pight field. About the ſame time one Adrian an Italian was ſent in ambaſſage from pope Innocent the eight into Scotland, to haue taken vp the variance betwixt the king there and his people. But being arriued here in England, he was informed that king James was ſlaine, and therfore taried here certeine moneths.

Adrian an Italian made biſhop of Hereford, and after of Bath and welles.

And for that he was a man of excellent learning, vertue, and humanitie, the archbiſhop of Canturburie John Morton ſo commended him to the king, that he made him firſt biſhop of Hereford, and ſhortlie after, that reſigned and giuen ouer, he promoted him to the biſhoprike of and Bath Welles. And after that with theſe honors he was returned to Rome, he was aduanced by all the degrées of ſpirituall dignities into the college of the cardinals. And worthie ſure he was of great preferment, for by his meanes, learned men were mooued to ſéeke out the vſe of eloquent writing and ſpeaking in the Latine toong, he being the firſt in the time of our fathers that taught the trade to chooſe and vſe apt words and fit termes.

Anno Reg. 6.

Ambaſſadors from ẏ Frẽch king to the king of England.

In the ſixt yeare of king Henries reigne there came ambaſſadors to him from the French king the lord Francis of Lutzenburgh, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gaguine miniſter of the Bonnehommes of the trinitie. The effect of their comming was to haue concluded a peace with king Henrie, and that with good will the French king might diſpoſe of the mariage of the yoong ducheſſe of Britaine, as he ſhould thinke good; and to make void the contract and former mariage, which by proxie the deputie of Maximilian king of Romans had before time contracted & made with hir. But thereto would not king Henrie giue his conſent, euer harping on this ſtring, that the maiden being once lawfullie combined in matrimonie with Maximilian, ought not to be compelled againſt hir will and promiſe (yea and contrarie to all law, right and equitie) to take anie other perſon than him to hir ſpouſe and huſband.

K. Henrie is loth that the French king ſhould marrie the ducheſſe of Britaine.

In déed king Henrie was loth that the French king ſhould marrie the ducheſſe of Britaine himſelfe (as he perceiued his meaning was) and ſo ioine the duchie of Britaine to the crowne of France: and therefore he did what he could to hinder that bargaine. Yet at length it was agréed that a forme of a league ſhould be drawen with conditions, clauſes, and couenants. And for full concluding of the ſame, it was thought expedient, that the king of England ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to the French king to finiſh all matters betwixt them. Wherevpon the French ambaſſadors being diſmiſſed with great rewards, ſtreightwaies Thomas erle of Ormond, and Thomas Goldenſton prior of Chriſtes church in Canturburie, were appointed by the king to follow them into France, inſtructed fullie in althings that he would haue on his behalfe either moued or determined.

Lionell biſhop of Concordia ſent from the pope to the French king.

In this meane ſpace, Lionell the biſhop of Concordia was ſent as oratour from pope Alexander the ſixt to the French king for certeine matters: and amongſt other things, he had in charge to conclude a peace and vnitie betwixt the French king and the king of England. He moouing this matter to the French king, found him nothing ſtrange to incline to his motion. Wherevpon the biſhop of Concordia conceiuing good hope, and therewith deſirous (as became him beſt bearing that title) to ſet an attonement betwixt thoſe two kings, tooke his iournie towards England, to the intent he might mooue king Henrie to be agréeable therevnto, and ſo comming to Calis, found the Engliſh ambaſſadors there, being ſo farre on their waie towards the French king; and being honorablie receiued of them into that towne, after they had communed togither, the biſhop tooke the ſea, and was tranſported ouer into England, and the ambaſſadors departed towards the French king.

After the biſhop of Concordia had talked with king Henrie, and perceiued that (vpon reaſonable conditions) he could be content to conclude a peace with all chriſtian princes, and to liue in reſt after ſo manie troubles afore time ſuſteined, the ſaid biſhop returned backe into France to ſollicit this purpoſe to ſome perfect concluſion. But the Frenchmen ſo handled the matter, that whileſt they outwardlie ſhewed how they deſired nothing but fréendſhip and amitie, they allured the yoong dutcheſſe of Britaine to ſubmit hirſelfe wholie to their diſcretion, ſo that ſhortlie after ſhe was maried to king Charles. Now the Engliſh ambaſſadors, after they perceiued which waie the wind would blow, returned againe to their countrie, and nothing doone or agréed vpon in their matter.

The ducheſſe of Britaine maried to K. Charles.

A parlement wherin king Henrie openeth the iuſt cauſe of making warres againſt France.

King Henrie ſore troubled in his mind therwith, determining no more with peaceable meſſages, but with open warre to determine all controuerſies betwixt him and the French king, called his high court of parlement, and there declared the cauſe why hée was iuſtlie prouoked to make warre againſt the Frenchmen: and therefore deſired them of their beneuolent aid of men and monie toward the maintenance therof. The cauſe was ſo iuſt, that euerie man allowed it; and to the ſetting foorth of the war taken in hand for ſo neceſſarie an occaſion, euerie man promiſed his helping hand. The king commended them for their true and faithfull hearts. And to the intent that he might ſpare the poorer ſort of the commons (whome he euer deſired to kéepe in fauor) he thought good firſt to exact monie of the richeſt ſort by waie of a beneuolence.

Who firſt deuiſed the exaction of monie called a beneuolence.

Sée pag. 694.

Which kind of leuieng monie was firſt deuiſed by king Edward the fourth, as it appeareth before in his hiſtorie. King Henrie following the like example, publiſhed abroad, that by their open gifts he would meaſure and ſearch their beneuolent hearts and good minds toward him; ſo that he that gaue moſt, ſhould be iudged to be his moſt louing fréend; and he that gaue little, to be eſtéemed according to his gift. By this it appeareth, that whatſoeuer is practiſed for the princes profit, and brought to a preſident by matter of record, maie be turned to the great preiudice of the people, if rulers in authoritie will ſo adiudge and determine it. But by this means king Henrie got innumerable great ſummes of monie, with ſome grudge of the people, for the extremitie ſhewed by the commiſſioners in diuers places.

1491.

Ye haue heard before, how the lord of Rauenſtein, by the aid of Bruges & Gant, had taken the towne and two caſtels of Sluis, which he kept againſt his ſoueraigne lord Maximilian, and getting into the hauen certeine ſhips and barks, robbed, ſpoiled, & tooke priſoners the ſhips and veſſels of all nations that paſſed alongeſt by that coaſt, towards the mart at Antwerpe, or into anie part of Brabant, Zeland, or Friſeland, and was euer ſufficientlie vittelled out of France and Picardie. There was a little towne alſo two miles from Bruges towards the ſea, called Dam, which was a bulworke to Bruges, and an hedſpring to Sluis. The king of Romans had attempted the wining of this towne diuers times, but miſſed his purpoſe; till at length Albert duke of Saxonie, a great fréend to the king of Romans, by policie found meanes to get it.

Albert the duke of Saxonies policie to get the towne of Dam.

This duke feining himſelfe as a neuter betwixt the king of Romans, and the rebels of Flanders, required of the lords of Bruges, that he might enter peaceablie into their towne according to his eſtate, with a certeine number of men of armes, to communicate with them diuerſe matters of great weight, and ſent before his cariages and herbengers to make prouiſion. They of Bruges were in no doubt of him, ſo that his men of warre entered into the citie in good order, and he followed. They that went before, inquired for innes and lodgings, as though they would haue reſted there all the night, and ſo went forth ſtill in order aſking after lodgings, till they came at the gate that leadeth directlie toward Dam, diſtant from Bruges a Flemiſh mile, which is called the bulworke of Bruges.

The capteins and inhabitants of Dam ſuſpecting no harme to come out of Buges, thought their fréends (knowing ſome danger towards) had ſent them aid, and ſo nothing miſtruſting thoſe that approched their towne, ſuffered them to enter, and ſo was the towne of Dam taken by ſleight, which could not be woone by open force. This chance ſore diſpleaſed them of Bruges, for now could they haue no recourſe to the ſea; ſo that they muſt néeds fall into ruine and decaie. The duke of Saxonie thus hauing woone the towne of Dam, ſent to the king of England, that if it would pleaſe him to miniſter anie aid by ſea, hée would beſiege Sluis by land. Wherevpon the king of England, vpon due conſideration of the dukes motion (as he was wiſe enough in all his enterpriſes, and no leſſe fortunate in the iſſue of the ſame) would conclude nothing vpon the ſudden, but (as he did alwaies) ruled his affaires by good counſell, like to the wiſe man commended in the holie ſcripture:

The duke of Saxonie ſendeth for aid to king Henrie to win Sluis

Gu. Ha. in Tob. 4.

At laſt he well remembring that Sluis was a ronſeneſt, and a verie den of théeues to them that trauerſed the ſeas towards the eaſt parts, incontinentlie diſpatched ſir Edward Poinings a right valiant knight and hardie capteine, with twelue ſhips well furniſhed with bold ſouldiers and ſufficient artillerie. Which ſir Edward ſailed into the hauen, and kept the lord of Rauenſtein from ſtarting by ſea. The Duke of Saxonie beſieged one of the caſtels, lieng in a church ouer againſt it: and the Engliſhmen aſſaulted the leſſe caſtell, and iſſued out of their ſhips at the ebbe, neuer ſuffering their enimies to reſt in quiet one day togither, for the ſpace of twentie dais, and euerie day ſlue ſome of their aduerſaries; and on the Engliſh part were ſlaine one Vere, brother to the earle of Oxford, and fiftie more.

The lord of Rauenſtein had made a bridge of botes betwéene both the caſtels, to paſſe from the one to the other; which bridge one night the Engliſhmen did ſet on fire. Then he, perceiuing that he muſt loſe his caſtels by force, and that the Flemings could not aid him, yéelded the caſtels to ſir Edward Poinings, and the towne to the duke of Saxonie, vpon certeine conditions. Sir Edward Poinings kept the caſtels a while, of whom the Almains demanded their wages, bicauſe the duke had nothing to paie. Then theſe two capteins ſo handled them of Bruges, that they not onelie ſubmitted themſelues to their lord Maximilian; but alſo were contented to paie and diſpatch the Almains. And ſo ſir Edward Poinings taried there a long ſpace, and at length returned to the king before Bullogne.

The firſt day of Aprill this preſent yeare, the nobles of the realme aſſembled in the cathedrall church of S. Paule in London, where the maior of the ſame citie, his brethren the aldermen, and the crafteſmen in their liueries alſo aſſembled: to whome doctor Morton chancellor made an oration, declaring how the king of Spaine had woone the great and rich citie & countrie of Granado from the Turks: for ioy whereof Te Deum was ſoong with great ſolemnitie. ¶ But bicauſe it is requiſite and neceſſarie in this ample volume, to ſet downe the report of accidents as they are to be found at large in our owne Engliſh writers: you ſhall heare for the furtherance of your knowledge in this matter concerning Granado, what Ed. Hall hath left noted in his chronicle. Which although it conteine diuerſe actions of ſuperſtition, and popiſh trumperie: yet ſhould it not offend the reader, conſidering that a people eſtranged from the true knowledge of God and ſincere religion put the ſame in practiſe, as ſuppoſing principall holineſſe to conſiſt in that blind deuotion.

Granado woone from the Turkes or Saracens.

On the firſt of Aprill (ſaith he) this yéere, the king commanded all the nobilitie of his realme to aſſemble at the cathedrall church of S. Paule in London, where (after Te Deum ſolemnlie ſoong) the cardinall of Canturburie, ſtanding on the ſteps before the quier doore, declared to the people, how the famous citie of Granado, which manie yeares had béene poſſeſſed of the Mores or Mauritane nation, being infidels & vnchriſtened people, was now of late beſieged a great time by Don Ferdinando and Elizabeth his wife, king and quéene of Spaine, Arragon, and Caſtile. And the ſaid infidels, by reaſon of ſiege brought to great penurie and miſerie, for lacke of vittels & neceſſarie viands, perceiuing that all ſuccours were clerelie ſtopped and excluded from them, and ſo brought into vtter deſpaire of aid, or comfort, after long conſultation had amongſt them, determined to render themſelues and their citie to the ſaid king vpon diuerſe couenants and conditions, and therevpon ſent to him diuerſe ſenators of the citie fullie inſtructed of their mind and purpoſe.

The king of Spaine and his councell, conſidering and ſagelie pondering that winter approched & was at hand, and that the chriſtian hoſt had long lien in the fieldes in ſore tempeſts and gréeuous ſtormes (which they gladlie ſuffered for Chriſtes ſake, in whoſe cauſe and quarell they made that preſent warre) reremembring alſo that the citie was of ſuch riches, fame, and eſtimation, that it conteined an hundred and fiftie thouſand houſes of name, beſide other ſmall houſes and cotages; & that it was repleniſhed with people innumerable, and furniſhed with thrée ſcore and ten thouſand good fighting men; and finallie, perceiuing that he might inioy now the poſſeſſion of the ſame, without aſſault or effuſion of chriſtian bloud by the aduiſe of his councell, he accepted, accorded, and agreed to their offers the twentie and fift of Nouember, in the yeare of Chriſts incarnation 1491, then being the daie of ſaint Katharine.

By the which compoſition, the roiall citie of Granado, with all the holds and fortreſſes of the realme, and the towers and caſtels of Alpuſſarate was rendered into the hands of the ſaid king of Spaine; and that the king of Granado ſhould become ſubiect and vaſſall to the king of Spaine, and to relinquiſh and forſake the vſurped name of a king for euer: and that all the men of warre ſhould frankelie depart out of the citie, and none there to remaine, but artificers and merchants: and all theſe things to be doone before the fiue & twentith day of Ianuarie. But the time was preuented, for the Moores on the firſt day of Ianuarie ſent ſix hundred notable perſonages out of the citie with their children for hoſtages into the campe of the king of Spaine, to the intent that he ſhould put no diffidence nor miſtruſt in the citizens, but that he might peaceablie and quietlie with his people enter into the citie, and take poſſeſſion of the ſame. The which hoſtages were diſtributed and lodged in the tents and pauillions of the Spaniſh armie.

Hoſtages deliuered to the K. of Spaine for his ſecuritie.

The third of Ianuarie, the lord of Guitterins Cardenes, great maſter & gouernor of Lion, of the order of S. Iames, departed from the armie, noblie and triumphantlie accompanied with fiue hundred horſmen, and thrée thouſand footmen toward the citie. And as he approched néere to the ſuburbs, there iſſued out diuers noble and valiant capteins of the Moores, making to him humble obeiſance, and conducted him to a palace adioining to the citie, called the palace of Anararas, and from thenſe conueied him to the palace roiall of the ſame citie called Alhambra, whereof hée tooke quiet and peaceable poſſeſſion, to the behoofe of the king of Spaine, whome the Moores promiſed and confeſſed to take and obeie, as their king and ſoueraigne lord. And in ſigne and token that they thought in their hearts, that which they promiſed by mouth; they proſtrated and humbled themſelues before the ſaid great maſter, and with dolorous lamentation and ſalt teares deliuered to him the keies of the ſaid palace.

The vanquiſhed people humblie ſubmit thẽſelues to the kings vicegerent, & deliuer vp the keies of the citie.

When he had the keies, and was alſo poſſeſſed of that ſtrong and magnificent place, he firſt of all diſpatched the houſe of all the Moores and pagans, and appointed a garriſon of valiant and noble chriſtians, to kéepe and defend the ſame: and the ſame day cauſed a maſſe ſolemnlie to be celebrate in a place of the ſame palace called Melchita; which done and finiſhed, he tooke poſſeſſion of all the fortreſſes, towers, and holds to the ſaid citie and towne of Granado belonging or apperteining. And then he cauſed to be erected and ſet vp on the higheſt tower of the palace (where it might beſt be ſéene) the ſigne and token of the croſſe, whereon Chriſt for vs ſinners ſuffered his bitter paſſion. At the raiſing whereof were preſent an archbiſhop, and thrée biſhops, with other prelats, which deuoutlie ſang this antheme: O crux, aue ſpes vnica.

The ſaid croſſe was thrée times deuoutlie lifted, and at euerie exaltation, the Moores being within the citie, rored, howled, & cried, proſtrating themſelues, groueling on the ground, & making dolorous noiſe and pitifull outcries. The armie incamped without the citie, ſéeing theſe things, humbled themſelues méekelie before the croſſe, rendering to almightie God their moſt humble and heartie thankes. The king of Spaine, being mounted on horſſebacke, perceiuing the erection of the croſſe, deſcended from his genet, and knéeled downe on the bare ground; and rendered to God, laud, honour, and praiſe; for that noble and triumphant victorie. And after that the croſſe was thus ſet vp on the high tower, the banner of ſaint Iames, and the kings banners were pitched and fixed vpon the turrets and pinacles of the citie: an herald ſtanding in the top of the high tower, proclaming and publiſhing theſe words following.

The maner of the Spaniſh kings giuing of thanks for victorie.

Saint Iames, ſaint Iames, ſaint Iames; Caſtile, Caſtile, Caſtile; Granado, Granado, Granado. By high and mightie power, lord Ferdinando and Elizabeth, king and quéene of Spaine, haue woone from the infidels and Moores the citie and realme of Granado, through the helpe of our Lord God, & the moſt glorious virgin his mother, and the vertuous apoſtle S. Iames, and the holie father Innocent the eight, togither with the aids and ſuccours of the great prelats, knights, and other gentlemen borne, and commons of their realmes and countries. When the herald had finiſhed, the artillerie ſounded, the minſtrels blew, the people applauded and clapped their hands for gladneſſe, that the earth ſéemed to tremble and quake vnderneath them.

The Spaniards reioiſing & triumphing after the conqueſt of the Moores.

After this ioy ended, there iſſued out of the citie in maner of proceſſion, ſeuen hundred and mo chriſtians, as well men, as women and children, which had bin there priſoners and liued in bonds, ſeruitude, and miſerable captiuitie, whereof the moſt part were naked, wounded, and in maner famiſhed for hunger. To whome the king (of his great liberalitie) gaue both apparell, viands and monie. Theſe poore priſoners comming out of the citie ſang this pſalme; Benedictus Dominus Deus Iſrael, qui viſitauit & fecit redemptionem plebꝰ ſuæ; Bleſſed be the Lord God of Iſrael, which hath viſited and redeemed his people. And ſo ſinging foorth the pſalme, went to the church of ſaint Faith, which the king Ferdinando had cauſed to bée moſt ſumptuouſlie edified during the time of the ſiege, being diſtant from Granado two or thrée miles.

Now as this poore proceſſion paſſed by the hoſt, one eſpied his ſonne, and another ſaw his brother; and the ſon perceiued the father, and the father found the daughter, which were now deliuered out of miſerable ſeruitude and bondage. But they could not refraine nor bridle themſelues from diſtilling of teares and ſobbing, ſéeing their parents and kinſfolke reſtored to libertie & fréedome. And when theſe people had ſaid their oriſons in the church of ſaint Faith, and were come to the armie, they knéeled before the king, kiſſed his féet, crieng with one voice; God grant to the king of Spaine euerlaſting life. The next daie after the lord Euerus de Mendoza, earle of Tendiglie, was by the king made capteine of the houſe roiall and principall tower of the citie of Granado, called Alhambra, hauing to him appointed and aſſigned one thouſand men of armes, and two thouſand footmen. Unto the which earle, the great maſter deliuered the keies of the ſaid palace and tower, and other ports and fortreſſes.

The lord Euerus de Mẽdoza made capteine of the houſe roiall.

On ſaturday the eight daie of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our Lord 1492, Ferdinando K. of Spaine & Granado, the quéene, & their eldeſt ſon Don Iohn prince of Spaine, the lord Peter of Mendoza, the archbiſh. of Toledo, the patriarch of Alexandria, the cardinall of Spaine, the lord Peter prince of Lion, the duke of Gaditan, the marques of Uillena & Moia, the erle of Capre, the erle of Uienna of Ciſnentes, and manie other earles, barons, and nobles, whereof ſome were Engliſhmen (whoſe names I haue not) with ten thouſand horſſemen, and fiftie thouſand footmen, with great triumph and roialtie entered into the citie of Granado, and thereof tooke reall poſſeſſion & ſeazine, and cauſed maſſe to be ſoong in a great place called Melchita, where hée cauſed a ſolemne church to be builded in the honour of God and his mother. When maſſe was ended, the king and queene repaired to the palace roiall of Alhambra, the which was wonderfull, both in qualitie & ſumptuous building, which houſe was adorned with rich arras and tapeſtrie in euerie chamber.

The earle of Tendiglie capteine of the palace, feaſted the king and queene, and all the nobilitie at his owne coſtes and charges. So the king of Spaine there remained till the countrie was reduced into a good conformitie and order, and diuerſe fortreſſes and caſtels were made for the ſafegard and tuition of the realme. And bicauſe this victorie obteined, was to the glorie of God, and to the publike wealth of all chriſtianitie, the * ſaid cardinall of Canturburie declared to the people, that the king had ſent him and the other nobles thither that day, not onelie to notifie and declare to them the veritie of the fact; but alſo to exhort them to giue lauds and praiſings to almightie God, for deliuering ſo goodlie a citie, ſo plentifull a countrie, and ſo notable a region out of the hands of his enimies, and perſecutors of his faith and religion. Which declaration ended, the archbiſhop with the cleargie & the nobles with the communaltie, in moſt deuout maner went in generall proceſſion, rendering to God for this great atchiued enterpriſe, glorie, honour, and moſt reuerent thanks.]

Abr.Fl. ex I. S. pag.866.

¶ In the moneth of Maie next and immediatlie following this triumph, was holden a great and valiant iuſting within the kings palace of Shine, now named Richmond, the which indured by the ſpace of a moneth, ſometime within the ſaid palace, and ſometime without, vpon the greene before the gate of the ſaid palace. In which iuſtes ſir Iames Parker knight, running againſt a gentleman named Hugh Vaughan, by caſualtie was ſo ſore hurt and bruſed, that he died thereof. This yeare alſo two pardoners were ſet on the pillorie in Cornehill three market daies, for forging of falſe pardons, wherewith they had deceiued the people, & got much monie. And for that one of them had feined himſelfe to be a prieſt, hee was ſent to Newgate, where he died: the other was driuen out of London with ſhame enough. ¶ Alſo this yere was Robert Fabian ſhiriffe of London & alderman, who made a chronicle of England & of France, beginning at the creation of the world, and ending in the third yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, which booke is now imprinted to the end of Richard the third.]

Sir Iames Parker by caſualtie at iuſtes mortallie wounded.

Two pardoners ſet on the pillorie.

Robert Fabian.

Maximilian king of Romans, intending to be reuenged on the Frenchmen for the manie iniuries doone to him of late (and eſpeciallie for that king Charles had forſaken his daughter ladie Margaret, and purpoſed to take to wife the ladie Anne of Britaine) bicauſe he was not rich enough to mainteine the warre of himſelfe, he ſent his ambaſſadour, one Iames Contibald, a man of great wiſedome, to require the king of England to take his part againſt the French king, making diuers great offers on his owne behalfe, if it ſhould pleaſe him ſo to doo.

King Henrie and Maximilian agree to plague the Frenchmen.

King Henrie no leſſe deſirous than Maximilian to put the French king to trouble, and chieflie to aid the Britains in the extremitie of their buſineſſe, gladlie conſented to the requeſt of Maximilian; and promiſed to prepare an armie with all ſpeed, and in time conuenient to paſſe the ſeas with the ſame, and inuade the French territories. In this verie ſeaſon, Charles the French king receiued the ladie Anne of Britaine, as his pupill into his hands, and with great ſolemnitie hir eſpouſed, hauing with hir in dower, the whole duchie of Britaine.

Anno. Reg.7.

The cauſe of Maximilians malice againſt Charles of France.

Now was Maximilian in great chafe toward the French king, not onelie for that he had refuſed his daughter, but alſo had bereued him of his aſſured wife the ſaid ladie Anne, contrarie to all right and conſcience. Wherefore he ſent vnto king Henrie, deſiring him with all ſpeed to paſſe the ſeas with his armie, that they might purſue the warre againſt their aduerſarie, with fire, ſword and bloud. King Henrie hearing this, and hauing no miſtruſt in the promiſe of Maximilian, with all ſpeed leuied an armie, and rigged his nauie of ſhips. And when all things were readie, he ſent his almoner Chriſtopher Vrſwike, and ſir Iohn Riſeleie knight vnto Maximilian, to certifie him, that the king was in a readineſſe, and would arriue at Calis, as ſoone as he ſhould be aduertiſed that Maximilian and his men were readie to ioine with him.

These ambaſſadors comming into Flanders, perceiued that Maximilian was neither purueted of men, monie, nor armor, nor of any other thing neceſſarie for the ſetting forth of warre; ſauing onlie that his will was good, although his power was ſmall. King Henrie being aduertiſed hereof by letters ſent to him from his ſaid ambaſſadors, was ſore diſquieted in his mind, and was almoſt brought to his wits end, to conſider how his companions in arms ſhould thus faile him at need; but taking aduiſe of his counſell, at length he determined not to ſtay his prepenſed iournie, and therfore he ſo increaſed his numbers before he tooke ſhip, that he with his owne power might be able to match with his aduerſaries. When he had thus gathered and aſſembled his armie, hee ſailed to Calis the ſixt day of October, and there incamped himſelfe for a ſpace, to ſee all his men and prouiſion in ſuch readineſſe, as nothing ſhould be wanting.

Maximilian dealeth diſhoneſtlie with the king of England to his great vexation.

In this place all the armie had knowledge by the ambaſſadours (which were newlie returned out of Flanders) that Maximilian could not ſet forth anie armie, for lacke of monie: and therefore there was no ſuccour to be looked for at his hand. But the Engliſhmen were nothing diſmaid therewith, as they that iudged themſelues able enough to match the Frenchmen without the helpe of anie other nation. In the meane ſeaſon, although the French king had an armie togither, both for number and furniture able to trie in battell with the Engliſhmen: yet he made ſemblance as though he deſired nothing more than peace, as the thing much more profitable to him than warre: conſidering the minds of the Britains were not yet wholie ſetled.

Maximilian king of Romans breaketh promiſe with king Henrie in ioining with him to inuade France.

The diſſimulation of the French king.

And againe, he was called into Italie to make warre againſt the king of Naples, whoſe kingdome he pretended to apperteine to him by lawfull ſucceſſion from his father king Lewes, to whome Reine duke of Aniou laſt king of Sicill, of the houſe of Aniou, had transferred his right to that kingdome (as partlie before ye haue heard) wrongfullie and without cauſe diſinheriting his coſine, godſonne and heire, Reine duke of Lorraine and Bar. The lord Chordes hauing commiſſion from his maiſter the French king to make ſome entrie into a treatie for peace with the king of England, wrote letters to him before he paſſed ouer to Calis, ſignifieng to him that if it might ſtand with his pleaſure to ſend ſome of his councellors to the borders of the Engliſh pale adioining to France, there ſhould be ſo reaſonable conditions of peace proffered, that he douted not but his grace might with great honour breake vp his campe, and retire his armie home againe.

A motion on the French part for a treatie of peace with the Engliſh.

The king of England conſidering that Britaine was cleerelie loſt, and paſt recouerie, and that Maximilian for lacke of monie, and miſtruſt which he had in his owne ſubiects, laie ſtill like a dormouſe dooing nothing; and herewith weieng that it ſhould be honorable to him, and profitable to his people to determine this great warre without bloudſhed, appointed the biſhop of Exceſter, and Giles lord Daubenie to paſſe

Commiſſioners ſent ouer to Calis about the ſaid peace.

paſſe the ſeas to Calis, and ſo to commun with the lord Cordes of articles of peace, which tooke effect as after ye ſhall perceiue. In the meane time, whileſt the commiſſioners were communing of peace on the marches of France, the king of England (as ye haue heard) was arriued at Calis: from whenſe after all things were prepared for ſuch a iournie, he remoued in foure battels forward, till he came néere to the towne of Bullogne, & there pitched his tents before it in a conuenient place for his purpoſe, meaning to aſſaile the towne with his whole force & puiſſance.

Bullogne beſieged by the Engliſhmen the king himſelfe preſent.

But there was ſuch a ſtrong gariſon of warlike ſouldiers within that fortreſſe, and ſuch plentie of artillerie, and neceſſarie munitions of warre, that the loſſe of Engliſhmen aſſaulting the towne (as was doubted) ſhould be greater damage to the realme of England, than the gaining thereof ſhould be profit. Howbeit the dailie ſhot of the kings battering peeces brake the wals, and ſore defaced them. But when euerie man was readie to giue the aſſault, a ſudden rumor roſe in the armie that peace was concluded: which brute as it was pleaſant to the Frenchmen, ſo was it diſpleſant to the Engliſhmen, bicauſe they were preſt and readie at all times to ſet on their enimies, and brought into great hope to haue béene inriched by the ſpoile and gaine to haue fallen to their lots of their enimies goods, beſide the glorious fame of renowmed victorie.

Why the Engliſh preferred warre before peace.

And therefore to be defrauded hereof by an vnprofitable peace, they were in great fume, and verie angrie: and namelie, for that diuerſe of the capteins to ſet themſelues and their bands the more gorgeouſlie forward, had borrowed large ſummes of monie, and for the repaiment had morgaged their lands and poſſeſſions, and ſome happilie had made through ſale thereof, truſting to recouer all againe by the gaines of this iournie. Wherefore offended with this ſudden concluſion of peace, they ſpake euill both of the king and his councell. But the king like a wiſe prince aſſwaged their diſpleaſure in part with excuſing the matter, alleaging what loſſe and bloudſhed was like to inſue both of capteins and ſouldiers, if the aſſault ſhould haue béene giuen to the vtterance, eſpeciallie ſith the towne was ſo well furniſhed with men and munitions. When he had ſomewhat appeaſed their minds with theſe and manie other reaſons, he returned backe againe to Calis.

Polydor.

Sir Iohn Sauage ſlaine at this ſiege.

There were not manie of the Engliſh armie loſt at this ſiege of Bullogne, & few or no men of name, ſauing that valiant capteine ſir Iohn Sauage knight, the which, as he and ſir Iohn Riſelie rode about the wals of the towne, to view in what place it might be eaſilieſt aſſaulted, was compaſſed about by certeine Frenchmen that were iſſued out of the towne, and there ſlaine ſtanding at defenſe, and vtterlie refuſing to yéeld himſelfe as priſoner. But ſir Iohn Riſelie eſcaped by flieng awaie. When the K. was thus returned to Calis, he began to ſmell a certeine ſecret ſmoke, which was like to turne to a great flame, without wiſe foreſight, and good looking to. For by the craftie inuention, and diuelliſh imagination of the ladie Margaret ducheſſe of Burgognie, a new idoll was ſet vp in Flanders, and by a forged name called Richard Plantagenet ſecond ſonne to king Edward the fourth, as though he had béene raiſed from death to life.

Richard Plantagenet a counterfeit of ladie Margarets imagining.

The newes hereof ſomewhat troubled him, ſo that he was with better will content to receiue the honorable conditions of peace offered of his enimie: bicauſe he ſhould not be conſtreined at one time to make warre both at home, and alſo in a forren region. The concluſion of this agréement made with the Frenchmen, was this: That this peace ſhould continue both their liues; and that the French king ſhould pay to the king of England a certeine ſumme of monie in hand, according as the commiſſioners ſhould appoint for his charges ſuſteined in this iournie. Which (as the king certified the maior of London by his letters the ninth of Nouember) amounted to the ſumme of ſeuen hundred fortie and fiue thouſand duckats: the which is of ſterling monie, one hundred foure ſcore and ſix thouſand, two hundred and fiftie pounds. It was alſo concluded that he ſhould yearelie (for a certeine ſpace) paie or cauſe to be paid, for the monie that the K. had ſpent & expended in the defenſe of the Britans fiue & twentie thouſand crowns.

The concluſion of peace betwéene the Engliſh and French.

Which yearelie tribute the French king (afterwards continuallie occupied in the wars of Italie) yearelie ſatiſfied & paid ſo long as K. Henrie liued; who after he had taried a conuenient ſpace at Calis, tooke the ſea, and arriued at Douer, and ſo came to his manour of Gréenewich. Immediatlie after his returne thus into England, he elected into the fellowſhip of ſaint George, commonlie called the order of the garter, Alphonſe duke of Calabre, ſonne and heire to Ferdinando king of Naples. Chriſtopher Vrſwike the kings almoner was ſent to him vnto Naples with the garter, collar, mantell, and other habilments apperteining to the companions of that noble order. The which was reuerentlie receiued of the ſaid duke, who in a ſolemne preſence reueſted himſelfe with that habit, ſuppoſing by the countenance of that apparell to be able to reſiſt his aduerſarie the French king, ſith he was now made a fréend and companion in order with the king of England: but that little auailed him, as after it was right apparant. [And here, bicauſe in ſundrie actions we haue ſéene and obſerued the French kings ſubtilties, his inconſtancie, lacke of truth, honeſtie, and kinglie modeſtie; we maie be bold to ſet downe the deſcription of his perſon, as we find the ſame readie drawne to hand; that by a view thereof we maie conclude that his properties were proportioned to his perſon.

Alphonſe duke of Calabre made knight of the garter.

Abr. Fl. ex Guic. pag. 43.

The French king deſcribed.

It is verie certeine (ſaith mine author) that king Charles from his infancie was of complexion verie delicate, and of bodie vnſound and diſeaſed, of ſmall ſtature, and of face (if the aſpect and dignitie of his eies had béene taken awaie) fowle and deformed, his other members bearing ſuch equall proportion, that he ſéemed more a monſter than a man: he was not onelie without all knowledge of good ſciences, but ſcarſelie he knew the diſtinct characters of letters: his mind deſirous to command, but more proper to anie other thing, for that being inuironed alwaies with his familiars and fauourits, he reteined with them no maieſtie or authoritie: he reiected all affaires and buſineſſe, and yet if he did debate and conſider in anie, he ſhewed a weake diſcretion and iudgement. And if he had any thing in him that caried apparance of merit or praiſe, yet being thoroughlie weied and ſounded, it was found further off from vertue than from vice: he had an inclination to glorie, but it was tempered more with raſhneſſe and furie than with moderation and counſell: his liberalities were without diſcretion, meaſure, or diſtinction: immoueable oftentimes in his purpoſes, but that was rather an ill grounded obſtinacie than conſtancie. And that which manie call bountie, deſerued more reaſonablie in him the name of coldneſſe & ſlackeneſſe of ſpirit.]

The birth of Henrie duke of Yorke, after crowned king by the name of Henrie the eight.

This yeare the two and twentith of Iune, was borne at Gréenewich the lord Henrie, ſecond ſonne to this king Henrie the ſeuenth, which was created duke of Yorke, & after prince of Wales, and in concluſion ſuccéeded his father in gouernance of this realme, by the name of Henrie the eight, father to our gratious ſoueraigne quéene Elizabeth. But now to returne to the new found ſonne of king Edward, coniured by mens policies from death to life: ye ſhall vnderſtand that the ducheſſe of Burgognie euer deſiring to caſt a ſcorpion in the boſome of king Henrie, not for anie diſpleaſure by him towards hir wrought or done; but onelie bicauſe he was deſcended of the houſe of Lancaſter, being an enimie to hir line, began to ſpin a new web, like a ſpider that dailie weaueth when his kall is torne: for after that the earle of Lincolne, which was by hir ſet forth, had miſſed the cuſhin, and loſt both horſſe and ſpurres, ſhe could not be quiet, vntill ſhe had practiſed a new deuiſe to put king Henrie to trouble. And as the diuell prouideth venemous ſauce to corrupt ſtomachs, ſo for hir purpoſe ſhe eſpied a certeine yong man of viſage beautifull, of countenance demure, and of wit craftie and ſubtill.

1492

The malice of the ducheſſe of Burgognie to the line of Lancaſter.

This youths name was Peter Warbecke, one for his faintneſſe of ſtomach of the Engliſhmen in deriſion called Perkin Warbecke, according to the dutch phraſe, which change the name of Peter to Perkin, of yonglings and little boies, which for want of age, lacke of ſtrength, and manlike courage, are not thought worthie of the name of a man. This yong man trauelling many countries, could ſpeake Engliſh and diuerſe other languages; & for his baſeneſſe of birth and ſtocke, was almoſt vnknowne of all men; and driuen to ſéeke liuing from his childhood, was conſtreined to go and trauell thorough manie countries. The ducheſſe glad to haue got ſo méet an organ for the conueieng of hir inuented purpoſe, as one not vnlike to be taken and reputed for the duke of Yorke, ſonne to hir brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certeine ſpace with hir priuilie.

Perkin warbecke ẏ counterfeit duke of Yorke.

Beſides that, ſhe with ſuch diligence inſtructed him both in the ſecrets and common affaires of the realme of England, and of the linage, deſcent and order of the houſe of Yorke, that like a good ſcholer, not forgetting his leſſon, he could tell all that was taught him promptlie without anie ſtackering or ſtaie in his words. And beſides that, he kept ſuch a princelie countenance, and ſo counterfeit a maieſtie roiall, that all men in manner did firmelie beléeue, that he was extracted of the noble houſe and familie of the dukes of Yorke. For ſuerlie, it was a gift giuen to that noble progenie, as of nature planted in the root, that all the ſequels of that line and ſtocke did ſtudie and deuiſe how to be equiualent in honour and fame with their forefathers and noble predeceſſors.

The readie wit of Perkin to learne all that made for his preferment to honor.

The emulatiõ of the dukes of Yorke.

When the duches had framed hir cloath méet for the market, ſhe was informed that king Henrie prepared to make warre againſt Charles the French king. Wherefore ſhe, thinking that the time ſerued well for the ſetting forth of hir malicious inuention, ſent this Perkin hir new inuented mawmet, firſt into Portingale, and ſo craftilie into the countrie of Ireland; to the intent that he, being both wittie and wilie, might inuegle the rude Iriſhmen (being at thoſe daies more inclined to rebellion than to reaſonable order) to a new ſeditious commotion. Shortlie after his arriuall in Ireland, whether by his ſhrewd wit, or the malicious exhortation of the ſauage Iriſh gouernours, he entred ſo farre in credit with the people of that Ile, that his words were taken to be as true, as he vntruelie with falſe demonſtrations ſet forth and publiſhed them.

Perkin warbecke arriueth in Ireland.

The French king aduertiſed hereof, then being in diſpleaſure with king Henrie, ſent into Ireland for Perkin, to the intent to ſend him againſt king Henrie, which was then inuading France (as yée before haue heard.) Perkin thought himſelfe aloft, now that he was called to the familiaritie of kings, and therefore with all diligence ſailed into France, and comming to the kings preſence, was of him roiallie receiued, and after a princelie faſhion interteined, and had a gard to him aſſigned, whereof was gouernour the lord Congreſhall: and to him being at Paris, reſorted ſir George Neuill baſtard, ſir Iohn Tailor, Rowland Robinſon, and an hundred Engliſh rebels. Now, after that a peace (as before is ſaid) was concluded betwixt the French king, and the king of England, the French king diſmiſſed Perkin, and would no longer kéepe him.

Perkin ſailleth into France eft aſſant.

But ſome haue ſaid (which were there attending on him) that Perkin, fearing leaſt the French king ſhould deliuer him to the king of England, beguiled the lord Congreſhall, and fled from Paris by night. But whether the French king knew of his departure or not, the truth is, that he being in maner in deſpaire, returned to his firſt founder the ladie Margaret, of whome he was ſo welcomed to all outward appearance, that it ſéemed ſhe could not haue reioiſed at anie earthlie thing more, than ſhe did at his preſence, and (as ſhe could well diſſemble) ſhe made ſemblance as though ſhe had neuer ſéene him before that time. Now as ſhe had ſore longed to know not once, but diuerſe times in open audience, and in ſolemne preſence, ſhe willed him to declare and ſhew by what means he was preſerued from death and deſtruction, and in what countries he had wandered and ſought fréendſhip; and finallie, by what chance of fortune he came to hir court.

Perkin returneth to the ladie Margaret his firſt founder.
